granted; but it is contended, at the same time, that that clause has no reference to "Kings," "Princes," or "States," within the States of the Confederacy, but to "Kings," "Princes," and "States," foreign from our territorial limits, and not within the control and operation of our laws. The term treaty is well known to all civilized nations, and carries with it ideas well understood: it is the highest grade of exercising power that belongs to independent sovereign Governments. A mere compact between a Government and any of its own subjects is not a treaty: it must be a compact entered into by sovereign powers, competent to act, free from, and independent of, the control of each other. If I am correct in this position, and that I am (if it were possible to doubt even) I could adduce conclusive authority, there is no farther need to investigate this delegation of power, this declaration of right; and as it never has been contended that our Federal Government possessed any innate rights, or any powers derived a jure divino, but, on the contrary, ever admitted, and most correctly too, that all the powers and rights of the National Government were granted or conceded to it from other Governments, and from the people themselves, to some other concession or grant of power we must look, then, to sustain the position that this power of treaty-making with Indian tribes belongs to the General Government. In continuing our examination of the same instrument, (the articles of the old Confederacy,) we find, in article 9, the following additional delegation of powers to Congress: "The United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive power and right of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective States; fixing the standard of weights and measures, throughout the United States; regulating the trade, and managing all affairs, with Indians, not members of any of the States; provided that the legislative right of any State, within its own limits, be not infringed or violated; establishing and regulating Post-offices," &c. Need I comment on the principles developed in this clause of the charter of the National Government? Upon the subject under discussion, there is no room for doubt—there is no room for quibbling even: the full and ample power of regulating the trade with the Indians, and managing all their affairs, is most undoubtedly given: but the trade and affairs of what Indians? No room to cavil here is left: they are Indians, not members of any of the States. And lest some doubt should here arise, the explanatory proviso is added, "that the legislative right of any State, within its own limits, be not infringed or violated." But a single moment's examination is here necessary before we proceed, I think I may call it adventure, in search of the power claimed and exercised by the National Government.

It is contended that this clause, at the same time that it grants the power of regulating the Indian affairs, expressly confines and limits the exercise of that power exclusively to Indians not within the limits of any State; or else, why contradistinguish any portion of Indians by the terms "not being members of any of the States?" It is clear to my mind, that it was not only the intention, but that that intention is most fully developed, that the power of regulating Indian trade, and managing Indian affairs, out of the jurisdictional limits of any of the States, was most fully and exclusively given to the Confederacy; but that this power should not be conferred over Indians within any State, unless sanctioned by the legislative authority of such State. If this be not the proper and strictly legal construction of the whole clause, I am at some loss to know what effect to give to the proviso. Without this proviso, no matter what might have been the circumstances of any State, within whose limits there were Indians, there could not be any interference on the part of the Confederacy without the direction and assent of at least nine of the States; the time taken in the procurement of such assent might have been attended with important consequences. To my mind, therefore, it appears quite clear, that, at the same time that unlimited control was given over Indians out of the States, there should be a limited control over Indians within the States; preserving, however, the full and ample legislative jurisdiction and power within the limits of each and any State. It is, therefore, evident that, so far, we have not traced the investment of this power in Congress; but, if our former position was correct, that the whole power of the British Crown passed to the States, respectively, we contend, that, as I have shown you, this power of purchasing lands and regulating Indian concerns, belonged to the Crown, and that it passed from thence into each of the States; and, inasmuch as all power which belongs to the National Government springs from grants and concessions made by these States, and as it cannot be shown that, by the articles of confederation, this power was not granted or conceded, but, on the contrary, expressly retained to each State of which Indians were members, I must maintain the ground that, prior, and subsequent to, the Confederation, the power of regulating Indian affairs, and purchasing Indian lands, belonged, exclusively, to the State within whose limits Indians were.

The next step, in the investigation of this subject, I propose to take, is the examination of the different surrenders of the waste lands, by the different States, to the General Government; and to see if any power was conveyed or relinquished to the National Government, which impaired or lessened the powers retained to the States. I have before observed, that, in the common cause against the common enemy, obligations were created, which, upon the establishment of peace, it was universally conceded should be borne in common. As this led to the formation of a National Government, to regulate commerce, and to secure the collection of customs in aid of the revenue, policy dictated a surrender of property which, though claimed by a few, had been protected and defended by the whole. We see the State of Virginia, with a magnanimity only equalled by her own patriotism, making the greatest sacrifice upon this altar of her common country—her charter, the first and the greatest, embracing within its limits the whole Northwestern territory—reserving to her own State troops the pledges already made in these lands, the whole beside was freely given—embracing, now, the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. North Carolina surrendered the State of Tennessee upon like condition. To prevent future embarrassment, each State that set up any claim to any of those waste lands made a relinquishment to the United States. Afterwards Georgia sold her claim, from the Chatahoochie to the Mississippi River.

I shall now proceed to the examination of some of the conditions of those grants; and the first I shall notice is that of the great State of New York. Her cession was accepted in 1781; and, after reciting the principles and policy which induced the surrender on her part, which were wholly to promote the general interest, the following are the main conditions on her part exacted. After defining her limits, it follows: "And we do, by these presents, in the name of the people, and for and in behalf of the State of New York, and by virtue of the power and trust committed to us by the said act and commission, cede, transfer, and forever relinquish, to and for the only use and benefit of such of the States as are, or shall become, parties to the Articles of Confederation, all the right, title, interest, jurisdiction, and claim, of the said State of New York, to all lands and territories to the northward and westward of the boundaries to which the said State is in manner aforesaid limited and restricted; and to be granted, disposed of, and appropriated, in such manner only as the Congress of the United or Confederate States shall order and direct." The terms of this cession are clear and intelligible; the whole title and jurisdiction to all lands presumed to be within her charter, beyond the western and northern limits, then defined and established, are fully and completely conveyed to, and vested in, the Congress of the United or Confederate States, to be by said Congress disposed of for the benefit of the whole of such States, and such alone as became, or were, of the Confederacy. Here it is evident that all the power and right that formerly pertained to New York over this whole territory, and, of course, all who dwelt thereon, is transferred and conveyed to the Congress of the United States. But this transfer, it is evident, only extends to the territory surrendered; nothing of her right and jurisdiction to that portion retained, and constituting the State, is at all impaired; but, on the contrary, the very act of surrender and acceptance establishes them beyond question. New York, then, by her surrender of vacant territory, lost no power or right over her own soil and the people thereon. If, therefore, that State has lost any thing of her full and complete sovereignty, it is to be found in the Articles of Confederation alone, up to the period we are now investigating.

The next I shall proceed to is the State of Virginia: Her session was made in 1784. I will here give the language by which the powers vested in her delegates were granted, viz: "To convey, transfer, assign, and make over, unto the United States in Congress assembled, for the benefit of the said States, all right, title, and claim, as well of soil as jurisdiction, which this Commonwealth hath to the territory or tract of country within the limits of the Virginia charter, situate, lying, and being to the northwest of the river Ohio; subject to the terms and conditions contained in the before recited act of Congress of the 18th day of September last; that is to say, upon condition that the territory so ceded shall be laid out and formed into States, containing a suitable extent of territory, not less than one hundred, nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances will admit; and that the States so formed, shall be distinct Republican States, and admitted members of the Federal Union, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States." Then follow sundry conditions: expenses for defending the surrendered territory, confirmations of the lands claimed and settled by the French, a special grant to Clarke's regiment and military reservations, and concludes: "That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States, as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation or Federal Alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

Afterwards, in 1786, the reservation in respect to the limits of the States to be formed of the territory northwest of the Ohio, was recommended for alteration by Congress, and acceded to, in 1788, by Virginia. This, then, constitutes the whole of the surrender of Virginia, embracing, in full and clear terms, the country surrendered, the extent of the surrender, and the purposes of that surrender. The country surrendered, now composes the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; and the purposes of the surrender were for the benefit of the whole Federal Alliance; the extent of the surrender covered the whole unappropriated soil and the entire jurisdiction, vesting, of course, all the right Virginia had in the soil, in the United States, and transferring all her jurisdiction, indirect and collateral, to the United States. Here, as in the State of New York, no right or jurisdiction to the retained limits of Virginia is impaired, or in any manner transferred; the whole transfer is confined to, and limited by, the territory surrendered. In the case of Virginia an important condition is annexed to the transfer, and that is, that, of the territory surrendered, a certain number of States should be formed, which States should be "distinct republican States, and admitted members of the Federal Union; having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States."

The States, therefore, admitted into the Federal Alliance within this ceded territory, must have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States, (as Virginia,) who surrendered their soil, had, or as the whole of the States, who received the surrender, had. Virginia retained all her sovereignty and jurisdiction over her own limits entirely unimpaired, save only in the concessions made by the Articles of Confederation. How can the States admitted into the Union under Virginia's surrender come into the alliance with impaired powers or limited rights? It is contended that they have not.

Afterwards, in 1785, Massachusetts made her surrender; and in 1786, Connecticut made hers; in both instances, in the terms and on the conditions of the surrender of New York. In 1800, Connecticut surrendered her Western reserve. In 1787, South Carolina made her cession, with the magnanimity that has ever characterized her public acts, when her country's weal was in question, without price or reward, in terms as follows: "Do by these presents, assign, transfer, quit-claim, cede, and convey to the United States of America, for their benefit, South Carolina inclusive, all the right, title, interest, jurisdiction, and claim, which the State of South Carolina hath in and to the before mentioned and described territory or tract of country," &c. In 1790, North Carolina made her cession; and, as reasons that induced to it, the payment of the public debt and preserving the harmony of the Confederacy are enumerated, and the cession made, after stating the conditions, of which are the reservation of bounty lands, the protection of the people surrendered, &c., the cession then follows: "Do, by these presents, convey, assign, and set over, unto the United States of America, for the benefit of the said States, North Carolina inclusive, all right, title, and claim, which the said State hath to the sovereignty and territory of the lands situated," &c., &c. Here it is to be observed, that the sovereignty is only surrendered over the territory surrendered, impairing, in no degree, either the sovereignty, or right of soil in the States making such surrenders.

The next and last to be examined is the cession of Georgia, in 1802, by an actual compact with the United States. The whole territory west of the Chatahoochie to the Mississippi, now including the States of Alabama and Mississippi, was, by this cession, transferred from Georgia to the United States; and the conditions now proper to be noticed are as follows: The payment, out of the proceeds of the sales of the lands surrendered to Georgia, of one million and a half of dollars; certain land claims to be confirmed; the lands surrendered to constitute a common fund; and that the Indian title to lands still remaining within the retained limits of Georgia to be extinguished, at the cost and expense of the United States; and that "the territory thus ceded shall form a State, and be admitted, as such, into the Union, as soon as it shall contain sixty thousand inhabitants, or at an earlier period, if Congress shall think it expedient, with the same privileges, and in the same manner as is provided in the ordinance of Congress, of the thirteenth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, for the Government of the Northwestern territory of the United States; which ordinance shall, in all its parts, extend to the territory contained in the present act of cession, that article only excepted which forbids slavery."

Thus, it will be observed, that, so late as the year 1802, it was deemed proper to stipulate, by actual covenant, that the Government of the United States should extinguish the whole Indian title of one of the States, at the actual cost and expense of the General Government; and the execution of this condition is secured, by making it one of the considerations of the surrender of an extensive tract of waste land. Georgia has surrendered the soil, territory and jurisdiction, of the States of Mississippi and Alabama, to the General Government. So far, then, this places this portion of country in the precise situation of the Northwestern territory as surrendered by Virginia, with the single proviso, that one article in the ordinance for the government of that territory shall not be here enforced, viz: the article prohibiting slavery. Is there any thing to be deduced from the surrenders, on the part of the different States, which I have here thought proper, at some length, to introduce, favorable to the treaty-making policy of the General Government with our Indian tribes? On the contrary, I think it is conclusively shown, that, in every instance, except one, this whole matter is exclusively retained in the States making the surrenders. That exception is in the case of Georgia; and the extinguishment of her Indian title is guaranteed. Indeed, no one will contend that, if any thing is granted by the surrenders, it is not proper that the thing granted should actually be expressed in the surrender; nor can any contend that any thing is given up by the surrender that is not embraced in it. Therefore, in every instance, the whole of the terms of the surrender are applied exclusively to the country surrendered. The country, therefore, retained, either in government, soil, or jurisdiction, is in no degree affected.

I think I have shown that anterior to these several surrenders, so far as the Articles of Confederation went, the power of controlling this subject belonged exclusively to the several States. If it belonged to the States originally members of the Confederacy, it certainly belonged, in the same manner, to the States subsequently admitted into that Confederacy. But it may be said that the States subsequently admitted were admitted upon certain conditions. This is admitted. But what were those conditions? They are precisely those stipulated for in the terms and conditions of the surrender of the country which they now embrace in their limits. The leading and prominent conditions, then, are, that their constitutions shall be democratic; that there shall be no interference in the sale of the public lands; that certain navigable streams shall be forever free to the citizens of all the States; and that, besides these, to be on a perfect footing of equality with the other States. Some doubt the constitutionality of these conditions, and say that no State can be admitted into the Union without a perfect equality in every respect. This question does not come up. It is enough for the purpose under consideration to show, that, so far as regulating Indian concerns goes, they are not of the stipulations: therefore, whatever rights, on this point, pertain to the old States, unquestionably belong to the new ones. Upon the ground that this right ceased by the State surrendering the territory and jurisdiction to the General Government, it is claimed to have passed into such new State as has been formed, so soon as the consent of Congress has been obtained for its admission into the Union. In other words, all the power and jurisdiction over the surrendered territory belonged alone to the General Government, during its territorial vassalage, and, with the sole exception of the conditions of admission into the Union, are there any exceptions or conditions in favor of the General Government, if even there be such? I do, therefore, claim that, in this respect, there is no shadow of difference in the rights of the States. I think I have shown that neither the Articles of Confederation nor the surrendering of waste lands have divested the several States of the sole and exclusive power over the Indian tribes within their respective limits, that passed into those States, respectively, from the British Crown, by their successful struggle for independence.

The next point of examination I propose, is the Constitution of the United States. Through the various stages of our political existence, the powers of the confederated States have undergone various modifications, until all the power now vested in the Government of the United States, is expressed and circumscribed by that instrument. Nor need we have looked elsewhere in the investigation of this question, unless historic facts had been necessary to explain some of its provisions; and I think that the subject now before us derives that advantage. I have shown that, in the progress of our Government, certain powers for certain specified purposes, were found necessary to be conveyed to, and centered in, one head, to wit: the means of defraying the expenses of a common cause, and of raising a revenue for the payment of a debt created in a common struggle; and, in addition to these, for controlling and regulating a national intercourse with foreign powers, and of regulating all foreign commerce, as well as commerce between the several States. These were the points that presented difficulties; and it was to control these that one common umpire was to be created. That umpire is the General Government, and it is created by the Constitution of the United States. In the history of the different stages of our political existence, was it found that any thing belonging exclusively to, and confined within the limits of, any of the States, claimed a reference to this general umpire? It is thought not. But, on the other hand, it is considered evident, that any thing that did not concern the whole was not to be matter for the management of the power created by the whole. In other words, any thing that was purely of State concern was still to continue so; and a reference to the instrument itself will clearly sustain this position. The powers of Congress pertain to subjects of general concern; and so it is with all other powers of the General Government. But the point now under review is embraced in the 8th section of the first article: in enumerating the powers of Congress, with others, it is said, "The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." Does this clause grant the power of making a treaty for the extinction of Indian title to lands within any State? Or does the following clause divest the States of the power of purchasing Indian titles to lands within their respective limits? Section 10: "No State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit, make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts, or grant any title of nobility." Is this intended to prevent a State regulating the concerns of her own people within her own limits? or is it intended to prevent these things, here enumerated, from being done with others, foreign to herself, so far as the treaty, alliance, or confederation, is concerned? It is conceived that the first clause does not grant the power to the General Government of making treaties with Indians; and the second does not prevent the States from exercising any power on this subject heretofore belonging to them. But a few remarks will bear me out in this position. Can the Congress, under her power of regulating commerce with the Indian tribes, remove thousands of Indians from one State, and plant them in another? Or can Congress, if any State thought proper to interpose, take Indians from such State? Suppose a State should grant her Indian population the same rights and privileges that are granted to her citizens, and they partook of, and exercised, such rights and privileges, could Congress interpose, and prohibit this policy? Suppose they were made competent to civil rule, could they be deprived of this right by any act of Congress? If these questions are answered in the negative, it will at once present itself, that, if a State interpose obstacles to, other than purely regulating, commerce with Indian tribes, that Congress has not the power to remove them; and, on the other hand, if the State exercise a power over, and grant a privilege to, the Indians within her limits, Congress cannot prohibit it. It must follow, then, that whatever of power is here given, must be over those who are not under the immediate and paramount authority of State jurisdiction. Otherwise, to what absurd consequences would it lead? Might not the President and Senate, at any time, destroy and overrun any one of the States in which there are public lands, by removing the Indians from any other State to such lands? Might not the whole of Mississippi be granted to the Choctaws, Illinois to the Pottawatamies or Winnebagoes, and Alabama to the Muscogees or Creeks? These ideas will be said to be absurd; but these ideas are constitutional if the Indian treaty-making power be so. But in addition to this, where is the power to prevent this same treaty-making power from removing Indian tribes, if you please, and locating them upon the public grounds in this district? Who can prevent the same authority from filling your arsenals, your forts, and other national domains, or possessions, with this greatly favored people? But I am answered and told that the States in which there are public lands can exercise no control, because the land on which the Indian lives, when the title is extinguished, becomes a part of the public lands, and is beyond the jurisdiction of a State Government; and, to sustain this ground, I may be referred to the 4th article of the ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio, which says:

"The said territory, and the States which may be formed therein, shall forever remain a part of this Confederacy of the United States of America, subject to the Articles of Confederation, and to such alterations therein as shall be constitutionally made, and to all acts and ordinances of the United States in Congress assembled conformable thereto. The inhabitants and settlers in said territory shall be subject to pay a part of the Federal debts contracted, or to be contracted, and a proportional part of the expenses of Government, to be apportioned on them by Congress, according to the same common rule and manner by which apportionments thereof shall be made on the other States; and the taxes for paying their proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the district or districts, or new States, as in the original States, within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled. The Legislatures of those new States or districts shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States in Congress assembled, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers; no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents. The navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the Confederacy, without any tax, impost, or duty, therefor."

Has this clause directly, or indirectly, any grant of power to the Confederacy, or any prohibition to the States, in relation to the question under consideration? or is it not known that the soil may be in the General Government, and the people living thereon subject to the municipal regulations of the State in which that soil may lie? It is humbly conceived that this clause of the ordinance does not change the character of the policy originally existing in relation to Indians. But, before I proceed farther, another clause in the before-recited ordinance must be noticed; some have said that it is conclusive on this question; it is the third article, and is as follows: "Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government, and the happiness of mankind, schools, and the means of education, shall forever be encouraged; the utmost good faith shall always be observed towards the Indians; their lands and property shall never be taken from them without their consent; and in their property, rights, and liberty, they shall never be invaded or disturbed, unless in just and lawful wars, authorized by Congress; but laws founded in justice and humanity shall, from time to time, be made, for preventing wrongs being done to them, and for preserving peace and friendship with them." The first consideration that presents itself, in relation to the last-recited article, is, how far this is now a principle of the National Government, in reference to all the Indian tribes, or is it a legislative act, municipal in its character, and exclusively applicable to a region of country in which soil and jurisdiction were exclusively in the National Government? This was so: for it is solely applicable to the territory that but three years before this time belonged exclusively to Virginia: for, let it be remembered that this ordinance is exclusive in its operation to the lands lately surrendered by a State, which State, anterior to this surrender, could have wholly disregarded such ordinance, had it then been made. So far, therefore, from this weakening my positions, it certainly gives them strength, and is fully developed in the history of the day, as being the then received opinion, and thenceforth became the adopted practice of the National Government. What is this history? It has, in part, been already noticed; it pertained to the surrender of the waste lands. Until this surrender, a system of depredation and continual warfare was waged upon the savages, and that too with the sanction of the Government that claimed jurisdiction to the land. This system not only endangered but sacrificed the quiet of not merely the people of the State, who were sanctioned in their Indian wars, so called, but of all the contiguous States. The surrender being made, we find for which, among the other considerations enumerated, "that the necessary and reasonable expenses incurred, &c., in maintaining forts and garrisons within, and for the defence, or in acquiring any part, of the territory so ceded or relinquished, shall be fully reimbursed by the States." This ordinance was therefore adopted for the government of the surrendered territory, and over the Indians therein, and is evidently the assumption of a policy, as contradistinguished from the policy that had heretofore characterized the Government which had just now ceased to exist over this same region of country. I look, therefore, upon this, as being confirmatory of what I have heretofore contended for, to wit: that, if the General Government wishes to enforce this policy in relation to Indian tribes, the lands on which such tribes lived must be excluded from the limits of any State; and this is farther exemplified by this clause never having been introduced into any act specifying the conditions of admission into the Union of any new State, not even of the States formed of the territory over which this ordinance was first made operative.

Thus, in relation to this question, I think I have presented the fundamental principles on which, if it exists in the General Government, it must assuredly rest. If the power to make treaties with Indians residing within the limits of any of the States is now claimed for the General Government, it must be derived from some clause or clauses of the Articles of Confederation, in the voluntary relinquishments made by the States in the conveyance of their waste lands, or in the Constitution of the United States, which I have troubled your patience and consumed your time in bringing into view. For my own part, after this thorough examination, I am the more firmly convinced of the correctness of the positions I have endeavored to maintain.

Mr. GILMER said that, after the ample discussion which the subject before the committee had received, he should content himself with stating one or two facts connected with it, and adding a few necessary comments. The first question (said Mr. G.) which presented itself for determination was, to whom the unexpended balance of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars belonged, after satisfying the Georgia claimants. He had no doubt that it belonged to the United States. When, however, he admitted this, he wished it to be understood, that, according to his interpretation of the contract between the United States, Georgia, and the Creeks, all parties supposed that, when the contract was faithfully executed, there would, most probably, be no balance whatever. Mr. G. said that this matter would be better understood by a knowledge of the circumstances under which that contract was entered into. In 1821, commissioners, on the part of the United States, proceeded to make a treaty with the Creek Indians, for the extinguishment of their title to lands in Georgia, in pursuance of an appropriation of money specially made by Congress for that purpose; that, according to instructions given to those commissioners by the War Department, (and here he wished the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to correct him if he were in error,) they were not to exceed ten cents per acre in price, for what they should acquire of the Creeks. That, accordingly, the commissioners had contracted with that tribe that it should cede to the United States, for the benefit of Georgia, four and a half millions of acres, for which they were to receive four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. That, after these terms had been agreed upon, but before the treaty had been signed, commissioners on the part of Georgia presented to the Creek chiefs, claims of the citizens of that State against their tribe, amounting to the sum of two hundred and eighty thousand dollars, and required that they should be adjusted. It was then agreed, between the several parties, that the Creeks should receive of the United States two hundred thousand dollars, in money, for their land, and the remaining two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, which they were to have received, should be paid by the United States, to the State of Georgia, for the benefit of her citizens, who had received injuries from the Creeks; subject, however, to the investigation and determination of the President of the United States. In pursuance of which agreement, (Mr. G. observed,) the commissioners of Georgia gave to the Creek tribe a receipt in full of all claims, debts, damages, and property, which the citizens of that State had against that tribe, prior to 1802. And the United States agreed to pay to the citizens of Georgia, those claims, debts, damages, and property, provided the same did not exceed two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Mr. G. observed that each of the parties to this contract seemed to have had an equal reason to be satisfied. The Indians had sold their land for a larger consideration than usual, and, with two hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the price, had paid an account which the Georgians had against them of thirty years' standing, most of which they had frequently acknowledged to be just; and amounting to the sum of two hundred and eighty thousand dollars. The Georgians were very much pleased, because, by the construction which the United States had put upon the constitution, their own State Government had not the power of compelling the Creeks to restore their property, or otherwise to do them justice; by which, previously, it had seemed as if they were to have been deprived entirely of redress for their injuries. And the commissioners of the United States were gratified, because they had been enabled not only to perform the purpose for which they had been originally appointed, by procuring a valuable tract of country for the State of Georgia, but also to render an essential service to a large class of injured citizens. There was also a possibility, that, by assuming the payment of the claims of the citizens of Georgia, with the power given to the President to adjudicate those claims, the United States might have a less sum to advance than that which it would otherwise have been obliged to have paid the Indians. It was to be remarked too, (Mr. G. said,) that the United States commissioners had taken care that this Government should not, in any event, pay more than two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and with a farther beneficial proviso, that whatever sum should be found due might be paid in five annual instalments, and without interest. Mr. G. observed that, if the view he had taken of the contract between all the parties was correct, he thought there could be no difficulty as to the disposition of what should remain of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, after satisfying all the Georgia claimants.

Mr. G. said that he would proceed to show that the United States Government had not done justice to the citizens of Georgia in its adjudication of their demands against the Creek Indians. They had been told that they should be satisfied, because that adjudication was made by an arbiter chosen by themselves. The proper answer to which (Mr. G. said) was, that that circumstance aggravated the feelings excited by the injustice done them, especially as that arbiter had gained in proportion to their loss. This Government never can compensate the citizens of Georgia for the injuries they received from their savage neighbors. Those injuries could not be estimated in money. Mr. G. said that the most rigid rules had been imposed by the Government upon itself, in allowing the claims of the citizens of Georgia. He did not intend to say that the Government intended thereby to do injustice to those citizens. He thought that the peculiar circumstances under which those claims had originated had never been considered by the Government. Had that been done, he believed it would have been convinced that the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars was a very inadequate satisfaction of those claims.

Mr. G. then proceeded to say, that, during the Revolutionary war the inhabitants of Georgia were at one time almost entirely driven beyond its limits, by the Creek Indians and their allies. At its conclusion, feelings of hostility had not ceased to exist. Repeated injuries were inflicted upon the frontier inhabitants, which the weakness of the State Government rendered it unable to punish. Attempts were frequently made to conciliate the Creeks. Treaty after treaty was made, from 1788 to 1790. They were, however, broken as often as made, without the Government having the power to enforce them. The frontiers were very extensive, and the population so scattered that the Indians had an easy access into the country, everywhere, for the purposes of plunder. The people were compelled to protect themselves by fortifications of their own making. Block houses were erected by them, and manned by voluntary service, in order to intercept and punish the predatory parties of the Indians. This service was extremely burdensome to inhabitants just arrived from distant parts of the United States, and with scanty means of support. Mr. G. continued to say that the loss of slaves, horses, and cattle, could not then be repaired by the people, as they could at the present time. The value of such property was far greater then than at present. The country was to be cleared of its forests to fit it for cultivation. Labor was not to be hired. There was no supplying the place of a lost horse, or stolen cattle, because the people, in moving from Virginia and North Carolina, found it difficult to carry with them a sufficient supply for their own use. The loss of cattle (Mr. G. said) was particularly felt, because thereby the people were deprived of their most usual and cheapest means of subsistence. One of the principal inducements to the settlement of the country had been the advantages which its extensive range presented, abounding, as it did, with grass and cane.

The exuberance of the natural vegetation of the country, instead of proving an advantage to the settlers, had been frequently the occasion of their greatest losses, by exposing their horses, and stock to the thieving habits of the Indians. But the injuries (Mr. G. said) which the frontier inhabitants suffered, by having their property plundered and destroyed, were accompanied by evils the extent of which could only be known to those who had felt them. He said it was his fortune to have been a native of the county which bordered both on the Creek and Cherokee hunting grounds. He could yet recollect the horrid views of the Indian scalping knife which were presented to him in the dreams of his childhood. From the commencement of the Revolutionary war, until 1794 and 1795, the Creek Indians continued to commit occasional acts of the greatest barbarity upon the frontier people. The Government had been either unable, or neglected, to furnish the necessary protection to its citizens. After a military force was finally authorized by this Government, and troops had been enlisted from among the people of Georgia, it was a matter of history, familiar to every member of the committee, that those troops had scarcely yet been paid. For more than thirty years, year after year, they had petitioned in vain. Mr. G. said that he had attempted to describe the kind and peculiar value of the property of which the Georgia claimants had been plundered, by the Creek Indians; their continued apprehension of Indian attacks; and the want of protection on the part of the Government; in order to show, more clearly, the injustice which had been done them, by the manner in which their claims had been heretofore adjudicated, and as the best commentary upon the reasoning of the Secretary of War and the Attorney-General.

Mr. G. then proceeded briefly to consider the different classes of claims which he supposed had been improperly rejected. First, that for property destroyed previous to the treaty of New York; secondly, that for interest upon claims which had been allowed; and, thirdly, that for the value of the increase of those female slaves who had been taken by the Creeks, and not restored, according to the conditions of treaties. As to the class of claims for property destroyed, which had been rejected because the treaty of New York did not provide for them, Mr. G. said that the treaty at the Indian Springs specially contracted for the payment of property destroyed prior to 1802. This stipulation of that treaty had been pressed upon the House with its full weight, by his colleagues and other gentlemen. It was not his intention to say any thing more upon that subject. He was desirous of showing to the committee that the provisions of the treaty of New York ought not to affect injuriously the claims of the citizens of Georgia. That treaty, he said, was, perhaps, the first act of the United States Government which usurped power which properly belonged to the States. It was so considered at the time. The first voice heard in the Congress of the United States, against the encroaching spirit of Federal dominion, was from a representative of Georgia, in relation to the treaty of New York. By that treaty the Government of the United States guarantied to the Creek tribe of Indians, lands which that tribe had previously conveyed to Georgia. By it, the United States obtained from the Creeks a stipulation that they would hold no treaty with Georgia. And, by the same treaty, the United States agreed that, if any citizens of Georgia should attempt to settle on lands claimed by the Creeks, such citizens should be placed without the protection of the United States, and punished as the Indians thought proper.

Mr. G. asked the members of the committee to examine that treaty, and judge for themselves whether the citizens of Georgia ought to lose the right to have their injuries redressed, because compensation was not provided by it.

Georgia Claims.

What right had the United States Government to place beyond its protection its citizens, who, by virtue of grants of land made to them by the State of Georgia, within her own limits, and in payment to those citizens for revolutionary services, settled on lands which the United States thought proper to consider Indian property? By that treaty, a citizen of the United States might have been burnt at the Indian stake, without the right of rescue by his Government! It was made, too, by one McGillivray, the son of a tory, and an Indian, who felt by inheritance the deepest malignity, and most unrelenting revenge, towards the people of Georgia. What means had the people of that State of making known to the United States Government, at the treaty of New York, their claims for property destroyed? And yet, by their omission to do so, a considerable portion of the injuries received by the people of Georgia, from the Creek Indians, previous to the making of that treaty, were to remain undressed. Was it right for the United States to take advantage of its own wrong?

The second class of claims which had been rejected by the Government, consisted of those the principal of which had been allowed, and upon which interest had been refused. Mr. G. said that he had already endeavored to show that the most liberal allowance ought to be made in favor of all the claims before the committee. He did not consider the claimants as demanding interest of the Government, but as insisting upon the equitable lien they had upon the funds in its hands, for a full and just compensation for the injuries they had sustained. He did not consider that interest upon the value of their losses, from the time when their property was taken or destroyed, would really be ample satisfaction to the claimants for the kind of depredations committed upon them, but as furnishing the only fixed rule by which a uniform estimate could be made. The claim of interest was upon the fund appropriated for the payment of the claims, and not upon the public treasury. The question really was, whether the claimants, whose demands had remained unsatisfied for thirty or forty years, had not a more equitable lien upon the unexpended balance of the two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, for compensation to them for the time they had lost the use of their property, than any right to it on the part of the Government. That compensation to the claimants had, however, been resisted, through the opinion of the Attorney-General. The claimants would have been better satisfied to have had the justice of their demands decided upon by the sense of equity of the Chief Magistrate of their country, by whom, according to compact, they were to have been adjudicated, than by the technical rules of the Government's law officer. That high officer had determined that interest did not follow a claim for unliquidated damages. Nominally, he was right; but, substantially, wrong. The claims were not for un-liquidated damages, but for specific property in the possession of the Creek Indians, which belonged to citizens of Georgia, and which the Creek tribe, by various treaties, had promised to restore to its owners. If the Indians could have been sued in the courts of law, the remedy for the Georgia claimants would have been an action of trover, in which they would have been entitled to recover their property, or its value in lieu thereof, together with damages equal to the value of the use of the property, from the time at which it had been demanded until the termination of the suit. That was the law of the State within which both parties resided. It was a rule of equity that the compensation for injuries should be fully equal to the loss sustained. Was there any reason why the Georgia claimants should not have that justice done them, by their Government, which one citizen could compel of another, by the strict rules of law? Surely, it was not because the Government had neglected to compel the Creeks to perform the stipulations of their treaties. Had the Government done its duty, the Georgia claimants would have had their property restored to them more than thirty years ago. It could not be said that the State of Georgia had neglected the use of any means in its power to obtain redress for its citizens. [Mr. GILMER then read resolutions of the Legislature of that State, directing the manner in which the claims of its citizens should be proven, and demand made of the Creek Indians.] The Attorney-General had given, as a reason why interest should not be allowed upon the Georgia claims, that the property for which they had been paid had been estimated at double its value. In this he speaks without authority, and most disrespectfully of the United States Commissioners, and the witnesses by whose oaths that valuation was made. There were many other most obvious objections to the opinions of the Attorney-General. He had determined, for reasons peculiar to himself, not to urge that subject any farther. His colleague (Mr. WILDE) had performed that duty, in the most satisfactory manner.

The third class of claims rejected, (Mr. G. said,) was that for the increase of those female slaves who had been taken by the Creek Indians from the citizens of Georgia, and not restored according to the conditions of their treaties with that State, and those with the United States. These claims were founded in that principle of law, by which the issue of female property followed the state of its mother. The right of the Georgia claimants to recover the identical slaves they had lost, was acknowledged by all the treaties having reference to that kind of property. The stipulations of all the treaties was, that the negroes taken from the citizens of Georgia should be restored, and not that they should be paid for in money. If the Indians who were in the possession of the issue of the female slaves could have been sued in the courts of Georgia, by the original owners of such female slaves, the Georgia claimants would, no doubt, have recovered. The claimants contend for no right but what was sanctioned by the law. The difficulty had proceeded from the impossibility of compelling that branch of the Government which alone had the power of redress in its hands to enforce that right. It was well known to all the Southern gentlemen, that female slave property, which was owned thirty years ago, had yielded a much larger profit than any other equal amount of capital whatever. And hence it was (Mr. G. said) that the Georgia claimants who had lost such property by the acts of the Creek Indians, were entitled to the redress sought for them.

In conclusion, Mr. G. repeated that, by the treaty of the Indian Springs, the Creek chiefs had contracted to relinquish a certain quantity of land to the United States, on condition that it would pay to them two hundred thousand dollars in money, and satisfy the claims of Georgia against their tribes, estimated by the parties at two hundred and eighty thousand dollars. That the value of the lands relinquished by the Indians was considered by them as worth four hundred and fifty thousand dollars, thereby making the consideration received by the United States for its contract to pay the citizens of Georgia, equal to the sum of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. That the United States, having the power to adjudicate the claims of those citizens, had circumscribed them within such narrow bounds that the larger portion of the fund appropriated by the Indians for their payment, had, instead of being applied to that purpose, gone into the Treasury of the United States. That it was inconsistent with her character as an arbiter, and still more with her national character for justice, to deprive her own citizens of a fund which had been appropriated for the payment of losses sustained by them, under circumstances of peculiar hardship, and occasioned, partly, too, by the neglect or want of power in the Government to protect them. He, therefore, confidently trusted that the committee would support the motion of his colleague, and determine that it was expedient to have farther legislation in favor of the claims of the citizens of Georgia.

SATURDAY, January 17.

Amendment of the Rules.

The resolution, offered on Thursday, by Mr. WICKLIFFE, coming up,

Mr. RAMSEY addressed the House in support of the resolution. He had been taught (he said) from his infancy, that a Representative of the people ought always to vote viva voce. In Pennsylvania, the constitution says expressly that such shall be the case. The practice, if adopted in this body, would occasion none of the delay which some gentlemen seemed so much to apprehend. In the Legislature of Pennsylvania, they elected all their officers viva voce, and the whole election was usually gone through with in about half an hour. That body lately elected a State treasurer, and the whole matter did not occupy more than fifteen minutes. All the delay necessary was the time occupied in calling over the names of the members. Mr. R. said it was his fixed opinion that all persons represented either in a county, a State, or the United States, should have the votes which they gave in their representative capacities recorded. A representative is merely the mouthpiece, the mere agent, of those who send him; and it is their right to know how he has transacted their business. It had been said by some gentleman, yesterday, that, if any constituent wanted to know how his Representative had voted in any particular case, he might call upon him and inquire. But how would this be possible in such States as Missouri and Illinois, which have but one representative on this floor? Those States were nearly as large as the State of Pennsylvania, and the Representative might live in one corner of them. Were his constituents to travel two or three hundred miles to ask such a question? I do not want to lay them under any such necessity. I would have the Representative vote in every case viva voce, and let his vote be put on record, and let his constituents know what it has been.

Mr. BARTLETT said he would vote very manfully for the resolution if any reason could be shown why the present mode of election was not a good one, and why the mode proposed would be better. From the commencement of the Government the practice of electing by ballot had been uniformly observed; and he had listened with attention to the mover of the resolution to hear what evil attended it; but he had listened in vain. He was opposed to hasty changes in legislation, and never would adopt them without a strong probability of some benefit to follow. In the present case, the mover of the resolution had not been able to state a single evil or inconvenience arising from the existing practice. He had, indeed, placed the matter upon the ostensible ground, that the votes of every member would, by this means, be known to his constituents. Now, for his own part, he had never once heard it stated that any attempt had been made to conceal the course taken by gentlemen in elections in this House. Gentlemen had indeed told the House that the practice of voting viva voce prevailed in some of the States. This might be so; but, wherever it did prevail, he believed it to have been originally adopted because the Representatives were not all able to read and write. That reason, he trusted, would not be held as operating in this House. He presumed there was no danger of imposition here from the want of the votes being uttered in an audible voice.

Mr. BARRINGER said: We are elected by the people to do what? To enact laws, to prescribe rules by which we are to be governed.

JANUARY, 1829.]

Cumberland Road.

[H. OF R.]

Is that the end for which a Speaker of this House is chosen? The Speaker makes no rules for us; it is we who dictate laws and prescribe rules for him. He is merely an Executive officer, whose duty it is to carry into effect such regulations as we choose to lay down. In every part of his duty he is wholly subject to our will. His office is ministerial; ours is legislative. The House prescribes to him rules so plain that he who runs may read them; and whenever he deviates from any one of those rules, his decisions are subject to our revision, and he is himself amenable to our control. He is placed in that chair; not to control the action of this House, not to interrupt it, far less to oppose it. He is set there to facilitate its action. But we stand in no such relation to our constituents. We are, by our office, makers of the laws by which they are so bound; and, while we are engaged in making those laws, it is fit and proper that they should know, if they have any wish to know, how each man votes on every law. But this principle does not apply to our acts when merely appointing an instrument to further and facilitate the discharge of our legislative duty. That is a matter of ours, and of ours alone. The gentleman from Kentucky tells us, that the Speaker has great and extensive patronage, and that, therefore, the nation have a concern in knowing how every man votes in giving him his appointment. Sir, he has no patronage at all. Whatever he enjoys in that way, he exercises by the courtesy of this House and on no other grounds. It is very true that he appoints the Standing and Select Committees of the House; but by what right? Under a rule of the House. But who made that rule? We have made it and can repeal it at pleasure. What does the language of the rule itself say? That he shall appoint those committees until otherwise ordered by the House. He is the creature of this House, and holds his existence by its breath, and can be annihilated at its pleasure. I say, then, that, as we elect a Speaker merely for the benefit of the House itself, that it may thereby be enabled with more ease and order to discharge its duty, we are not responsible to the people, whether we make A or B our instrument for that purpose. When we vote upon a law, we are responsible, and the people have a right to know who voted for and who voted against it; but whether we put A or B in our chair, is a matter of ours, and not of theirs. The only object in requiring a skillful and experienced individual in that important station, is, that the House may thereby come to right results with greater speed and certainty than would be possible in any other way. When that point is accomplished our duty is performed.

MONDAY, January 19.

Cumberland Road.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole and proceeded to consider the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road—the amendment offered by Mr. BUCHANAN being under consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the bill and the amendment now before the committee presented a subject for discussion of the deepest interest to the American people. It is not a question (said Mr. B.) whether we shall keep the road in repair by annual appropriations; nor whether we shall expend other millions in constructing other Cumberland roads; these would be comparatively unimportant; but it is a question, upon the determination of which, in my humble judgment, depends the continued existence of the Federal constitution, in any thing like its native purity. Let it once be established that the Federal Government can enter the dominion of the States; interfere with their domestic concerns; erect toll-gates over all the military, commercial, and post roads, within their territories, and define and punish, by laws of Congress, in the courts of the United States, offences committed upon these roads; and the barriers, which were erected by our ancestors with so much care, between Federal and State power, are entirely prostrated. This single act would, in itself, be a longer stride towards consolidation than the Federal Government have ever made; and it would be a precedent for establishing a construction for the Federal constitution so vague, and so indefinite, that it might be made to mean any thing, or nothing.

It is not my purpose, upon the present occasion, again to agitate the questions which have so often been discussed in this House, as to the powers of Congress in regard to Internal Improvements. For my own part, I cheerfully accord to the Federal Government the power of subscribing stock, in companies incorporated by the States, for the purpose of making roads and canals; and I entertain no doubt whatever, but that we can, under the constitution, appropriate the money of our constituents directly to the construction of Internal Improvements, with the consent of the States through which they may pass. These powers I shall ever be willing to exercise, upon all proper occasions. But I shall never be driven to support any road or any canal, which my judgment disapproves, by a fear of the senseless clamor which is always attempted to be raised against members upon this floor, as enemies to Internal Improvement, who dare to vote against any measure which the Committee on Roads and Canals think proper to bring before this House. It was my intention to discuss the power of Congress to pass the bill, and its policy, separately. Upon reflection, I find these subjects are so intimately blended, they cannot easily be separated. I shall, therefore, consider them together.

Before, however, I enter upon the subject, it will be necessary to present a short historical sketch of the Cumberland road. It owes its origin to a compact between the State of Ohio and the United States. In 1802, Congress proposed to the convention which formed the constitution of Ohio, that they would grant to that State one section of land in each township, for the use of schools; that they would also grant to it several tracts of land on which there were salt springs; and that five per cent. of the net proceeds of the future sales of public lands within its territory should be applied to the purpose of making public roads, "leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same." The act, however, distinctly declares that such roads shall be laid out under the authority of Congress, "with the consent of the several States through which the road shall pass." These terms were offered by Congress to the State of Ohio, provided she would exempt, by an irrevocable ordinance, all the land which should be sold by the United States within her territory, from every species of taxation, for the space of five years after the day of sale. This proposition of Congress was accepted by the State of Ohio; and it thus became a compact, the terms of which could not be changed without the consent of both the contracting parties. By the terms of the compact, this five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public land was applicable to two objects; the first, the construction of roads leading from the Atlantic to the State of Ohio; and the second, the construction of roads within that State. In 1803, Congress, at the request of Ohio, apportioned this fund between these two objects. Three of the five per cent. was appropriated to the construction of roads within the State; leaving only two per cent. applicable to roads leading from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to it.

In March, 1806, Congress determined to apply this two per cent. fund to the object for which it was destined, and passed "An act to regulate the laying out and making of a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio." Under the provisions of this act, before the President could proceed to cut a single tree upon the route of the road, it was made necessary to obtain the consent of the States through which it passed. The Federal Government asked Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, for permission to make it, and each of them granted this privilege in the same manner that they would have done to a private individual, or to a corporation created by their own laws.

Congress, at that day, asserted no other right than a mere power to appropriate the money of their constituents to the construction of this road, after the consent of these States should be obtained. The idea of a sovereign power in this Government to make the road, and to exercise jurisdiction over it, for the purpose of keeping it in repair, does not, then, appear to have ever entered the imagination of the warmest advocate for federal power. The federalism of that day would have shrunk with horror from such a spectre. There is a circumstance worthy of remark in the act of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which was passed in April, 1807, authorizing the President of the United States to open this road. It grants this power upon condition that the road should pass through Uniontown and Washington, if practicable. The grant was accepted upon this condition, and the road was constructed. Its length is one hundred and thirty miles, and its construction and repairs have cost the United States one million seven hundred and sixty-six thousand one hundred and sixty-six dollars and thirty-eight cents; whilst the two per cent. fund which we had bound ourselves to apply to this purpose, amounted, on the 30th of June, 1822, the date of the last official statement within my knowledge, only to the sum of one hundred and eighty-seven thousand seven hundred and eighty-six dollars and thirty-one cents; less than one-ninth of the cost of the road. This road has cost the United States more than thirteen thousand five hundred dollars per mile. This extravagant expenditure shows, conclusively, that it is much more politic for us to enlist individual interest in the cause of Internal Improvement, by subscribing stock, than to become ourselves sole proprietors. Any Government, unless under extraordinary circumstances, will pay one-third more for constructing a road or canal, than would be expended by individuals in accomplishing the same object.

I shall now proceed to the argument. Upon a review of this brief history, what is the conclusion at which we must arrive? That this road was made by the United States, as a mere proprietor, to carry into effect a contract with the State of Ohio, and not as a sovereign. In its construction, the Federal Government proceeded as any corporation or private individual would have done. We asked the States for permission to make the road through the territories over which their sovereign authority extended. After that permission had been obtained, we appropriated the money, and constructed the road. The State of Pennsylvania even annexed a condition to her grant, with which the United States complied. She also conferred upon the agents of the United States the power of taking materials for the construction and repair of this road, without the consent of the owner, making a just compensation therefor. This compensation was to be ascertained under the laws of the State, and not under those of the United States. The mode of proceeding to assess damages in such cases against the United States was precisely the same as it is against corporations, created by her own laws, for the purpose of constructing roads.

What, then, does this precedent establish? Simply, that the United States may appropriate money for the construction of a road through the territories of a State, with its consent; and I do not entertain the least doubt but that we possess this power. What does the present bill propose? To change the character which the United States has hitherto sustained, in relation to this road, from that of a simple proprietor to a sovereign. To declare to the nation, that, although they had to ask the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, for permission to make the road, now, after it is completed, they will exercise jurisdiction over it, and collect tolls upon it, under the authority of their own laws, for the purpose of keeping it in repair. We will not ask the States to erect toll gates for us. We are determined to exercise that power ourselves. The Federal Government first introduced itself into the States as a friend, by permission; it now wishes to hold possession as a sovereign, by power.

Cumberland Road.

[H. OF R.]

This road was made in the manner that one independent sovereign would construct a road through the territories of another. Had Virginia been a party to the compact with Ohio, instead of the United States, she would have asked the permission of Maryland and Pennsylvania to construct the Cumberland road through their territories, and it would have been granted. But what would have been our astonishment, after this permission, had Virginia attempted to assume jurisdiction over the road in Pennsylvania, to erect toll gates upon it under the authority of her own laws, and to punish offenders against these laws in her own courts. Yet the two cases are nearly parallel.

The right to demand toll, and to stop and punish passengers for refusing to pay it, is emphatically a sovereign right, and has ever been so considered amongst civilized nations. The power to erect toll gates necessarily implies, 1st. The stoppage of the passenger until he shall pay the toll. 2d. His trial and punishment, if he should, either by force or by fraud, evade, or attempt to evade, its payment. 3. A discretionary power as to the amount of toll. 4th. The trial and punishment of persons who may wilfully injure the road, or violate the police established upon it. These powers are necessarily implied. Without the exercise of them, you could not proceed with safety to collect the toll for a single day. Other powers will soon be exercised. If you compel passengers to pay toll, the power of protecting them whilst travelling along your road is almost a necessary incident. The sovereign, who receives the toll, ought naturally to possess the power of protecting him who pays it. To vest the power of demanding toll in one sovereign, and the protection of the traveller's person in another, would be almost an absurdity. The Federal Government would probably, ere long, exercise the power of trying and punishing murders and robberies, and all other offences committed upon the road. To what jurisdiction would the trial and punishment of these offences necessarily belong? To the courts of the United States, and to them alone. In Ohio, in New York, in Virginia, and in Maryland, it has been determined that State courts, even if Congress should confer it, have no jurisdiction over any penal action or criminal offence, against the laws of the United States.

Even if these decisions were incorrect, still it has never been seriously contended that State courts were bound to take jurisdiction in such cases. It must be admitted by all, that Congress have not the power to compel an execution of their criminal or penal laws by the courts of the States. This is sufficient for my argument. Even if the power existed, in State courts, they never ought, unless upon extraordinary occasions, to try and to punish offences committed against the United States. The peace and the harmony of the people of this country require that the powers of the two Governments should never be blended. The dividing line between their separate jurisdictions should be clearly marked; otherwise dangerous collisions between them must be the inevitable consequence. In two of the States, through which this road passes, it has already been determined that their courts cannot take jurisdiction over offences committed against the laws of Congress. What, then, is the inevitable consequence? All the penal enactments of this bill, or of the future bills which it will become necessary to pass to supply its defects, must be carried into execution by the Federal courts. Any citizen of the United States, charged with the most trifling offence against the police of this road, must be dragged for trial to the Federal court of that State within whose jurisdiction it is alleged to have been committed. If committed in Maryland, the trial must take place in Baltimore; if in Pennsylvania, at Pittsburgh; and if in Virginia, at Clarksburg.

The distance of one hundred or two hundred miles, which he would be compelled to travel to take his trial, and the expenses which he must necessarily incur, would, in themselves, be a severe punishment for a more aggravated offence. Besides, the people of the neighborhood would be harassed in attending as witnesses at such a great distance from their places of abode. These, and many other inconveniences, which I shall not enumerate, would soon compel Congress to authorize the appointment of justices of the peace, or some other inferior tribunals, along the whole extent of the Cumberland road.

Can any man lay his hand upon his heart and say that, in his conscience, he believes the Federal constitution ever intended to bestow such powers on Congress? The great divisions of power, distinctly marked in that instrument, are external and internal. The first are conferred upon the General Government—the last, with but few exceptions, and those distinctly defined, remain in possession of the States. It never—never was intended that the vast and mighty machinery of this Government should be introduced into the domestic, the local, the interior concerns of the States, or that it should spend its power in collecting toll at a turnpike gate. I have not been presenting possible cases to the committee. I have confined myself to what must be the necessary effects of the passage of the bill now before us. By what authority is such a tremendous power claimed? That it is not expressly given by the constitution, is certain. If it exists at all, it must, therefore, be incidental to some express power; and, in the language of the constitution, "be necessary and proper for carrying that power into execution." From the very nature of incidental power, it cannot transcend the specific power which calls it into existence. The stream cannot flow higher than its fountain. This principle applies, with peculiar force, to the construction of the constitution. For the purpose of carrying into effect any of its specific powers, it would be absurd to contend that you might exercise another power, greater and more dangerous than that expressly given. The means must be subordinate to the end. Were any other construction to prevail, this Government would no longer be one of limited powers.

The present case affords a striking and forcible illustration of this principle. Let it be granted that you have a right, as proprietor, by the permission of the States, to make a road through their territories, can it ever follow, as an incident to this mere power of appropriating the public money, that you may exercise jurisdiction over this very road, as a sovereign? If you could, the incident is as much greater than the principle, as sovereign is superior to individual power. It does follow that you can keep the road in repair, by appropriations, in the same manner that you have made it; but this is the utmost limit of your power. What, sir! Exclusive jurisdiction over the road, for its preservation, and for the punishment of all offenders who travel upon it, and that as an incident to the mere power of expending your money upon its construction! The idea is absurd.

Under the power given to Congress "to establish post offices and post roads," the Federal Government possess the undoubted right of converting any road already constructed, within any State of this Union, into a post road. Let it also be granted, for the sake of the argument, that they possess the power, independently of the will of the States, to construct as many post roads throughout the Union as they think proper, and to keep them in repair; does it follow that they can establish toll gates upon such roads? Certainly not. What is the nature of the power conferred upon Congress? It is a mere right to carry and protect the mail. It is confined to a single purpose—to the transportation of the mail, and the punishment of offences which violate that right. This is the sole object of the power—the sole purpose for which it was called into existence. Over some post roads, the mail is carried once per day; and over others once per week. With what justice can it be contended that this right of passage for a single purpose—this occasional use of the roads within the different States for post roads—vests in Congress the power of closing up these roads against all the citizens of those States, at all times, until they have paid such a toll as we may think proper to impose. Let me present the naked argument of gentlemen before their own eyes. Congress have the right, under the constitution, "to establish post offices and post roads." As an incident they possess the power of constructing post roads. As another incident to this right of passage for a single purpose they possess the power to assume jurisdiction over all post roads in the different States, and prevent any persons from passing over them, unless upon such terms as they may prescribe. This would, indeed, be construction construed. I would ask the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MASON,) to furnish the committee with an answer to this argument. If I were to grant to that gentleman a right of passage, for a particular purpose only, over a road which belonged to me, what would be my surprise and indignation, were he to shut it up, by the erection of toll gates, and prohibit me from passing unless I paid him toll.

Should Congress act upon the precedent which the passage of this bill would establish, it is impossible to foresee the dangers which must follow, to the States and to the people of this country. Upon this branch of the question, permit me to quote the language of Mr. Monroe, in his celebrated Message of May, 1822, denying the constitutional power of Congress to erect toll gates on the Cumberland road: "If, said he, the United States possessed the power contended for under this grant, might they not, in adopting the roads of the individual States for the carriage of the mail, as has been done, assume jurisdiction over them, and preclude a right to interfere with, or alter them? Might they not establish turnpikes, and exercise all the other acts of sovereignty above stated, over such roads, necessary to protect them from injury, and defray the expense of repairing them? Surely, if the right exists, these consequences necessarily followed, as soon as the road was established. The absurdity of such a pretension must be apparent to all who examine it. In this way, a large portion of the territory of every State might be taken from it; for there is scarcely a road in any State which will not be used for the transportation of the mail. A new field for legislation and internal government would thus be opened." Arguments of the same nature would apply with equal, if not with greater force, to those roads which might be used by the United States for the transportation of military stores, or as the medium of commerce between the different States. I shall not now enlarge upon this branch of the subject, believing it, as I do, to be wholly unnecessary.

There is another view of this subject, which I deem to be conclusive. The Constitution of the United States provides that "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise the like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings." This is the only clause in the constitution which authorizes the Federal Government to acquire jurisdiction over any portion of the territory of the States; and this power is expressly confined to such forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings, as the States may consider necessary for the defence of the country. You will thus, sir, perceive, with what jealousy our ancestors conferred jurisdiction upon this Government—even over such places as were absolutely necessary for the exercise of the power of war. This power—which is the power of self-defence—of self-preservation—the power given to this Government of wielding the whole physical force of the country, for the preservation of its existence and its liberties—does not confer any implied jurisdiction over the smallest portion of territory. An express authority is given to acquire jurisdiction, for military and for naval purposes, and for them alone, with the consent of the States. Unless that consent has been first obtained, the vast power of war confers no incidental jurisdiction, even over the cannon in your national fortifications. How, then, can it be contended, with the least hope of success, that the same constitution, which thus expressly limits our power of acquiring jurisdiction, to particular spots, necessary for the purpose of national defence, should, by implication, as an incident to the power to establish post offices and post roads, authorize us to assume jurisdiction over a road one hundred and thirty miles in length, and over all the other post roads in the country. If this construction be correct, all the limitations upon Federal power contained in the constitution, are idle and vain. There is no power which this Government shall ever wish to usurp, which cannot, by ingenuity, be found lurking in some of the express powers granted by the constitution. In my humble judgment, the argument in favor of the constructive power to pass the sedition law is much more plausible than any which can be urged by the advocates of this bill, in favor of its passage. I beg gentlemen to reflect, before they vote in its favor.

I thank the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. VANCE,) for having reminded me of the resolution passed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, at their last session, which authorizes the Federal Government to erect toll gates upon this road, within that commonwealth; to "enforce the collection of tolls, and, generally, to do and perform any and every other act and thing which may be deemed necessary to ensure the permanent repair and preservation of the said road."

I feel the most unfeigned respect for the Legislature of my native State. Their deliberate opinion, upon any subject, will always have a powerful influence over my judgment. It is fairly entitled to as much consideration as the opinion of this or any other legislative body in the Union. This resolution, however, was adopted, as I have been informed, without much deliberation and without debate. It owes its passage to the anxious desire which that body feel to preserve the Cumberland road from ruin. The constitutional question was not brought into discussion. Had it been fairly submitted to the Republican Legislature, I most solemnly believe they would have been the last in the Union to sanction the assumption, by this Government, of a jurisdiction so ultra-federal in its nature, and so well calculated to destroy the rights of the States.

But this resolution can have no influence upon the present discussion. The people of the State of Pennsylvania never conferred upon their Legislature the power to cede jurisdiction over any portion of their territory to the United States, or to any other sovereign. If the Legislatures of the different States could exercise such a power, the road to consolidation would be direct. If they can cede jurisdiction to this Government over any portion of their territories, they can cede the whole, and thus altogether destroy the Federal system.

Even if the States possess the power to cede, the United States have no power to accept such cessions. Their authority to accept cessions of jurisdiction is confined to places "for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings." Mr. Monroe in the Message to which I have already referred, declares his opinion, "that Congress do not possess this power; that the States, individually, cannot grant it; for, although they may assent to the appropriation of money, within their limits, for such purposes, they can grant no power of jurisdiction, or sovereignty, by special compacts with the United States."

I think it is thus rendered abundantly clear, that, if Congress do not possess the power, under the Federal constitution, to pass this bill, the States through which the road passes cannot confer it upon them. I feel convinced that even the gentleman who reported this bill (Mr. MEROER) will not contend that the resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania could bestow any jurisdiction upon this Government. I am justified in this inference, because that resolution is, in its nature, conditional, and requires that the amount of tolls collected in Pennsylvania shall be applied, exclusively, to the repair of the road within that State; and the present bill contains no provision to carry this condition into effect. The gentleman cannot, therefore, derive his authority to pass this bill from a grant, the provisions of which he has disregarded.

This question has already been settled, so far as a solemn legislative precedent can settle any question. During the session of 1821-'2, a bill, similar in its provisions to the one now before the committee, passed both Houses of Congress. The vote, on its passage in this House, was eighty-seven in the affirmative, and sixty-eight in the negative. Mr. Monroe, then President of the United States, returned this bill to the House of Representatives, with his objections. So powerful, and so convincing, were his arguments, that, upon its reconsideration, but sixty-eight members voted in the affirmative, whilst seventy-two voted in the negative. Thus, sir, you perceive, that this House have already solemnly declared, in accordance with the deliberate opinion of the late President of the United States, that Congress do not possess the power to erect toll gates upon the Cumberland road. That distinguished individual was the last of the race of Revolutionary Presidents, and, from the soundness of his judgment, and the elevated stations which he has occupied, his opinion is entitled to the utmost respect. He was an actor in many of the political scenes of that day when the constitution was framed, and when it went into operation, under the auspices of Washington—"all which he saw, and part of which he was." He is, therefore, one of the few surviving statesmen, who, from actual knowledge, can inform the present generation what were the opinions of the past. The solemnity and the ability with which he has resisted the exercise of the power of Congress to pass this bill prove, conclusively, the great importance which he attached to the subject.

During that session, which was the first I had the honor of a seat in this House, I voted for the passage of that bill. I had not reflected upon the constitutional question, and I was an advocate of the policy of keeping the road in repair by collecting tolls from those who travelled upon it. After I read the constitutional objections of Mr. Monroe, my opinion was changed, and I have ever since been endeavoring, upon all proper occasions, to atone for my vote, by advocating a cession of the road to the respective States through which it passes, that they may erect toll gates upon it and keep it in repair. There was a time in the history of this country—I refer to the days of the first President of the United States—when this Government was feeble, and when, in addition to its own powers, the weight of his personal character was necessary fairly to put it in motion. Jealousy of Federal power was then the order of the day. The gulf of consolidation then fawned before the imagination of many of our wisest and best patriots, ready to swallow up the rights of the States and the liberties of the people. In those days, this vast machine had scarcely got into regular motion. Its power and its patronage were then in their infancy, and there was, perhaps, more danger that the jealousy of the States should destroy the efficiency of the Federal Government, than that it should crush their power. Times have changed. The days of its feebleness and of childhood have passed away. It is now a giant—a Briareus—stretching forth its hundred arms, dispensing its patronage, and increasing its power over every portion of the Union. What patronage and what power have the States to oppose to this increasing influence? Glance your eye over the extent of the Union; compare State offices with those of the United States; and whether avarice or ambition be consulted, those which belong to the General Government are greatly to be preferred to the offices which the States can bestow. Jealousy of Federal power—not of a narrow and mean character, but a watchful and uncompromising jealousy—is now the dictate of the soundest patriotism. The General Government possesses the exclusive right to impose duties upon imports—by far the most productive and the most popular source of revenue. United and powerful efforts are now making to destroy the revenue which the States derive from sales at auction. This Government is now asked to interpose its power between the buyer and seller, and put down public sales of merchandise within the different States—a subject, heretofore, believed to be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the State sovereignties. Whilst the Federal Government has been advancing with rapid strides, the people of the States have seldom been awakened to a sense of their danger. In the late political struggle, they were aroused, and they nobly maintained their own rights. This, I trust, will always be the case hereafter. Thank Heaven! whilst the people continue true to themselves, the constitution contains within itself those principles which must ever preserve it. From its very nature—from a difference of opinion as to the constructive powers which may be necessary and proper to carry those which are enumerated into effect—it must ever call into existence two parties, the one jealous of Federal, the other of State power; the one anxious to extend Federal influence, the other wedded to State rights; the one desirous to limit, the other to extend, the power and the patronage of the General Government. In the intermediate space there will be much debatable ground; but a general outline will still remain, sufficiently distinct to mark the division between the political parties which have divided, and which will probably continue to divide, the people of this country. Jealousy of Federal power had long been lumbering. The voice of Virginia, sounding the alarm, has at length awakened several of her sister States; and, although they believe her to be too strict in her construction of the constitution and her doctrines concerning State rights, yet, they are now willing to do justice to the steadiness and patriotism of her political character. She has kept alive a wholesome jealousy of Federal power.

If, then, there be a party in this country friendly to the rights of the States and of the people, I call upon them to oppose the passage of this bill. Should it become a law, it will establish a precedent, under the authority of which the sovereign power of this Government can be brought home into the domestic concerns of every State in the Union. We may then take under our own jurisdiction every road over which the mail is carried, every road over which our soldiers and warlike munitions may pass, and every road used for the purpose of carrying on commerce between the several States. Once establish this strained construction of the Federal constitution, and I would ask gentlemen to point out the limit where this splendid Government shall be compelled to stay its chariot wheels. Might it not then drive on to consolidation, under the sanction of the constitution?

Is there any necessity for venturing upon this dangerous and doubtful measure? I appeal to those gentlemen who suppose the power to be clear, what motive they can have for forcing this measure upon us, who are of a different opinion? Can it make any difference to them, whether these toll gates shall be erected under a law of the United States, or under State authority? Cannot the Legislature of Pennsylvania enact this bill into a law as well as the Congress of the United States? Nobody will doubt their right. I trust no gentleman upon this floor will question the fidelity of that State, in complying with all her engagements. She has ever been true to every trust. If she should accept of the cession, as I have no doubt she would, I will pledge myself that you shall never again hear of the road, unless it be that she has kept it in good repair, and that, under her care, it has answered every purpose for which it was intended.

I know that some popular feeling has been excited against myself in that portion of Pennsylvania through which this road passes. I have been represented as one of its greatest enemies. I now take occasion thus publicly to deny this allegation. It is true that I cannot vote in favor of the passage of this bill, and thus, in my judgment, violate the oath which I have taken to support the Constitution of the United States. No man can expect this from me. But it is equally true, that I have heretofore supported appropriations for the repair of this road; and, should my amendment prevail, I shall vote in favor of the appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars, for that purpose, which is contained in this bill.

Mr. STORRS spoke in reply, contending that the constitutional question was not involved, inasmuch as the construction of the road rested in a contract prior to the constitution, between Virginia and the old Confederation, in which Virginia gave to the Confederation power to regulate the road, when constructed, and by which all the then existing States in the Confederation were bound.

Proposed Territory of Huron.

The bill establishing a new Territory west of Michigan, to be denominated the Territory of Huron, having been set down for this day, was taken up and considered.

Mr. STRONG, Chairman of the Committee on the Territories, briefly recapitulated the ground on which the bill had been proposed, and after stating the population of the country which it proposed to erect into a territory to amount to between ten and fifteen thousand persons, insisted that the territory might be established with little or no expense to the Government, the great mass of the population being engaged in mining on lands leased to them by the United States, on which they paid an annual rent of about one million of pounds of lead, worth to the Government, say forty thousand dollars; that citizens thus situated were entitled to the protection of the Government, and the enjoyment of the same civil rights and privileges as other citizens of the Union. Though they were not owners of the soil, they were not intruders, but they were there by the express permission of Government; that, although the jurisdiction of Michigan Territory extended over a part of the country embraced by the bill, that jurisdiction was nominal, more than any thing else; the Council sat at Detroit, the distance from which to Green Bay was six hundred miles, to Prairie du Chien eight hundred, and to Galena more than one thousand. The Council usually sat for sixty days in the summer, and before the laws passed at such session could be published and forwarded to Green Bay, much less to Galena, the waters were usually frozen, and the practical result was, that the people for whom the laws were made did not hear of their existence till nearly twelve months after they were passed; and it had actually happened that laws, at the time they began to be enforced, had been repealed by the authority who passed them. Hence the whole jurisprudence of that region was necessarily irregular, and sometimes illegal. That this was a state of things to which no free citizens of the United States ought ever to be subjected. The frontier to which the bill had respect, was, in every view, of a very interesting character; it bordered on the territories of an alien Government, and was filled with Indians, some of whom were avowedly hostile to the United States. It was obviously proper that our citizens in that angle of the Union should be fully protected by the Government, nor could the whole valley of the lower Mississippi be indifferent to such protection. It would prove a great relief, in the event of sudden hostilities, operating to relieve the Middle States from the necessity of sending their troops northward, when they might possibly be still more wanted at the south. There were various points in the argument which Mr. S. declined to touch unless any opposition should render it his duty. He concluded with expressing his conviction that the proposed territory ought to be erected, and that without delay, and his hope that the bill would now be allowed its third reading.

Mr. KREMER was opposed to the bill. It proposed an expense of twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars a year for the accommodation of a few Indian traders. He did not believe that they were near so numerous as had been stated, for the whole of Michigan Territory contained last year but eighteen thousand inhabitants. As to the objection that those people could not enjoy the laws of Michigan, who believed that they cared any thing about the law? Few, if any of them, held any property, and they might very well be left to make such laws for themselves as they could agree upon. Here Mr. K. referred to the case of certain adventurers, before the Revolution, who settled beyond the limits of the United States, and were known by the name of the "Fair play dealers," who made laws for themselves, and faithfully obeyed them. The dividing of the Territory of Michigan, at this time, might retard its admission, as a State, into the Union, for twenty years.

Mr. WING, of Michigan, vindicated the character of those whom Mr. K. had so roughly handled. A more respectable population was nowhere to be found. There are among them many men who, in enterprise, information, capital, and extent of business, were not surpassed, save in our largest commercial cities. His own constituents had at first been opposed to the plan, but were now satisfied of its propriety, and strongly recommended the measure.

Mr. POLK opposed the bill as premature. He stated the number of persons in the old French settlements to be inconsiderable, and as to those of Galena, it was as yet uncertain whether they would fall within the territory, or the State of Illinois. The great body of the inhabitants were transient persons, and after all the machinery of a territorial government should be established, the difficulty of learning the laws would remain as great as ever, from the extent of the territory, the sparseness of the population, and their insular situation, in separate groups, &c.

Mr. BATES, of Missouri, replied to the objection as to the want of ownership, referring, on that subject, to the established policy of the Government, granting pre-emption rights, and encouraging and favoring settlers on the public domain; but the settlers at Galena were not intruders; they leased their land from Government, and paid their rent. On the subject of the amount of population in that territory, he stated the fact, that a regular weekly steamboat plied between St. Louis and Galena. He vindicated the respectability of the settlers; and as to such of them as were transient persons, nothing would be more likely to render them permanent settlers than extending to the territory the benefits proposed in the bill. An agricultural population would be attracted, and the culture would be improved. He had had ample opportunity to form a judgment on this subject, having been an inhabitant of a frontier country during fifteen years of his life; and he would venture to predict, that, if this bill passed, the new territory would exhibit as large an influx of settlers as was now to be seen in the Territory of Arkansas.

The bill was ordered to its third reading—yeas 113, nays 70.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 21.

Pontchartrain Canal and Louisiana College.

The House resumed the consideration of the following resolutions, moved by Mr. GURLEY yesterday:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency and justice of granting to the State of Louisiana five hundred thousand acres of the public lands in said State, for the purpose of opening a canal from the river Mississippi to Lake Pontchartrain, in conformity with the survey heretofore made by the United States engineers, and for making such other works of internal improvements in the said State as the legislature thereof may direct.

"Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a township of land to the trustees of Louisiana College, at Jackson, in said State, for the benefit thereof."

Mr. GURLEY, after expressing it as a conviction of his duty to himself, to state some of the reasons which had induced him to offer the resolutions, proceeded to observe that the Legislature of Louisiana had, some years ago, forwarded a memorial to Congress, asking its aid towards opening the canal referred to in the first of the resolutions which he had now offered, and it had been referred to the Committee of Roads and Canals, who made a favorable report on the subject, but no efficient legislation had as yet followed. He had, therefore, felt himself bound once more to present the subject to the attention of Congress. The subject contemplated in the first resolution claimed its consideration not only as having received the sanction of one of the sovereign States of the Union, but as presenting one of the most important works of internal improvement which had ever asked the aid of Government. In so saying, he was not speaking the language of imagination, or individual opinion. The route of the proposed canal had undergone an examination, in 1826, by four United States engineers, under an order from the Secretary of War. Their report presented in detail the arguments in favor of the plan, considered not merely in a commercial point of view, but as furnishing an important mean of military defence. The work was considered, by the Department, as essential to the safety of that section of the Union, inasmuch as, without it, the forts which had already been erected, might, by a successful movement of the enemy, be rendered of little avail. The expense involved would be nine hundred thousand dollars, for which sum a connection would be formed between the river Mississippi and Lake Pontchartrain. Nor could any work be named which would be of such general interest, both to the western and the eastern States of the Union. When completed, it would open new markets to the whole of the western country, and, therefore, he felt himself warranted to call on gentlemen from the west of the Alleghanies to give their support to the resolution. The vast produce of the whole valley of the Mississippi was now, of necessity, carried to New Orleans, where the owners were compelled to dispose of it at such prices as the merchants there might choose to give; and, if the city happened to be sickly, this was done in great haste, at a great sacrifice, and even with a risk of life itself; but if this canal should be opened, the western agriculturist would enjoy a choice of markets; a direct communication would be opened from the interior of Ohio, down the Mississippi, to Mobile and Pensacola. Of the importance of such an advantage he need say nothing; nor would the effect of such a canal be less important to the eastern States; because their navigation, instead of being obliged to take the circuitous route, by the mouth of the Mississippi, would have an open passage from Pensacola and Mobile to New Orleans, between which points the voyage, now usually pursued, was as tedious and dangerous as a voyage from Washington to New Orleans. Such a canal would form an important link in the chain of inland communication from the East to the West, the most important, indeed, of any in the whole series. It would open a communication between the river and the lake, for sloops of war, which would thus be enabled to pass with ease from the one to the other, as the exigence of the service might demand. Without this advantage, the forts which had been erected at the Rigolets and the Chef Menteur, as well as those on the Mississippi, would be of comparatively small value. The only avenue by which an enemy could successfully approach New Orleans would thus be effectually defended, and the disposable force of the country be transported at pleasure, from point to point, as the threatening danger might render proper and necessary. At present, the mouth of the river could readily be blockaded; and, as soon as this took place, the only outlet for the valley of the Mississippi was completely shut up, and no American ship could leave the river.

In support of the second resolution, Mr. G. went into a history of the College of Louisiana, and explained the reason why it did not participate with the other seminaries of the State in the grants of land made by Congress, in the years 1807 and 1811, for their benefit. This college lay in what was then West Florida, and, being out of the limits of Louisiana, was, of course, not included in the grants. Since then the limits of the State had been extended—the whole of Florida, west of Pearl River, having been added to her territory. The object of the resolution was to grant to this college the same quantity of land which Congress had given to the other two colleges in the State. Mr. G. observed that the proposition for the present grant of land was by no means of a novel character. The House had, last session, made a grant to the State of Ohio, to aid her in completing her canals, of seven hundred thousand acres; and to Alabama, four hundred thousand; and a bill was now on the calendar for extending the latter grant to five hundred thousand. He had cheerfully voted for both the former bills, and when the other came up it should have his support. Besides these donations, Congress had granted land to Indiana, which is now worth a million of dollars; and Illinois, too, had received more than he now asked for Louisiana. He hoped there was to be no proscription in this case. There could not be a more useful application of our public lands than to further the progress of works of internal improvement; but, dear as was that general subject to him, if gentlemen were determined that Louisiana should be an object of proscription, he would inflexibly withhold his assent from any farther aid to be granted by this Government. Hitherto she had never received an acre of land from the Government, nor did she now present herself in the attitude of an humble suppliant. The principles and policy which the Government had adopted, she considered, and had a right to consider, as applicable to herself as to any of her sister States; nor could he imagine on what ground gentlemen who had voted the donations he had referred to, could refuse a similar request when coming from his own State, especially when the work in behalf of which it was made was national in its character, and of as great intrinsic importance as any in the Union, the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal not excepted. [Mr. G. here sent to the Clerk's table the report of the United States engineers on the subject of this canal, from which various extracts were read to the House.]

Mr. HUNT briefly opposed the resolution. The canal itself might be very proper as a national object, but he disapproved of committing its construction to the Legislature of a State, under a large and valuable grant of land. Such grants were liable to be perverted to objects merely local, or even private and temporary in their character. Such an application of the public lands he considered improper; but would cheerfully vote for a distribution of their proceeds among the several States.

Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana, was persuaded that the House had not a proper view of the resolution. It did not direct the committee to report a bill, nor did it commit the House in any form. Such being the case, he appealed to the generosity and justice of gentlemen, and asked if it was either just or generous to refuse even a consideration of the expediency of the measure proposed. The House was not yet in possession of all the facts of the case; but if it had resolved to withhold from Louisiana the same justice which had been awarded to Ohio, to Indiana, to Illinois, and other States, he at least hoped that the reasons would be stated. He did not agree with his colleague as to the specific object to which the grant was to be applied, but he hoped the resolution would at least be suffered to go to a committee.

Cumberland Road.

The House, on motion of Mr. MERCEUR, went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. STRONG said, the bill proposes to erect toll-gates upon the Cumberland road; and, in my judgment, the whole comes to be a mere question of property, and of the right in Congress to protect, by its laws, that property, whatever may be its kind. Sir, I am always sorry to hear, on this floor or elsewhere, those arguments too often used, which go to alarm the people for the safety of State rights, and which rarely fail to induce a belief that there is danger, where there is none. I am not against that watchful jealousy and cautious foresight so needful for the preservation of these rights; but I regret and deprecate that train of argument which, whether so intended or not, never fails to act more upon the passions than upon the judgment of men.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) is not free from objections. Could I be in favor of ceding this road to the respective States through which it passes, I should be against annexing any conditions to the cession. It seems to me that the amendment involves a serious difficulty. If the United States have not only that sort of property in the road of which it is susceptible, (and which the amendment admits, though the gentleman denies it in his argument,) but also the right to put up gates on it, then, indeed, Congress may prescribe conditions. But, if the United States have no right to put up gates, then you not only undertake to grant what the United States do not possess, but you impose a condition, which limits the exercise of the sovereign power of a State. The right to erect these gates is clearly in the one sovereign or the other. It is either in the United States or in Pennsylvania. For example: If not in the United States, (and the gentleman contends that it is not,) then it is in the State of Pennsylvania. The condition, therefore, which is annexed to the grant, will obviously detract from and impair the sovereignty of the State.

The gentleman (Mr. B.) also insisted that the bill would impose great hardships upon the offender, (for it will touch no honest citizen,) by dragging him one or two hundred miles to a Federal court, for the trial of his offence; and would, moreover, give to the Federal court exclusive jurisdiction over all crimes committed upon the road. Why, sir, the inferior courts of the United States can have no jurisdiction over any matter or offence, but what Congress gives, by law. If you impose a fine for injuring the gate, or for refusing to pay toll, you can touch none but the offender, nor prosecute for any other cause. Pennsylvania has concurrent jurisdiction and concurrent legislation over this road; and the trial for crimes perpetrated upon it would be in her courts, and not in the courts of the United States. The objection, on the ground of distance from the Federal courts, is an objection equally applicable to the prosecution of any matter, civil or criminal, in the courts of the United States. It goes to the whole system of the Federal Judiciary.

The Cumberland road is a mail road, and the post-office laws, among other things, impose fines for obstructing the transportation of the mail. It appears to me that the only object of these fines is to prevent injury to the thing itself; that is, to protect the mail, as matter of property—and not to punish the offender for resisting the execution of the law. This latter offence would be a crime of a high grade, and perhaps could be punished only in the Federal courts. And what is worthy of notice in this law, is, that, by the 37th section of it, "all causes of action arising under" it are to be "sued" for, and "all offenders against it prosecuted, before the justices of the peace, magistrates, or other judicial courts of the several States." If the State courts have jurisdiction in these matters, then the tolls upon this road may be collected in the same way, whenever that mode shall be thought advisable. But, if the United States can impose a fine of a hundred dollars upon an offender, for putting a log, for instance, across the road, by which the mail is obstructed for five minutes, can they not also impose a fine for obstructing the passing of a cannon, or the wilful destruction of a gun-carriage, or of a turnpike-gate, or for passing the gate and refusing to pay the toll? And where is the hardship or injustice, whether the same thing is done by the one Government or the other?

The honorable gentleman (Mr. B.) moreover urges, that this power (which is the power of a sovereign to protect his own property) will become dangerous to the States; because, the exercise of the power being discretionary, if you can put up toll-gates on the Cumberland road, you can on every other mail road in the United States. Sir, I think not. The distinction between the two cases is this: the United States own the Cumberland road as a sovereign, and have a right to dispose of it as such. They have an interest, a property, in it; whereas, in the common mail roads they have neither. But is the danger of abusing the power in this case greater than it is in others? The exercise of the great war power is entirely discretionary, and necessarily so: for, al though the Federal constitution is made up of enumerated powers, yet each power is, in itself, unlimited. Hence it is, that Congress can authorize the raising of an army of a million of men, or the building of a thousand ships of war, or the levying of a direct tax of five hundred millions of dollars, and yet not reach the limit of constitutional power. So in these as in other cases, the proper execution of the trust must, of necessity, be left to the sound discretion of the agent.

I have said that the property in the Cumberland road belonged to the United States—by property, I mean that sort, whatever it may be, which would have been in the State of Pennsylvania had she constructed the road. By the terms of the agreement (as the committee will remember) between the people of Ohio and the United States, the United States became bound to make a road leading from tide water to the State of Ohio. The performance of this, however, depended upon the assent of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland. The Legislature of each of these States gave the assent required, and the Cumberland road was made. The United States, under these circumstances, having constructed this road, I think it belongs to them; that it is their property; unless it be true, as some contend, that they cannot take the title to land, lying within any of the States, nor any interest growing out of it, other than particular parcels, ceded for the purposes specified in the constitution, and over which they have exclusive legislation.

In point of fact, the United States now hold real estate within the limits of the old States, and over which they have not exclusive legislation. The right to take and hold these parcels of land must either be incident to sovereignty, or be found in the Federal constitution. It can exist nowhere else. If a State can give an acre of land, as she clearly can, to an alien subject or State, why not to the United States? But if there be no power in the constitution authorizing the United States to acquire real property, how did they succeed to the vast domain which belonged to the old Confederation? or how take the lands ceded by Georgia in 1802, and over which the States of Mississippi and Alabama have since been organized and admitted into the Union? or how hold such as fall into their hands for taxes or debts? The clause in the constitution which says that "Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States," if it does not give in terms, certainly takes it for granted that the United States have the right to hold real estate as well as other property. As a co-sovereign, therefore, it seems to me that the United States have the same kind and degree of property in this road that either of the States could have had.

The United States having the property, be it what it may, in the Cumberland road, have they the right of erecting toll-gates on it for its preservation? I have always supposed that the Federal and State Governments had equally the power of making laws for the protection of their own separate property; that each individual State has, none will deny. And if any doubt exists in regard to the power of the United States in this respect, it seems to me the clause of the constitution which I have before cited will remove it. That clause gives to Congress the power of making all needful "rules and regulations," not only respecting the "territory," but "other property, belonging to the United States." This obviously cannot relate to the property mentioned in the preceding clause of the constitution, which gives Congress power "to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over" what is now the District of Columbia, and "over all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings," because, as this clause confers all power over these places, no other or greater power is needed or can be given. To what, then, does the phrase "other property" refer, and with respect to which Congress has power to make "all needful rules and regulations?" If, therefore, Congress can make laws for the protection and preservation of the property which the United States have in a ship of war, while lying within the limits of a State, or in the public mail, and the like, why not also for the property they have in the Cumberland road?

I will now proceed to examine the sort of jurisdiction which the United States have over this road. As this Government is peculiar in its structure, so it cannot be rightly judged of by that of any other. Its powers, carried out, those which belonged to the respective States are, like those remaining to the States, sovereign and concurrent, or exclusive, with regard to the particular subject upon which they act. The judiciary power of the Federal Government extends over all the Union. The civil and criminal process of the courts of the United States can be exercised in and throughout every part of each and of all the States. So the like process of each State may be executed anywhere within its limits, except in places, the exclusive legislation over which may have been ceded to the United States. These two jurisdictions must, therefore, be strictly concurrent: for, otherwise, the laws of but one of the sovereign parties could be executed. It seems to me, moreover, that, owing to the peculiarity of our Federal system, the legislative powers of Congress, and of the respective State Legislatures, are also concurrent. If they are not, how can Congress and a State Legislature, at the same time, tax the same subject or thing, or bind the same citizen to support both Governments? The fact is, whatever the theory may be, that person and property are, at all times, subject to the legislative action of the National and State Legislatures. But, nevertheless, Congress can neither acquire nor exercise exclusive legislation, except over a few places, purchased for specified purposes, such as forts, arsenals, &c.; and the sole object of that clause in the constitution, relating to these places for forts, &c., and to which I have before referred, clearly was to enable a State to give, and Congress to exercise, exclusive legislation in the enumerated cases, and not to restrain the power of a State in the disposition of her soil for any other purpose. I am aware that, by the cession of Georgia, the United States took the title to the territory ceded, and acquired exclusive legislation over it. But this exclusive legislation was the result, not of any grant, but of contracting the limits of Georgia, which she had a right to do; because, had her limits remained unaltered, although she might have granted the territory, yet she could not have granted exclusive legislation over it to the United States, as the object of the grant would not have been for any of the special purposes named in the constitution.

The United States now have the title to many small parcels of land within the States, and over which they have no exclusive legislation. Indeed, over many of the places purchased for forts, arsenals, and the like purposes, the States in which they are have retained their concurrent jurisdiction. Whence, then, the right to hold them, if legislation over them must be exclusive, and can, in no case, be concurrent? So, if a State should convey its whole domain to the United States, would it affect the constitutional powers of the two Governments? Suppose the United States construct a public road through the public lands in Ohio, for example, as they have a right to do, and erect gates on it, and, at the same time, erect gates on the Cumberland road—are not the powers of Congress over the two roads precisely the same? If different, wherein do they differ? Congress cannot exercise exclusive legislation over one foot of this road in Ohio, any more than over that part of it in Pennsylvania, although the one in Ohio is, in truth, a part of the public domain; and the reason is, that neither of them is for any of the purposes over which this high power is permitted to be given. But both Ohio and Pennsylvania have concurrent jurisdiction and legislation over the respective roads, in common with the United States. And, in my judgment, Congress has the right to make laws to protect the title, and to preserve the property in both roads from destruction. Putting up gates are the usual and ordinary means of preserving this sort of property. It imposes no hardship upon any one. It affects none but the passenger, and he pays only for the benefit he receives at the time.

Mr. S. Wood, after giving a brief history of the cession of Virginia, of 1784, and of the ordinance of 1787, stated that the United States, in the act of 1802 for the admission of Ohio into the Union, stipulated that five per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands in the said State, sold by Congress, should be applied to the laying out and making of public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to be laid out under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the several States through which the road should pass, in consideration of an exemption of the lands, sold by the United States, from taxation by the State for a given period. That, by an act of the subsequent year, passed at the request of Ohio, three of the five per cent. was agreed to be paid to Ohio, for the purpose of making roads within the said State, and two per cent. only was reserved to be expended in the manner stipulated by the former act. The United States, in conformity with the terms of the compact, obtained the consent of the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, to their making a road from Cumberland to the river Ohio. In 1806 the United States made an appropriation to commence the making of the said road, and have gone on making appropriations until the road was completed.

The whole amount of the two per cent. fund, on the 31st December, 1826, arising from the sales of the public lands in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, amounted only to two hundred and ninety-two thousand four hundred and seventy-seven dollars and three cents, and the moneys expended by the Government on the Cumberland road, from 1806, to December, 1827, amounted to one million eight hundred and thirty-eight thousand and seventy-four dollars and twenty cents; more than six times as much as was required by a literal performance of the stipulation with the State of Ohio. Thus, said Mr. W., the United States have anticipated the two per cent. fund many years in advance, and have honorably fulfilled the agreement with the Western States. They have laid out and made the road agreeably to the stipulation, and therefore are under no farther obligations in relation to that road. It is, however, very desirable that so important a road, and upon which so much money has been expended, should be placed in a situation to support itself, and be kept in constant repair. The best mode to ensure the preservation of the road is the establishment of toll-gates, with the exaction of a very moderate toll, and an appropriation of the revenue, after deducting the expenses of collection, to the continual improvement of the road. By this plan the road will, at a very small expense to those who shall enjoy the benefit of it, be kept in constant repair, and will be made as perfect as the nature of the ground and the materials will admit. No objection has been made to this mode of keeping the road in repair; but two propositions have been made relative to the means by which it shall be carried into effect. The bill proposes that the General Government shall repair the road, erect the gates, fix and collect the toll, and expend the surplus revenue in the improvement of the road. The amendment proposes to transfer whatever claims the United States have to the road, to the States through which it passes, in full faith that they will take the proper steps for the preservation of the road. I am decidedly in favor of the last of these propositions. It is immaterial, to those who use the road, by which Government the toll is collected, and the road is kept in repair; but it is all-important to the preservation of our political institutions that this power should be exercised by that Government to which, in the partition of their sovereign power, the people have allotted it.

The power to regulate highways is certainly not among the enumerated powers of the General Government; nor does it seem to be a necessary incident to any one of those powers. The powers of the General Government were intended for those purposes for which the States were not competent; and it is hardly possible to select an object of authority more of a local nature, and more completely subject to municipal regulation, than highways. It is also doubtful whether it is competent for the General Government to establish such inferior tribunals, and to appoint such ministerial officers, as would be necessary to enforce the collection of the toll. The evasion of the toll, and injuries to the road, can only be prevented by courts and officers in the neighborhood of the road. This would be an extension of the judiciary system of the United States to purposes which do not seem to have been within the contemplation of the constitution. This exercise of authority by the General Government would intrench upon the judicial authority of the States; would efface the lines of distinction between the jurisdiction of the General and State Governments; and would lead to an abridgment of the constitutional powers of the States. If the operation of the act should depend on the judicial authority of the United States as now organized, the expense of prosecutions would effectually prevent its execution by the assurance of indemnity to offenders. It is not a subject-matter for concurrent jurisdiction, as has been intimated; the imposition of toll exhausts the subject, and must necessarily be exclusive.

It has been said that the General Government may enforce the collection of toll, and recover the penalties for the violation of the law, by the courts and ministerial officers of the States. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the State officers might, if they chose, exercise this authority, it is evident that they would not be culpable for the omission, and it would be unsafe and improvident to rely for the execution of your laws upon the voluntary exercise of authority by judicial officers. It has been farther alleged, that Pennsylvania has expressly authorized the collection of toll on this road by the General Government. This is an admission that the General Government has no authority in this case. If the General Government possessed the power, the grant was unnecessary; and if not, it is not competent for Pennsylvania to supply the defect. No one will contend that it is in the power of a single State to enlarge or diminish the powers of the General Government, or that this can be done in any other way than by an amendment, in the mode provided by the constitution. It has also been contended that the Cumberland road belongs to the General Government, and that jurisdiction over it results from the property.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR said: This subject of internal improvement, in its different phases, has engaged the attention of Congress for a series of years. On some former occasions, and on one of them particularly, perhaps eleven years ago, I took a part in the discussion, and, to the utmost of my ability, I then endeavored, in an elaborate argument, to prove that it was utterly without the sphere of the constitutional power of Congress. It is not my purpose now to retrace my steps in that discussion. I may be allowed, however, merely to suggest some of the prominent positions which I then occupied. I would not do even this, if it were not to express my dissent from some of the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with whom I concur in the general result at which he has arrived. I denied the power of Congress to appropriate money for the construction of roads, upon these plain principles: that if, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has admitted, we had no right to construct, we could not have the power to appropriate money for their construction; that the power of appropriation was a mean for the attainment of certain ends, which were specified; that, whenever we had not power to execute the end, we could not use the means which conduced to it: for that would be to say, that what we had not a power to do, we yet had a power to cause to be done. Thus, if we had no power to raise and support armies, or to provide and maintain navies, we could not rightfully appropriate money for either of those purposes.

As to the reasoning which attempted to derive the power to construct roads from that to regulate commerce, from the military power, and even from that to establish post-offices and post roads, I resisted it upon the ground that it led to an inadmissible latitude of construction, and an indefinite train of implication, which would run out to such remote consequences, as to obliterate every line of partition between the Federal and State Governments. Thus, for example, take the power of establishing post roads, which bears upon its face the strongest plausibility; this, I contended, meant only to designate the mail routes, as is shown not only by the plain meaning of the terms, but by the practice of the Government from its commencement: for all the laws, professing by their titles to establish post roads, did nothing more than declare what roads should be mail routes; and this argument ought to have much weight with those gentlemen who repose so much upon the strength of legislative precedent. Now, sir, let us for a moment examine the long train of implications which have been derived from this single clause. The power to establish, it is said, implies the right to create; the right to create, implies that to preserve; the right to preserve, implies that to turnpike; that to turnpike implies that to erect gates; that to erect gates, implies that to collect toll; that to collect toll, implies that to punish for non-payment. I will appeal to the committee to say, if this process of reasoning can be sustained, whether the advocates of the sedition law were not equally sustained in their argument, when they reasoned thus: we have power to suppress insurrections; the publication of seditious papers, and uttering seditious words, lead to insurrections; the suppression of these will tend to prevent insurrections; prevention is one of the modes of suppression; we, therefore, logically prove our right thus to suppress insurrections, and consequently our right to pass the sedition law. This kind of argument, in either case, may, I think, be fairly represented by comparing it to a cone inverted; as the one must fall, by the laws of matter, so must the other, by a just construction of the constitution; the line of direction falls without the base.

But I promised not to go into the argument of these questions, and I will therefore forbear to notice them farther. Before, however, I come to the views which I propose to present, permit me, for a moment, to trace the history of our progress on this subject. At the last session of the Fourteenth Congress, a bill passed both Houses, setting apart a particular fund for the construction of roads and canals: this bill was rejected by the then President, (Mr. MADISON,) on the last day of his official life, and upon the express ground that it was unconstitutional. At the first session, I think, of the Fifteenth Congress, a resolution was reported to the House, affirming the power of Congress to appropriate moneys for the construction of roads and canals, and others affirming our power to construct post roads and military and commercial roads and canals. The House sustained the one, affirming the power of appropriation; but rejected all those which affirmed the power of construction. At an after time, a bill passed Congress authorizing the erection of toll-gates on this Cumberland road, which was rejected by the then President, (Mr. MONROE,) upon the ground that it was unconstitutional. Thus we have the opinion of one House of Representatives, and two Presidents, against the power now claimed: for it is obvious that the denial of the power to construct involved the denial of that to erect gates; and yet now the power is gravely contended for. Precedents, it seems, are to have great weight, when they support power; but when they deny it, they are to be utterly disregarded.

Without farther remark, I come directly to the question before us. We are told by the advocates of this bill that it may be supported upon two grounds: First, that the constitution, per se, gives us the power of erecting toll-gates. And, secondly, that if it did not, we are authorized to do it by compact. Let us examine these grounds separately, in the order in which they have been stated. My promise to the committee will preclude me from discussing this subject upon the old ground of constitutional objection, to some of which I have already merely alluded; but I beg leave to offer some new views, in this aspect of the question, which seem to me, of themselves, to be decisive of it. The bill proposes to erect turnpike gates, and to collect toll from those who use the road. Toll thus collected would be a tax: not only is it embraced by the just definition of the word tax, but the best writers on political economy call it a tax: nor can there be a possible doubt upon the subject; for every requisition of money by the Government from the people is a tax, and this bill makes such a requisition. The constitution gives to Congress power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare; but it imposes these two limitations: First, that all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States. Secondly, that every capitation or direct tax shall be in proportion to the census or enumeration which it directs to be made of the people. Now, the tolls required to be paid by this bill are not in conformity with either of these limitations: it is neither apportioned upon the people of the United States according to the census, nor can it be pretended to be uniform throughout the United States; for the obvious reason that it is required only of those who pass one single road, and for the liberty of using it. A tax for the use of a road surely could not be uniform unless it was required, to the same amount, of those who passed all the roads in the United States. To illustrate this by example: suppose that Congress, in consideration of a great expenditure upon a particular harbor, should require the ships entering that harbor only to pay a tonnage duty, or to pay a larger tonnage duty in one port than in another; or suppose that we were to require postage upon this road only, or a larger postage upon this than any other road, is there a member of this committee who would say that the constitution would not be violated in either case? And if it would, then it follows that this toll cannot be imposed.

But there is another view, which will place this subject in a strong light. Whosoever will attentively examine the constitution, will find that all the powers which it gives to Congress have relation to persons and things, except two: those two are the power to exercise exclusive legislation over the seat of the Federal Government, and places purchased for the erection of forts, magazines, &c., and the power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States. Now, sir, the rule which has been established, ex cathedra, by which to decide in what cases the sovereignty of the States has been alienated to the Federal Government, is this: that the States retain all the sovereignty which the constitution has not delegated exclusively to the United States. This exclusive delegation, says the same authority, only exists in three cases: 1st, where the constitution in express terms grants an exclusive authority to the Union, as, for example, the exclusive legislation over the seat of Government, &c.; secondly, where it grants an authority to the Union, and prohibits the States from exercising a like authority; as, for example, the power to coin money, which is granted to Congress, and prohibited to the States; thirdly, where it grants an authority to the Union, to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant. One example which is given, is the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States; this, it is said, must be exclusive, because, if each State had power to prescribe a distinct rule, there could be no uniform rule. Except in these three classes of cases, it is said, that, as the State sovereignty is not alienated, Congress have not exclusive power, and consequently the State Governments have a concurrent power with them. The third branch of this rule, that is, the one which declares the power of the Federal Government to be exclusive, where an authority is granted to the Union, to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant, has a direct and important bearing upon the present question. Where the powers of the Federal Government expend their force upon persons and things, there may be many instances in which, under this principle, the States may claim a concurrent power, because the operation of the Federal Government upon them does not necessarily exhaust the power. Even in the very strong case of taxation, it is said the States have this concurrent power; though there may be inconvenience in the action of the Federal and State Governments upon the same subject, yet there is no necessary contradiction and repugnancy, because, though the one Government should consume a portion of the property of the citizens by taxation, a portion would still remain for the demands of the other. But, sir, this cannot be the case where the Federal Government claims to exercise a direct jurisdiction over the soil, even in regard to mere property, though different persons may, at the same time, own a joint interest; or, one may own a present, and another a future interest; or, there may be other possible circumstances producing modifications of interest; yet, it is a proposition which cannot be denied, that two different persons cannot, at the same time, and in the same subject, possess distinct and independent rights, each embracing the whole interest in that subject; this would be legally as impossible as it would be physically for two different masses of matter, at the same time, to occupy the same space. If this would be the case in regard to property, how much stronger is the proposition when applied to jurisdiction.

All the powers of Government may be considered as emanations from its sovereignty; but what I now speak of, is that complete and perfect jurisdiction which necessarily includes, as a part of its definition, the right in, and power over, the domain or territory. Whosoever and wheresoever this jurisdiction is exercised directly over the soil, as the subject of its action, it must be exclusive; because, as the jurisdiction of a Government embraces the whole right in and power over the soil, whenever it exercises it directly on that subject, the jurisdiction of any other Government must necessarily be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant, if brought to act upon the same subject. Thus, to illustrate: When the General Government shall have turnpiked a particular road, and established toll-gates, if a State were to attempt to regulate or to claim the same road, the two powers could not exist together—the action of the first Government directly upon the right of soil having exhausted the whole subject, and expended the whole power over it. Accordingly, with a view to prevent this necessary collision of jurisdiction, in the clause relating to the seat of Government, &c., the jurisdiction or legislation is, totidem verbis, declared to be exclusive; and, in the other, to dispose of, and make all needful rules as to the public land, it must be exclusive, from the necessity of the case; because, no other power can exercise jurisdiction, inasmuch as that implies the ownership in the domain, which is in the General Government alone. We are told, however, that Congress have passed laws to punish robberies of the mail, &c., and that this power is no stronger. I answer, that, without stopping to inquire whether they rightfully had power to pass such laws, there is no analogy in the cases; because, there the power acts upon persons, but here it proposes to act directly upon the soil as its subject. No one can doubt but that the erection of toll-gates and demanding toll is an exercise of jurisdiction which can be founded only on a right to, and power over, the soil. If so, and the principle be true, that the jurisdiction in the Federal Government, in its direct action upon the soil, must, where it exists at all, be exclusive, then it results that the States have not, in this respect, concurrent power—that is, that they cannot turnpike any road which is declared to be a post road—thus giving to the General Government exclusive jurisdiction over one hundred and fourteen thousand miles of post road, which we now have, without the assent of the States, though the constitution requires that assent before it can be divested of its jurisdiction, in the small surface which is the seat of Government, and the other inconsiderable places which it enumerates. Again, sir. See to what lengths this principle would carry us. If Congress have a right to turnpike roads, then they have a right to adopt the accustomed means of doing it; but, one of the most usual means is the incorporation of companies; and thus we might have every road in the Union in the hands of incorporated companies, demanding tolls of the people, which Congress must make high enough to yield them a dividend upon their stock. This is not all: we are told that the right to create implies the right to preserve. Upon this principle, Congress might, with a view to preservation, prohibit any citizen from passing it, unless his wheels were of a given width; and, indeed, in this very bill, it is provided that those whose wheels exceed six inches in width shall be exempt from toll.

But, sir, I affirm the proposition, and I call upon gentlemen to refute it if they can, that, with the exception of the cases provided for in the constitution, of a seat of Government, the sites of forts, magazines, &c., it is not competent for the General Government to exercise jurisdiction, or to acquire by purchase, jurisdiction and property, in and over one square foot of territory in one of the States. Let me not be misunderstood; I speak not here of our public lands lying within any of the States; our power over them results from a substantive and distinct provision of the constitution. But my proposition applies to those States, in all the soil of which the State Governments have the right both of soil and jurisdiction: such, for example, as the State of Massachusetts. In such a case as this, I repeat, that I defy a refutation of my proposition.

I have two objections to the amendment, which I would desire to have obviated. They are these: I would prefer that the language should be all the right which we claim to have, rather than as it is, all the right which we may have; the other is the proviso, which proposes to attach certain conditions to the surrender. I would prefer an absolute unqualified surrender of all our pretensions, expressed in terms which could not, by implication even, be tortured into any admission that we had claim; but if these objections cannot be removed, I will vote for the amendment in its present form, as the nearest attainable approximation to what I think ought to be done.

FRIDAY, January 28.

Retrenchment.

The following resolution, reported from the Committee on Retrenchment, on the 21st inst., by Mr. WICKLIFFE, came up for consideration:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representa- tives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, shall prohibit the use of the stationery of the two Houses, in folding or endorsing any documents, pamphlets, or package, other than such as may have been printed by order of either House of Congress, or such manuscript documents as may relate to the business of the same."

Mr. WICKLIFFE briefly stated the object of the resolution, as intended to prevent the unwarrantable use, or the abuse of the existing privilege of members in relation to stationery, by enclosing, for the purpose of distribution, matter which had no connection with the business of the House.

Mr. WILDE inquired of the mover whether any resolution had been reported from the Committee on Retrenchment, showing the existence and the extent of such an abuse as the gentleman seemed to refer to. Without the most convincing evidence of the fact, he should not be willing to vote for such a resolution as this. He had always been opposed to the sanctioning, except on evidence the most incontestable, any self-condemnatory ordinance. He had occasion, some years ago, to say to the House, "A fronte recedentes Imperii." He thought the House had done this. They had receded from the front of empire by stigmatizing their own body. The conduct referred to in this resolution was admitted by all to be unworthy of members of this House, and he would not throw before the public an imputation of it to them without the fullest proof.

Mr. WICKLIFFE spoke in reply. If the gentleman would read the report made by the Committee of Retrenchment, at the last session, and would compare it with the instructions given by the House to that committee, he would see that their duties had special reference to the expenditures of this House. The committee had not proposed to retrench any of the expenditures in the departments, however great might be their amount, if they considered them necessary to a correct administration of the affairs of this Government. In the course of the investigation, the committee became fully satisfied that the original purpose, had in view by the House, in furnishing stationery to its members, had been greatly perverted by an improper use of the privilege. He did not pretend to say who had been most to blame, or who had been to blame at all, in this matter. He would not say that he was himself wholly exempt from deserved censure. It was highly probable that, partly from the force of habit, and partly from the influence of the example of others around him, he might have been induced to extend this privilege beyond its proper limits. He would state one or two facts to the House: within the first sixty days of the last session there had been printed (as he understood, and had reason to believe, for he could not speak with absolute certainty) within this District, between thirty and forty thousand copies of the Richmond address, besides ten thousand copies of the North Carolina address, and several thousand of the address from Washington, in Pennsylvania. All these had been folded and wrapped up in the folding rooms of this House, or at least out of the stationery furnished for the use of members. Besides these, two other documents had been put up in like manner, one of them purporting to be a copy of the official documents respecting the Six Militiamen; the other was a document purporting to have been written by a gentleman from Ohio, but whose contents were known to those only who had read it. He did not say or insinuate that a similar practice had not prevailed on the other side of the late great political controversy. No doubt great abuses had taken place on both sides. But this formed only an additional reason why the resolution ought to be adopted. If any gentleman would compare the account for stationery furnished at the last session, with that of any preceding year, he could not resist the impression that more of the public stationery had been consumed than was called for by the business of this House.

Retrenchment.

Mr. STOKES said that there had, perhaps, been some abuse in the matter referred to in the resolution, and he thought it should be corrected. The amount consumed last year for stationery, he had been informed, was upwards of six thousand dollars. There was convenience, too, in permitting members to purchase their own stationery. By a specific allowance this may be done, and from three to four thousand dollars cut off from the expenditure. If members were to be allowed any stationery at all, he thought this was the best course, and moved to amend the resolution as follows:

After the words House of Representatives, strike out the balance of the resolution, and insert: "Shall audit, at each session of Congress, and pay, out of the contingent funds of each House, the accounts for stationery of the members of each House, actually paid by them; not to exceed the sum of ten dollars for each member, during one session: and that the practice of furnishing stationery to the members, from the Secretary's and Clerk's offices, be discontinued."

Mr. EVERETT said he was opposed to the amendment, for the same reasons for which he was opposed to the original resolution. He had opposed it in the Committee of Retrenchment, and must vote against it in the House. He should not go into any calculation as to the number or kind of documents which had been folded in the public paper. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) had made a statement of abuses—for abuses (Mr. E. admitted) they were—which had taken place, in this respect, on one side of the question, and had been candid enough to admit that similar abuses had taken place on the other side of the question. This is, perhaps, all that is necessary to say, on this point, with the addition of one qualification. Mr. E. believed that the abuses, which the gentleman had not specified, were at least equal to those which he had. But he should say no more about it; they were abuses on whatever side they took place. He was opposed to the resolution and amendment, because the subject-matter is one which we cannot regulate by public enactment. It is one of those things which must be left to public sentiment, or the private sentiment which exists in the bosom of every member. He was, himself, willing to do away with this whole apparatus, of which the stationery is a part. He was willing to have the hall swept and garnished—cleared of these incumbrances, and exclusively appropriated to the objects for which it was constructed, and the members of the House were convened. But he believed it was out of the question to attempt to remove the desks; and while they remain, it seemed not worth while to attempt to do away the supply of a few sheets of paper, pens, and ink, furnished at the desks. And how can you draw a line between furnishing these small articles, and those lavish expenditures, justly complained of, by any thing but the operation of a sense of honor on the part of the members of the House, or of public sentiment upon them. If any thing could be effected by regulations, we have them already. By what right are reams, he had almost said cart loads, of paper furnished for the folding of electioneering pamphlets? Who furnishes it? Who pays for it? Have we no executive officers of this House? Have we no Committees of Accounts? Must any thing, and every thing, in the shape of an account, be passed? Mr. E. asked not to be mistaken. He cast no censure on the officers, or the committees of the House. They would go as far, no doubt, as the House would support them. But of what use was it, to pass a resolution, directing the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House to do that, which they were already able to do in the general discharge of their duty. Mr. E. thought a protracted debate on this subject, at a moment when so much business of importance was before the House, was inexpedient; and for this reason, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion of Mr. E. was determined in the negative.

Mr. BATES, of Missouri, said he was not quite sure that it would be considered proper for him to meddle in questions of this sort; but of this he was sure, that he would think and speak upon this subject as disinterestedly as any gentleman here. My days on this floor, said Mr. B., are numbered, and are few; as a member of this body, therefore, I cannot be greatly affected by any new course that may now be adopted. I have always understood that the practice of supplying members with public stationery was for the good of the public, and not as a personal kindness to the members of this House—for the purpose of facilitating the diffusion of useful knowledge among the people, and not partaking in any degree of the character of individual interest. I never, for an instant, supposed that my right to use the public paper and to frank packages, was designed as a personal boon to me, but have always acted upon the idea that it was the privilege of my constituents, intended exclusively for their benefit. It is the established practice of the House to order the printing of great numbers of public documents for the use of the people, evidently not to be read by us, because they are folded and sealed, and placed on our desks, ready to be franked and mailed. This privilege is highly useful to the public, and it is no valid argument against it that it is liable to be, or actually has been, abused. Every other good thing is obnoxious to the same objection. Sir, it is the theory of our Government, and I believe that it is very true in fact, that any man, whom forty or fifty thousand people may consider fit to represent them on this floor, is entitled to have imputed to him some little touch of discretion and honesty. If the consciousness of the dignity of a seat here, or a consciousness of personal respectability among individual members, cannot restrain a dishonest propensity to mean and grovelling speculations on the public, I shall despair of the efficacy of any rules we may adopt. The privilege of using public stationery must be withheld altogether, or the regulation will lead to consequences infinitely worse than those already existing. You cannot enforce the modified enjoyment of the privilege, as proposed in the resolution, without the exercise of an inquisitorial power over members, dishonorable alike to those who exercise, and those who are subject to it. The abuses referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE,) arising out of the high political excitement at the last session of Congress, are not to be wondered at. They will occur on both sides, whenever such extraordinary excitement prevails. The public curiosity on such occasions is on the gaze for news from the seat of Government, and it is no matter of surprise that errors of judgment should sometimes be committed, as to the importance of the matter diffused among the people. The abundance of our self-love makes us prone enough to consider every thing that concerns ourselves as of sufficient importance to be worthy of a circulation.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that, as to the propriety of adopting either the original resolution or the amendment, or of postponing both indefinitely, although the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAMBRELENG) had seen fit to denominate the whole a small business, still the resolution having received the votes of a majority of the Committee on Retrenchment, and he having in obedience to that committee reported it to the House, he felt himself called upon to make one or two observations. He could not perceive exactly how those gentlemen, who had been last session zealous in the cause of retrenchment and reform, could possibly be opposed to a resolution like this—a resolution which proposed to correct, by the authority of this House, abuses existing within its own domicile, and which, whatever gentlemen might say to the contrary, did call for correction in some shape or other. He would inquire of the gentleman from New York, whether a waste of the public stationery to the amount of two or three thousand dollars annually, was not as worthy of that gentleman's attention, as three or four hundred dollars expended for newspapers in one of the Departments. The amount, it was true, might not be of any great magnitude, yet it was a manifest abuse. Whether it was one which had sprung from a sudden emergency, or had insensibly grown up from a course of gradual indulgence, he would leave to the gentleman from Missouri to determine. All gentlemen seem to admit that the abuse had existed. The gentleman from Missouri might say that this resolution would not correct it; but, for himself, he was satisfied that it would. But, should even this be evaded, no doubt that gentleman's ingenuity would soon suggest a remedy. Very possibly he (Mr. W.) might be situated in the same manner as the gentleman from Missouri. It was very possible that he too might have but a few remaining days to spend here. That was a matter which did not depend on his own will. The resolution did not go to prohibit such a use of the public stationery as the will of Congress had permitted to the predecessors of those who now constituted that body. It was only intended to prohibit its application to matters not connected with the business of legislation. Would this House raise a committee for the express purpose of pointing out existing abuses, with a view to their correction, and then, as soon as the committee pointed out an abuse, and proposed a remedy, immediately vote it down, because it might possibly lead to abuse in some other form? Would not the adoption of such a resolution as this make its appeal to the moral feelings of a succeeding Congress? Was it to be believed, that, in the face of such a resolution, members of this House would send their stationery to their private lodgings, in violation both of its spirit and letter? If such a member was to be found, and the fact could be proved upon him, any gentleman that would move for his expulsion should have his zealous support.

Lotteries in Washington.

The bill to continue in force the provisions of "An act to authorize the Corporation of the City of Washington to draw Lotteries," was considered in Committee of the Whole, and occasioned some debate.

Mr. INGERSOLL explained the reasons why the Committee on the District had reported the bill. He disapproved of lotteries as much as the gentleman from New York; and if this were a proposition for the original grant of one, he should take the same ground, and certainly oppose it; but it was merely for the renewal of a privilege formerly granted. Mr. I. then went into an explanation of the circumstances of the case. The bill did not release the Corporation from its existing liabilities, and he thought the experience of that body was a very sufficient security that they would take good bonds for the future.

Mr. KREMER warmly opposed the bill. He had opposed it in committee, and would oppose it in the House. What security did that House possess, that, if they should pass the bill, the Corporation would not do the same thing again? Then another loss would happen, and the same argument would be urged upon the House again. Was it wise and prudent to encourage lotteries? If it was not, the House ought not to do it. If an evil was committed ten years ago, that was no reason that it should be committed now. The Corporation of Washington, it seemed, had made a bad bargain, and now that was urged as an argument why the House should give them an opportunity of making another bad bargain.

Mr. MARTIN had not had an opportunity of consulting the original bill, which the present one proposed to extend; and on his motion, the bill was laid aside for the present.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 24.

Retrenchment.

The resolution from the Committee on Retrenchment, on the subject of stationery, coming up.

Mr. VANCE said that he had no disposition to debar gentlemen from the ordinary use of stationery in the House, as heretofore, nor would such be the effect of his amendment. The business of the House would proceed as usual. As to correspondence, he could hold up as large a bundle of letters as the gentleman from Kentucky; [which he did.] A great noise had been made on the subject of reformation and retrenchment; but, after waiting so long, what had the House received? Three bills and one resolution. One of the bills proposed to make an alteration in the mode of furnishing the forage of officers in the army; another cut up the appropriation for the Indian department; the last was to discontinue secret service money during peace; and now the honorable gentleman's resolution went to save a few reams of paper. He would not say that he was more fit or more disposed to discover objects for retrenchment than the gentleman; but he really thought, if he was honored with a place in that committee, he could find more worthy objects than these. He would bring in a bill to take off five thousand dollars a year from the President's salary; he would take off the Speaker's extra pay; and he would dock off something from the pay of the members of this House. This would be doing something. Such a bill would be worth reporting. As to the present resolution, seeing that it had come into the House, he, for one, was prepared to meet it; he was ready, for his own part, to pay for all the stationery he made use of; it would not cost him more than six dollars, with which sum he could diffuse all useful information through his district, as well as if any quantity of paper should be furnished him out of the public purse.

Mr. HAMILTON said that he was exceedingly happy that the gentleman from Ohio had indicated so keen an appetite for retrenchment, and hence he hoped that the committee would have the benefit of his co-operation throughout the discussion of their measures; but it is a little hard that the eagerness of the appetite of the gentleman should be such, that he should be for proceeding to the banquet before half the dishes are served up. Permit me to assure him, that, before the committee have finished their labors, he will have subjects sufficiently comprehensive and various for the full exercise of his patriotism and love of frugality. It is true, sir, that the committee have reported but four or five bills as yet, and one resolution; and those not the most important in connection with our late investigations. Other bills, however, are in progress and preparation, and, I trust, in the course of the next week, that they will all be presented to the House. This delay no one regrets more than myself, more especially as it resulted from my own absence at the early part of the session. It has so happened, that the discussion has commenced on one of the most inconsiderable items of retrenchment which the committee have recommended. Yet, he trusted that, minute as was the subject, it might find its apology in this truth, that, however wrong it might be that charity should begin at home, it was right that retrenchment should do so. But he frankly confessed, he was greatly opposed to a waste of time on one item of the retrenchments of this House, when, perhaps, the same consumption of time would be sufficient for a full consideration of all the savings which the committee designed, in their bill, to propose for the consideration and adoption of the House. With this view, he should renew his motion to lie on the table.

Mr. LONG observed, although opposed to the principle contained in the resolution, he would prefer meeting the question now. If economy be the object, and the resolution is to pass, he thought the House ought to act promptly; he was not sure but it would have been something more of a saving to the Government, if the resolution had been passed yesterday, inasmuch as it had been suggested that there had been, in the course of the last evening, I will not say in anticipation of the passage of the resolution, some pretty heavy draughts made in the stationery. Should it be postponed a few days longer, it would afford ample opportunity for all the members to be furnished in the same way; consequently it must lose its effect for the present Congress. Mr. L. would say a word in relation to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE,) made yesterday on the subject of the resolution now under consideration; he did not, at the time, so particularly notice the observations; but in his printed speech, which appears in the morning's paper, he has given a tolerable minute statement of the number of copies of the Richmond address, the North Carolina address, and Militia documents, which he said had all been wrapped up in the folding rooms. This information is given and gone abroad for the benefit of the people. Now, no doubt, it is equally desirable that the people should be informed as to the number of copies of the Telegraph extra, &c., which was about that time circulated in the same way. He had no doubt the gentleman had it in his power to give this information, which, perhaps, might be deemed of as much importance as the parts he had communicated so minutely.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table—yeas 106, nays 62.

MONDAY, January 26.

Cumberland Road.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, and took up the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. FORT said: This question, like all others of great importance, ought to be discussed dispassionately. I feel that I can meet it calmly; but I am well aware that it will be impossible to present my view of it, without running into that disputed ground, so loudly defended by those who, it would appear, are the guardians of the rights of the States. Sir, I have attended patiently to this discussion; I have heard much of the growing powers of this Government, and of the imminent danger impending over the States and over the people; yet I never in my life felt more thoroughly convinced that these opinions are illusory and the fears entertained entirely groundless. This Government cannot exist a single day after the Governments of the States are destroyed; nor can it deprive the people of their liberties unless they shall become tired of the precious inheritance, and, like a famous nation of old, who enjoyed a Government established by the Most High, cry aloud against it, and, destroying its powers, bury themselves and their liberties in the mighty ruin. May our nation profit by the example of the punishment which they have suffered and yet continue to suffer.

Three questions present themselves for discussion under the bill on your table:

1. Has the Government of the United States power to construct roads within the States?

2. Has it power to levy tolls on roads thus constructed? and,

3. Is it expedient to exercise this power in the present instance?

Having risen to deliver my opinion in support of the bill reported by the Committee on Roads and Canals, it is obvious that I answer all these questions in the affirmative. To sustain these opinions, I deem it best first to notice, what I think the principal errors lying at the root of this subject; and from which have sprung the arguments deemed so conclusive against us. These are—

1. That this Government is a compact between the Governments of the States.

2. That its powers are derived from the State Governments.

3. That it properly exists only within the ten miles square, composing this district. And,

4. That the sovereignty of each State over its soil, is paramount and exclusive.

It is obvious, if these propositions are not founded on a just view of the constitution, but are, on the contrary, wholly untrue, a great part of the argument which has been advanced on this question must fall to the ground. I shall, therefore, bestow some attention on each of them. In the first place, let us inquire whether this Government is a confederation of independent sovereign Governments. Every Government is, in some sense, sovereign, and the States, within their limits of power and territory, are as truly so as any Government on earth. But the people of the United States live under no Government having boundless authority; and, although the term sovereignty is of frequent use amongst us, it invariably means no more than the sovereign power known under the Government we live in. Nothing has contributed more to darken this subject, than the obstinacy with which the definitions of sovereign powers, drawn from foreign countries, whose Governments have not a principle in common with ours, are brought in and applied to the States and to this Government. This subject cannot be thus explained or understood: our form of Government is too complex. True, it is wholly derived from one simple element, the will of the people; but, as it was impossible to bring this will to bear on the various circumstances requiring its exercise, our ancestors happily fell on the plan of delegating this power to proper agents. No one has denied the authority of the Constitution of the United States; nor, so far as I know, has any denied the obligation of individuals to conform to its laws; but the difficulty is, how far it may bind the States, without destroying that sovereignty reserved to them by the people. That we may not wander in this discussion, let us look a little into the history of the formation of this Government.

The Governments of most of the States existed before the establishment of this. The war of the Revolution left these States united by a compact, whose obligation, under the patriotic feeling prevailing during the conflict, was sufficient to preserve them through the arduous struggle. But the experience of a few years demonstrated that this compact was insufficient to perform the duties of a Government in time of peace. A heavy debt existed, which each State felt itself bound to see discharged, and this required something like a National Government. It is obvious, through all the stages of the proceedings had towards the establishment of the Constitution of the United States, that its founders deemed it invalid till ratified by the people themselves. The convention who framed it, therefore, returned it to the people for their sanction; and by whom was the sanction given? By the State Governments? By no means. The people chose delegates to meet in convention for this particular purpose; and by these conventions was this sacred instrument ratified and confirmed; and from that day till the present has it been considered as binding equally on all the States, and on all the people, deriving its powers from the highest authority known in this country—the people. True, this sanction was not obtained through popular assemblies; the people met in their geographical divisions; and in the only practicable way, I repeat it, gave to this Government the impress of their sovereignty.

I take it as granted that the Constitution of the United States was ratified, and consequently enacted by the people of the United States, and not by the State Governments. But let us look a little closer into this matter. Let us suppose the convention who framed it convened for the purpose; what can we suppose was the first object of their desire? To form a Government qualified to secure the happiness of the people. This is acknowledged by all the world to be the only true object of Government. No matter with what despotism or what fanaticism the liberties of the people are destroyed, whether it be by the cruel Autocrat, the infatuated Turk, or the bigoted Spaniard—all declare themselves the guardians of the happiness of the people. How much more are we justified in thinking that this was the ruling desire of our glorious convention. Follow them a little further; the objects deemed necessary to this great end gradually develop themselves; the instrument, intended to be invalid till sanctioned by the people, speaks in their name.

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union; to establish justice; ensure domestic tranquillity; provide for the common defence; promote the general welfare; and, above all, to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

These are the great ends to be accomplished, and they are worthy of the statesman and the sage. It was requisite to point out the means necessary to accomplish these great ends, and this is done in that wonderful instrument, equally distinguished for brevity and comprehensiveness—the Constitution of the United States. The power to construct roads is nowhere mentioned in the constitution, as belonging to the United States. If it exists at all, it is as an incident to the powers specially granted. The special grants of means or power, to this Government, which it appears to me may, in the administration of its affairs, require the exercise of the power to construct roads, are principally these: "To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises." "To regulate commerce with foreign powers, among the States and with the Indian tribes." "To establish post offices and post roads." "To provide for the public defence and general welfare of the United States." And, "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof." I have said that these powers were granted, not by the State Governments, but by those whose power will not be disputed here—the people of the United States. Over whom and to whom have they directed their mandate? Hear them—"This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges of every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." Could it be believed that this power thus granted, maintained, and executed, by every successive administration of the Government, for forty years, should now be a matter of question here? Could it have been dreamed that an argument to prove that this Government is clothed with power to execute its laws, as well within the States as elsewhere, would have been listened to for a moment? What then—does it follow that the States have no means to preserve themselves, or that the people are subject to an arbitrary power? Far from it. The people have reserved in their own hands, and in the State Governments, powers ample for the defence of both. But of these I shall say more hereafter.

2. Are the powers of this Government derived from the State Governments? I think I have shown that its powers are derived from a higher source. That the sovereignty it exercises is from an authority as much greater than that of a State, as the whole of the people are greater than a part; and that it is not only so from the reasonableness of the thing, but has been uniformly so received from the foundation of the Government. It may, however, be proper here to notice the many frightful pictures drawn of the decaying powers of the States, and of the rapid strides making by this Government towards absolute power and unlimited dominion. Nothing can present itself to my mind more idle than this fear, or more unfounded than these opinions. Have gentlemen failed to notice that this Government ceases to exist with those of the States? Have they failed to notice that the people themselves not only control us through returning elections, but the State Governments can decree our annihilation at their pleasure? No doubts exist on this subject. Let the State Legislatures cease to elect Senators, and soon the Senate ceases its existence; let them fail to provide for the election of electors, and where is your President? Let them repeal their laws providing for the election of members to Congress, and where is your Government? Dead, to all intents and purposes. Sir, this Government was not made for tyranny, but for liberty. True, it is strong: for how else, in this day, could it exist without strength? But let it be observed, and I say it without fear of refutation, that, although the United States possess the power to defy the greatest power on earth who should dare to invade us, yet they are nerveless, yea, dead, that instant they lose the confidence of the people. Far different is it with the State Governments: they have a self-existing principle, and may, in the sad day of our dissolution, survive our fall. True, they ought to be watchful; liberty flies from the sluggard: but let them not think of finding liberty by the destruction of this Government. They have nothing to fear from it. True, it may itself be overthrown by the means raised to defend us against our enemies. A traitor, at the head of our own army, might be a dangerous foe to liberty; but let it be remembered that, if the State Governments fall, this Government is also extinct: their confidence and united efforts should remain perpetual: for their interests are one.

8. Does this Government exist only in the ten miles square composing the District of Columbia? This notion, although not perhaps distinctly avowed, appears to me to form the basis of a great portion of the most abstruse reasoning, which has been advanced on this occasion. Surely, it cannot be derived from the study of our institutions, but is a worthy offspring of the writings of foreign jurists. With them, sovereignty means an unlimited power, and, therefore, two sovereignties cannot exist in the same place, or operate on the same thing: and follow their train of argument from their definition, and their conclusion is certainly true. But, as I have before said, the people of this country live under no such sovereignty, and this is fully admitted; but the many legal fictions, the boast of the English lawyer, but, in my opinion, the disgrace of his code, are not so readily shaken off. In this argument, we are told there can be no concurrent jurisdiction, and from definitions equally, perhaps, sound, and inapplicable to the case. I confess, the study of this part of the subject has opened a sort of fairy world, in which it would seem to be the first element of correct judgment to give up the evidence of the senses. Even the late Mr. Pinkney, whose powerful intellect would not suffer the cobwebs of doctrine to obscure the end of the law, is unable to see into this subject without the help of fiction.

Knowing that this Government could not exist, if its army, mail-bags, custom-houses, ships, or other property, necessary to the execution of its powers, were subject to taxation in every State they might happen to be in, he discovers a way to save the maxim about sovereignty, and yet maintain the law. Let him speak for himself: "The property, and all the institutions of the United States, are constructively," yea, constructively, "without the local territorial jurisdiction of the individual States, in every respect, and for every purpose, including that of taxation." What! the forts, arsenals, public dockyards, arms, and other property of this Government, while within the States, have no protection from the grasp of such States, except by construction, and that construction in the face of common sense? Now can any thing be more absurd than this? And how could such an absurdity maintain its ground in so powerful a mind? Because the States of this Union are declared sovereign? and no thousand facts can do away the notions infused into the mind by this magic word. Give me matter of fact, not fiction. If we have no Government, let the people know it at once, and provide one. But how stands the fact here? Is this Government really alien to the States? Or, is it equally at home in every State or territory in this Union, claiming an exemption from taxation on its means of carrying on its operations through that paramount sovereignty, derived from the people themselves? Why resort to fiction? Are we afraid that the people should know the fact that we attempt to blind them with fiction? True, this district is a residence for the functionaries of this Government, and the seat of its legislation. But the people know that no part of its power is derived from the ten miles square. Every member of both branches of Congress are citizens of the States, and subject to their laws. Every President and every Head of Department, have, so far as I know, been likewise citizens of some of the States. They are taken from among the people, to enact and execute laws operating to the whole extent of our territory, and this Government is, in fact, equally at home in all the States and Territories of this Union.

4. I come now to consider what seems most insisted on, and is, I believe, declared to admit of neither doubt nor exception. Do the States enjoy a paramount and exclusive jurisdiction over the soil they cover? So long as this Government exists, its enactments are nothing, unless of force in the States. They are worse than nothing, if subject to be repealed, directly, or indirectly, by the individual States. And, how, let me ask, can this Government carry on its indispensable operations, without exercising sovereignty over the soil? True, this sovereignty, although paramount for its purposes, is not exclusive, even for forts, arsenals, &c., unless by the consent of the States in which they lie, so abundantly guarded are the rights of the States. But, for all the necessary purposes of its institution, this Government, by the declaration of the people themselves, the uniform decision of its courts, and the legislative enactments of every administration, from its commencement, is declared to have a paramount jurisdiction over the whole Union. The powers of this Government are co-equal with its duties. It must establish post roads, regulate internal commerce, defend us against our enemies, have fortifications, march its armies, and occupy so much space as these operations require. Suppose a State were to refuse her consent to each and every one of these operations; by what right would this Government enter her territory for either purpose, if the State sovereignty over the soil is exclusive?

Cumberland Road.

I have used freely the term sovereignty. I am apprised that it is at the risk of being misunderstood or misrepresented. I disclaim all definitions of this term, which signify a power unknown to the constitution. I have used it because it is so liberally and exclusively applied to the States, by those in opposition to my views. I grant that each Government is equally entitled to the term, but must again repeat, that the people of this country acknowledge no sovereignty inconsistent with that liberty which they have again and again declared to be dearer than life, and which he who surrenders is unworthy to live.

If I have been so fortunate as to have conveyed my ideas intelligibly, in what I have said, little more will be necessary to point out the opinions I entertain on this subject. I think I have shown that the United States is a Government of the people, and that its powers are all sovereign and paramount, though, in many instances, not exclusive. That, if it can make a road, it must do so as a sovereign power, and, if so, a power to tax for the use, is a necessary and proper incident. But this power, although sufficient for its objects, can be extended no farther. It can never be extended to forbid a State from making as many roads as it thinks proper, nor can it claim from the citizen any tax except he travels the road. And it is equally untrue, that the legislation of Congress, on this subject is intended to be exclusive. The sovereignty of the States over this road remains uninterrupted for all the purposes of her civil and criminal jurisdiction, and Congress is restricted in its legislation to those measures which may be necessary and proper to construct, preserve, and keep it for the purposes of the nation. Nor have the individuals on this road been invaded without a strict observance of that clause of the constitution requiring compensation to be made to them for every damage they have sustained.

Sir, it was obvious that a successful opposition to this bill required that the force of legislative precedent should be destroyed. I confess this forms no conclusive argument; but, in spite of what has been said to decry its influence, I must still point to your statute book. If the exercise of incidental powers, from the establishment of the Government to this day, has not developed proofs of the absolute necessity of the frequent use of those powers to the existence of this Government, then I think the argument must be yielded to our adversaries. The framers of the constitution did not attempt a code of laws, but a constitution. They knew the age they lived in, and had they been required to do so, it was beyond the wisdom of man to devise laws suited to the progressive wants of this expanding nation. They knew that it would be equally vain and pernicious to attempt to fetter society with a code like that of the Locrians, or the more renowned laws of Lycurgus. No, sir: the march of knowledge, and the spread of institutions, beneficial to mankind, forbade it. A form of Government they gave for our acceptance; and, wonderfully comprehensive as it is, few, very few of our laws are founded directly on the powers granted to Congress. The whole post-office code, extending to punishment of the people for every hindrance or injury to the mail, and even forbidding the reasonable liberty of carrying letters for hire on private account, are passed by powers incidental to the right to "establish post offices and post roads." The revenue laws, and the tariff among them, are incidental to a right "to regulate commerce." Nor is this the most remote incident to this power which has been exercised. Buoys, beacons, lighthouses, dockyards, and sea walls, have risen under it, and a tax on all who use this light is exacted on the same principles.

The treaty-making power appears to carry incidents still more wonderful. The power to make treaties has carried with it that to buy those invaluable possessions Louisiana and Florida, and not only to pay for them twenty millions of the people's money, but to bind this Union to accept of them as States, equal every way to those who made the purchase. Where is the authority granted to this nation to have passed these laws? I venture to say they are nowhere to be found, except in the incidental powers granted by the people in the constitution. And shall we acknowledge all these powers—the right to take away the lives of our citizens, to consume millions of our money, to open to foreign nations the door of union and equal sovereignty with ourselves, and yet shrink back from the power to make a road, which is equally an obvious incident to granted power?

I have said that all the powers of this Government must be sovereign. No State can add to them, except in the instances pointed out in the constitution. I, therefore, think it unnecessary to say much on the subject of compacts made with the States, on the subject of this road. If we had not the right to make this road, before these compacts, we have never had the right. But if we have that right, certainly an obligation to exercise it might grow out of the compacts alluded to. This view of the matter seems the only rational account of it. The road in question is beneficial to the States through which it runs; but it is invaluable to the States lying beyond it to the West. To grant power to make it is a strange way of asking a favor of such magnitude; to have made a compact requiring its construction, was a regular and ordinary exercise of that attention to our interest, so indispensable in all the transactions of life.

Mr. BARNEY remarked that, as a Representative of one of the States to which this road was to be transferred, not as a gratuity, but clogged with onerous and oppressive conditions, it became him to investigate the title, and to be well assured of its validity, before he could give his assent to the transfer. In the present dilapidated condition of the Cumberland road, in consequence of the continued neglect of Congress to make adequate appropriations for its repair, it will require a large expenditure to put it in a condition to erect toll gates, which, by turnpike law, are to be thrown open whenever it shall cease to be in good travelling order. One hundred thousand dollars is appropriated by the original bill to this object. [Mr. BUCHANAN stated that this amendment did not propose to strike it out.] Thus, (said Mr. B.,) the leading question presents itself: What authority does Congress possess to delegate to the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, a power which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and all who support his amendment, deny she herself possesses? If the General Government cannot erect toll-gates, can she authorize the erection of them by the States? And conceding, as I do, her right to preserve, by the exercise of her own sovereignty, that which she has created, yet she cannot, by any forced construction of the compact with Ohio, transfer this road, or divest herself of its proprietorship, by any legislative enactment.

While the Western world was almost a desert, you contracted, for a valuable consideration, to connect it with the Atlantic border, by making, regulating, and constructing a highway, that should create an identity of interests, by facilitating intercourse; and the obligation to preserve it, for the full attainment of all the objects designed by its construction, is binding on all succeeding generations. If you can now transfer it to a State or States, you could, with equal propriety, have destroyed it within a month after you had complied with the letter of your compact, by its construction. So long as this Union shall endure—and may Heaven grant it perpetuity!—so long are these United States bound, by the spirit of their compact, by every principle of morality and good faith, by self-interest, which has its influence in the councils of the nation as well as in the breasts of individuals, to preserve this object of general interest—the common property of the Republic—which they cannot divest themselves of, and which they ought not, if they could. Wherein consists the difference between exacting light money and tolls on a highway? Will it be contended that, because a ship is borne on the wide expanse of the Atlantic Ocean, without the limits of any individual State, the General Government has exclusive jurisdiction?

It must be recollected that four-fifths of all our lighthouses are erected in our bays, and sounds, and rivers, and within the limits of the States; consequently the cases are precisely parallel, and the former right having always been fully conceded, with what propriety can the latter be denied? The Government being bound, in good faith, to keep up the road, it is but reasonable that they who enjoy the benefit of it, should contribute an indemnity adequate to the injury sustained by the travel over it. He who passes to-day contemplates to return to-morrow; and it is his interest that it should be always kept in such a state of repair as to create the least possible delay, and enable him to carry the heaviest burdens; and as it must be sustained by a tax, the principles of equity and justice demand that the remotest sections of the Union should not be required to contribute to an improvement which affords to them no advantage; but that those who enjoy the benefit should bear the burden. Pennsylvania and Maryland by their respective laws, have invited you to erect toll-gates thereon. Through Virginia it passes but a few miles; and, were the assent of that State deemed necessary, she has displayed too much magnanimity in granting corporate privileges to citizens of other States to the right of her soil, to refuse it to these United States.

Mr. B. attached additional importance to the decision of the committee on this amendment, as to its effect on other improvements contemplated to be made out of the public funds. If it should succeed, it is not difficult to foretell the fate of the great national road from Washington to New Orleans, in the South, and to Buffalo, in the North. Congress will cease to entertain similar propositions of a national character, whenever it shall be solemnly decided that the roads, as soon as constructed, are to be ceded to the respective States through whose limits they pass, and thus the course of the republic be arrested in her march to the high destinies which await her. The bill, as reported, proposes to impart vitality to the road—a living principle which carries with it the means of self-preservation. It is a metaphysical refinement to suppose that the exercise of a power, by the General Government, within the limits, and by the assent, of a State, which, while it benefits her, does no injury to her sister States, can, by any fair construction, be deemed a violation of constitutional right.

TUESDAY, January 27.

Widow of John Paulding.

Mr. WARD submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report on the memorial of

JANUARY, 1829.]

Widow of John Paulding.

certain citizens of the county of West Chester, in the State of New York, heretofore presented to this House, praying for a pension to the widow of John Paulding, deceased, one of the captors of Andre, be re-committed to the Committee on Military Pensions.

In support of his resolution, Mr. WARD said that, having made the motion from a sense of duty, he was constrained, by the same principle, to make a few explanatory remarks upon the circumstances of the case. Sir, (said Mr. W.) the petition that I am now desirous should be re-committed to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, I had the honor to submit to this House at its last session, which was then referred to that committee, and upon which the committee made an unfavorable report. It was my intention, sir, to have proposed an amendment, in favor of this widow, to the bill reported for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution, and which yet remains to be acted upon: but I felt it to be my duty, in the first place, to consult with the honorable gentleman at the head of that committee, upon the subject, and he advised me to pursue the course I have now adopted. It will be seen, sir, that this resolution does not instruct the committee to bring in a bill; nevertheless it is my wish that gentlemen who are in favor of granting the prayer of the petitioner, should vote in favor of it, and that those who are opposed to it, will vote against it; because we have now but thirty days left in this session upon which we can transact business; and if the House was opposed to this application, I am not desirous of troubling the committee again with this matter. I would observe that the petition sets forth that John Paulding, who was one of the captors of Major Andre, died several years since, leaving a widow in indigent circumstances, with twenty children, five of whom are minors, and that they pray that the pension which was granted to him during his life, may be given to his widow.

It is well known to every gentleman of this House that, in the Autumn of 1780, when our military affairs in every quarter were in a worse condition than they had ever been in since the beginning of the war of the Revolution—if we except the latter part of the year 1776—and when dismay and almost despair had paralyzed the energies of our country; and at a time too, when Washington was absent from the camp on official duties, and when our Army was dwindled to a few thousand efficient men, that Arnold, in brooding over his imaginary wrongs and neglects, from a spirit of resentment and avarice, committed an act of treason—not a simple act of treason, by deserting his own standard and flying from his own post, but an act of treason pregnant with the most awful consequences, such as involved the lives of his whole army and the fate of his country together.

The success of his plan would have been a death blow to the hopes of America. Arnold had been, for a long time, laying his plans and searing his conscience. The British, after many hints and suggestions from him, understood their man, and Major Andre was sent to West Point to negotiate the business of the surrender of this stronghold. The work, as far as compact could make it, was accomplished. The British spy was returning to his headquarters, flushed with the success of his diplomacy, when he was taken by John Paulding and his associates, three plain honest yeomen of the county of West Chester, citizen soldiers, without wealth or office. The prisoner offered them bribes of great magnitude to release him, and named himself as a hostage until those stipulations were complied with, and his ransom was forthcoming. They did not listen to him, although they would not doubt his word, nor the ability of his general to pay the ransom, but rejected his offers, and marched him, forthwith, to the nearest post of the American army, and gave him up to the commanding officer, and felt happy in the discharge of their duty. The country was astonished and confounded at this act of treason, and officers and soldiers started forth to avenge it; but, while words of indignation were on every tongue at the very name of Arnold, those of commendation and gratitude to these captors were commingled with them.

Congress felt satisfied with the patriotism of these men, and expressed a sense of gratitude to them by voting to send medals to the Commander-in-Chief, to be presented to them; and with the scanty means then in the power of the nation voted also to pension them for life. A dollar then, as our country was situated, was worth a hundred now: for at the time when this was done the Treasury was nearly bankrupt, and soldiers half naked and half starved were paid in depreciated paper. Yet, such was then thought to be the magnitude of the services of Paulding and his associates, that there was no question about the course to be pursued in rewarding such inflexible honesty. The army, who knew what was honorable in citizen soldiers, hailed with delight this act of justice in Congress, and not a murmur was heard among the people, who were then ground to the earth by taxes and requisitions to support the war. The soldiers did not think the country bountiful, or hardly just, to those men, for such important services. Besides these honors, an ample page was given to this incident in the annals of our Revolutionary conflict; and the biographers and historians gave the names of John Paulding, Isaac Van Wart, and David Williams, to future ages, as men in the common walks of life, who were above the influence of a bribe—men who maintained Spartan integrity in the midst of corruption, espionage, treachery, and treason. The story was told on both sides of the Atlantic in nearly the same words: and the enemy, while he deplored the loss he had sustained, never denied these men the virtue of stern honesty. Two of these men, Paulding, and Van Wart, resided in the county I have the honor to represent, and I can speak of them from personal knowledge. They supported through life an unsullied reputation. Their fame was never tarnished; they were respected by the whole living neighborhood, and honored with civic honors when dead; and the corporation of the city of New York reared a monument to the memory of Paulding, in gratitude for his services.

And now, sir, what is it that the petitioners ask? For it must be remembered that it is not the petition of the widow and orphans of John Paulding for a large sum of money, to give them affluence and ease; no—but it is the petition of the inhabitants of West Chester county, their neighbors, who are acquainted with their indigent circumstances, and also with the merits of the deceased, soliciting only a humble pittance to save a sinking widow and a bereaved family from penury and want. It may be said that hundreds of meritorious officers and soldiers, who faithfully discharged their duty, have died without a just compensation for their services and sufferings. This is a painful truth, which I deplore, not deny; but I think it no argument against the prayer of this petition. Shall we be hardened against humane and generous acts to one, because justice cannot be shown to all? Shall we deny justice to the living, because we neglected to do it to some who are now beyond the reach of it? This argument was strongly urged, last session, on the bill for making some compensation to the surviving officers of the Revolution who come under certain clauses, yet, thank God, it had but little effect on the good sense of this House. A great portion of the original number of those entitled to this compensation were in their graves; they had fallen like the autumnal leaves, and sunk into the bosom of their mother earth, unnoticed and unknown. Several of them died while we were lingering on with the debate upon the bill; yet was this a reason why the survivors should be neglected, and fall into their graves in the same forlorn state as their comrades in arms? This bill gave more satisfaction in every part of the country that I have heard from, than all the other doings of Congress for the session. The people have always approved, heart and soul, of every thing done for the benefit of the old soldiers. And even those Revolutionary worthies to whom none of the nation's bounty, as we call it, came, never were known to repine at the good fortune of others, although they justly, in many cases, complain of their not being taken care of themselves. So far as it relates to myself, I would not only cheerfully vote for a bill to provide for those who yet remain to be provided for—I mean the militia who served in that war—but for the widows of all our soldiers of the Revolution.

Let us look for a moment and see what has been done for the other actors in this drama—the traitor and the spy, who figured largely in this business. The traitor, although his plan entirely failed of success, received his promised reward to the very letter of the contract. The ten thousand pounds were paid down; the commission rank of Brigadier General was instantly given him, his family were at once put under the protection and patronage of the British Government, and his children are at this day men of considerable standing and wealth in the Canadas. The British Government fulfilled every part of this base contract, even to doing all they could to make him a man of consequence; but there were hearts among our enemies too noble to yield their confidence to a traitor. As regards the spy, it is true that he was insensible to honors, for he slept under the tree where he was executed; but his Government pensioned his mother and sisters, and some of them survive to enjoy the royal bounty until this day. A cenotaph was erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey, among the monuments of the great and wise of his nation, who had gone to their long rest in honor and virtuous praise. This was not all. After the lapse of nearly forty-five years, his bones were even unearthed by a royal mandate, and carried to his native land, and placed in consecrated ground. They thought he died in a good cause, and were not content that his ashes should remain in an ignominious grave. I complain not of this: for his country, as well as other countries, had a right to pass in judgment upon the merits of their heroes, or martyrs, or soldiers, and to decide as they please.

I state these facts not to injure the fame of Andre, for he took his life in his hand, and forfeited it, and was punished by the death all nations have prescribed for his offence. Justice was satisfied, and so should all be: what I complain of is, that, while listening to monodies upon Andre, and keeping up our sympathies with every act of his nation, in regard to his family or fame, that we forget the merits of his captors, and something more than forget them—even question the purity of their motives, and undervalue their services, and cloud their fame with suspicions. This at once is robbing the dead, and piercing to the heart their descendants, who had no other inheritance left them but the reputation of their ancestors. If these men had acted for gain, how widely did they misjudge: for the ransom of their prisoner would have been five times as much at the moment as they have received during the whole of their lives, and an annuity might easily have been added: for such things require no debate in Parliament. A reward for delivering him to the British would have been certain, and no doubt, splendid. What they might possibly gain from Congress, was distant and uncertain: for, sir, neither these men, nor the wisest of the sages of the Revolution, could predict at that time what would have been the probable result of the more than doubtful contest in which they were engaged.

Cumberland Road.

[H. OF R.]

They were true to their country; to the cause of liberty; and deserved ample rewards.

Mr. BRENT inquired of the Chair if it was in order to refer petitions by a resolution.

The SPEAKER replied that it was not.

Mr. WARD then modified his resolution so as to make it read, "report of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions;" and, being thus amended, it was adopted.

Cumberland Road.

On motion of Mr. MERCE, the House went into Committee of the Whole, and took up the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Pennsylvania, took the floor, and said, as it was his intention to vote against the amendment under consideration and in favor of the bill, he would ask the indulgence of the committee while he stated very briefly some of the reasons which had led him to that conclusion. On the constitutional question, of the power of Congress to appropriate a part of the national resources to objects of Internal Improvement, he should say but little. I have understood (said Mr. A.) that the question was considered as definitively settled and put to rest, and I certainly have no desire to provoke a discussion of it on the present occasion. As it appears to me, however, to be, in some measure, involved in the subject under consideration, I will take the liberty of making a few remarks, by way of introduction to what I intend saying hereafter. I never had any scruples of the existence of such a power in the General Government. The language of the constitution is too plain and intelligible to be misunderstood. I apprehend it would be difficult to discover any ambiguity in its meaning. To doubt the right of Congress to make appropriations for purposes of Internal Improvement, appears to me to be about as reasonable as it would be to doubt their right to appropriate a part of the revenue to the payment of the national debt, or to any other purpose. To be adequate to any great national purpose of providing for the general welfare, it was necessary that this power should be untrammelled by restrictions or reservations that might lessen its efficiency. It was equally as impossible for the convention to foresee what state of things the fluctuating tide of events might develop, in the course of half a century, as it is for us to foresee what another half century may unfold to posterity. It was all-important, therefore, that Congress should be clothed with a power fully competent to provide for every possible emergency. It is a national power, created for national purposes, and, of necessity, should be lodged in the General Government, by which it can be most promptly and most efficiently applied. I apprehend it would have been a very doubtful, if not a dangerous policy, to have confided to the States, in their separate capacity, the performance of a duty so important as that of providing for the general welfare. It is a duty which properly and necessarily appertains to Congress to perform. If, then, it is admitted to be the special province of Congress to provide for the general welfare, the existence of a power adequate to the fulfilment of that duty, and their right to exercise it, can no longer be a matter of doubt. It is contended, however, that this power, which has been emphatically called the making power, does not involve the preserving power; that the power to make turnpike roads does not involve a power to erect gates and collect tolls, for their preservation; that they are distinct powers, between which there is no connection; that the power to preserve is not an attribute of the making power. This (said Mr. A.) is the first time I have ever heard such a doctrine seriously advocated. I have always supposed that the power to provide for the repair and preservation of a public work, and the power to construct it, were so closely united, and so intimately blended, as to be inseparable; that the one was an essential attribute and concomitant of the other. Will it be said that the power to build forts, arsenals, and ships of war, does not involve a power to provide the means of keeping them in repair? Every man in the community knows that they are indispensably necessary for the common defence, and for the protection of our commerce. The power to appropriate money for their preservation is universally admitted. Annual appropriations are made for that purpose, without opposition. In relation to these objects, the power to make, and the power to preserve, are necessarily indivisible. The efficiency of the one would be, in a great measure, destroyed, if deprived of the other. If, then, it is conceded that the power granted to Congress, to provide for the general welfare, involves a power to make turnpike roads, it is manifestly clear that they possess a power to provide the ways and means of keeping them in repair.

Mr. STEWART expressed his regret that gentlemen had deemed this a fit occasion to draw into discussion all the topics connected with the general power over the subject of internal improvements. If repeated decisions, and the uniform practice of the Government, could settle any question, this, he thought, ought to be regarded as settled. The foundation of this road was laid by a report made by Mr. Giles, the present Governor of Virginia, in 1802, and was sanctioned, the next session, by a similar report, made by another distinguished Virginian, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) now a member of this House. It was, therefore, the offspring of Virginia, and he hoped she would not now abandon it, as illegitimate. Commenced under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, it had been sanctioned and prosecuted by every President, and by almost every Congress, for more than a quarter of a century. It had cost more than two millions of dollars, and was worth much more than it had cost. Its benefits were incalculable. Important as this road was, as a medium of communication, and as a bond of union between the Atlantic and Western States; important as it was, to the nation, in connection with its mail, military, and commercial operations; no permanent system had yet been adopted for its preservation and repair. This road had already passed through three States, and was in progress through three others. A portion of it had been in constant use, for fifteen or sixteen years, yet the whole amount appropriated for its repair had not been sufficient to put one inch of stone on its entire surface. No road in the world, he contended, had ever sustained itself so long, with so little repair. This fact, alone, furnished a triumphant refutation of the charge of want of fidelity and skill in its original construction.

This road was now in a state of rapid decay, and almost rapid dilapidation. "Something must be done speedily, or both the road and the money it had cost would be lost to the nation. The impossibility of obtaining annual appropriations had induced the Committee of Roads and Canals to report the bill under discussion, which required those who used the road to pay for its repair. This was not to be a tax for purposes of revenue, as had been alleged; but a voluntary contribution, paid by travellers, barely sufficient to repair the injury they did to the road by using it; it was not a tax in the constitutional sense, no more than the postage paid on letters, or the money paid by vessels passing lighthouses on the seacoast. The power that sanctioned the one, sustained and supported the other.

Mr. S. laid it down, as a general principle, that the power of creation carried with it, as a necessary and inseparable incident, the power of preservation. This could not be controverted; and, hence, gentlemen opposed to the bill were under the necessity of denying the power of the Government to construct the road. This they had done, and thus brought under discussion the whole question of power, in all its aspects. His colleague, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) who had opened the debate on this subject, seemed to regard the bill with more alarm than the people of the South did the tariff. He had denounced it as a most daring and dangerous usurpation of power; as tending directly to consolidation or separation; as even worse than the sedition law; as alike destructive to the rights of the States, and the liberties of the people. He had, indeed, conjured up a most frightful picture. He had, himself, called it a "spectre." True—but it was one of his own creation. A "spectre" at which, he says, even the Federalism of former days would have "shrunk back with horror." He had, therefore, felt it his duty to sound the tocsin of alarm; he had exhorted the friends of State Rights to rally their forces; he had appealed to Virginia, whose voice, he said, had awakened some of her slumbering sisters, and kept alive the wholesome doctrine of State Rights; and of this school, he, too, it seems, had become a sudden, and, of course, a zealous disciple. He had, however, taken but one step—he must take another, and that was, to deny, also, the constitutionality of the tariff. This he might do at the next session; and then, and not till then, could he be admitted into full communion. He must go the whole, and even that would not restore him to favor.

The gentleman has, in fact, distinctly informed us, in his speech, that the politicians of this country are hereafter to be divided into two great parties: the one in favor of "Federal power, and the other wedded to State Rights;" in other words, those who advocate, and those who deny, the power of this Government to protect domestic manufactures and promote internal improvements. These are the subjects, and the only subjects, over which the power of this Government is now warmly resisted. These were the great points of controversy, and he agreed with his colleague, that every man must take his stand, on the one side or the other. The issue was made up. These measures must be abandoned or sustained. The power exists, or it does not: there was no half way course. If it existed in the one case, it existed in the other; they were kindred measures, and, in his opinion, would stand or fall together. After the public debt is paid, which must occur in a very few years, Why, you will be asked, impose a tariff of duties, when there is no object on which you can expend the revenue? These subjects were inseparably connected; they constituted one system of policy; it was against this system that the party "wedded to State Rights" were directing their efforts, and it was this system that its friends were now called upon to defend and uphold.

Mr. S. appealed to the Representatives of the Interior and the West. Without internal improvements, he inquired what they were ever to expect from the expenditures of this Government. They must bear their full share of the public burdens, pay their full share of the public revenue, without the possibility of participating in its benefits—the whole would go to the seaboard. In the Interior, and the West, they had no fortifications, no ships and navies, no sea walls, dockyards, lighthouses, buoys, and beacons. He affirmed, without fear of contradiction, that, from the foundation of the Government, to the present time, the whole civil expenditures of the Government, for all purposes, except internal improvements, in the whole Union, twenty miles from the tides of the ocean, had not been equal to the expenditures on a single fortification! Deplorable, indeed, must be their condition, without this power; it amounted to a positive exclusion of the Interior and the West from all participation in the benefits of the public expenditure. Their wealth, it was true, like their vast rivers, would continue to flow in uniform and never-ceasing streams to the ocean, bearing to it their ample contributions; but, by destroying this power, you blot out forever that sun, which alone could take up a portion of this great deep, and return it in copious and refreshing showers over the vast region from which it was drawn, invigorating and replenishing the numberless fountains from which it originally flowed.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 28.

Cumberland Road.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole upon the state of the Union, and resumed the consideration of the Cumberland road bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Indiana, said: Is it necessary that Congress should adopt any measures for the permanent repair and preservation of the Cumberland road? If so, does the bill, as reported, provide for such repairs and preservation? And, if the bill is liable to objections, is the amendment the less so? So far as I have heard the argument, these questions have divided themselves into two general heads—I mean those of constitutionality and expediency; or, in other words, is the proposition contained in the bill constitutional? Is it expedient? The same questions arise on the amendment. This subject, and the answers to these questions, are not new to me; they are not new to the people whom I represent; they present no new question here. For myself, I confess that I have thought much upon this subject—not for the purpose of making a speech here; not merely since I have been a member of Congress; no, sir, in my own house, at my own fireside, at times when I could view the whole ground coolly and dispassionately; when the gaze of such an august body as this, which is almost enough to drive from the mind of so young a speaker as I am, the ideas which he intends to bring into the discussion, was not upon me. At times like these, sir, I have formed an opinion for myself on this all-important question; and that opinion it will be my object to communicate to this committee, as distinctly and intelligibly as I can, as it is upon that opinion, and the reasons which have operated on my mind, in its formation, that I must rely, before my constituents and the world, for the correctness of the vote which I am about to give on this question.

Then, sir, I have no doubt but that Congress is vested with plenary powers, by the Constitution of the United States, to construct roads and canals of a national character. I do not wish to be understood as saying, that the United States possess the power to construct either roads or canals which are local or sectional in their character. The question which these two propositions would present, have little or no affinity with each other. This Government is only vested with power to operate on objects strictly national in their character. Sectional or local objects do not come within the sphere of her operations; they fall within the exclusive control of the State Governments in which they are constructed. In this restrictive sense I wish to be understood as contending for the power of Congress, under the constitution, to construct roads and canals.

So far as principle is involved, the amendment presents quite as strong a question of constitutional power as the original bill; indeed, it may well be questioned, whether the amendment does not go one step farther than the bill as reported. The bill proposes to put the road in repair, and then to collect a toll barely sufficient to keep it in repair. The amendment proposes to put the road in a like repair, and then provides that the United States shall cede the road to the different States in which it lies, upon the condition that the States, by a given day, shall accept of the cession, with a restriction annexed that they shall never collect more toll on this road than will be sufficient to keep it in repair. What, then, does this amendment assume? It assumes, first, that Congress has the power to take the materials necessary for the repair of this road, and to enter upon it, and repair it; secondly, that the road, when repaired, is the property of the United States; thirdly, that the Congress of the United States can constitutionally cede the property of the United States in this road to the several States in which it lies; and lastly, that we have the power to impose restrictions on the legislation of the States on the subject; for we cannot repair this road unless we can constitutionally use the means; we cannot cede this road unless it is our property; we cannot impose restrictions on the legislation of the States, in relation to this road, unless it is subject to our jurisdiction and control. The bill assumes no more—nay, it does not assume so much: the one provides that Congress shall keep the road in repair, by erecting the gates and collecting toll sufficient for that purpose; the other provides that the gates shall be erected by the States, and a toll collected, under restrictions imposed by Congress. Now, sir, what is the difference? Will not the maxim, qui facit per alium facit per se, apply to this case with some propriety? It seems to me to amount to about the same thing either way, so far as the erection of the gates and the collection of toll is concerned, except as to the laws under which the tolls are to be collected. Of this exception I shall have occasion to speak hereafter; and I should like the gentleman to show me the section of the constitution under which he proposes to cede this road to, and impose the restriction on, the States. There may be such a clause in that instrument, but I confess it has escaped my observation. I have now, I presume, said enough to let the committee know that I am in favor of the bill, as reported, and against the amendment.

I listened with pleasure to the speech of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) delivered on this question a few days since, as I do to all that gentleman says in debate; and while I acknowledge the great powers of his mind, and the ingenuity of his arguments, I must most decidedly dissent from his doctrines. His premises, too, are professedly the provisions of the constitution; but I hope to be able to show that his arguments are founded in error, in respect to the powers given by the constitution to Congress, and the object of conferring those powers. This will make it necessary for me to take a cursory view of the formation of this Government and its powers, prior to the adoption of the federal constitution. It will be recollected by gentlemen, that the thirteen original States were bound together by the Articles of Confederation. This was emphatically a union of States. The States who had thus entered into this league or confederation retained all their rights, their sovereignty, and their exclusive jurisdiction in their own hands. The Congress of the United States acted upon those States as so many sovereign corporations, and not upon the people. When it became necessary to raise an army for the common defence, Congress could fix the just quota that each State should send to the field, and could request the States to comply with the requisition. Was it necessary to collect money from the people to support the army, carry on the war, and defray the expenses of Government, Congress could apportion the sum that each State should contribute to the common stock, and make a request that the States should furnish the amount. If these requests were thought expedient, and no constitutional scruples should suggest themselves to the State Legislatures, they were complied with; but, should the States, or any one of them, not comply, what was the consequence? Congress, under the Articles of Confederation, had no power, by civil means, to coerce a compliance: nothing short of a resort to the sword—to civil war, with all its awful consequences—could hope to procure a submission on the part of the State. Thus, the Confederation was not only weak and powerless, but it contained within itself the seeds of civil war, and its own dissolution, and with them the destruction of the lives and liberties of those citizens who had taken shelter under its rotten branches, from the storms of the revolution. The sages and patriots of the age saw, with feelings of the deepest regret and anguish, that the Government, as then organized, must be dissolved; that it could not exist; and that, in its dissolution, must be engulfed all the fair prospects of liberty and happiness, which had buoyed up their spirits under the privations and dangers of the revolution. Thus was this republic situated, when a large majority of the patriotic citizens of the day resolved on changing the whole form of the Government. This brings me, sir, to the federal constitution, of which it is my purpose now to speak: for it is by that chart we are now to navigate these political seas. Old things are done away, and all things have become new; doctrines like those which have been urged upon us by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) and all other gentlemen of the same school, have no application to the Government and its powers, as renovated by the adoption of the constitution.

Having shown the committee, briefly, some of the many objections to the old Articles of Confederation, I shall now turn to the constitution, the very first words in which are strongly marked with the change which had taken place in the Government. The preamble to that instrument, which unfolds the reasons that called for the change in the Government, reads: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America." Not we, the States, "in order to form a more perfect union;" no, sir, a union of States exclusively, as such, was the very evil in their form of Government that they were attempting to remedy. Such a union could not have been more perfect than it was under the Articles of Confederation; the people had tried it, and it was found altogether incompetent to "establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and procure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." The very preamble, then, clearly contemplates a dissolution of exclusive State bonds, and the creation of a closer union of the people. Was it not remarkable, that those old sages and heroes, who had fought the good fight in times that tried men's souls, should not have been alarmed at the idea of letting the people become more closely united? Was there no voice then to raise the cry of State rights—of bleeding State rights? Was there no philanthropist or statesman in those days to warn the people against adopting such political heresies as were contained in this preamble? Yes, there were, in those days, such men as these; they represented, in glowing colors, the same—yes, the very same doctrines that are now contended for on this floor. They contended that the States had much better continue under the Articles of Confederation, than for the people to adopt a federal constitution, with such tremendous powers as to authorize Congress "to provide for the common defence and the general welfare;" but all to no purpose. It was believed that the people were capable of self-government; that they would be more likely to act together for the public good, than to destroy each other without inducement. It was believed that a Government, to do good, and to "promote the general welfare," must have the power to act. The convention said so; the people said so; and the unparalleled prosperity of the United States, under the exercise of this power, enters a caveat against the confederation doctrines of the gentleman from Virginia: for such, sir, I certainly consider them.

Cumberland Road.

[H. OF R.]

THURSDAY, JANUARY 29.

Cumberland Road.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. BUCKNER said: Should the proposed amendment prevail, not only would the superintendence and control of the General Government be withdrawn from it, but it could not fail to be considered as the commencement of the prostration and abandonment, by the Federal Government, of the whole system of internal improvements. The adoption of the amendment could be justified on the ground only of a want of power in the Government to protect and control what, it had been acknowledged by a large majority of every Congress, for many years past, she had a right to construct. He could not, therefore, justify himself to his constituents (especially as but one other gentleman from the West had raised his voice in argument against it) to permit the vote to be taken upon it without manifesting his decided opposition to the amendment, and explaining the grounds of his opposition.

Why, said Mr. B., should we confide to the management of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, a duty which we could as conveniently attend to as they could, and which, if we possessed the power, we ought to perform? Those States might faithfully discharge any promise made, or engagement entered into, on the subject, however plain it may be that such promise would be utterly invalid, in a legal or constitutional point of view. It was not his intention to insinuate they would not. He should attempt to draw no invidious distinctions between States. It was sufficient for his purpose that no such contract would be obligatory on a State. In case of failure, we had no means of forcing compliance, and any attempt at coercion would not only be an unauthorized assumption of power, but could not fail to lead to the most unhappy collisions, and the most calamitous consequences. If we cede to those States, we must do the same to Ohio, Indiana, &c., as to those portions of the road which have been, or may be hereafter, constructed in those States.

If any one of them failed to keep the road in the state of preservation contemplated, the same difficulties would present themselves, as if all should fail. Let us not flatter ourselves that such an event could not occur, and need not be guarded against. In this age of political wonders, nothing should surprise us. Who, when the public lands were solemnly pledged for the payment of the national debt, could have supposed the period was so near at hand when not only a State, in which some of those lands are situated, would deny to this Government any valid title to them, but, when such a doctrine would become so prevalent in different States, that the political prospects of aspirants to office were made to depend upon their urging the propriety of their seizure by the States; and when politicians in this House, of deservedly high standing, would look upon it as expedient to enter gravely into the inquiry, whether our title to them was valid?

Whence, asked Mr. B., could this strange infatuation proceed? Was it not the unhappy result of the same mistaken notions of "State rights," which had suggested the proposed cession of this great national road to the States through which it is conducted? No one could be more devoted to State rights than he was; but Federal rights were not less dear to him. He could not say, in speaking of them, "not that he loved the one less, but that he loved the other more." So intimately were they connected, so absolutely dependent on each other, that, destroy the one, and you thereby destroy the other. The sun which rises, mourning the annihilation of the latter, may shroud itself in the darkness of disconsolate grief, for the inevitable and rapidly approaching loss of the former. He would not use the language of a celebrated politician in England, who said, "whenever he heard of the word 'rights,' he had learned to consider it as preparatory to some desolating doctrine," because it was the language of tyranny; but he rejoiced that he had learned to love not only the constitution of his State, but of the General Government; and to regard the rights secured by each as equally sacred and inviolable. If, then, when a man told him he was devoted to State rights, he meant that he wished to preserve unimpaired the constitutional powers of the State Governments, he approved his judgment and honored his patriotism. But if, thereby, he signified his disposition to weaken or resist the constitutional exercise of Federal power, he deprecated his motives and abhorred his doctrines.

He knew it was difficult so to define the powers of each Government as on all occasions to avoid apparent confusions. It was proper that each should be administered in a spirit of mutual forbearance, and with the kindest feelings of mutual confidence. We should indulge in no jealousy; no, not even in what had been termed a wholesome jealousy. Such a devotion to State rights, and such a jealousy of Federal rights, might be very properly considered as "preparatory to some desolating doctrine; to some wide-spread ruin." Its direct tendency was to dismember the States, to sever the Union—a Union which the patriots of other days, of days gone, he feared never to return, had fondly anticipated would effect for us in a political, what faith does in a religious view, everlasting salvation. It destroyed the confidence of the people in the wisdom of their Government; it led to angry contentions, to bloodshed, to civil war, with all its hideous and desolating consequences.

Let us then, said Mr. B., inquire into the nature of our Governments, Federal and State, and define, as far as we can, their respective powers, taking care, as we proceed, to affix definite significations to the terms employed: for he apprehended it was to an omission to do this—to the loose, undefined, and variant meanings in which many expressions in common use in such arguments had been employed, or, perhaps, not unfrequently to the fact of their being used without any meaning at all, that much of the supposed difficulty on this subject originated. The expressions "eminent domain," "jurisdiction attaching to soil," "concurrent jurisdiction," "State sovereignty," "the absurdity of considering the incidental power as greater than the one from which it is deduced," as generally used in arguments on this subject, might serve to round off a sentence, or fill up a speech, but they cast no light on the question. If it be not mere jargon, let those who use them inform us what they mean, and how they apply them.

What, then, said Mr. B., is the nature of the Federal Government? It was one of delegated and limited authority. It could act but in pursuance of the authority vested in it under the constitution. "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." After the enumeration of various powers with which Congress is clothed, it is declared that it shall also have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." Speaking, then, of the relation in which it stands connected with the State Governments, it was not sovereign. It was to be sure sovereign, or supreme, which he should use as synonymous terms, respecting all such matters as had, by the constitution, been confided to its management. It was absolutely necessary to its preservation it should be so. It could not have survived its formation five years without such power. God grant it may be preserved with it. He had always viewed the danger resulting from a heedless and unwarrantable resistance of it, on the part of the States, and a consequent dissolution of the Union, as more imminent than any proceeding from an attempt at encroachment by the Federal authorities.

Are the States then sovereign? But for the Federal constitution, each State would have been sovereign in the most unlimited sense of the word. Each one might have abolished, altered, or reformed its Government in any manner the people might have thought proper; which it could not now do: for "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union, a republican form of Government." It might, in fine, have done any and every thing within its territorial limits, or in relation to foreign Governments, which, by the constitution, had been confided to the General Government. So far, however, as they have vested a portion of the power, which, otherwise, they would have possessed, in this Government, or have, by the constitution, been expressly prohibited from exercising it, they are not sovereign, because there are many matters which belong to sovereign power which they could not control even within their territorial limits. See, for example, 1st article, 10th section, of the constitution. Yet the people of the United States are free. They possess sovereign power. The power is lodged in the hands, not of the Federal Government, but of the Federal and State Governments. Taken in one combined view, they might be considered as a great, splendid, and complicated machine; yet, so skilfully and judiciously arranged, its powers so nicely balanced, that we might, with much greater propriety, apply to it the eulogium pronounced by a distinguished individual upon another Government, who said "it was the most stupendous fabric of human invention."

If this view, said Mr. B., of the nature of those Governments be correct, and surely none could deny it, he would proceed to examine what gentlemen meant by saying that jurisdiction always attaches to soil; and also to examine why it did so attach. "Jurisdiction," when applied to courts, was not used in the same sense as when applied to a Government. In the first case, it meant the authority conferred by law on the courts to adjudicate in relation to particular matters: in the latter, it signified the power or authority of the Government, and sometimes the tract of country over which such authority extends. Thus, we say that such a matter originated within the jurisdiction of the United States; that is, within the territory over which she exercises a lawful and constitutional authority. In other Governments, where there is no imperium in imperio, as here, whatever controversy is to be decided, or act to be performed, respecting either persons or property, must necessarily be subject to the control of the Government within whose territory the controversy is to be decided, or the persons and property are located. As no other Government had a right to interfere, the jurisdiction was said to attach to the soil: jurisdiction attached to the soil here also. But whether the subject was one which was placed under the power or jurisdiction of the General or State Government, must, in every case, depend upon the provisions of the constitution. To it we must look as the source of information. If, on such examination, it should be found to belong to the latter, say Virginia, the jurisdiction attached to the soil, because Virginia, not Pennsylvania, nor any other State, had a right to act in relation to it: if to the General Government, jurisdiction still attached to the soil, because the United States, not Great Britain nor France, had a right to act respecting it. As to any supposed concurrence of jurisdiction, he did not know it would throw any light on this subject, to enter into an examination of it. He might, perhaps, before he closed his observations, make a few remarks concerning it.

Mr. B. said he had already urged, and he had the constitution as his authority for saying so, that no State could, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State. In like manner, and with equal propriety, it might be insisted, the General Government could derive no power from the consent of a State, except in the cases pointed out in the constitution. In the District of Columbia, and such other places as had been, or might hereafter be, purchased by the consent of the Legislature of a State, within which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings, we were authorized to exercise exclusive legislation. There no State could interpose its authority to control the most unimportant matter, however disconnected it might seem to be from the interests of the Federal Government. But had there been no such provision in the constitution, as to the power of exclusive legislation, it would by no means be true that the Government would have been without power to appropriate to its use land sufficient to execute its legitimate objects in relation to those matters. If so, other important and necessary powers, expressly granted, would have been entirely inadequate, if not altogether unavailing. It is well worthy of observation here, that, in this clause, the power is not given, in express terms, to the General Government, to appropriate to itself such property for the objects pointed out. Such authority would have been properly and clearly deduced from other parts of the constitution. But the power conferred is, "to exercise exclusive legislation" over such places, so obtained, with the consent of the States. But for this clause, we could have exercised no other authority than such as might be "necessary and proper for carrying into execution" other constitutional powers. We might have legislated concerning it, and our acts made in pursuance of the constitution would have been a part of the supreme law of the land; but our power of legislation would not have been exclusive; that is, the State in which the property might be located would have had the right to extend its legislation to every matter, even within the bounds of an arsenal, &c., which had not been confided to the management of the General Government. The distinction to legislate as to certain purposes, and to legislate exclusively, should not be lost sight of.

If there were any other cases in which the legislative power of the General Government could be enlarged by the consent of a State, he did not recollect them, and should be glad to have them pointed out. Surely our power to construct a road could not be made to depend upon the consent of the State through which it is proposed to be conducted. We cannot construct the road without first legislating on the subject. If the cases put were those only in which the consent of a State could enlarge the legislative power of this Government, and legislation was necessary preparatory to the construction of a road, it followed, as an unavoidable conclusion, that, if we had a right to construct it at all, it must be deduced from some other source than such consent.

FRIDAY, January 30.

Lotteries in the City of Washington.

The bill to continue in force the provisions of "An act to authorize the Corporation of the City of Washington to draw Lotteries," came up in order.

Mr. WICKLIFFE briefly expressed himself in opposition to the principle of lottery taxation, as odious, immoral, and impolitic. He referred to some calculations which he had made from several lottery schemes published; but declined a full discussion of the subject. He concluded by demanding that the question be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. SERGEANT said that he had made up his mind, long since, that the existence of lotteries was a great evil; and he had since had ample means of confirming that conclusion from facts and experience: so much so, that he could not consent to sanction any law for the establishment or the continuance of any lottery whatever. He did not affect to be more swayed by considerations of a moral kind than other gentlemen; although he did consider the question, even in that point of view, as well deserving of consideration. He thought the House might as well erect an establishment for public gambling in any other form; nay, better, for this was gambling of the very worst and most injurious kind. By a new contrivance in the drawing of lotteries, that operation is now performed with almost as much celerity as the dice are thrown, or a coin tossed up in the air. Lotteries thus drawn exhibit the most rapid and powerful kind of gambling now existing; and they present a temptation of fearful force and magnitude to the indulgence of what all will own to be an evil propensity—a propensity which no gentleman of this House would wish to encourage in any one that is dear to him; no gentleman who heard him would wish to see a child of his, or a servant or apprentice in whom he felt any interest, occupying his time in running after lotteries, and suffering that high and morbid excitement which always accompanies such a pursuit. So great was this temptation in its actual results on society, that in a thousand cases it has urged men to the commission of acts which brought them to a jail, if not to the gallows. Here Mr. S. adverted to one very affecting instance in illustration of this position. It was the case of an aged and highly respectable man of character, till then unblemished, and of such standing as to bring him into an office of great trust in a moneyed institution. In consequence of a defalcation in the funds, the gray hairs of this unhappy man were brought down to the lowest state of ignominy by his being tried and convicted for purloining the money of the institution. It was found, on examining into the case, that all this amount of funds had gone to a lottery office. The man had been dealing in lottery tickets for a long time before, (in tickets authorized by law;) but, being unfortunate, he yielded in his despair to the force of a propensity which sometimes gets the mastery of the strongest minds, and which is sure to make an easy conquest over weak ones. Lotteries, he said, were springing up like mushrooms, or rather like the poisonous resemblance of mushrooms, which, having the same appearance, are nevertheless deadly to every one who eats of them. If any gentleman will go to the apartment where a lottery was drawing, he would see collected there a crowd of a description which would make his heart ache—a crowd consisting of persons, no one of whom ought to be there; persons who ought to be at home, pursuing some branch of honest industry—minors, apprentices, and idlers of every kind. There he would witness the intense excitement which gambling never fails to produce—he would there see how the appetite for such speculations is quickened till it becomes overpowering. Yet lotteries were at this hour organized by the United States to an extent of which gentlemen probably had little idea. He knew that, some time ago, a lottery was drawn on every Wednesday in the year. Now, the utmost proceeds of such a system were from five to ten per cent. of the amount invested; to be sure, there was generally a deduction allowed of fifteen per cent., but out of that all the expenses were to be paid, and a profit allowed to the contractor for the risk he takes. In some cases the profit was even less than five per cent. Thus, to raise a sum of five thousand dollars, the Government draws from the people, by one of the worst species of taxation, a contribution of one hundred thousand dollars. It was in his opinion the very worst and most pernicious species of taxation that ever was devised by the mind of man. Those only buy lottery tickets who ought not to buy them; who were in no circumstances to do so. The wealthy, the prudent, the prosperous, do not dabble in this kind of speculation. No, it is the ignorant, the needy, the weak, the inexperienced; persons so foolish as to see nothing before their view but the highest prize, and never consider that there are a hundred thousand chances to one against their obtaining it.

For his own part, if a sum is wanted by the Corporation of Washington, and the Government are disposed to grant it, he would rather give it to them at once, and then the whole mischief would be done; the Government would know the extent of it, whether larger or smaller. But when it sends abroad an unlimited permission to erect lottery offices, who can bound the evil? No man. On the whole, he was decidedly opposed to the bill, and was happy to hear that the yeas and nays had been called, that he might have an opportunity of recording his vote against it.

Mr. INGERSOLL should rejoice entirely to exclude from the District of Columbia this species of gambling; and if such was the object of the gentlemen who opposed this bill, he would go with them heart and hand. But he had given his assent to the present bill merely on the ground that the Corporation of Washington had formerly had a similar grant made them, and in consequence of the defalcation of an individual had been losers to a large amount. Mr. I. dwelt on the venerable character of preceding legislators who had sanctioned this grant, and then stated the careful manner in which the present bill had been guarded. But still insisting on his disapproval of the principle of lotteries, he said he would, for the present, move to lay the bill on the table, in order that, if gentlemen chose to introduce a resolution on the subject of putting an end to all lottery-selling within the District, they might have an opportunity to do so. He then moved to lay the bill upon the table; but withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. LITTLE, who moved to re-commit the bill, with instructions to introduce a bill to prohibit the sale of lottery tickets within the District of Columbia; which was carried nem. con.

TUESDAY, February 6. Cumberland Road.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole, and resumed the consideration of the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. MEEBOKER took the floor in defence of the bill, and in opposition to the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN, (which goes to cede the road to the States in which it lies,) and having proceeded in his speech till near four o'clock, he gave way to a motion to adjourn.

WEDNESDAY, February 4. Counting Electoral Votes.

The resolution from the Senate, proposing the appointment of a Joint Committee "to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes of the President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election," was then called up, read, and adopted by the House. [See Senate Debates.]

SATURDAY, February 7. Counting of Electoral Votes.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, from the Joint Committee appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, reported, in part, the following resolution:

FEBRUARY, 1829.]

Cumberland Road.

[H. OF R.]

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives, on Wednesday, the 11th day of February, 1829, at 12 o'clock; that one person be appointed teller on the part of the Senate, and two persons be appointed tellers on the part of the House, to make a list of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid, the state of the vote, and the persons elected, if it shall appear that a choice hath been made agreeably to the Constitution of the United States, which annunciation shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the person or persons elected, and, together with a list of the votes, shall be entered on the journals of the two Houses.

This resolution was concurred in.

Cumberland Road.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. BARNARD said: I have heard it said that the attempt to sustain a power for this Government by resorting to several distinct portions of the constitution for that purpose, afforded very tolerable evidence that the power was not given at all. I agree that an attempt to hatch up a power can give but a very weak and unsatisfactory result. But I have never been able to conceive what solid objection there can be to finding a full and perfect authority for any single act of the Government, in half a dozen distinct clauses of the constitution, any more than I can imagine how the authority of an agent, on a particular service, could be weakened by having a double command for it from the same master. The loudest and fiercest objections which have been urged against the exercise of the power contemplated by this bill, have all proceeded on the ground that the making of the Cumberland road, as well as the measure now proposed for its preservation, could be justified only under what has been called the war power, or the commercial power, or the post-road power; and from these premises gentlemen have reasoned themselves into the belief (I shall not stop to inquire how justly) that, if the example of this bill be once set, the supremacy of authority in this Government will be irrevocably established, to the certain destruction of State sovereignty. And one or two gentlemen have seemed to look for the consummation of this state of things to the time when this Government, from making a single road of four rods wide through the corner of a State, shall come to put the whole area of that State under one broad, unbroken, and beautiful pavement—not for the convenience of the royal progresses which its functionaries may make through their dominions—not for the march of armies such as Xerxes led—but for the carriage of a letter-bag, by a post-boy, on horseback; or, at most, for the passage of a mail coach, drawn by four smart bays, and whipped up by a postilion, who is paid for his services at the rate of fifteen dollars for the month.

But besides the extravagances, not to say absurdities, into which a smart logician may easily run, on so vast a subject, there really are views of this subject which may be, and have been, presented, calculated to engender serious doubt. The subject of internal improvements, under this Government, is by no means free from difficulties. For one, I do not feel disposed to encounter them unnecessarily. I have, therefore, as will be seen in the sequel, chosen to rest my support of this bill on a source of power different from either of those which I have enumerated. And if I succeed half as well in convincing others as I have in satisfying myself, it may be that the scruples of some at least, who have not yet made up their minds to sustain a power in this Government for all the purposes of internal improvement, will be so far relieved as to enable them to vote for this bill. I regret that it has not been in my power, from circumstances which some around me know very well, to look into the debates formerly had in Congress on this subject. Had I done so, I might have found that all I propose to say had been long ago anticipated by some one much abler than myself; and that, therefore, instead of entering myself into this field of controversy, I might only have called the attention of the committee to some one who had already valiantly and successfully borne himself through it. I am encouraged, however, by the polite attention of the committee, to proceed, and I shall do so.

If the Government has the power to make an appropriation for the Cumberland road, and to provide for its preservation, as in this bill, I can see, I think, a strong necessity for the exercise of that power at this time. I am one of those who think that, to neglect the exercise of a power fairly belonging to the Government, whenever a necessary occasion for its exercise is presented, because of the doubts of individual politicians or of individual States, however loudly, or even angrily expressed, is just as dangerous a violation of the constitution as the assumption of unaccorded power.

The Speaker told us the other day, of centrifugal force and gravitation in our political planetary system; but he seemed only to fear that the planets might fall into the sun. God avert that experience should ever teach us how much danger there is that some of these immense bodies will fly off from their orbits, and either wander on alone to darkness and destruction, or, meeting each other in their erratic flight, produce a concussion to shake the whole system to its centre. This bill contains an appropriation for repairing and perfecting the Cumberland road, and also a provision for its permanent preservation. In the appropriation for present repairs is involved the power of the Government to make that road; the remaining provision is thought by some to involve another and a new question of power—of a power never yet exercised by the Government. The power to construct the Cumberland road, as well as every other power which this Government can exercise, must be found in the constitution; and, if it is not there, it cannot be found anywhere. I confess it has struck me with surprise, when I have heard gentlemen, for whose talents and sagacity I have entertained the most profound respect, attempting to show how this Government derived, by a compact of its own making, the power to do that which the constitution itself had not authorized it to do. What would the old thirteen States of this Union have thought, when the constitution was presented to them for acceptance, had they found in it a clause to this effect: "In addition to the powers herein specially enumerated, Congress shall have power to do in the States whatsoever it shall hereafter, by compact with the people of the territories, agree to do?" And yet this is precisely what is claimed by those who deduce authority to construct the Cumberland road from a compact between the United States and the people of Ohio. This Government cannot acquire the right to violate the constitution by entering into a solemn engagement to that effect. It is fenced round on every side by that sacred instrument; and its paramount obligation is, to take from it all its lessons of wisdom for devising plans, and of energy for executing them.

It is certainly very proper for us, at all times, to look diligently after the obligations under which we may have placed ourselves, in virtue of compacts or agreements, with a faithful purpose of strict performance—always remembering, however, that the faith of this Government can never stand pledged to violate the constitution, or to do any thing beyond the scope of its enumerated or incidental powers. In 1784, the United States, under the old confederation, received from the State of Virginia, by grant and cession, a title to a vast territory of land, lying northwestward of the river Ohio. The terms and conditions upon which this cession was made and received, are not, for our present purposes, necessary to be known, farther than that it was stipulated that all the unappropriated lands should form a common fund for the benefit of the United States, and that States should thereafter be formed out of the territory ceded, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the original States, and should be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with those States. This was one of those engagements which were continued in force after the abolition of the old confederation, by an express stipulation in the new constitution. It is to be observed, however, that here was, as yet, no compact which contemplated the making of any road whatever.

In 1802, Congress passed a law authorizing the people of the eastern division of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, to form a constitution and State Government, preparatory to admission into the Union as a State. In this law, it was, amongst other things, proposed to the people of the eastern division of that territory, that, if they would stipulate not to tax the lands of the United States, lying within the boundaries of the proposed State, for the space of five years, from and after the day on which the same might be sold, the United States would apply the one-twentieth part of the net proceeds of such lands, as the same should be sold, to the laying out, under the authority of Congress, and making, of public roads "leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same." This proposition was acceded to in convention by the people of the territory about to be erected into the new State of Ohio, with a modification proposed by that convention, and accepted by Congress in the next year. That modification was, that three out of the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the Government lands in Ohio should be paid over to the State, to be applied by the Legislature of the State to the same purpose of laying out and making roads in Ohio, and no other, leaving two per cent. of that fund to be applied under the direction of Congress; to be applied, not as some gentlemen seemed to have imagined, exclusively to the country this side of the Ohio, but to be applied, as all may be satisfied, by an examination of the documents on this subject, in the discretion of Congress, as if the modification of the contract had not been adopted, to the laying out and making of a road, not only to the said State, but through the same.

Let us now consider the rights and duties of the respective parties to this compact, keeping in mind, all the time, that the General Government was acting, necessarily, under the salutary restraints of the constitution. The power of Congress over the territories, as over the other property of the United States, is, by a fair construction of the constitution, limited only by the equitable rule that the power shall be so exercised as not to inflict a wanton injury upon others. Nobody doubts, except those whose wisdom consists in doubting of every thing, the power of Congress to construct roads in the territories, by money drawn from the public treasury, to improve, in any way it pleases, consistently with the rule I have just mentioned, this common property of the nation, by the application of the common resources of the nation. Nobody, for instance, will deny that Congress had power to lay out and construct a national road through the territory included in the present State of Ohio, at any time previous to its erection into a State. It had, too, as I contend, power to provide for the improvement and enhancement in value of the great national domain lying within and beyond the then contemplated State of Ohio, by entering into an agreement with the people of the territory about to be formed into a State, that a road should be made through that territory, at some time after the admission of that State into the Union. The constitution gives Congress the power to admit new States into the Union, and to this the power of imposing conditions of admission is, in my judgment, clearly and necessarily incidental; and the only restraint upon Congress, in this particular, that I am aware of, beyond its own wisdom, grows out of the ordinances of the old Congress, by which the present Government is bound, and by which the old thirteen States stipulated with the people of the northwestern territory, that the new States, carved out of that territory, should have "the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the original States." I shall not now stop to show, that the making of a road by the United States, through the State of Ohio, by agreement with the people of that State, cannot impair its "rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence." It can no more have that effect, than if the same privilege were exercised by an individual, or an ordinary corporate body, under an agreement with a State, as we may perhaps understand better before I have done with the subject.

The United States did, as we have seen already, agree with the people of Ohio to carry a road through the territory of that State. And, although it may in the compact sound very much like a promise to do Ohio a favor, and it could not perhaps have promised a greater, yet if there was any balance of interest, between these parties, in the contemplated improvements, it was on the part of the United States. Having agreed to admit new States into the Union, from the vast regions beyond the Ohio and the Alleghanies, the Government must have looked to the avenues which it proposed to open to and through those regions, as the arteries through which a healthy circulation might be kept up in the extremities of the body politic. Certain it is, the United States did agree to open such an avenue, and under such circumstances, as I contend, that it has acquired the absolute and unequivocal right of laying out and making a road through the State of Ohio; placing itself under a clear obligation to expend a specified fund on some such work as was contemplated in the compact, and acquiring thereby, as clearly, the right to expend money beyond that fund, if necessary to complete such work and keep it in repair.

The fact that the expenditures for the Cumberland road have already greatly exceeded the two per cent. fund, it seems to me cannot, in any way, as some have contended, affect the power of this argument. Its obligation to Ohio, under the compact, may have expired with the fund, but the right which it acquired survives it. For the benefit of Ohio, a specific fund was pledged to be expended upon such a work, but it seems to me absurd to say that the use of the Cumberland road, by this Government, is to cease, whenever that fund may happen to be exhausted, for want of power to apply other means necessary to its completion and preservation. In this way, then, at which I have now briefly glanced, do I think the power of this Government may be deduced, in frequent accordance with the constitution, to make an appropriation for that portion of the Cumberland road which lies within the State of Ohio; and it will be readily perceived that the same argument, if tenable at all, may be made to support the continuation of this road through the State lying westward of Ohio.

I will now, with the indulgence of the committee, proceed to inquire how Congress may derive the power of making an appropriation for that part of the road in question, which runs through the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. It will be recollected that the compact between the United States and the people of Ohio contemplated a road "leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic," to and through that State; and as the route of such a road must necessarily be from its eastern termination, through some of the original States, it was provided that Congress should lay out the road westward to the river Ohio, "with the consent of the several States through which the same should pass." No gentleman in this House can be more certain than I am, that the consent of any individual State cannot authorize Congress to do what the constitution has not given it the power to do. This would be to put it in the power of a less number of States than the constitution requires, to make any amendment they pleased to propose, and to clothe Congress with any power they pleased to confer; even a single State could do this, in the face of the constitution, and in defiance of all the other States in the Union. But this does not seem to me to be a case where consent is claimed as conferring power. The power, I apprehend, on examination, will be found in the constitution, but is a power of that imperfect kind that it cannot, or ought not, in certain cases, to be exercised without consent.

In the present case, let it be recollected, we are inquiring after the powers of Congress to lay out and construct the Cumberland road through the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, with the consent of those States. The interest which the United States had in its public lands was neither forgotten nor neglected by the framers of the constitution. And without entering now into a minute examination of that clause of the constitution which gives to Congress power over the public domain and the other common property of the United States, I venture to lay down this proposition: that Congress possesses, under that instrument, precisely that kind and extent of power and authority over and respecting the public lands, which any individual or ordinary corporation, having the absolute ownership of them, would possess. So far as the property, merely, in these lands, is concerned, the United States may be considered merely as a corporation, having the ordinary power of a proprietor to do with them as it pleases for the common benefit, only taking care, in what it may do, not to injure the property of any other corporation, or of any individual whatever. Congress may dispose of these lands; and, to bring them into market and enhance their value, it may cut them up in every direction with roads and canals. It may, in my judgment, do more; it may open a communication to them through any State in the Union, with the consent of that State.

Mr. DANIEL said: I hope the House will bear with me while I submit to them a few considerations in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) and against the power asserted in the original bill to erect toll-gates on the Cumberland road. I object to the exercise of this power on two grounds: First, because it is unconstitutional: secondly, because, if constitutional, it is not expedient. Before I proceed to examine these propositions, I will take occasion to say that I admire the inventive genius of some gentlemen, and of none more than my colleague, (Mr. BUCKNER,) who derives the power to construct roads and canals, and erect toll-gates, from every nook and corner of the constitution. It is admitted that the power to establish post offices and post roads is expressly delegated to Congress; but the power to erect toll-gates, and make the people pay a tax for travelling over the post roads of the United States, to the entire exclusion of the jurisdiction of the States over those roads, is certainly a very different question. Have Congress the right to erect toll-gates on any or all of their post roads, and, by means of toll, pay salaries to superintendents and toll-gatherers, and keep the roads in repair, to the exclusion of all State authority? is the point on which hang "all the law and the prophecies."

The several States of this Union first entered into articles of confederation and perpetual union, which, after fair experiment, proved to be inadequate to the purposes for which they were intended. For the purpose of securing a more efficient Government, our present constitution was formed and adopted. With careful jealousy, the people, both in the articles of confederation and in the constitution, guarded the rights and sovereignty of the States from any unnecessary innovations. In the former instrument, the second article read as follows: "Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled."

The Constitution of the United States, as originally adopted, contained this feature of the articles of perpetual union and confederation; but so careful were the people to guard and protect their State Governments, that they made an explanatory amendment, which they thought could leave nothing to doubt or construction. That amendment, which now forms a part of the constitution, is in the following words: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The object of this amendment is obvious. It was to mark and define the limits of those powers which were to be exercised by the General Government, and specify what was left to the States, in a manner so plain as to prevent disputes and collision. Thus the patriots and sages of the revolution, who well knew that the safety of liberty in this country would depend on preserving the State Governments, took every precaution within the compass of human vigilance, to explain and hedge in the powers granted to the General Government. Doubtless, they believed they had accomplished their great object, and had so clearly prescribed the limits of federal authority as to cut off the possibility of dangerous encroachments on the rights and independence of the States. But of late years, all their anticipations have been falsified by a set of political latitudinarians, who have the art to deduce the most tremendous powers as incidental to the most trifling grants, and are driving their theories and their practice to the destruction of those State powers and institutions which it was the chief object of the constitution to protect. Dazzled with the central Government, they strive to increase its splendor by robbing the States of their reserved powers, and reducing them to petty corporations. This doctrine has made great progress, in this House and out of it. Consolidation, so much dreaded by Patrick Henry, and other distinguished statesmen of former days, has lost all its terrors, and, if I am to judge by the arguments of gentlemen, has become a desirable object.

No man can read the constitution without being satisfied, that it was the intention of those who framed and adopted it, clearly to designate every power which this Government should possess. Incidental powers are the necessary parts of a general grant. When a power is claimed as incidental, we have only to examine whether it is necessarily included in the general grant; if not, the power is not incidental, and therefore not delegated.

The State constitutions are predicated on a different principle. They are not delegations of power, but limitations. If a people who have no constitution choose a legislative body, their power, like the British Parliament, is unlimited. The people of our States have deemed it necessary to limit the powers of their legislative bodies by written constitutions. Except on those points in which the State Legislatures are restricted by the State constitutions, or the Constitution of the United States, they are politically omnipotent.

[H. OF R.]

That the State Governments have the right to construct roads through any portion of their territories, and put toll-gates upon them, unless restrained by their own constitutions, there is no room to doubt. The Constitution of the United States neither grants the general road-making power to Congress, nor does it forbid its exercise by the States; it is therefore reserved to the States, or to the people. The power, however, to establish post offices and post roads, is expressly granted. Whether this grant means only that Congress shall designate the roads on which the mails shall travel, as some contend, or that they may make those roads, is not important to my argument. I am inclined to the opinion that they may make a road under this grant, wherever it shall be necessary for the transportation of the mail; but the power to tax the people for travelling on that road, is a very different thing.

But, certainly, the only kind of road which the United States can make, under this grant of power, is post roads; the power of making every other species of road is left to the States. Toll-gates are not necessary, nor is it possible to employ them in making or establishing post roads. The power to erect them is not, therefore, incidental to the power to establish post roads. Those roads can be repaired by the same means employed to establish or make them. Indeed, the power to repair roads is itself incidental to the power to make or establish: for the constitution does not delegate to Congress in express terms the power to repair post roads. We have seen that toll-gates are not necessary, nor can they be employed, in the making of roads, and consequently the right to erect them is not incidental to that power. If it be incidental to the power to repair post roads, it is not an incident of the general grant, but the incident of an incident. The reasoning by which it is deduced from the original grant, is something like this: Congress has a right to establish post roads, therefore Congress has a right to repair post roads, therefore Congress has a right to erect toll-gates on post roads. Thus, a power which cannot possibly be employed in effecting the original grant, is deduced as incidental to that grant by a process of reasoning!

Now, I maintain that you must employ the same means to repair post roads as may be employed to establish them, and no others. When a power is granted, the means to make it effectual are granted also. The constitution grants the power to make or establish post roads. What are the means? Not toll-gates, but the appropriation of money and the employment of hands. These are the only incidental powers by which post roads can be made or established. After the road is established, and the object of the grant completed, is it not absurd to say that the incidental power of keeping it in repair has also its incidents, which were unknown to the original power? Are not the means by which the road was established, or made, sufficient to keep it in repair? Can it not be done by appropriations, and the employment of suitable hands? No man doubts it. The power of erecting toll-gates is not, therefore, incidental to the power to establish or make post roads, nor can it possibly belong to it. I view it as an assumption of power by this Government, wholly unwarranted by the constitution.

Cumberland Road.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. BELL rose and said: Upon all the questions presented by the bill, I fear candor would require me to admit that those who support it occupy the "vantage ground" of public sentiment. By this admission, I mean to say no more than that, by an extraordinary combination of circumstances and interests, to which we have all been witnesses, within the last four or five years, a majority of the people in a majority of the States of this Union has been prepared to sanction any measure in relation to what is called a "national system of Internal Improvement," which the leading advocates of that system, in this House, may choose to urge upon us. So strongly does their position, in this respect, operate in sustaining them upon this floor, that he who shall venture in the discussion of any of the many internal improvement bills which come before the House, to question the authority of Congress to act upon such subjects, is but too apt to be discouraged by such symptoms of discontent as I know, from the usual courtesy of the House, can only spring from something like a belief that this question has been settled by the practice of the Government, and that further opposition must be the result only of a spirit of obstinacy.

Now, I have just had experience enough of the influences and principles which govern the proceedings of Congress, to know, that no system of policy of great and general interest can be either introduced here, or successfully opposed, until public sentiment shall have been in some degree prepared for its adoption or abandonment. It is with this knowledge, and a deep conviction of the magnitude of the considerations involved in the bill before the committee, that I am induced to say any thing upon the present occasion. I believe that the time will not be lost, either to the committee or to the country, which, being devoted to the further discussion of this subject, may be the means, either of reviving the recollection of some of the prominent objections heretofore urged against measures of this kind, or of bringing to light any new arguments, which, under the practice of the Government in relation to this subject, experience may have recently developed.

Although I shall give no pledge as to the time I shall occupy in the discussion of what I consider the question of chief interest raised by the bill, yet, upon the mere constitutional question, I promise to be brief. The ability with which that part of the subject has been handled by those gentlemen who have preceded me, would deter me from going fully into it, if no other consideration restrained me. But I have not so much confidence in the efficacy of mere constitutional arguments as some gentlemen, as I may take occasion to explain more fully before I sit down; at all events, whatever might have been their effect at an anterior date, in the history of the assumption of implied powers by this Government, I fear they must be unavailing in this crisis of the policy of the country, in relation to a great and important interest involving in its issues perhaps the destiny of the republic. The mere glance which I shall give at that part of the subject will be more out of respect to the opinions of those who seem to think the constitutional question the only one presented by the bill, than because I think the discussion of it, at this time, of much importance. In making this declaration, however, I would not be understood as placing a light value upon a strict adherence to the constitution in the measures of Congress. A disregard of the spirit of that instrument, manifested in the proceedings of Congress, upon subjects however trivial and unimportant they may be, is to be regretted. In such cases, however, the evil operates by example only; but it is a matter of far different import, when by implication and construction, such a range of action is proposed to be given to the Federal Legislature as can only be done by spurning the idea that there ever were any fixed limits to its authority; or, if admitted to exist, by boldly trampling them under foot, as things calculated only to become stumbling-blocks to the weak and fastidious. If, by one mode of construing the constitution, what is called an incidental power may, in its exercise, become greater than the substantive one from which it is derived; if a power which those who formed the constitution did not suppose they were conferring upon Congress, or rather one which we find, from the journal of their proceedings, was expressly negatived, may, by construction, become a source of the principal business of Congress; if, I repeat, a power which, at most, could only have been regarded as last and least of the purposes for which the constitution was formed, may become first and chief in the operations of the Government organized under it, reflecting men may very well begin to consider whether the idea of a written charter of liberty is not all a delusion, and whether public sentiment, as it may be changed and modified from time to time, accordingly as this or that political faith or party may predominate, is not the only barrier, at last, which the nature of man and of human society admits of, against the encroachments of power and ambition.

Before I proceed to the brief notice which I intend to take of the constitutional question, permit me to advert, for a moment, to what I consider a sort of anomaly in the pretensions of the leading advocates of this system of Internal Improvement. One cannot but infer, from the tenor of their arguments in support of the policy of assuming the power to construct roads and canals, that they think themselves entitled to stand in the first rank of those who, in their political course, have most regard for the union of these States. Now, without disputing the honesty of their intentions, I say they are the last men in this country who have any just claim to such precedence. They say they are employing all their skill and ability in forging new ties of union, and charge that their opponents are perpetually managing to tie up their hands in the good work by gleaming fetters from the constitution. I say, they are doing their utmost to destroy the existing cords, which bind the States; and although they may succeed for a season, by means of that fertility of resource in argument, and a pleasing elocution, which I admit some of them possess in a high degree, in persuading the country that their schemes of Internal Improvement entitled them to be proclaimed the very champions of union; yet, if they shall succeed in bringing their plans into more general favor than they have already done, those who come after us may have cause to regret the existence of gifts which had so much power to win; or, to speak more justly, that a scheme of Federal policy was ever devised by gentlemen, calling themselves friends of union, which contained in itself a principle of persuasion more eloquent than the tongues of men, in making converts to its expediency. Some future traveller, contemplating among the broken columns of this capitol, the ruins of a great confederated republic, in tracing the causes of its downfall may assign to their proper class the statesmen of this day; and a disunited people, in brooding over the story of their misfortunes, may have to determine whether those who were eager to push their wild and extravagant schemes beyond the verge of the constitution, and the longer endurance of those whose means were exhausted in support of them, were the real friends of union or not. Sir, if I believed this picture would be realized, I could not stand up in my place; yet who does not see that it may be so, if success shall still attend every effort at a new assumption of Federal power, and every new project of the majority to enrich themselves at the expense of the minority! What are some of the most striking circumstances under which this grand system of Internal Improvement is attempted to be executed? In a third, or more than a third of the States, it may be considered the settled doctrine, that Congress has no power to act upon this subject. A third of the whole population of these United States believe they are to be the victims of this policy; yet gentlemen who advocate this system upon this floor, from day to day, and from year to year, and who openly acknowledge that they have to contend against nearly equal numbers for every inch of ground they occupy, do not shrink from the absurdity of urging the love of union in support of their projects! Does it matter, in questions of this sort, whether the minority are mistaken or not, in their opinions of the proper construction of the constitution? Or whether the apprehensions of those who believe that ruin to their interest is to be the result of the present policy of the majority, are mere delusions or not? Do not prudence and patriotism call as loudly as ever on the majority, by every consideration of order, and perhaps of liberty and union, to forbear? Justice, moderation, and forbearance, in the majority, towards the minority, are the best preservatives of union, said an able man, at the last session of Congress, in relation to this question; and it then seemed to me to be a sentiment so full of wisdom and patriotic feeling, that it deserved to be written on the frieze of the columns which surround this hall, that it might be ever present to the minds of those who sit here to deliberate and determine upon the true policy of the Government, in relation to every great interest.

Cumberland Road.

Let us now take a brief view of the grounds upon which it is attempted to sustain the authority of Congress to enact the main provisions of the bill before the committee. The power to erect turnpike gates, and the right to exact tolls upon the road in question, is derived from the power which it is said Congress had to construct the road in the first instance; and the former power is admitted, by the advocates of the bill, to be dependent upon the latter. This is the true state of the question, as regards that part of the road which is located in Ohio. Some of the gentlemen on the other side contend that the question is modified, in regard to the old Cumberland road, by the cessions which have been made by the States through which it passes, to Congress, and that, as to this part of the road, no constitutional impediment exists, though there might be some doubt as to the power of Congress to extend the provisions of the bill to the part of the road which lies in Ohio. The compact with the States north of the Ohio, has, as I think, been judiciously thrown out of the question, as having nothing to do with it, unless the power to construct this road can be shown to have existed independently of that compact.

The modified question which has been presented in the argument, I think will be found, upon a short examination of it, to result in the general question, as I have stated it. Some speculative inquirers have said, that all human knowledge might be reduced to a few general principles and propositions. While the experience of each day is teaching us the fallacy of this theory, and the danger of relying too much upon general principles in the management of any of the affairs of life, yet all will admit that the process of generalizing in reasoning, or of tracing things up to first principles, is, in some cases, the only test of truth. Those who place any reliance upon the cessions which have been made by the States, do so, only because, without such cessions, they doubt the power of Congress to legislate in any way concerning the construction or preservation of the road. Now, are gentlemen, who take this ground, aware of the principle they assume, and would establish? If they can show that they have taken a correct view of the subject, what is it? It is, that the powers of Congress, and the subject-matters upon which they are authorized to legislate by the constitution, may be added to, and enlarged, at the option of one or more of the States. If this be a correct principle, it is a discovery of the utmost importance; for it must inevitably lead to a removal of all constitutional restrictions upon the proceedings of Congress. But, sir, has this principle been assumed as a dogma or tenet by any political party, which does, or ever has existed in this country? If it has, I am ignorant of the fact. Will the gentlemen who advocate the bill contend for such a principle? I know they support doctrines which must lead to the same results, but they have never had the boldness to come out openly, and in the face of the country to contend that any of the States can confer new powers upon Congress, or create new subjects of Federal legislation, in any other way than that pointed out by the constitution itself. The consent, then, of the States through which a part of this road passes, implied in the cessions which have been made by them, has no more to do with the subject than the compact with the States north of the Ohio.

When it is argued that Congress may rightfully preserve a road which it had the power to construct in the first instance, it does seem to me that the advantage of the argument is with the gentlemen on the other side. If you grant the power to make the road, I can see no constitutional impediment to the erection of toll-gates, that being the usual mode of assessment upon the public for keeping roads and bridges in repair. It would then be a mere question of expediency, about which I feel but little interest. I am willing the people of this country should know the full extent to which Congress may go in the exercise of the power to make roads and canals. But, sir, the error in the argument of the gentlemen who support this bill is, in taking it for granted that this power to construct roads is vested by the constitution in Congress. I know that it has been said that this point has been settled by the repeated decisions of this House. While I am willing to admit the force of precedent in legislating under the constitution, as well as in judicial determinations, and am satisfied that no political compact can be devised by the wisdom of man, upon which all men would concur in their opinions of the extent and proper constructions of its provisions, yet no precedent, involving a great and vital principle, either in the Federal Legislature, or in the courts of law, has ever been, nor should it be, considered as settling such a principle, until it shall have been sanctioned by long and general acquiescence. It is because this power in Congress to construct roads and canals has never been so sanctioned, that I consider the question open for farther discussion. In availing myself of this state of the question, in a limited degree, I will advert for a moment to the manner in which the exercise of this power will operate, as it may affect the rights of the citizens, and as it may conflict with the State authorities. It is by selecting plain and practical examples, by way of illustration, that we can best understand the full operation of any principle or power. In the first place, if you have the power to construct these roads, you have the right to take from the citizen the usufructuary interest in the soil, without his consent. It would be a trespass in him to resist those charged with the actual construction of one of these roads or canals, in an attempt to throw open his fields, or to pull down his farm-houses, which may be in its course. The State authorities cannot protect him; and they, in their turn, in the exercise of powers which are not denied to them, may cut up his freehold in another direction, and the Federal authorities, in that case, cannot interfere in his behalf. Thus the property of the citizen is at the mercy of two sovereignties, and all the consolation he can take to himself is, that he can demand a recompense for the loss of the use of his property, in the adjustment of the amount of which he has nothing to do. Now, do the people of this country understand that their property may be taken by two Governments, in this respect altogether distinct and separate, for the same public use—the use and purpose being one—that of keeping up public highways; the invading authorities being two, and at the same time acting independently of each other? So much for the effect of the exercise of this power by Congress upon the rights of the citizen. Let us see, in the statement of a plain example, how the jurisdiction and authority of the States may be interfered with. In the State which I have the honor to represent in part, and I refer to that State merely because I am better acquainted with her municipal regulations than with those of any other, the public interest has been found to be best consulted by committing to a court, in each county, composed of the justices of the peace in each, the power not only of ordering the opening of any new road, but to alter or discontinue altogether any old road, if, in their opinion, the public interest required such an exercise of their power. If the property of any citizen is, in any case, supposed to be injured, by opening a road over it, a form of assessment, by his neighbors, of the damage he may have sustained, is prescribed by law, which, in general, secures him a fair remuneration. Under the operation of this policy in relation to roads, in that State, the joint interest and convenience of the population of all the counties in the State have been promoted by roads leading from one county to another, and the interest and wishes of the citizens of adjoining States have always been attended to, in keeping up roads leading to and from each other. The citizens of that State have not heretofore supposed that any power, except their own Legislature, could compel them to contribute to the public welfare, in the opening of roads through their farms; nor have they supposed that they could be made liable to pay any other fees or tolls for the use of any road in that State, than such as might be ordained by their own State Legislature. It has never entered into the heads of those who have been engaged in the legislation of that State that the entire policy in relation to public roads might be defeated and annulled by any other authority whatever. The same view, I presume, in substance, might be presented, in relation to the road police of every other State of the Union. From what I have said, it will readily occur to every one that serious collisions might arise between the Federal and State authorities, if this power is assumed by Congress. It will also be perceived that an attempt to convert Congress into a general turnpike and canal company for all the States, with the privilege to take the property of the citizen and to levy tolls at its discretion, would not be likely to meet with a favorable reception in any of the States, upon a first introduction. I will presently show that the projected system of Internal Improvements possesses an inherent quality, which causes it to be regarded with less alarm, upon a near approach; and how, by holding out the lure of immediate and tangible interest, it is enabled to triumph over the influences of the lasting and more important benefits to be expected from an adherence to principle.

But I am unwilling to leave this part of the subject without noticing the general doctrine which I have heard advanced in support of the power of the Federal Government to apply to public use so much of the property of the citizen as may be required in the execution of this system of Internal Improvement. It is said this may be done under what is technically called the "right of eminent domain," or the right which every form of political society possesses, in its corporate capacity, to the use of all the property of all the individuals entitled to protection under it, for the support and protection of the whole. The correctness of the position, as a general doctrine, I do not deny; but I contend it has no application to the present question. When the people, or the States, (and it is immaterial to my argument which of them,) formed and became bound by the present constitution, they acted under a sense of the necessary existence of such a right as is contended for; but it was a great and capital consideration with them to guard the exercise of it against those abuses which had characterized all bad governments, and which they knew would distinguish this one, if they did not carefully define and limit it in such a manner that Congress should not be allowed to take the property of a portion of the citizens, under the pretext that it was necessary to do so, to promote the prosperity or secure the protection of the whole community. The constitution limits the manner of exercising this right of taxation, direct and indirect, and secures the citizen against unequal exactions, by providing that all taxes shall be uniform. The property of the citizen, taken in the exercise of this right of eminent domain, in this country, or indeed in any country, cannot be refunded in any other way than by securing to him that equal protection, and the enjoyment of the advantages of that form of government, which it may be his lot or his choice to be subject to, and for the preservation of which he is bound not only to yield up the whole of his property, but his life also. That clause of the constitution, therefore, which provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, must refer to some of those irregular invasions of the rights of the citizen inseparable from the operation of the Government, and not to that appropriation of his property to public uses, which is expressly allowed by the constitution, and which is not the subject of compensation in money. It provides a compensation for those violations of private property which are sure to result from a state of war. Our armies, in carrying on war, in our own territories, are often driven, by necessity, to seize upon munitions of war, and provisions for subsistence, in the hands of private citizens, without their consent, which can only be justified by that paramount law of self-preservation attaching to collective masses of men, as well as to individuals, strengthened in this case by the consideration that, in the army, while in actual service, all the active energies of the Government are concentrated, and they are thus charged, for the time, with the common defence and protection of the whole country. Our armies, aggravants bello, are justified upon similar principles, in violating the rights of the citizen by opening roads through fields and private forests, in pursuit of or in retreating from an enemy, and these are the only roads which can be properly denominated military roads—roads growing out of the necessities of war and made by the soldiery.

But it is said that Congress being vested with the war-making power, and charged with the common defence, you would strip the country of one of the most efficient means of defence if you deny to the Federal Government this power to make roads and canals. A time of peace is said to be the proper time to prepare for war. Let us examine whether the Federal convention did not have this matter of defensive preparation in view, when they agreed upon the provisions of the constitution, and whether they did not point out and limit the authority which Congress should exercise over the territory of the States, to secure that object. Forts, magazines, dockyards, and other buildings, it was foreseen, would be essential requisites in the execution of the duty of making war, and of providing for the common defence; and it was perceived that something more than the mere transitory right of occupying the territory of the States with our armies, in time of war, might be necessary to be vested in Congress over such places as should be selected for the purposes of permanent fortifications and supply; and, therefore, the power was given to Congress to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over all such places, with the assent of the States. If Congress has not thought proper to exercise such jurisdiction over any of them, it only shows that more power was given than was necessary to secure the objects intended. It was thought, also, that the deliberations of the Federal Legislature should be free from the interruption or influence of the State authorities; therefore, it was provided that Congress should have exclusive jurisdiction over these ten miles square.

These provisions of the constitution are clearly nugatory and inoperative, if Congress may assume any legislative power over the territory of the States, for any other purpose. The argument is, that the country cannot be put in a complete state of defence, by the exercise of jurisdiction over the sites of forts, &c.; and it is contended that, in the discharge of that duty, Congress must assume jurisdiction over as much more of the territory of the States as will be required in the construction of such roads and canals as may be thought necessary to the common defence. May not gentlemen, with the same propriety, contend that, if Congress shall be of opinion that the purposes for which a power of exclusive jurisdiction was given over these ten miles square, have not been secured, the right to add another ten to them may be implied? The argument I have advanced is not impugned by the exercise of legislative authority over the public domain, in the new States. That power is expressly given by the constitution; besides, it is only a proprietary interest which the United States hold in these lands. I will make one other remark upon this point, and I shall have done with it. We have heard a great deal upon the subject of the value of the roads and canals proposed to be constructed, in a military point of view. It does seem to me that a very mistaken notion prevails upon this subject. I have no experience in military operations, but I do not believe that any of the great roads now projected are ever to be of any material advantage to the country in time of war; and if our neighbors were somewhat stronger than they are now, or are ever likely to be, I think it could be demonstrated that it would be altogether problematical, and that it would depend on many contingencies, whether the great roads proposed to be made from the centre, in the direction of the most exposed points of our frontier, may not be more useful to our enemies than to ourselves. I know that many gentlemen may regard it as perfectly ridiculous, and even degrading to our national character, to suppose that any foreign enemy will ever have the impudence to attempt to penetrate the interior of our country; I hope it never may be in the power of an enemy to succeed in any such attempt; but I must say that this is inauspicious ground upon which to indulge any such proud anticipations of our power and good fortune in war.

WEDNESDAY, February 11.

Counting of Electoral Votes.

It being now twelve o'clock, the Speaker announced the special order of the day, which was the opening and counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States: whereupon,

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR moved that the Clerk announce to the Senate that the House was ready, on its part, to proceed to that duty.

The motion being agreed to—

The Clerk left the House, and seats having been prepared for the Senate in the vacant space in front of the Clerk's table, they soon after entered the hall, with the VICE PRESIDENT at their head, preceded by the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate.

When the Senators had taken the seats assigned them, and the VICE PRESIDENT had seated himself at the right hand of the SPEAKER, the tellers, viz: on the part of the Senate, Mr. TAZEWELL, and, on the part of the House, Messrs. P. P. BARBOUR and VAN RENSSELAER, took their places at the Clerk's table.

The VICE PRESIDENT then, having before him the packets received, one copy by express, and one through the post office, from the several States, took up those from the State of Maine, and, announcing to the Senators and Representatives that those packets had been certified, by the Delegation from Maine, to contain the votes of that State for President and Vice President, proceeded to break the seals, and then handed over the packets to the tellers, who opened and read them at length. The same process was repeated, until all the packets had been opened and read; when,

Mr. TAZEWELL, retiring to some distance from the Chair, read the following report:

The result of the election was then again read by the VICE PRESIDENT, who, thereupon, said:

I therefore declare that ANDREW JACKSON is duly elected President of the United States for four years, from the fourth day of March next, and JOHN C. CALHOUN is duly elected Vice President for the same period.

The Senate then retired.

THURSDAY, February 12.

President Elect.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, from the Joint Committee appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining and counting the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of one member of the Senate be appointed by that body to join a committee of two members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that House, to wait on

Cumberland Road.

[H. OF R.]

ANDREW JACKSON, of Tennessee, and to notify him that he has been duly elected President of the United States for four years, commencing with the 4th of March next.

A message was then received from the Senate, notifying the agreement of the Senate to the resolution recommended by the Joint Committee.

The resolution was then taken up by the House, and adopted, and Mr. HAMILTON and Mr. BELL were appointed the Committee on the part of the House.

MONDAY, February 16.

Cumberland Road.

This bill being again taken up—

Mr. T. R. MITCHELL, of South Carolina, then took the floor, and said that the great length of the discussion must have exhausted the patience of the House, and rendered it necessary that he should apologize for the farther tax which he was about to impose upon it. He assured the House that he made the attempt with unfeigned reluctance. I do not speak with the hope of making a convert, (said Mr. M.) for on a subject so frequently discussed, and so profoundly examined, who has not made up his mind? I do not speak for the sake of exhibition; for talents infinitely superior to mine could give neither novelty nor ornament to a theme so threadbare. But I speak at the peremptory instance of my constituents, who consider the power involved in the amendment as unconstitutional, and fatal to their liberties; and claim it as their privilege to protest and remonstrate against its exercise by you. In a series of resolutions submitted by their Legislature to this House, at the last session, and suggested by them, you are called on, in the stern and impassioned language of freemen, to retrace your steps; to abandon that which you cannot justly hold; and to relieve their minds from those gloomy forebodings to which the assumption of this power naturally gives rise. In obedience to their will, I shall, therefore, as briefly as possible, present their views.

What, sir, does this amendment propose? Why, that this Government should cede, upon certain conditions, to the States of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, any property which it has in the Cumberland road. And the important question which here suggests itself is, whether this Government has any property in the road? for, if it has not, the amendment will, of course, fall to the ground. If, sir, we have any property in this road, it must be derived from one of two sources: either from the grant of those States, made by acts of their Legislatures, or by a power given to us by the constitution to make roads. Now, sir, if we examine the act of Congress under which this Cumberland road was made, and compare it with the corresponding acts of Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, we will be convinced that it was neither the intention of Congress to obtain, nor the intention of the States to grant any interest in the road. The act of Congress simply requires the President to adopt the most effectual means to obtain the consent of those States that he should "cause the road to be laid out and completed within their respective territories." No cession of sovereignty over the soil, nor proprietary interest in it, was demanded by the Government; the only boon which it sought was simply an authority to make the road within their jurisdictions. A road leading from the Atlantic to the waters of the Mississippi was considered an object of great national importance; it would promote the personal convenience of the people; it would give rise to a profitable commerce between the East and the West; and, above all, it would perpetuate the Union of the States. Congress thought it would be only necessary for them to make the road, as the interests of the States would induce them to keep it in repair. The act of Maryland, in answer to this application, is expressed with the most circumspect precision. It simply "authorizes" the President to cause the said road "to be laid out, opened, and improved, in such a way and manner as, by the before recited act of Congress, is required and directed." Nothing more is here granted to Congress than a bare naked authority to lay out and make the road. The act of Pennsylvania is, if possible, more conclusive to this effect. The title of that act is, "An act authorizing the President to open a road through that part of this State lying between Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, and the Ohio River." The first section authorizes the "President to cause so much of the said road as will be within the State to be opened, so far as it may be necessary the said road should pass through this State." And to prove that Pennsylvania did not consider the grant of this authority as involving any interest in the land, a second section is subjoined, giving a right of entry on the land to the commissioners appointed by the President to lay out the road. Why grant a right of entry to the commissioners, if she had ceded to the United States either a sovereign jurisdiction over the soil, or an interest of any description in it? The most precarious and limited estate in lands—a mere tenancy at will—carries with it a right of entry. We cannot attribute so much ignorance, so much folly, to an assembly so distinguished for its wisdom as the Legislature of Pennsylvania, to suppose, for a moment, that, in one section, she should have ceded an interest in the lands, and in the next she should have granted a right of entry. In further support of this construction of these acts, I offer the political opinions of Mr. Jefferson, who sanctioned the act of Congress. No man was more delicate with regard to the soil, nor more devoted to the sovereignty of the States, than this immortal patriot. Had he obtained an interest in the soil, from those States, it would have been in opposition to the principles by which he had been elevated to the Chief Magistracy, and for the preservation of which he had sacrificed his seat in the cabinet of President Washington. To go as far as he did, to appropriate money to make the road, was a fundamental error, which can be explained only by supposing that his imagination misled his judgment; that, convinced of the necessity of such a communication between the East and the West, and dazzled with its brilliant advantages, he did not examine, with sufficient coolness, the exact tendency of the measure with regard to the constitution.

But we all have to deplore this error. It has given rise to a new theory, under which, in a subsequent administration, (that of Mr. Monroe,) millions have been lavished, for no other purpose than to purchase aspiring men, or conciliate adverse sections. Mr. Monroe, afraid to abandon the doctrine that we have no constitutional power to make roads, lest he should disaffect the party by which he had been supported, and, at the same time, anxious to meet the views and promote the interests of his adversaries, took advantage of this error of Mr. Jefferson's to establish a new construction on this subject, which is even more dangerous, as it is more insidious, than an open unqualified assertion of the power. Professing the greatest respect for the sovereignty of the States, and the sacredness of their soil, the United States, says he, has no power, under the constitution, to make internal improvements: I will sanction no act of that kind, but they can appropriate money, in any amount, to such undertakings, provided they be of a national character. Now, this is, in every respect, exceptionable. If we appropriate money to the construction of a road, we certainly should have a control over it; we should have the power to establish toll-gates, to keep it in repair, and of inflicting penalties for injuries done to it. Under this construction, those immense surveys of routes of roads and canals have been made, and works of this kind projected, which, if they were undertaken, will cost the people thousands of millions of dollars; and, if not undertaken, will be millions thrown away, in employing our engineers in idle peregrinations from one part of the Union to another. It has been used as an engine of vile and corrupt electioneering. To conciliate a section, the administration has no more to do than to lay off a road or canal in it, and a powerful party is immediately formed in its support. The whole community is benefited by it; those who undertake contracts for executing the work; those who are employed on it as laborers; shopkeepers and farmers who supply them; in fact, it is showering on them so much unexpected gold, which all scramble for, and all get a part of. Finally, if the construction which I have put on these acts of Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, be not correct, all language is unintelligible, and laws are not guides, to direct, but false lights, to deceive and confuse us.

TUESDAY, February 17.

President Elect.

Upon a call for reports of Select Committees—

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, said that he rose for the purpose of informing the House that the committee appointed to meet such committee as the Senate might appoint, to notify ANDREW JACKSON of his election as President of the United States for four years, to commence with the fourth of March next, had discharged this duty; and that the President elect, in signifying his acceptance of this office, had expressed his deep sensibility of its responsibilities, and his gratitude to his country for this recent proof of its confidence. He had, moreover, requested the committee to convey to their respective Houses the assurances of his high consideration and regard.

WEDNESDAY, February 18.

Cumberland Road.

On motion of Mr. MEMOR, the House took up the bill for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road.

Mr. McDUFFIE warned gentlemen that the very first moment he perceived any attempt to prolong the debate on this bill, he should immediately move for the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. CHILTON delivered his sentiments at length in opposition to the amendment, and in favor of the original bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER moved to amend the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN, by striking out that clause in it which makes the cession of the road to the States conditional on their establishing toll-gates to keep it in repair.

The motion was decided in the negative.

Mr. VANCE offered the amendment which he had before submitted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. V. briefly explained his reasons for offering the amendment. It was intended merely to secure to Ohio her rights, should the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN succeed, against which, however, he protested, as proposing a cession which was not warranted.

The amendment of Mr. VANCE shared the same fate with that of Mr. ALEXANDER, being negatived without a count.

The question was put on the amendment of Mr. BUCHANAN, and decided by yeas 77, nays 118.

Mr. BUCHANAN then moved another amendment as follows:

Strike out all the bill and insert—

"Be it enacted, &c. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter into such arrangements with the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Ohio, as he may deem necessary, for the purpose of having toll-gates erected, under the authority of the said several States, upon the Cumberland road; and collecting sufficient toll thereupon for its preservation and repair."

Mr. BUCHANAN said that his object was to get rid of the difficulties which attended the proposal to cede the road; and, in support of his amendment, he quoted a clause from the Message of President Monroe, sent to Congress at the time he rejected the Cumberland road bill.

Messrs. WEEKS and FLOYD spoke in opposition to the second amendment: whereupon, it was withdrawn by the mover.

Mr. GORHAM offered the amendment which he had proposed in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was negatived—yeas 60, nays 129.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, believing that the bill could not pass both Houses if clogged with a provision for erecting of toll-gates upon the road, moved to strike out the first seven sections of the bill, and part of the eighth section, being all that part of it which relates to toll-gates and toll.

Mr. VANCE suggested that this was, in effect, the same proposition as had already been offered by Mr. GORHAM, and rejected.

The SPEAKER replied, that that was a matter for the House to judge on.

The form of the proposition was different, inasmuch as the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts went to strike out the whole of the bill after the enacting clause, and then to insert; whereas that of the gentleman from Kentucky proposes only to strike out a part of the bill, and to leave the latter part of it untouched. The proposition was, therefore, in order.

The amendment of Mr. WICKLIFFE was rejected.

Mr. ARCHER renewed the motion to amend the bill, which had been moved and withdrawn by Mr. BUCHANAN, not with any hope that it would be accepted, but merely to show what, in his judgment, was the course the House ought to pursue.

Mr. BARTLETT, after adverting to the time which had been consumed by this debate, the importance of the passage of the Appropriation Bills, and the few open days of the session which yet remained, now moved the previous question, and the call was sustained by the House—yeas 180, and the main question ordered.

The main question was then stated, in the following form: "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?"

And it was decided in the affirmative as follows:

SATURDAY, February 21.

The House was principally occupied this day on the different appropriation bills.

TUESDAY, February 24.

Reprinting of Public Documents.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution, reported by the Committee on the Library.

"Resolved, That such of the Executive Documents, and Legislative reports of the House of Representatives, as are important to be preserved, from the first to the tenth Congress, both inclusive, shall be selected by the Clerk of this House for publication, and shall be printed under his inspection and direction."

Mr. WARD offered an amendment to restrict the expenditure for that purpose to the sum of thirty thousand dollars. On this question,

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he was not only opposed to the original resolution, offered by the member of North Carolina, (Mr. BARRINGER,) but also to that reported by the Committee on the Library, even with the restriction upon it, offered by the member from New York, (Mr. WARD,) which proposes to limit the expenditure to thirty thousand dollars. Both propositions contemplated an expenditure of public money, useless and wasteful, without any corresponding benefit. He regretted that the member from New York was not in his seat. If he were present, (said Mr. W.,) I would urge him to withdraw his amendment, to give place to one I have prepared, which contemplates an inquiry into the nature, character, importance, and probable cost, of printing such of the public documents of the twenty-six years, which it be deemed advisable to reprint.

I am (said Mr. W.) called upon to meet the proposition as it now stands; and I flatter myself that, if I can engage the attention of the members of this House for a short time, I shall be able to satisfy any and all, who are open to conviction, that this resolution ought not to pass. If it be deemed expedient to spend the small sum of thirty thousand dollars, because we may have it in the Treasury, perhaps by a little investigation we may be able to find some other object upon which to squander it, of more importance than reprinting the mass of trash which is to be found in the old, and, I might say, useless volumes of executive and legislative reports for the period of twenty-six years.

The member from North Carolina obtained the unanimous consent of the House to offer his resolution, upon stating that it was "a resolution which merely contemplated the printing of some documents which were necessary to be printed." For one, I consented that it might be introduced, under the impression that it related to some business before the House necessary to be acted upon. Amid the noise and bustle which is but too common in this Hall, when the resolution was read at the Clerk's table, I was only able to hear the words thirteenth Congress, inclusive, which induced me to read the resolution at the Clerk's table; and I confess my astonishment, when I learned, by its phraseology, that it contemplated a reprinting of the whole documents, executive and legislative, for twenty-six years, without regard to their importance, and reckless as to the expense.

It was then stated by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. FLOYD,) conjecturally, that the expense would be equal to three hundred thousand dollars. The gentleman from North Carolina gratuitously ascribed this estimate to me when he congratulated himself that the committee had so modified his proposition that the cost was estimated at thirty thousand dollars only. And this sum is too contemptible in the estimation of the gentleman to deserve serious consideration. His surprise is excited that a resolution of his, which only contemplates the expenditure of thirty thousand dollars, should have met with such serious opposition. I can assure the gentleman his surprise was not greater than mine, when I found that one portion of this House, by a unanimity unexampled, voted against the reference of his proposition to a committee for investigation. They seemed to have comprehended, by a species of instinct, the object of the resolution, and negated the motion to refer. What was the resolution of the gentleman? I will again call his own attention and that of the House to it: "Resolved, that the usual number of the documents of the House of Representatives, Executive and Legislative, up to thirteenth Congress inclusive, be reprinted under the direction of the clerk of this House." He proposed to submit nothing to the discretion of the Clerk, or anybody else. His order is imperative; the whole were to be reprinted at an expense unlimited: not content with a sufficient number for the use of your library, lest the sum might not be sufficiently large, the gentleman desires to have six hundred and thirty copies of each document, making, according to the estimate of the committee, seven thousand five hundred and sixty volumes; a good fat job! but what of that? It is paid for out of the public purse. If I am not grossly deceived (said Mr. W.) in the estimate which I have made, the expense of the printing contemplated by the resolution as offered by the member from North Carolina, will greatly exceed any amount which he had contemplated. I am sure if that gentleman had correctly comprehended the extent of his resolution, he would not have been surprised that it met with "serious opposition" from some members in this House, who think it a duty which they owe to their constituents, to resist any and every proposition to increase the expenditures of this Government unnecessarily. I know it is an invidious task here for any member to resist a proposition which contemplates an expenditure of money. I have felt it a duty which I owed to those who have sent me here, on many occasions to oppose what I believed a waste of public money, when, by remaining silent, I might have rendered myself more acceptable to persons in and out of this Hall. I have endeavored to satisfy myself, since this subject was introduced, whether my first impressions were correct; and the more I have investigated it, the more I am convinced of its utter inutility.

There is no data by which to test the amount of expense, so correct as the sum expended for printing by Congress for the years embraced in the resolution. Upon reference to the Treasury Department, I am informed by a letter from the Register, that in consequence of the burning of the Treasury Office, in 1814, the amount paid for printing by the House of Representatives does not appear on the records of that office, prior to the thirteenth Congress. By the statement of that officer, which I now hold in my hand, the amount paid for printing for the House of Representatives alone, during that Congress, was thirty-three thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars and thirty-three cents. If you will make the deduction for the probable amount paid for printing bills and journals, say three thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars thirty-three cents, you will find that, if the resolution of the member from

Reprinting of Public Documents.

[H. OF R.]

North Carolina had been adopted, the expense of printing the documents contemplated by it, for that Congress alone, would have been thirty thousand dollars. We may fairly estimate the average costs for printing for the twenty-six years at ten thousand dollars per year. And if the gentleman will aid me by his knowledge of arithmetic, and multiply ten thousand dollars, by twenty-six years, he will discover, what I at first apprehended, that his resolution contemplated an expenditure of two hundred and sixty thousand dollars, to print old documents of no possible use but to encumber your shelves in the library. The gentleman, looking to the great public good to be effected by this measure, with some gravity inquires of us, why we "higgle" at this trifling, insignificant sum. Sir, if only the sum of thirty thousand dollars is to be expended, I would advise the gentleman (if he will pardon the use of his own word) to "higgle" a little while—long enough, at least, to satisfy us of the necessity and utility of the expenditure.

Upon a proposition involving the expenditure of so large a sum out of the contingent fund of this House, it might not be unworthy of our attention, or time needlessly expended, to retrospect the contingent expenses of this House, for the last seven years, to see with what rapidity they have increased. If we were to extend our inquiries farther, and examine the objects of expenditure, and the causes which have led to its increase, we shall find them mainly to be the quantity of useless printing of documents which are read by no one, and only serve the purposes of grocery and shop-keepers, after the adjournment of Congress.

I do not hazard much when I state to you the average amount per annum paid by this House for printing for the last seven years is equal to the average amount per annum for the first ten years of this Government, paid for the printing done for every department, executive, legislative, and judicial. How are you to check this evil? for an evil it is we must all admit. The only safe remedy is to be found in the good sense and sound discretion of the members of this House, by refusing to print every thing as a matter of course. As an humble member of a committee of this House, it was made my duty to investigate this subject of printing, and to suggest some remedy for the abuse. In order to diminish the expense, that much-abused Committee on Retrenchment reported a resolution altering, in some manner, the mode of printing the public documents. When this resolution was presented, it was thought a small business; some gentlemen smiled as if their dignity contemned the effort; and the well-directed press of this place attempted to ridicule that portion of the labors of the committee. What has been the effect of that reform? Your clerk informs you, by a document on your table, that it will reduce the expense of printing annually about eight thousand dollars. That committee, in pursuing their labors at the present session, propose one other means of correcting the abuse, and that is, by a Standing Committee of this House documents and papers shall be first examined, who shall report upon the propriety of printing, and the number of copies to be printed.

WEDNESDAY, February 25.

Reprinting of Public Documents.

Mr. BARRINGER said: The whole substance of his resolution, as presented, and now modified, might be comprised within the limits of a nutshell. It was a mere question of expediency, involving no question of principle. It was simply whether documents shall be now reprinted, (for reprinted they certainly will be,) which formed a part of the history of the country; aye, the foundation—the very corner stone—the entire legislative history of the times to which they relate; containing, within their compass, all the principles of our polity, and without a knowledge of which, the subsequent superstructure is baseless, and without symmetry or proportion. It was a question, he repeated, whether the public records of the country should remain scattered and dispersed; a few in print, and a few in manuscript, and for ten years, from 1793 to 1808, according to the report, not the vestige of a manuscript copy, and whether that House, the Government, and the nation, should be without a single copy of many of them.

The question of their expense was merely incidental; although it was desirable, and comported with his own principles of action, that it should meet the strictest scrutiny. The subject of that scrutiny, he could not but felicitate himself, had been taken up by one who was not of the least celebrity in guarding against needless appropriations, and whose attention was peculiarly devoted to matters connected with the public expenditure. The formal preparations of the gentleman from Kentucky had certainly alarmed him. When he (Mr. B.) had witnessed the formal exhibition of volumes of books, and heard quoted minutes, reports, indexes, and copies of letters, he felt startled! He really began to apprehend that the gentleman was correct; he began to fear that he himself, though the mover of the resolution, did not understand the extent of it; that he could not, on reflection, approve of it; nay, indeed, he was almost led to believe that he was utterly ignorant of the subject in all its bearings and relations. When there appeared, too, on the part of the member from Kentucky, such a formidable array of figures; when it was shown, by an astute calculation, that the cost of carrying the resolution into effect would amount to two hundred and sixty thousand dollars, ($260,000), he was, he repeated, ready to admit that, in bringing forward the resolution in question, he had not foreseen the enormous expense which the project involved, and his fears were, in no small degree, enhanced, by the gentleman's repeated professions of candor. But, (Mr. B. continued,) he was led, by all he saw, and all he heard, to review his premises; and it would be found, upon investigation, that the latter calculations of the member from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE,) were as erroneous as his former statements were unfounded. The gentleman had formed his estimates by the expenses of a few particular years, and those years among the most recent of the operations of this Government, and long subsequent to the most extreme period to which his resolution proposed to confine its operations.

Sir, (continued Mr. B.,) the cost of printing, or the annual increase of cost for the last ten or five years, form no data from which to estimate the cost of printing the documents coming within the scope of my resolution. The gentleman admits that the annual increase has been equal to the annual cost of printing for the whole Government, for the first ten years. Did the gentleman see the conclusion which would necessarily result from such premises? and, that it puts his whole argument—with all its accompaniments—books, minutes, indexes, letters, all to flight; aye, with the whole array of figures, with which the gentleman so sedulously fortified himself? And to show most conclusively that such was the case, (Mr. B. said,) he would presently read to the House, as a part of his argument, a statement, which the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) Chairman of the Committee on the Library, had kindly prepared, and handed to him, showing that the expenses of printing for both Houses of the first ten years of the Government, or rather the ten years, from 1798 to 1808, did not exceed three thousand; nay, he would say not two thousand dollars per annum. The member from Kentucky had concluded his remarks upon the subject, by stating that ten, he had previously said twenty thousand dollars per year, would be necessary for the execution of the project, and he had triumphantly called upon him (Mr. B.) to multiply that sum by twenty-six years, and ascertain that it amounted to two hundred and sixty thousand dollars. Now, what was shown by the statement which he held in his hands? And what were the expenses of the Houses during ten years of the time referred to? It appeared that the "firewood, stationery, printing, and all other contingent expenses of the two Houses, amounted, in 1798, to nine thousand five hundred and fifty-two dollars; in '94, to ten thousand dollars; in '95, to nine thousand five hundred dollars; in '96, to eleven thousand dollars; in '97, twelve thousand dollars; in '98, to thirteen thousand dollars; in '99, to thirteen thousand and five hundred dollars, &c. Previous to '93, the charges are not specifically stated;" but we are left to infer that they were within the limits of any given year stated. Deduct (Mr. B. continued) from these sums the probable amount of the items for firewood, for stationery, for all other contingent expenses; bear in mind, also, that the bills and journals are not to be included, and then say whether the expense of reprinting the documents, coming within the scope of my resolution, would be one-sixth, or even one-tenth of the whole charge! Would the utmost of the expense exceed one thousand dollars per annum? It was impossible that it could; and he wondered that the gentleman from Kentucky, who, in the course of his observations, had so emphatically disclaimed all reference to persons, should have suffered the subject to remain uninvestigated in that point of view, and should have made such an exaggerated assertion, (unintentional, no doubt,) as that the cost of the printing would amount to two hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

MONDAY, March 2.

The Cumberland Road.

The Cumberland road bill was returned from the Senate with amendments, which went to strike out all that part of the bill which provides for the erection of toll-gates.

Mr. MERCE moved that this House do disagree to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. STEWART earnestly opposed this motion. If the House disagree, the appropriation will be lost, and the road become impassable. He read a letter from the Postmaster General, showing that the mail and travel were last Spring frequently forced off the road, through farms. The friends of the road had done all they could to get up gates, but had failed. This money would now do more good than double the amount a year hence. To reject the bill would be equivalent to a vote of non-intercourse between the East and West. He described the present condition of the road, and entreated its friends, East and West, to concur in the amendments of the Senate, and save the road from total destruction.

Mr. STORRS opposed any farther appropriation for the repair of the road, unless gates should be allowed, as the means of providing for keeping it in repair.

Mr. BARNEY took the same ground as Mr. STEWART.

Mr. BUCHANAN offered an amendment proposing to invest the President of the United States with power to make an arrangement with the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, for the erection of gates and collection of toll.

Mr. B. said he felt as friendly as any gentleman in the House to the appropriation of money for the extension of the Cumberland road to the Mississippi. He would state the single reason why he felt himself compelled—he would say reluctantly compelled—to vote against this bill. The House had recently determined that they would keep the Cumberland road in repair by erecting toll-gates upon it, under the authority of the Federal Government. As long as the pretension continued to be set up, which he believed to be both dangerous and unconstitutional, he could not, nor would not, vote for the construction of any road intended, after its completion, to be thus placed under the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. VANCE opposed the amendments, on the ground that the House could not authorize the President to do what it had decided itself to have no right to do. Mr. V. then demanded the previous question, which was sustained by the House, and the yeas and nays were demanded by Mr. FORWARD, and ordered.

The main question was finally put, as follows: "Will the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate to this bill?" And decided by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 52, nays 80.

So the House refused to disagree, and therefore the Senate's amendments were agreed to.

TUESDAY, MARCH 3.

Thanks to the Speaker.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, offered the following:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be presented to the Honorable ANDREW STEVENSON, for the able, prompt, and dignified manner with which he has presided over its deliberations, and performed the important and arduous duties of the Chair.

Mr. BRENT inquired whether the ordinary rules of order applied to the last day of the session? The Chair decided that they did. Thereupon, Mr. BARTLETT objected to the reception of the resolution, as not in order, and moved to suspend the rule with respect to the orders of the day.

The CHAIR (then temporarily occupied by Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) said that, if the rules of order were to be strictly enforced the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts would, of course, be out of order. But, it was the view of the Chair, that the universal practice of the House had decided that such a resolution might be received on the last day of the session, though not strictly in order, and that, therefore, the resolution would be received.

Mr. TALLAFERRO suggested that the rules of order, resting as they did on the joint action of both Houses, terminated, of course, at 12 o'clock last night, when the action of the two Houses, in respect to each other, also terminated.

Mr. VANCE observed that the Chair had just decided that the rules of order do apply to the last day of the session. If so, they ought to apply equally on both sides; if, under the rules, the discussion of the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina had been cut short at the expiration of the hour, the same rules pervade the offering of a new resolution unless unanimous consent were given, or the operation of the rules suspended by the will of the House.

Mr. BARBOUR said he must arrest the course of these remarks, unless an appeal was taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. VANCE declined to appeal, but Mr. BRENT did appeal to the House.

Mr. BRENT supported the appeal by a reference to the case of Mr. WRIGHT, of New York, which took place last session. It had always been the custom, when such a resolution as this was presented, for the mover to ask and obtain leave from the House to offer it. The Journals would show that Mr. W. had done so, and that leave had been granted. Leave was always given, as of course, but it was done by an act of courtesy, and not a concession of right.

Mr. POLK referred to a fact which took place last Congress, and furnished a case precisely analogous to the present, when a resolution offered by Mr. SAUNDERS, on the subject of printing, had regularly occupied the House every morning for a long course of time; and a gentleman from Ohio (Mr. WRIGHT) had spoken four or five mornings in relation to it, and after his remarks had been cut short by the expiration of the hour, and he, if any one, was entitled to the floor, a resolution of thanks to the Speaker had, nevertheless, been received and adopted.

Mr. ALLEN said that, if leave had been asked, the resolution could have been received only by courtesy, and the usage of the House had established the precedent that a resolution of this peculiar character was to be received as of course, at the close of the session. Mr. A. adverted to the closing scenes of a session as calling, in an especial manner, for the exercise of good feelings; and, as the resolution he had offered was usual and customary, he hoped it would be received without farther debate.

Mr. EVERETT said he hoped the appeal would not be persevered in, as, if it were, that it would not be sustained. The matter had been put by the Chair on the right ground; the receiving such a resolution was a matter of courtesy. A member, in rising to offer it, would say, of course, "with the leave of the House, I offer the following resolution;" but the leave was a matter of course. As to the resolution offered on the subject of reprinting the documents, he was as friendly to it as the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANCE) could be; but he believed it was impracticable, under existing circumstances, to effect its adoption, and, in the mean while, he was favorable to the present resolution also. He had given this explanation.

tion of his views, because he feared that the performance of what he considered a domestic duty [he was understood as alluding to his attendance on the funeral of Mrs. Barnard] would call him from the House before the final vote on this resolution.

Mr. HAMILTON said, that the strictest rules intended for the government of gentlemen were always subject to be modified by courtesy, when the modification of them violated no established right. Since he had enjoyed the honor of a seat on that floor, he had known instances, where, after the orders of the day had been proclaimed, at a late hour in the afternoon, and the House had declined going into committee, a resolution of this kind had been allowed to be introduced. It referred to a gentleman then in the Chair, (Mr. TAYLOR,) for whom he was free to confess he had no political predilections, and for whom he had not voted. This he considered as strong ground of precedent. During the first hour, the Speaker would, of course, be himself in the Chair, and there would be an obvious indelicacy in receiving a resolution of this kind; but after the House got to business, the Speaker frequently retired from the Chair, and then it might be offered with propriety. As to the subject-matter of the resolution itself, it was perfectly in order for any member to oppose it if he thought the thanks not merited, and, in so doing, to state the cases in which he supposed the Speaker to have acted with impropriety. If such an issue were made on the present occasion, he hoped that no gentleman who might apprehend that there had been partiality on the part of the Speaker, would shrink from performing his duty with firmness.

Mr. BARNEY suggested the propriety of withdrawing the appeal, and adverted, with his usual urbanity, to the desirableness of entire harmony and peace at the parting moments of the session.

The question was put on the appeal, and the decision of the Chair was affirmed, by yeas and nays—94 to 42.

And the question was taken on the proposed vote of thanks, and decided in the affirmative.

Panama Documents.

A Message in writing was received from the President of the United States, transmitting to Congress a copy of the instructions prepared by the Secretary of State, and furnished to the Ministers of the United States appointed to attend the assembly of American Plenipotentiaries, first held at Panama, and thence transferred to Tacubaya.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to lay the Message and documents on the table, and to print them.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, the question was divided.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. STORRS then adverted to the obligation imposed on the President to make communications on such subjects as concern the Union, and to recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as he shall judge necessary.

Mr. HAYNES was opposed to the printing.

Mr. HAMILTON said that this was a most extraordinary motion, to print a nonentity. We have not the instructions before us, but have to obtain them from the Senate. What power have we to obtain them from the Senate, at the moment we are going out of political existence? Perhaps the confidential seal of that body was placed upon the documents. He thought the Panama mission was injured, and that we had attended its funeral—that it had gone to the tomb of all the Capulets. There had been an attempt to entrap the other House, and it was a good scheme to send it to this House. But he hoped we should not be twice caught in the same snare. He called upon the House to come up and vote, and asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON moved to lay the motion to print on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered: decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Addams, Alexander, Robert Allen, Alston, John Anderson, John S. Barbour, Philip P. Barbour, Barlow, Barringer Bassett, Blair, Cambreleng, Carson, John C. Clark, Conner, Daniel, Warren R. Davis, Desha, Duncan, Earl, Findlay, Floyd of Virginia, Floyd of Georgia, Forward, Fry, Garrow, Green, Hallock, Hall, Hamilton, Harvey, Haynes, Hinds, Hobbie, Hoffman, Holmes, Isaacs, Jennings, Keese, Kremer, Lecompte, Lea, Livingston, Magee, Marable, McCoy, McDuffie, McHatton, McKean, Miller, John Mitchell, Thomas P. Wilson, J. Woods, Woodcock, John C. Wright—37.

Adjournment.

Mr. WARD moved the usual resolution, for the appointment of a committee to wait on the President of the United States, and to inform him that, if he had no further message to send to them, the two Houses were ready to adjourn. The resolution was agreed to, and Mr. WARD and Mr. BATES, of Massachusetts, were appointed a committee on the part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee of this House, appointed to wait on the President, subsequently reported that the committee had performed that duty, and had received for answer, that he had no other communication to make to this House, but to convey to every individual member his sincere wish of health and happiness.

A Message was sent to the Senate to inform it that this House was about to adjourn.

Mr. HAYNES moved that this House do now adjourn; which being agreed to,

The SPEAKER adjourned the House in the following terms:

GENTLEMEN: The moment having arrived in which I am about to lay down the trust with which you have honored me, and the connections which have existed between us are to cease, I should do violence to the feelings which now warm my heart, if I did not seize this occasion to express my deep sense of gratitude for your past confidence and kindness, and the flattering proof just given, of your continued approbation and favor.

Two years have elapsed since I had the honor of being placed in this chair. This period of service has been distinguished by events and circumstances well calculated to render this station, not only one of extreme delicacy, but severe responsibility and labor. Steady and lasting applause; permanent and solid reputation; can only be acquired in a station so exalted, by an undeviating adherence to elevated principles, and by a manly, upright, and independent discharge of its high and important functions. Under the influence of these principles, and a just diffidence in my own qualifications, I came to this chair, with a settled determination to pursue that course which should secure to me the testimony of my own mind, and the approbation of every just and liberal man. That my efforts have not been wholly unavailing, I am this day assured by the renewed evidence of the kindness and justice of the House. I receive it in the same spirit of kindness in which it has been offered, and shall cherish it through life with feelings of profound respect and the deepest gratitude.

If, gentlemen, in the discharge of our multifarious duties; if, amid the storm and strife of passion or of party; if, under the influence of momentary excitement or irritation, any thing unkind should have been said or done, let us, I entreat you, endeavor to forget and forgive it, and let our separation (with many of us long, and with some of us forever) be in the spirit of peace and good will, and as becomes the Representatives of virtuous and enlightened freemen. You will carry with you, gentlemen, my prayers for continued blessings upon our beloved country, and my best wishes for your health, prosperity, and happiness.

It remains for me only to announce, that this House stands adjourned sine die.

[SENATE.]

who replied that he would, to-day, at 12 o'clock, make a communication to each House of Congress.

Soon after which, a written Message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his Secretary.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

It affords me pleasure to tender my friendly greetings to you on the occasion of your assembling at the Seat of Government, to enter upon the important duties to which you have been called by the voice of our countrymen. The task devolves on me, under a provision of the constitution, to present to you, as the Federal Legislature of twenty-four sovereign States, and twelve millions of happy people, a view of our affairs; and to propose such measures as, in the discharge of my official functions, have suggested themselves as necessary to promote the objects of our Union.

In communicating with you, for the first time, it is, to me, a source of unfeigned satisfaction, calling for mutual gratulation and devout thanks to a benign Providence, that we are at peace with all mankind, and that our country exhibits the most cheering evidence of general welfare and progressive improvement. Turning our eyes to other Nations, our great desire is to see our brethren of the human race secured in the blessings enjoyed by ourselves, and advancing in knowledge, in freedom, and in social happiness.

Our foreign relations, although in their general character pacific and friendly, present subjects of difference between us and other powers, of deep interest, as well to the country at large, as to many of our citizens. To effect an adjustment of these shall continue to be the object of my earnest endeavors; and notwithstanding the difficulties of the task, I do not allow myself to apprehend unfavorable results. Blessed as our country is with every thing which constitutes national strength, she is fully adequate to the maintenance of all her interests. In discharging the responsible trust confided to the Executive in this respect, it is my settled purpose to ask nothing that is not clearly right, and to submit to nothing that is wrong; and I flatter myself, that, supported by the other branches of the Government, and by the intelligence and patriotism of the people, we shall be able, under the protection of Providence, to cause all our just rights to be respected.

Of the unsettled matters between the United States and other powers, the most prominent are those which have, for years, been the subject of negotiation with England, France, and Spain. The late periods at which our Ministers to those Governments left the United States, render it impossible, at this early day, to inform you of what has been done on the subjects with which they have been respectively charged. Relying upon the justice of our views in relation to the points committed to negotiation, and the reciprocal good feeling which characterizes our intercourse with those nations, we have the best reason to hope for a satisfactory adjustment of existing differences.

With Great Britain, alike distinguished in peace and war, we may look forward to years of peaceful, honorable, and elevated competition. Every thing in the condition and history of the two nations is calculated to inspire sentiments of mutual respect, and to carry conviction to the minds of both, that it is their policy to preserve the most cordial relations: such are my own views, and it is not to be doubted that such are also the prevailing sentiments of our constituents. Although neither time nor opportunity has been afforded for a full development of the policy which the present Cabinet of Great Britain designs to pursue towards this country, I indulge the hope that it will be of a just and pacific character; and if this anticipation be realized, we may look with confidence to a speedy and acceptable adjustment of our affairs.

Under the Convention for regulating the reference to arbitration of the disputed points of boundary, under the fifth article of the Treaty of Ghent, the proceedings have hitherto been conducted in that spirit of candor and liberality which ought ever to characterize the acts of sovereign States, seeking to adjust, by the most unexceptionable means, important and delicate subjects of contention. The first statements of the parties have been exchanged, and the final replication, on our part, is in a course of preparation. This subject has received the attention demanded by its great and peculiar importance to a patriotic member of this Confederacy. The exposition of our rights, already made, is such as, from the high reputation of the commissioners by whom it has been prepared, we had a right to expect. Our interests at the court of the Sovereign who has evinced his friendly disposition, by assuming the delicate task of arbitration, have been committed to a citizen of the State of Maine, whose character, talents, and intimate acquaintance with the subject, eminently qualify him for so responsible a trust. With full confidence in the justice of our cause, and in the probity, intelligence, and uncompromising independence of the illustrious arbitrator, we can have nothing to apprehend from the result.

From France, our ancient ally, we have a right to expect that justice which becomes the Sovereign of a powerful, intelligent, and magnanimous people. The beneficial effects produced by the Commercial Convention of 1822, limited as are its provisions, are too obvious not to make a salutary impression upon the minds of those who are charged with the administration of her Government. Should this result induce a disposition to embrace, to their full extent, the wholesome principles which constitute our commercial policy, our Minister to that Court will be found instructed to cherish such a disposition, and to aid in conducting it to useful practical conclusions. The claims of our citizens for depredations upon their property, long since committed, under the authority, and, in many instances, by the express direction of the then existing Government of France, remain unsatisfied; and must, therefore, continue to furnish a subject of unpleasant discussion, and possible collision between the two Governments. I cherish, however, a lively hope, founded as well on the validity of those claims, and the established policy of all enlightened Governments, as on the known integrity of the French monarch, that the injurious delays of the past will find redress in the equity of the future. Our Minister has been instructed to press these demands on the French Government with all the earnestness which is called for by their importance and irrefutable justice; and in a spirit that will evince the respect which is due to the feelings of those from whom the satisfaction is required.

Our Minister recently appointed to Spain, has been authorized to assist in removing evils alike injurious to both countries, either by concluding a Commercial Convention upon liberal and reciprocal terms; or by urging the acceptance, in their full extent, of the mutually beneficial provisions of our navigation acts. He has also been instructed to make a further appeal to the justice of Spain, in behalf of our citizens, for indemnity for spoiliations upon our commerce, committed under her authority—an appeal which the pacific and liberal course observed on our part, and a due confidence in the honor of that Government, authorize us to expect will not be made in vain.

With other European Powers our intercourse is on the most friendly footing. In Russia, placed by her territorial limits, extensive population, and great power, high in the rank of nations, the United States have always found a steadfast friend. Although her recent invasion of Turkey awakened a lively sympathy for those who were exposed to the desolations of war, we cannot but anticipate that the result will prove favorable to the cause of civilization, and to the progress of human happiness. The treaty of peace, between these powers, having been ratified, we cannot be insensible to the great benefit to be derived to the commerce of the United States, from unlocking the navigation of the Black Sea, a free passage into which is secured to all merchant vessels bound to ports of Russia under a flag of peace with the Porte. This advantage, enjoyed upon conditions, by most of the powers of Europe, has hitherto been withheld from us. During the past Summer, an antecedent, but unsuccessful attempt to obtain it, was renewed, under circumstances which promised the most favorable results. Although these results have fortunately been thus in part attained, further facilities to the enjoyment of this new field for the enterprise of our citizens are, in my opinion, sufficiently desirable to ensure to them our most zealous attention.

Our trade with Austria, although of secondary importance, has been gradually increasing, and is now so extended as to deserve the fostering care of the Government. A negotiation, commenced and nearly completed with that power by the late Administration, has been consummated by a treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce, which will be laid before the Senate.

During the recess of Congress, our diplomatic relations with Portugal have been resumed. The peculiar state of things in that country caused a suspension of the recognition of the Representative who presented himself, until an opportunity was had to obtain from our official organ there, information regarding the actual, and, as far as practicable, prospective condition of the authority by which the representative in question was appointed. This information being received, the application of the established rule of our Government, in like cases, was no longer withheld.

Considerable advances have been made during the present year, in the adjustment of claims of our citizens upon Denmark for spoiliations; but all that we have a right to demand from that Government, in their behalf, has not yet been conceded. From the liberal footing, however, upon which this subject has, with the approbation of the claimants, been placed by the Government, together with the uniformly just and friendly disposition which has been evinced by His Danish Majesty, there is a reasonable ground to hope that this single subject of difference will speedily be removed.

Our relations with the Barbary Powers continue, as they have long been, of the most favorable character. The policy of keeping an adequate force in the Mediterranean, as security for the continuance of this tranquillity, will be persevered in; as well as a similar one for the protection of our commerce and fisheries in the Pacific.

The Southern Republics of our own hemisphere have not yet realized all the advantages for which they have been so long struggling. We trust, however, that the day is not distant when the restoration of peace and internal quiet, under permanent systems of Government, securing the liberty, and promoting the happiness of the citizens, will crown with complete success their long and arduous efforts in the cause of self-government, and enable us to salute them as friendly rivals in all that is truly great and glorious.

The recent invasion of Mexico, and the effect thereby produced upon her domestic policy, must have a controlling influence upon the great question of South American emancipation. We have seen the fell spirit of civil dissension rebuked, and, perhaps, forever stifled in that republic, by the love of independence. If it be true, as appearances strongly indicate, that the spirit of independence is the master spirit; and if a corresponding sentiment prevails in the other States, this devotion to liberty cannot be without a proper effect upon the councils of the mother country. The adoption, by Spain, of a pacific policy towards her former colonies—an event consoling to humanity, and a blessing to the world, in which she herself cannot fail largely to participate—may be most reasonably expected.

The claims of our citizens upon the South American Governments, generally, are in a train of settlement; while the principal part of those upon Brazil have been adjusted; and a Decree in Council, ordering bonds to be issued by the Minister of the Treasury for their amount, has received the sanction of his Imperial Majesty. This event, together with the exchange of the ratifications of the Treaty negotiated and concluded in 1828, happily terminates all serious causes of difference with that power.

Measures have been taken to place our commercial relations with Peru upon a better footing than that upon which they have hitherto rested; and, if met by a proper disposition on the part of that Government, important benefits may be secured to both countries.

Deeply interested as we are in the prosperity of our sister Republics, and more particularly in that of our immediate neighbor, it would be most gratifying to me, were I permitted to say, that the treatment which we have received at her hands has been as universally friendly as the early and constant solicitude manifested by the United States for her success gave us a right to expect. But it becomes my duty to inform you that prejudices, long indulged, by a portion of the inhabitants of Mexico against the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, have had an unfortunate influence upon the affairs of the two countries; and have diminished that usefulness to his own which was justly to be expected from his talents and zeal. To this cause, in a great degree, is to be imputed the failure of several measures equally interesting to both parties; but particularly that of the Mexican Government to ratify a treaty negotiated and concluded in its own capital and under its own eye. Under these circumstances, it appeared expedient to give to Mr. Poinsett the option either to return or not, as, in his judgment, the interest of his country might require; and instructions to that end were prepared; but, before they could be despatched, a communication was received from the Government of Mexico, through its Chargé d'Affaires here, requesting the recall of our Minister. This was promptly complied with; and a representative, of a rank corresponding with that of the Mexican Diplomatic Agent near this Government, was appointed. Our conduct towards that Republic has been uniformly of the most friendly character, and, having thus removed the only alleged obstacle to harmonious intercourse, I cannot but hope that an advantageous change will occur in our affairs.

In justice to Mr. Poinsett, it is proper to say, that my immediate compliance with the application for his recall, and the appointment of a successor, are not to be ascribed to any evidence that the imputation of an improper interference by him, in the local politics of Mexico, was well founded; nor to a want of confidence in his talents or integrity; and to add, that the truth of that charge has never been affirmed by the Federal Government of Mexico, in its communications with this.

I consider it one of the most urgent of my duties to bring to your attention the propriety of amending that part of our constitution which relates to the election of President and Vice President. Our system of government was, by its framers, deemed an experiment; and they, therefore, consistently provided a mode of remedying its defects.

To the people belongs the right of electing their Chief Magistrate: it was never designed that their choice should, in any case, be defeated, either by the intervention of electoral colleges, or by the agency confided, under certain contingencies, to the House of Representatives. Experience proves, that, in proportion as agents to execute the will of the people are multiplied, there is danger of their wishes being frustrated. Some may be unfaithful: all are liable to err. So far, therefore, as the people can, with convenience, speak, it is safer for them to express their own will.

The number of aspirants to the Presidency, and the diversity of the interests which may influence their claims, leave little reason to expect a choice in the first instance: and, in that event, the election must devolve on the House of Representatives, where, it is obvious, the will of the people may not be always ascertained; or, if ascertained, may not be regarded. From the mode of voting by States, the choice is to be made by twenty-four votes; and it may often occur, that one of these may be controlled by an individual representative. Honors and offices are at the disposal of the successful candidate. Repeated ballotings may make it apparent that a single individual holds the cast in his hand. May he not be tempted to name his reward? But even without corruption—supposing the probity of the Representative to be proof against the powerful motives by which he may be assailed—the will of the people is still constantly liable to be misrepresented. One may err from ignorance of the wishes of his constituents; another from a conviction that it is his duty to be governed by his own judgment of the fitness of the candidates: finally, although all were inflexibly honest—all accurately informed of the wishes of their constituents—yet, under the present mode of election, a minority may often elect the President; and when this happens, it may reasonably be expected that efforts will be made on the part of the majority to rectify this injurious operation of their institutions. But although no evil of this character should result from such a perversion of the first principle of our system—that the majority is to govern—it must be very certain that a President elected by a minority cannot enjoy the confidence necessary to the successful discharge of his duties.

In this, as in all other matters of public concern, policy requires that as few impediments as possible should exist to the free operation of the public will. Let us, then, endeavor so to amend our system, as that the office of Chief Magistrate may not be conferred upon any citizen but in pursuance of a fair expression of the will of the majority.

I would therefore recommend such an amendment of the constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of President and Vice President. The mode may be so regulated as to preserve to each State its present relative weight in the election; and a failure in the first attempt may be provided for, by confining the second to a choice between the two highest candidates. In connection with such an amendment, it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term, of either four or six years. If, however, it should not be adopted, it is worthy of consideration whether a provision disqualifying for office the Representatives in Congress on whom such an election may have devolved, would not be proper.

While members of Congress can be constitutionally appointed to offices of trust and profit, it will be the practice, even under the most conscientious adherence to duty, to select them for such stations as they are believed to be better qualified to fill than other citizens; but the purity of our Government would doubtless be promoted by their exclusion from all appointments in the gift of the President in whose election they may have been officially concerned. The nature of the judicial office, and the necessity of securing in the Cabinet and in diplomatic stations of the highest rank, the best talents and political experience, should, perhaps, except these from the exclusion.

There are perhaps few men who can for any great length of time enjoy office and power without being more or less under the influence of feelings unfavorable to a faithful discharge of their public duties. Their integrity may be proof against improper considerations immediately addressed to themselves; but they are apt to acquire a habit of looking with indifference upon the public interests, and of tolerating conduct from which an unpractised man would revolt. Office is considered as a species of property; and Government rather as a means of promoting individual interest, than as an instrument created solely for the service of the people. Corruption in some, and, in others, a perversion of correct feelings and principles, divert Government from its legitimate ends, and make it an engine for the support of the few at the expense of the many. The duties of all public officers are, or, at least, admit of being made, so plain and simple, that men of intelligence may readily qualify themselves for their performance; and I cannot but believe that more is lost by the long continuance of men in office, than is generally to be gained by their experience. I submit, therefore, to your consideration, whether the efficiency of the Government would not be promoted, and official industry and integrity better secured, by a general extension of the law which limits appointments to four years.

In a country where offices are created solely for the benefit of the people, no one man has any more intrinsic right to official station than another. Offices were not established to give support to particular men, at the public expense. No individual wrong is therefore done by removal, since neither appointment to, nor continuance in office, is matter of right. The incumbent became an officer with a view to public benefits; and when these require his removal, they are not to be sacrificed to private interests. It is the people, and they alone, who have a right to complain, when a bad officer is substituted for a good one. He who is removed has the same means of obtaining a living that are enjoyed by the millions who never held office. The proposed limitation would destroy the idea of property, now so generally connected with official station; and, although individual distress may be sometimes produced, it would, by promoting that rotation which constitutes a leading principle in the republican creed, give healthful action to the system.

No very considerable change has occurred, during the recess of Congress, in the condition of either our Agriculture, Commerce, or Manufactures. The operation of the Tariff has not proved so injurious to the two former, nor as beneficial to the latter, as was anticipated. Importations of foreign goods have not been sensibly diminished, while domestic competition, under an illusive excitement, has increased the production much beyond the demand for home consumption. The consequences have been low prices, temporary embarrassment, and partial loss. That such of our manufacturing establishments as are based upon capital, and are prudently managed, will survive the shock, and be ultimately profitable, there is no good reason to doubt.

To regulate its conduct, so as to promote equally the prosperity of these three cardinal interests, is one of the most difficult tasks of Government; and it may be regretted that the complicated restrictions which now embarrass the intercourse of nations, could not by common consent be abolished, and commerce allowed to flow in those channels to which individual enterprise—always its surest guide—might direct it. But we must ever expect selfish legislation in other nations, and are therefore compelled to adapt our own to their regulations, in the manner best calculated to avoid serious injury, and to harmonize the conflicting interests of our agriculture, our commerce, and our manufactures. Under these impressions, I invite your attention to the existing Tariff, believing that some of its provisions require modification.

The general rule to be applied in graduating the duties upon articles of foreign growth or manufacture, is that which will place our own in fair competition with those of other countries; and the inducements to advance even a step beyond this point, are controlling in regard to those articles which are of primary necessity in time of war. When we reflect upon the difficulty and delicacy of this operation, it is important that it should never be attempted but with the utmost caution. Frequent legislation in regard to any branch of industry, affecting its value, and by which its capital may be transferred to new channels, must always be productive of hazardous speculation and loss.

In deliberating, therefore, on these interesting subjects, local feelings and prejudices should be merged in the patriotic determination to promote the great interests of the whole. All attempts to connect them with the party conflicts of the day, are necessarily injurious, and should be discountenanced. Our action upon them should be under the control of higher and purer motives. Legislation, subjected to such influences, can never be just, and will not long retain the sanction of a people whose active patriotism is not bounded by sectional limits, nor insensible to that spirit of concession and forbearance which gave life to our political compact, and still sustains it. Discarding all calculations of political ascendancy, the North, the South, the East, and the West, should unite in diminishing any burthen, of which either may justly complain.

The agricultural interest of our country is so essentially connected with every other, and so superior in importance to them all, that it is scarcely necessary to invite to it your particular attention. It is principally as manufactures and commerce tend to increase the value of agricultural productions, and to extend their application to the wants and comforts of society, that they deserve the fostering care of Government.

Looking forward to the period, not far distant, when a sinking fund will no longer be required, the duties on those articles of importation which cannot come in competition with our own productions, are the first that should engage the attention of Congress in the modification of the Tariff. Of these, tea and coffee are the most prominent: they enter largely into the consumption of the country, and have become articles of necessity to all classes. A reduction, therefore, of the existing duties, will be felt as a common benefit; but, like all other legislation connected with commerce, to be efficacious, and not injurious, it should be gradual and certain.

The public prosperity is evinced in the increased revenue, arising from the sales of the public lands, and in the steady maintenance of that produced by imposts and tonnage, notwithstanding the additional duties imposed by the Act of 19th of May, 1828, and the unusual importations in the early part of that year.

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1829, was five millions nine hundred and seventy-two thousand four hundred and thirty five dollars and eighty-one cents. The receipts of the current year are estimated at twenty-four millions six hundred and two thousand two hundred and thirty dollars, and the expenditures for the same time at twenty-six millions one hundred and sixty-four thousand five hundred and ninety-five dollars; leaving a balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January next, of four millions four hundred and ten thousand and seventy dollars, eighty-one cents.

There will have been paid, on account of the public debt, during the present year, the sum of twelve millions four hundred and five thousand and five dollars and eighty cents; reducing the whole debt of the Government, on the first of January next, to forty-eight millions five hundred and sixty-five thousand four hundred and six dollars and fifty cents, including seven millions of five per cent. stock, subscribed to the Bank of the United States. The payment on account of the public debt, made on the first of July last, was eight millions seven hundred and fifteen thousand four hundred and sixty-two dollars and eighty-seven cents. It was apprehended that the sudden withdrawal of so large a sum from the banks in which it was deposited, at a time of unusual pressure in the money market, might cause much injury to the interests dependent on bank accommodations. But this evil was wholly averted by an early anticipation of it at the Treasury, aided by the judicious arrangements of the officers of the Bank of the United States.

This state of the finances exhibits the resources of the nation in an aspect highly flattering to its industry and auspicious of the ability of Government, in a very short time, to extinguish the public debt. When this shall be done, our population will be relieved from a considerable portion of its present burthens, and will find, not only new motives to patriotic affection, but additional means for the display of individual enterprise. The fiscal power of the States will also be increased, and may be more extensively exerted in favor of education and other public objects, while ample means will remain in the Federal Government to promote the general weal, in all the modes permitted to its authority.

After the extinction of the public debt it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury, beyond what may be required for its current service. As, then, the period approaches when the application of the revenue to the payment of debt will cease, the disposition of the surplus will present a subject for the serious deliberation of Congress; and it may be fortunate for the country that it is yet to be decided. Considered in connection with the difficulties which have heretofore attended appropriations for purposes of internal improvement, and with those which this experience tells us will certainly arise, whenever power over such subjects may be exercised by the General Government, it is hoped that it may lead to the adoption of some plan which will reconcile the diversified interests of the States, and strengthen the bonds which unite them. Every member of the Union, in peace and in war, will be benefited by the improvement of inland navigation and the construction of highways in the several States. Let us, then, endeavor to attain this benefit in a mode which will be satisfactory to all. That hitherto adopted has, by many of our fellow-citizens, been deprecated as an infraction of the constitution, while, by others, it has been viewed as inexpedient. All feel that it has been employed at the expense of harmony in the legislative councils.

To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States according to their ratio of representation; and, should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it. I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and where its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations. Upon this country, more than any other, has, in the providence of God, been cast the special guardianship of the great principle of adherence to written constitutions. If it fail here, all hope in regard to it will be extinguished. That this was intended to be a Government of limited and specific, and not general powers, must be admitted by all; and it is our duty to preserve for it the character intended by its framers. If experience points out the necessity for an enlargement of these powers, let us apply for it to those for whose benefit it is to be exercised; and not undermine the whole system by a resort to overstrained constructions. The scheme has worked well. It has exceeded the hopes of those who devised it, and become an object of admiration to the world. We are responsible to our country, and to the glorious cause of self-government, for the preservation of so great a good. The great mass of legislation relating to our internal affairs, was intended to be left where the Federal Convention found it—in the State Governments. Nothing is clearer, in my view, than that we are chiefly indebted for the success of the constitution under which we are now acting, to the watchful and auxiliary operation of the State authorities. This is not the reflection of a day, but belongs to the most deeply rooted convictions of my mind. I cannot, therefore, too strongly or too earnestly, from my own sense of its importance, warn you against all encroachments upon the legitimate sphere of State sovereignty. Sustained by its healthful and invigorating influence, the Federal system can never fall.

In the collection of the revenue, the long credits authorized on goods imported from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, are the chief cause of the losses at present sustained. If these were shortened to six, nine, and twelve months, and warehouses provided by Government, sufficient to receive the goods offered in deposit for security, and for debenture; and if the right of the United States to a priority of payment out of the estates of its insolvent debtors were more effectually secured, this evil would, in a great measure, be obviated. An authority to construct such houses, is, therefore, with the proposed alteration of the credits, recommended to your attention.

It is worthy of notice that the laws for the collection and security of the revenue arising from imposts, were chiefly framed when the rates of duties on imported goods presented much less temptation for illicit trade than at present exists. There is reason to believe that these laws are in some respects quite insufficient for the proper security of the revenue, and the protection of the interests of those who are disposed to observe them. The injurious and demoralizing tendency of a successful system of smuggling, is so obvious as not to require comment, and cannot be too carefully guarded against. I therefore suggest to Congress the propriety of adopting efficient measures to prevent this evil; avoiding, however, as much as possible, every unnecessary infringement of individual liberty, and embarrassment of fair and lawful business.

On an examination of the records of the Treasury, I have been forcibly struck with the large amount of public money which appears to be outstanding. Of the sum thus due from individuals to the Government, a considerable portion is undoubtedly desperate; and, in many instances, has probably been rendered so by remissness in the agents charged with its collection. By proper exertions a great part, however, may yet be recovered; and, whatever may be the portions respectively belonging to these two classes, it behoves the Government to ascertain the real state of the fact. This can be done only by the prompt adoption of judicious measures for the collection of such as may be made available. It is believed that a very large amount has been lost through the inadequacy of the means provided for the collection of debts due to the public, and that this inadequacy lies chiefly in the want of legal skill, habitually and constantly employed in the direction of the agents engaged in the service. It must, I think, be admitted, that the supervisory power over suits brought by the public, which is now vested in an accounting officer of the Treasury, not selected with a view to his legal knowledge, and encumbered as he is with numerous other duties, operates unfavorably to the public interest.

It is important that this branch of the public service be subjected to the supervision of such professional skill as will give it efficiency. The expense attendant upon such a modification of the Executive Department would be justified by the soundest principles of economy. I would recommend, therefore, that the duties now assigned to the Agent of the Treasury, so far as they relate to the superintendence and management of legal proceedings, on the part of the United States, be transferred to the Attorney-General, and that this officer be placed on the same footing, in all respects, as the Heads of the other Departments, receiving like compensation, and having such subordinate officers provided for his Department as may be requisite for the discharge of these additional duties. The professional skill of the Attorney-General, employed in directing the conduct of Marshals and District Attorneys, would hasten the collection of debts now in suit, and, hereafter, save much to the Government. It might be further extended to the superintendence of all criminal proceedings for offences against the United States. In making this transfer, great care should be taken, however, that the power necessary to the Treasury Department be not impaired: one of its greatest securities consisting in a control over all accounts, until they are audited or reported for suit.

In connection with the foregoing views, I would suggest, also, an inquiry, whether the provisions of the act of Congress authorizing the discharge of the persons of debtors to the Government, from imprisonment, may not, consistently with the public interest, be extended to the release of the debt, where the conduct of the debtor is wholly exempt from the imputation of fraud. Some more liberal policy than that which now prevails, in reference to this unfortunate class of citizens, is certainly due to them, and would prove beneficial to the country. The continuance of the liability, after the means to discharge it have been exhausted, can only serve to dispirit the debtor; or, where his resources are but partial, the want of power in the Government to compromise and release the demand, instigates to fraud, as the only resource for securing a support to his family. He thus sinks into a state of apathy, and becomes a useless drone in society, or a vicious member of it, if not a feeling witness of the rigor and inhumanity of his country. All experience proves that oppressive debt is the bane of enterprise; and it should be the care of a Republic not to exert a grinding power over misfortune and poverty

Since the last session of Congress, numerous frauds on the Treasury have been discovered, which I thought it my duty to bring under the cognizance of the United States Court for this District, by a criminal prosecution. It was my opinion, and that of able counsel who were consulted, that the cases came within the penalties of the act of the 17th Congress, approved 8d March, 1823, providing for the punishment of frauds committed on the Government of the United States. Either from some defect in the law, or in its administration, every effort to bring the accused to trial under its provisions proved ineffectual, and the Government was driven to the necessity of resorting to the vague and inadequate provisions of the common law. It is therefore my duty to call your attention to the laws which have been passed for the protection of the Treasury. If, indeed, there be no provision by which those who may be unworthily intrusted with its guardianship, can be punished for the most flagrant violation of duty, extending even to the most fraudulent appropriation of the public funds to their own use, it is time to remedy so dangerous an omission. Or, if the law has been perverted from its original purposes, and criminals, deserving to be punished under its provisions, have been rescued by legal subtleties, it ought to be made so plain, by amendatory provisions, as to baffle the arts of perversion, and accomplish the end of its original enactment.

In one of the most flagrant cases, the Court decided that the prosecution was barred by the statute which limits the prosecution for fraud to two years. In this case, all the evidences of fraud, and indeed all knowledge that a fraud had been committed, were in possession of the party accused, until after the two years had elapsed. Surely the statute ought not to run in favor of any man while he retains all the evidences of his crime in his own possession; and, least of all, in favor of a public officer who continues to defraud the Treasury and conceal the transaction, for the brief term of two years. I would, therefore, recommend such an alteration of the law as will give the injured party and the Government two years after the disclosure of the fraud, or after the accused is out of office, to commence their prosecution.

In connection with this subject, I invite the attention of Congress to a general and minute inquiry into the condition of the Government, with a view to ascertain what offices can be dispensed with, what expenses retrenched, and what improvements may be made in the organization of its various parts, to secure the proper responsibility of public agents, and promote efficiency and justice in all its operations.

The report of the Secretary of War will make you acquainted with the condition of our Army, Fortifications, Arsenal, and Indian Affairs. The proper discipline of the Army, the training and equipment of the Militia, the education bestowed at West Point, and the accumulation of the means of defence, applicable to the Naval force, will tend to prolong the peace we now enjoy, and which every good citizen—more especially those who have felt the miseries of even a successful warfare—must ardently desire to perpetuate.

The returns from the subordinate branches of this service exhibit a regularity and order highly creditable to its character: both officers and soldiers seem imbued with a proper sense of duty, and conform to the restraints of exact discipline with that cheerfulness which becomes the profession of arms. There is need, however, of further legislation, to obviate the inconveniences specified in the report under consideration: to some of which it is proper that I should call your particular attention.

The act of Congress, of the 2d of March, 1821, to reduce and fix the military establishment, remaining unexecuted as it regards the command of one of the regiments of artillery, cannot now be deemed a guide to the Executive in making the proper appointment. An explanatory act, designating the class of officers out of which this grade is to be filled—whether from the military list, as existing prior to the act of 1821, or from it, as it has been fixed by that act—would remove this difficulty. It is also important that the laws regulating the pay and emoluments of officers generally, should be more specific than they now are. Those, for example, in relation to the Paymaster and Surgeon General, assign to them an annual salary of two thousand five hundred dollars; but are silent as to allowances which in certain exigencies of the service may be deemed indispensable to the discharge of their duties. This circumstance has been the authority for extending to them various allowances at different times under former administrations: but no uniform rule has been observed on the subject. Similar inconveniences exist in other cases, in which the construction put upon the laws by the public accountants may operate unequally, produce confusion, and expose officers to the odium of claiming what is not their due.

I recommend to your fostering care, as one of our safest means of national defence, the Military Academy. This institution has already exercised the happiest influence upon the moral and intellectual character of our army; and such of the graduates as, from various causes, may not pursue the profession of arms, will be scarcely less useful as citizens. Their knowledge of the military art will be advantageously employed in the militia service; and, in a measure, secure to that class of troops the advantages which, in this respect, belong to standing armies.

I would also suggest a review of the Pension law, for the purpose of extending its benefits to every Revolutionary soldier who aided in establishing our liberties, and who is unable to maintain himself in comfort. These relics of the War of Independence have strong claim upon their country's gratitude and bounty. The law is defective, in not embracing within its provisions all those who were, during the last war, disabled from supporting themselves by manual labor. Such an amendment would add but little to the amount of pensions, and is called for by the sympathies of the people, as well as by considerations of sound policy. It will be perceived that a large addition to the list of pensioners has been occasioned by an order of the late administration, departing materially from the rules which had previously prevailed. Considering it an act of legislation, I suspended its operations as soon as I was informed that it had commenced. Before this period, however, applications under the new regulations had been preferred, to the number of one hundred and fifty-four: of which on the 27th of March, the date of its revocation, eighty-seven were admitted. For the amount, there was neither estimate nor appropriation; and, besides this deficiency, the regular allowances, according to the rules which have heretofore governed the Department, exceed the estimate of its late secretary by about fifty thousand dollars: for which an appropriation is asked.

Your particular attention is requested to that part of the report of the Secretary of War which relates to the money held in trust for the Seneca tribe of Indians. It will be perceived that, without legislative aid, the Executive cannot obviate the embarrassments occasioned by the diminution of the dividends on that fund; which originally amounted to one hundred thousand dollars, and has recently been invested in United States three per cent. stock.

The condition and ulterior destiny of the Indian tribes within the limits of some of our States, have become objects of much interest and importance. It has long been the policy of Government to introduce among them the arts of civilization, in the hope of gradually reclaiming them from a wandering life. This policy has, however, been coupled with another, wholly incompatible with its success. Professing a desire to civilize and settle them, we have, at the same time, lost no opportunity to purchase their lands, and thrust them further into the wilderness. By this means they have not only been kept in a wandering state, but been led to look upon us as unjust and indifferent to their fate. Thus, though lavish in its expenditure upon the subject, Government has constantly defeated its own policy, and the Indians, in general, receding further and further to the West, have retained their savage habits. A portion, however, of the Southern tribes, having mingled much with the whites, and made some progress in the arts of civilized life, have lately attempted to erect an independent government within the limits of Georgia and Alabama. These States, claiming to be the only sovereigns within their territories, extended their laws over the Indians, which induced the latter to call upon the United States for protection.

Under these circumstances, the question presented was, whether the General Government had a right to sustain those people in their pretensions? The constitution declares, that "no new States shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State," without the consent of its Legislature. If the General Government is not permitted to tolerate the erection of a confederate State within the territory of one of the members of this Union, against her consent, much less could it allow a foreign and independent government to establish itself there. Georgia became a member of the Confederacy which eventuated in our federal union, as a sovereign State, always asserting her claim to certain limits; which, having been originally defined in her colonial charter, and subsequently recognized in the treaty of peace, she has ever since continued to enjoy, except as they have been circumscribed by her own voluntary transfer of a portion of her territory to the United States, in the articles of cession of 1802. Alabama was admitted into the Union on the same footing with the original States, with boundaries which were prescribed by Congress. There is no constitutional, conventional, or legal provision, which allows them less power over the Indians within their borders, than is possessed by Maine or New York. Would the people of Maine permit the Penobscot tribe to erect an Independent Government within their State? and, unless they did, would it not be the duty of the General Government to support them in resisting such a measure? Would the people of New York permit each remnant of the Six Nations within her borders to declare itself an independent people, under the protection of the United States? Could the Indians establish a separate republic on each of their reservations in Ohio? And if they were so disposed, would it be the duty of this Government to protect them in the attempt? If the principle involved in the obvious answer to these questions be abandoned, it will follow that the objects of this Government are reversed, and that it has become a part of its duty to aid in destroying the States which it was established to protect.

Actuated by this view of the subject, I informed the Indians inhabiting parts of Georgia and Alabama, that their attempt to establish an independent government would not be countenanced by the Executive of the United States, and advised them to emigrate beyond the Mississippi, or submit to the laws of those States.

Our conduct towards these people is deeply interesting to our national character. Their present condition, contrasted with what they once were, makes a most powerful appeal to our sympathies. Our ancestors found them the uncontrolled possessors of these vast regions. By persuasion and force they have been made to retire from river to river, and from mountain to mountain, until some of the tribes have become extinct, and others have left but remnants, to preserve, for a while, their once terrible names. Surrounded by the whites, with their arts of civilization, which, by destroying the resources of the savage, doom him to weakness and decay, the fate of the Mohegan, the Narraganset, and the Delaware, is fast overtaking the Choctaw, the Cherokee, and the Creek. That this fate surely awaits them, if they remain within the limits of the States, does not admit of a doubt. Humanity and national honor demand that every effort should be made to avert so great a calamity. It is too late to inquire whether it was just in the United States to include them and their territory within the bounds of new States whose limits they could control. That step cannot be retraced. A State cannot be dismembered by Congress, or restricted in the exercise of her constitutional power. But the people of those States, and of every State, actuated by feelings of justice and regard for our national honor, submit to you the interesting question, whether something cannot be done, consistently with the rights of the States, to preserve this much injured race?

As a means of effecting this end, I suggest, for your consideration, the propriety for setting apart an ample district west of the Mississippi, and without the limits of any State or Territory, now formed, to be guarantied to the Indian tribes, as long as they shall occupy it: each tribe having a distinct control over the portion designated for its use. There they may be secured in the enjoyment of governments of their own choice, subject to no other control from the United States than such as may be necessary to preserve peace on the frontier, and between the several tribes. There the benevolent may endeavor to teach them the arts of civilization; and, by promoting union and harmony among them, to raise up an interesting commonwealth, destined to perpetuate the race, and to attest the humanity and justice of this Government.

This emigration should be voluntary: for it would be as cruel as unjust to compel the aborigines to abandon the graves of their fathers, and seek a home in a distant land. But they should be distinctly informed that, if they remain within the limits of the States, they must be subject to their laws. In return for their obedience, as individuals, they will, without doubt, be protected in the enjoyment of those possessions which they have improved by their industry. But it seems to me visionary to suppose that, in this state of things, claims can be allowed on tracts of country on which they have neither dwelt nor made improvements, merely because they have seen them from the mountain, or passed them in the chase. Submitting to the laws of the States, and receiving, like other citizens, protection in their persons and property, they will, ere long, become merged in the mass of our population.

The accompanying report of the Secretary of the Navy will make you acquainted with the condition and useful employment of that branch of our service during the present year. Constituting, as it does, the best standing security of this country against foreign aggression, it claims the especial attention of Government. In this spirit, the measures which, since the termination of the last war, have been in operation for its gradual enlargement, were adopted; and it should continue to be cherished as the offspring of our national experience. It will be seen, however, that notwithstanding the great solicitude which has been manifested for the perfect organization of this arm, and the liberality of the appropriations which that solicitude has suggested, this object has, in many important respects, not been secured.

In time of peace, we have need of no more ships of war than are requisite to the protection of our commerce. Those not wanted for this object must lie in the harbors, where, without proper covering, they rapidly decay; and even under the best precautions for their preservation, must soon become useless. Such is already the case with many of our finest vessels; which, though unfinished, will now require immense sums of money to be restored to the condition in which they were when committed to their proper element. On this subject there can be but little doubt that our best policy would be, to discontinue the building of ships of the first and second class, and look rather to the possession of ample materials, prepared for the emergencies of war, than to the number of vessels which we can float in a season of peace, as the index of our naval power. Judicious deposits in navy yards, of timber and other materials, fashioned under the hands of skilful workmen, and fitted for prompt application to their various purposes, would enable us, at all times, to construct vessels as fast as they can be manned, and save the heavy expense of repairs, except to such vessels as must be employed in guarding our commerce. The proper points for the establishment of these yards are indicated with so much force, in the report of the Navy Board, that, in recommending it to your attention, I deem it unnecessary to do more than express my hearty concurrence in their views. The yard in this district being already furnished with most of the machinery necessary for ship-building, will be competent to the supply of the two selected by the Board as the best for the concentration of materials; and, from the facility and certainty of communication between them, it will be useless to incur, at those depots, the expense of similar machinery, especially that used in preparing the usual metallic and wooden furniture of vessels.

Another improvement would be effected by dispensing altogether with the Navy Board, as now constituted, and substituting, in its stead, bureaux similar to those already existing in the War Department. Each member of the Board, transferred to the head of a separate bureau, charged with specific duties, would feel, in its highest degree, that whole-some responsibility, which cannot be divided, without a far more than proportionate diminution of its force. Their valuable services would become still more so when separately appropriated to distinct portions of the great interests of the Navy, to the prosperity of which each would be impelled to devote himself, by the strongest motives. Under such an arrangement, every branch of this important service would assume a more simple and precise character: its efficiency would be increased, and scrupulous economy in the expenditure of public money promoted.

I would also recommend that the marine corps be merged in the artillery or infantry, as the best mode of curing the many defects in its organization. But little exceeding in number any of the regiments of infantry, that corps has, besides its Lieutenant Colonel Commandant, five Brevet Lieutenant Colonels, who receive the full pay and emoluments of their brevet rank, without rendering proportionate service. Details for marine service could as well be made from the artillery or infantry, there being no peculiar training requisite for it.

With these improvements, and such others as zealous watchfulness and mature consideration may suggest, there can be little doubt that, under an energetic administration of its affairs, the Navy may soon be made every thing that the nation wishes it to be. Its efficiency in the suppression of piracy in the West India seas, and wherever its squadrons have been employed in securing the interests of the country, will appear from the report of the Secretary, to which I refer you for other interesting details. Among these I would bespeak the attention of Congress for the views presented in relation to the inequality between the Army and Navy, as to the pay of officers. No such inequality should prevail between these brave defenders of their country; and, where it does exist, it is submitted to Congress whether it ought not to be rectified.

The report of the Postmaster General is referred to as exhibiting a highly satisfactory administration of that Department. Abuses have been reformed; increased expedition in the transportation of the mail secured; and its revenue much improved. In a political point of view, this Department is chiefly important as affording the means of diffusing knowledge. It is to the body politic, what the veins and arteries are to the natural, conveying, rapidly and regularly, to the remotest parts of the system, correct information of the operations of the Government, and bringing back to it the wishes and feelings of the people. Through its agency we have secured to ourselves the full enjoyment of the blessings of a free press.

In this general survey of our affairs, a subject of high importance presents itself in the present organization of the Judiciary. A uniform operation of the Federal Government in the different States is certainly desirable; and, existing as they do in the Union, on the basis of perfect equality, each State has a right to expect that the benefits conferred on the citizens of others should be extended to hers.

The Judicial system of the United States exists in all its efficiency in only fifteen members of the Union; to three others, the Circuit Courts, which constitute an important part of that system, have been imperfectly extended; and to the remaining six, altogether denied. The effect has been to withhold from the inhabitants of the latter, the advantages afforded (by the Supreme Court) to their fellow-citizens in other States, in the whole extent of the criminal, and much of the civil, authority of the Federal Judiciary. That this state of things ought to be remedied, if it can be done consistently with the public welfare, is not to be doubted; neither is it to be disguised that the organization of our judicial system is at once a difficult and delicate task. To extend the Circuit Courts equally throughout the different parts of the Union, and, at the same time, to avoid such a multiplication of members as would encumber the Supreme Appellate Tribunal, is the object desired. Perhaps it might be accomplished by dividing the Circuit Judges into two classes, and providing that the Supreme Court should be held by those classes alternately—the Chief Justice always presiding.

If an extension of the Circuit Court system to those States which do not now enjoy its benefits should be determined upon, it would, of course, be necessary to revise the present arrangement of the Circuits; and even if that system should not be enlarged, such a revision is recommended.

A provision for taking the census of the people of the U. States will, to ensure the completion of that work within a convenient time, claim the early attention of Congress.

The great and constant increase of business in the Department of State forced itself, at an early period, upon the attention of the Executive. Thirteen years ago, it was, in Mr. Madison's last message to Congress, made the subject of an earnest recommendation, which has been repeated by both of his successors; and my comparatively limited experience has satisfied me of its justness. It has arisen from many causes, not the least of which is the large addition that has been made to the family of independent nations, and the proportionate extension of our foreign relations. The remedy proposed was the establishment of a Home Department—a measure which does not appear to have met the views of Congress, on account of its supposed tendency to increase, gradually and imperceptibly, the already too strong bias of the Federal system towards the exercise of authority not delegated to it. I am not, therefore, disposed to revive the recommendation; but am not the less impressed with the importance of so organizing that Department, that its Secretary may devote more of his time to our foreign relations. Clearly satisfied that the public good would be promoted by some suitable provision on the subject, I respectfully invite your attention to it.

The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy in a measure involving such important principles, and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberate consideration of the Legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this Bank, are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens; and it must be admitted by all, that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency.

Under these circumstances, if such an institution is deemed essential to the fiscal operations of the Government, I submit to the wisdom of the Legislature, whether a National one, founded upon the credit of the Government, and its revenues, might not be devised, which would avoid all constitutional difficulties, and, at the same time, secure all the advantages to the Government and country that were expected to result from the present Bank.

I cannot close this communication without bringing to your view the just claim of the representatives of Commodore Decatur, his officers and crew, arising from the re-capture of the frigate Philadelphia, under the heavy batteries of Tripoli. Although sensible, as a general rule, of the impropriety of Executive interference, under a Government like ours, where every individual enjoys the right of directly petitioning Congress, yet, viewing this case as one of a very peculiar character, I deem it my duty to recommend it to your favorable consideration. Besides the justice of this claim, as corresponding to those which have been since recognized and satisfied, it is the fruit of a deed of patriotic and chivalrous daring, which infused life and confidence into our infant Navy, and contributed, as much as any exploit in its history, to elevate our national character. Public gratitude, therefore, stamps her seal upon it; and the meed should not be withheld which may hereafter operate as a stimulus to our gallant tars.

I now commend you, fellow-citizens, to the guidance of Almighty God, with a full reliance on His merciful providence for the maintenance of our free institutions; and with an earnest supplication, that, whatever errors it may be my lot to commit, in discharging the arduous duties which have devolved on me, will find a remedy in the harmony and wisdom of your councils.

ANDREW JACKSON.

December 8, 1822.

The Message was read, and, on motion by Mr. ROWAN, it was Ordered, That four thousand five hundred copies of the Message, with one thousand five hundred copies of the documents accompanying it, be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, December 9.

Honors to the Dead.

Mr. ELLIS having announced the death of his colleague, the Honorable THOMAS B. REED, of Mississippi, submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of the Honorable THOMAS B. REED, deceased, late a Senator of this body, from the State of Mississippi, will go into mourning for one month by wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved, That, as an additional evidence of respect to the memory of the Honorable THOMAS B. REED the Senate do now adjourn.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

Interest due to certain States.

The bill providing for the allowance of interest to certain States therein mentioned, on such advances made by them to the United States, during the late war, as have been or may hereafter be refunded to them, with the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary to the bill, were taken up in Committee of the Whole. The amendments, viz: To provide for the payment of interest due to the States of Rhode Island and New Hampshire, were agreed to; and, on motion of Mr. FREDELL, the bill was further amended by inserting the State of North Carolina; and the question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. BENTON expressed some repugnance at voting for the bill, until he was better informed of the consequences which might attend that vote, and how far the accounting officers of the Government might be authorized to go under the bill. Formerly great rigor and exactness were observed in the investigation of claims on the Government before Congress ordered their allowance. It was a good practice, and he should be sorry to see a different and looser mode introduced. For himself, he did not know that the United States owed a debt to a single State, and if the bill proposed to authorize the accounting officers to ascertain the fact of the existence of debt to the States, and allow interest thereon, without other examination, he could not consent to it. He should himself like to see the accounts, whether for advances made in money, or for services rendered, and know whether they were rendered by order or against order, and judge of their validity. At present he was in the dark as to the whole subject of the bill; he had seen no report on it, and knew not if there was any. He desired further information.

Mr. MARKS adverted to certain documents in his possession which would elucidate the principle of the bill, but not anticipating the consideration of the bill to-day, he had not brought the papers to the House with him. He, therefore, moved to lay the bill on the table for the present, but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, who said that the bill did not contemplate the admission of any claims for advances, or the examination of any accounts; there were none to be rendered—they had all been settled and paid—and the bill is for the allowance of interest on those claims which have been settled and paid. Instead of laying the bill on the table, he preferred postponing it to Monday, and making it the order of the day; which motion he made, and it was carried.

[SENATE.]

the day on the bill explanatory of the act to reduce and fix the military peace establishment of the United States, passed March 2, 1821.

The bill is as follows :

"Whereas doubts have arisen in the construction of the act of Congress, passed the second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, entitled "An act to reduce and fix the military peace establishment of the United States," which have hitherto prevented it from being carried into execution, so far as relates to the arrangement of a colonel to the second regiment of Artillery: And whereas it was the true intent and meaning of the said act, that the vacancy aforesaid should be filled by arranging to it one of the colonels in the army of the United States, at the time of the passage thereof: And whereas, in the execution of said act, Daniel Bissell, then a colonel in the line, and a brevet Brigadier General in the army of the United States, was ordered to be discharged as a supernumerary officer, which order, as it affected the said Daniel Bissell, and some other officers, was held by the Senate to be illegal and void: And whereas the President of the United States has since nominated the said Daniel Bissell to be colonel of the second regiment of artillery aforesaid, which nomination the Senate have not acted upon, because they hold the said Colonel and Brevet Brigadier General Daniel Bissell to be in the army, and to need no new appointment: Now, therefore, to put an end to all doubt and disagreement upon this subject, and to enable the President to carry said act of March second, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, into execution :

"Be it enacted, &c. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to fill the vacancy in the second regiment of artillery, by arranging Daniel Bissell thereto."

Mr. BENTON, in support of the passage of the bill, read the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred that part of the President's message to Congress in 1838, which relates to this subject.

Mr. SANFORD moved to expunge the preamble from the bill. He considered it wholly unnecessary, and stated that there was no instance in our Government in which a preamble to a bill was employed as a vehicle of the reasons why the bill itself ought to be passed. It was, he repeated, wholly unusual and unnecessary; and, in the present case, especially unnecessary, since all the reasons why the bill ought to be passed, were explained more at length in various other documents.

Mr. BENTON, in reply, said, that he would be sorry to be the occasion of introducing any innovations into the proceedings of this body; but if it was any innovation, he considered the present instance of sufficient importance to authorize a departure from the usual practice. It was a case, he said, which stood alone, and which, in his opinion, not only justified, but required a preamble. The object of the preamble was to explain the nature and the end of the act itself. The necessity for the preamble in this particular case, was, that the reasons for the act only existed in the secret Executive records of the Senate, and could not be known to the public or the other House unless stated in this way. There was no danger to be apprehended of its growing into precedent, nor of our bills being loaded with unnecessary preambles. He therefore hoped that the motion of the gentleman from New York would not prevail.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that precedents arise, and only arise, from the repetition of particular cases, which increase gradually till at length they become common usage. Thus, if it be acceded to in the present instance, it would be quoted hereafter in support of a repetition of it. He considered it wrong to follow the English practice in this respect, as the reports of our committees, with which all bills are accompanied, supply the place of preambles.

Mr. HOLMES deemed a preamble nothing but an apology for legislation; and for apologies he thought there was no necessity. His chief objection to preambles was, that they rendered legislation complex instead of elucidating it.

Mr. HAYNE said, that in the good olden times, when people were not ashamed to tell the truth, bills were preceded by preambles always. They were used to set forth the object of the bill, and the means by which that object was to be obtained. It now happens that the practice is changed, and preambles have come into disuse because legislative bodies are less candid. So much for precedent, which has led us to dispense with the use of preambles. He knew cases in which it would have been well to have retained the old practice. He knew a case in which a preamble would have been of infinite advantage—he meant the Tariff law. A preamble to that act would have stated its true objects—that it was for the purpose, not of raising revenue, but for the protection of the manufacturing interests. As to the apprehensions of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) he (Mr. H.) would say that there was no danger of its becoming a precedent—on the contrary, the only danger to be dreaded was, that we may be left without a precedent for stating the grounds of our legislation. The gentleman not only objects as to the danger of its becoming a precedent for future action, but he also says that it is not proper to spread our reasons for legislating upon record. This very case, he (Mr. H.) contended, required that the reasons should go with the act. Suffer it to go to the world naked, and what will it appear? Why, that Colonel Bissell is assigned to the command of the second regiment of artillery by an act of Congress. This would seem out of course, and what, he would ask, would be the consequences? Why, that Congress undertakes to fill vacancies in the army by special acts. But this is an extraordinary case, and to prevent the possibility of its being misunderstood, we state the reasons of passing the bill in a preamble to it. Unless these reasons were spread upon record, he would hesitate much whether he should vote for the passage of the bill, as he was not disposed to search for the reasons amongst the public documents of the Senate, or the Executive archives of the Senate. He hoped, therefore, the reasons for this act would go with it, and speak for themselves to all future time. The preamble of a bill, he said, was the key to unlock the motive which induced its passage.

Mr. Foor said that this bill required no key to unlock it. The bill was perfectly simple, and easily understood; it reads, "that the President be, and is hereby, authorized to fill the vacancy in the second regiment of artillery, by arranging Daniel Bissell thereto." As to assigning reasons for the passage of a bill he thought there was no necessity for it. He was opposed to making apologies for our public acts—he would make no apology. As the gentleman from Maryland had well observed, the reports accompanying the bills contain the reasons of our legislation.

Mr. KANE said there was some difficulty with him about this matter. The necessity which gave rise to the bill was a different construction being given to the act of 1821 by the President and the Senate. The President thought that he had not the power to arrange General Bissell to the command of the second regiment of artillery, and the Senate, on the contrary, thought he had the authority to do so. A bill has been formed for the purpose of settling the difficulty. If the bill pass in the proposed form, without the preamble, we call upon the President to sign a bill stating that to be right which he has declared or believed to be wrong; we call upon him to sign against his conviction. As he stated before, the President denies that he has the authority which the bill supposes. He moved to amend the motion of the Senator from New York, by striking out all from the word "artillery" to the words "And whereas," exclusive.

Mr. SMITH said that this very motion showed the impropriety of introducing preambles into bills. The Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HAYNE) considered a preamble necessary to show the intent and meaning of an act; and he said that if a proper preamble had been placed before the Tariff bill, the objects set forth would be widely different from what was there stated. His opinion was, that the preamble was wholly unnecessary; if it prevail in one case it must prevail in all, and the result will be that, instead of discussing bills, we will be employed in the consideration of preambles.

Mr. DICKERSON said he would vote against striking out the preamble in this particular case, though he objected to the general use of it. In reply to the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAYNE) who expressed his regret that a preamble was not introduced into the Tariff bill, Mr. D. read the preamble of the act of 1789, laying duties, which was as follows:

"Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported."

Mr. HAYNE said the gentleman had given the best reason why the practice ought not to be dispensed with. If the real object of the Tariff act of 1828 had been prefixed to it, we could then have gone to the judiciary and tested the constitutionality of that law.

Mr. KANE, with the consent of the Senate, so modified his amendment as to read, "And whereas it was decided by the Senate to be the true intent and meaning," &c.

This amendment was agreed to—ayes 21, noes 15.

The question on striking out the whole preamble was next taken, and negatived—ayes 19, noes 20.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, inquired whether the person referred to in the bill would be entitled to his pay for the time from which he was deranged to the time when he is to be arranged.

Mr. BENTON replied that each officer was obliged to give a certificate of honor that he was employed, and had incurred the usual expenses, during the time for which he claims pay, before he is entitled to any emolument.

The question of engrossing the bill for a third reading being stated,

Mr. BIBB asked the yeas and nays. He said he was equally opposed to the principle of the preamble and the bill. He thought the decision of the President right and this bill wrong. He was also opposed to paying any man a sum of perhaps fifteen thousand dollars, who had rendered no service for it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH moved to lay the bill on the table. He thought the bill could be amended by the insertion of a clause, providing against the payment of this individual for the time he has been out of service.

The motion was agreed to.

Pre-emption Rights.

The bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, was read the third time, and the question was stated on its passage.

Mr. BELL said that this bill, in its operations, would produce this effect: the encouragement of future violation of the laws which regulate our public land system. This bill gives the right of pre-emption to all those who have violated our land laws by entering on the public lands, and now have actual possession of them. It gives the right to those who have thus entered these, to purchase them at the minimum price. It will confer the right on a large portion of those intruders who have entered on those new tracts of land which have been surveyed, but which have not been as yet offered for sale. It will confer the right on those who are in possession of the most eligible portions of land in the new country, and the effect will be, that when those lands are offered at public sale, the intruders who are in possession of them, will deter purchasers from bidding for them. There are many and obvious reasons, (said Mr. B.,) why purchasers who already have lands, will decline interfering with the possessors of these lands when offered for sale, however eligible they may be. Compassion for the situation of these people and their families, will prevent competitors from interfering with them. There are, in fact, many other reasons to convince them of the imprudence of purchasing such tracts of lands over those who have taken possession of them. These intruders then will remain in possession, and this bill gives them the right to enter these lands at the minimum price, although they might be worth four times as much. This bill, besides, allows the purchasers time which is not allowed to others; it, in effect, gives them a credit of one year. If he understood the bill, (Mr. B. said,) its operations would not cease here. If its operations would end here only, the objection he had stated to the bill would still be conclusive with him; but its effect extended farther; it sanctions (said he) an act forbidden by the laws of the United States; it sanctions intruders on the public lands, and it will sanction this as a precedent for future intruders to act likewise. How many will it not tempt to follow the example, thus to give them title to the public lands, at the minimum price, and on a year's credit? He would ask whether this law would not encourage other intruders to enter upon the public lands, when they can purchase them at the minimum price? We cannot, and we will not refuse them the same privilege, when they ask us, which we now propose to grant. Any person who has witnessed the effect of precedents in this body, must see that this precedent will be acted upon hereafter. Thus by holding out this encouragement, the effect will be to induce other intruders to enter upon the public lands, with the hope of finally being allowed to purchase them at the minimum price. This is the natural, the probable, and certain effect of the measure proposed. It would be better to repeal all laws on this subject, and to permit a general scramble, than to pass the present law.

Pre-emption Rights.

Mr. BARTON said he would state briefly the reasons which influenced the committee in reporting the bill. There had been, heretofore, some difficulty with the committee on this subject of pre-emption rights; but he believed no difficulty on that subject existed at present. With respect to the prohibition of settlements on the public lands, contained in the old act of 1807, and alluded to by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. BELLI,) that act did indeed prohibit such intrusions, (and it was proper enough for any government intending to sell the whole of its lands to make such provision,) but the more particular object of that act was to prevent any difficulty in relation to the bature at New Orleans. The act, however, although intended to apply to that particular case, must necessarily have been general in its effects; and for this reason, and because of the many cases of hardship which arose from it, Congress had on various occasions deemed it necessary to depart from the provisions of the act of 1807, and grant pre-emption rights to actual settlers on the public lands. Inasmuch, then, as these various grants, made at different periods, in different sections of the country, together with the operations of the old law above alluded to, created great inequality in the conditions of the various settlers on the public lands, the object of the committee was to destroy that inequality, and place all the new States and Territories on the same footing. So far from its being the settled policy of the Government to prevent intrusions on the public land by others than actual purchasers, the general prohibition of the law of 1807 had been, as he had just observed, departed from in various instances, so that the bad precedent of reward in violation of the law, objected to by the gentleman from New Hampshire, had in fact been often set, and long ago. As to the policy or expediency of the measure recommended by the committee, they were chiefly induced to report the bill in consequence of the operations of the public land system at the present time. If the gentleman from New Hampshire would turn to the documents on the subject, he would find that, for the last thirty years, the sales of the lands had netted to the Government but little more than the minimum price, while the actual settler had paid more; and that result was produced in this manner: among other causes, not necessary to detail, there was a kind of intermediate power interposed between the actual settler and cultivator, and the Government. Speculators formed a combination, and ran up the price of the lands under sale, in some instances, but in a great many more cases, formed combinations to intimidate that class of purchasers who usually till the soil, and bought up large bodies of land for but little more than the minimum price; which they afterwards sold to them at a great profit. On consulting with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and learning that this system of speculation had been carried on to a very great extent, particularly in the southwest, the question presented itself to the committee, whether it would not be the better policy for the Government to give to the actual settler the tract cultivated by him, at the minimum price, than to give it, at the same price, to those who only purchased with a view to ultimate profit; and they had come to the conclusion that it was as much for the interest of the Government as of the cultivator and settler, that this combination of speculators should be disarmed and put down, by thus preferring the occupant. No injury could possibly accrue to the Government: for, if the only object be to put dollars into the Treasury, the actual settler, under the provisions of this bill, would pay as much as the speculator; while, on the other hand, encouragement would be given to a most interesting and meritorious class of our fellow-citizens, the cultivators of the soil.

Mr. NOBLE said that, as the subject had been brought under the consideration of the Senate, he could not remain in silence, especially on account of the expressions uttered by the gentleman from New Hampshire, that it would be better to leave the public lands to a general scramble than to pass this bill. The entering wedge (said Mr. N.) has now been introduced, and the citizens of the new States are to be left at the mercy of the tomahawk and scalping knife. The surveys of the public lands are to be checked in the first place, (alluding to Mr. Foot's proposition,) and now pre-emption is denied to actual settlers; a scramble for the lands is next proposed. The history of the sale of the public lands commenced at the Congress held in New York. These lands were at one time sold at twelve and a half cents per acre, and although the possessors of them have risked their lives in settling them, yet we are told that it would be better to have a general scramble for these lands than to pass the proposed bill. He hoped that we would feel for the people thus situated, and who have risked so much in making the settlements which they ask the privilege of buying. Without money, without clothes, without bread, they have settled this country, and now they are told that the surveys of the land must cease. The partition of these lands was first commenced by forming townships, and now they are narrowed down into eighty acres. But now surveys are to cease, emigration to be checked, the actual settlers to be turned off; the plough and the sickle are to be broken into pieces. We (said Mr. N.) will resist this attempt. It is said that the people are violators of the public land laws, and would, if this bill were passed, injure the sale of these lands, by deterring purchasers from bidding for them. He, (Mr. N.,) on the contrary, asserted that, instead of diminishing, they augmented the value of these lands.

The bill was then postponed to Tuesday week.

Massachusetts Claim.

Mr. SILSBEE rose and said, that, agreeably to notice given yesterday, he was about to ask leave to introduce a bill, entitled "A bill to authorize the payment of the claims of the State of Massachusetts for certain militia services during the late war;" but as this claim, which had been so long in Congress, had never been before this branch of it, he was induced to accompany its introduction here by a remark or two in relation to it. The subject of this claim, he said, had been embraced in every annual message of the Chief Magistrate of Massachusetts, and had occupied a portion of the attention of every successive Legislature of that State, for some time past; that this consideration, in connection with the interest and the feelings of the people of Massachusetts upon the subject, made it the duty of their Representatives here to press it upon the early consideration of the Senate, without waiting longer for the action of the other House upon it. Massachusetts, one of the oldest States of the Union, had presented a claim upon the Government of the United States, for military expenditures in the course of the late war, to an amount exceeding eight hundred thousand dollars. This claim had been considered an equitable one, not only by that administration of the Government of Massachusetts under which it originated, but by every succeeding administration of the State, from that period of time to the present one, and after twelve or thirteen years' application for a remuneration of the claim, a bill was reported, about two years ago, for two hundred and forty odd thousand dollars, or a little over one-quarter of its amount. This bill (said Mr. S.) was accompanied by a report from the most scrutinizing officer of the War Department, stating this amount, at least, to be due, according to the most rigid principles which had ever been adopted in the adjustment of any similar claim whatever; and although nearly or quite two years had elapsed since that report was made, it has not been acted upon; yet, while this claim of Massachusetts had been pending before Congress, most, if not all, those of a similar character, from other States, had, he believed, been settled. Massachusetts (said Mr. S.) asks and expects the same measure of justice to be rendered to her which has been accorded to those other States; and she asks also, and asks earnestly, for a decision upon her claim. It has, therefore, in the opinion of her delegation, become their duty to urge it to a settlement, and to express their desire that an early report and decision may be had upon it in the Senate. With this explanation, he asked leave to introduce the bill.

The leave was granted, and the bill was read and ordered to a second reading.

*Mr. Foot's Resolution to Inquire into the Expediency of Suspending the Sales of the Public Lands.**

Mr. HAYNE said, I have not risen, Mr. President, for the purpose of discussing the propriety

* This resolution was, in itself, but a simple proposed inquiry into the expediency of a temporary suspension of the sales of the public lands, and as such inquiry presented but a narrow field of discussion and but transient topics of debate. But it was soon made to take another turn, and to develop a topic of great and abiding interest—the doctrine of nullification! and its sequence—the dissolution of the

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Public Lands.

[SENATE.]

of instituting the inquiry recommended by the resolution, but to offer a few remarks on another and much more important question, to which gentlemen have alluded in the course of this debate—I mean the policy which ought to be pursued in relation to the public lands. The object of the remarks I am about to offer is merely to call public attention to the question, to throw out a few crude and undigested thoughts, as food for reflection, in order to prepare the public mind for the adoption, at no distant day, of some fixed and settled policy in relation to the public lands. I believe that, out of the Western country, there is no subject in the whole range of our legislation less understood, and in relation to which there exists so many errors, and such unhappy prejudices and misconceptions.

There may be said to be two great parties in this country, who entertain very opposite opinions in relation to the character of the policy which the Government has heretofore pursued, in relation to the public lands, as well as to that which ought, hereafter, to be pursued. I propose, very briefly, to examine these opinions, and to throw out for consideration a few ideas in connection with them. Adverting first, to the past policy of the Government, we find that one party, embracing a very large portion, perhaps at this time a majority of the people of the United States, in all quarters of the Union, entertain the opinion, that, in the settlement of the new States and the disposition of the public lands, Congress has pursued not only a highly just and liberal course, but one of extraordinary kindness and indulgence. We are regarded as having acted towards the new States in the spirit of parental weakness, granting to froward children, not only every thing that was reasonable and proper, but actually robbing ourselves of our property to gratify their insatiable desires. While the other party, embracing the entire West, insist that we have treated them, from the beginning, not like heirs of the estate, but in the spirit of a hard task-master, resolved to promote our selfish interests from the fruit of their labor. Now, sir, it is not my present purpose to investigate all the grounds on which these opposite opinions rest; I shall content myself with noticing one or two particulars, in relation to which it has long appeared to me, that the West have had some cause for complaint. I notice them now, not for the purpose of aggravating the spirit of discontent in relation to this subject, which is known to exist in that quarter—for I do not know that my voice will ever reach them—but to assist in bringing others to what I believe to be a just sense of the past policy of the Government in relation to this matter. In the creation and settlement of the new States, the plan has been invariably pursued, of selling out, from time to time, certain portions of the public lands, for the highest price that could possibly be obtained for them in open market, and, until a few years past, on long credits. In this respect, a marked difference is observable between our policy and that of every other nation that has ever attempted to establish colonies or to create new States. Without pausing to examine the course pursued in this respect at earlier periods in the history of the world, I will come directly to the measures adopted in the first settlement of the new world, and will confine my observations entirely to North America. The English, the French, and the Spaniards, have successively planted their colonies here, and have all adopted the same policy, which, from the very beginning of the world, had always been found necessary in the settlement of new countries, viz: A free grant of lands, "without money and without price." We all know that the British colonies, at their first settlement here, (whether deriving title directly from the crown or the lords proprietors,) received grants for considerations merely nominal.

The payment of "a penny," or a "pepper corn," was the stipulated price which our fathers along the whole Atlantic coast, now composing the old thirteen States, paid for their lands, and even when conditions, seemingly more substantial, were annexed to the grants; such for instance as "settlement and cultivation." These were considered as substantially complied with, by the cutting down a few trees and erecting a log cabin—the work of only a few days. Even these conditions very Union at the will of any one State. Mr. Webster and Mr. Hayne (with whom it began) were the prominent speakers on this new and startling topic; and, what was said upon it by themselves and others, is all that retains a surviving interest at this day, or gave celebrity to the debate at the time, and is the only part of it which comes within the scope of this abridgment. Mr. Hayne, in opposing Mr. Foot's resolution, took occasion to go into the consideration of the future disposition of the public lands, suggesting their transfer on easy terms to the new States in which they lie and for the benefit of settlers and cultivators, and deprecating their sale for money, either to accumulate in the Treasury, or to be divided among the States, as leading to corruption and consolidation. Mr. Webster, in reply, took up this point in Mr. Hayne's speech, and argued that consolidation was not the danger which threatened these States, but the contrary—Disunion! and referred to language and proceedings in South Carolina, unwise in their import, and tending to this dire extremity. With equal decorum and justice, (for there was nothing to implicate Mr. Hayne in any of this language or conduct,) Mr. Webster formally exonerated him from all complicity in the supposed design. But he implicated others, and that quite distinctly—friends of Mr. Hayne—some of whom were absent, and unconscious of what was said; and one of whom was present, and bound to hear all that was said, and to be silent—his position forbidding him to engage in Senatorial discussion—(Mr. Calhoun, Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.) The generous spirit of Mr. Hayne came to the defence of friends who could not speak for themselves. He spoke for them; and that brought on the great debate on Nullification and Disunion—of such absorbing interest at the time, and to which subsequent events have lent a great additional emphasis.

soon came to be considered as merely nominal, and were never required to be pursued, in order to vest in the grantee the fee simple of the soil. Such was the system under which this country was originally settled, and under which the thirteen colonies flourished and grew up to that early and vigorous manhood, which enabled them in a few years to achieve their independence; and I beg gentlemen to recollect, and note the fact, that, while they paid substantially nothing to the mother country, the whole profits of their industry were suffered to remain in their own hands. Now, what, let us inquire, was the reason which has induced all nations to adopt this system in the settlement of new countries? Can it be any other than this: that it affords the only certain means of building up in a wilderness, great and prosperous communities? Was not that policy founded on the universal belief, that the conquest of a new country, the driving out "the savage beasts and still more savage men," cutting down and subduing the forest, and encountering all the hardships and privations necessarily incident to the conversion of the wilderness into cultivated fields, was worth the fee simple of the soil? And was it not believed that the mother country found ample remuneration for the value of the land so granted in the additions to her power and the new sources of commerce and of wealth, furnished by prosperous and populous States? Now, sir, I submit to the candid consideration of gentlemen, whether the policy so diametrically opposite to this, which has been invariably pursued by the United States towards the new States in the West, has been quite so just and liberal, as we have been accustomed to believe. Certain it is, that the British colonies to the north of us, and the Spanish and French to the south and west, have been fostered and reared up under a very different system. Lands, which had been for fifty or a hundred years open to every settler, without any charge beyond the expense of the survey, were, the moment they fell into the hands of the United States, held up for sale at the highest price that a public auction, at the most favorable seasons, and not unfrequently a spirit of the wildest competition, could produce, with a limitation that they should never be sold below a certain minimum price; thus making it, as it would seem, the cardinal point of our policy, not to settle the country, and facilitate the formation of new States, but to fill our coffers by coining our lands into gold.

In coming to the consideration of the next great question, what ought to be the future policy of the Government in relation to the public lands? we find the most opposite and irreconcilable opinions between the two parties which I have before described. On the one side it is contended that the public land ought to be reserved as a permanent fund for revenue, and future distribution among the States; while, on the other, it is insisted that the whole of these lands of right belong to, and ought to be relinquished to, the States in which they lie. I shall proceed to throw out some ideas in relation to the proposed policy, that the public lands ought to be reserved for these purposes. It may be a question, Mr. President, how far it is possible to convert the public lands into a great source of revenue. Certain it is, that all the efforts heretofore made, for this purpose, have most signally failed. The harshness, if not injustice of the proceeding, puts those upon whom it is to operate upon the alert, to contrive methods of evading and counteracting our policy, and hundreds of schemes, in the shape of appropriations of lands for roads, canals, and schools, grants to actual settlers, &c., are resorted to for the purpose of controlling our operations. But, sir, let us take it for granted that we will be able, hereafter, to resist these applications, and to reserve the whole of your lands, for fifty or for a hundred years, or for all time to come, to furnish a great fund for permanent revenue, is it desirable that we should do so? Will it promote the welfare of the United States to have at our disposal a permanent treasury, not drawn from the pockets of the people, but to be derived from a source independent of them? Would it be safe to confide such a treasury to the keeping of our national rulers? to expose them to the temptations inseparable from the direction and control of a fund which might be enlarged or diminished almost at pleasure, without imposing burthens upon the people? Sir, I may be singular—perhaps I stand alone here in the opinion, but it is one I have long entertained, that one of the greatest safeguards of liberty is a jealous watchfulness on the part of the people, over the collection and expenditure of the public money—a watchfulness that can only be secured where the money is drawn by taxation directly from the pockets of the people. Every scheme or contrivance by which rulers are able to procure the command of money by means unknown to, unseen or unfelt by, the people, destroys this security. Even the revenue system of this country, by which the whole of our pecuniary resources are derived from indirect taxation, from duties upon imports, has done much to weaken the responsibility of our federal rulers to the people, and has made them, in some measure, careless of their rights, and regardless of the high trust committed to their care. Can any man believe, sir, that, if twenty-three millions per annum were now levied by direct taxation, or by an apportionment of the same among the States, instead of being raised by an indirect tax, of the severe effect of which few are aware, that the waste and extravagance, the unauthorized imposition of duties, and appropriations of money for unconstitutional objects, would have been tolerated for a single year? My life upon it, sir, they would not. I distrust, therefore, sir, the policy of creating a great permanent national treasury, whether to be derived from public lands or from any other source. If I had, sir, the powers of a magician, and could, by a wave of my hand, convert this capitol into gold for such a purpose, I would not do it. If I could, by a mere act of my will, put at the disposal of the Federal Government any amount of treasure which I might think proper to name, I should limit the amount to the means necessary for the legitimate purposes of the Government. Sir, an immense national treasury would be a fund for corruption. It would enable Congress and the Executive to exercise a control over States, as well as over great interests in the country, nay, even over corporations and individuals—utterly destructive of the purity, and fatal to the duration of our institutions. It would be equally fatal to the sovereignty and independence of the States. Sir, I am one of those who believe that the very life of our system is the independence of the States, and that there is no evil more to be deprecated than the consolidation of this Government. It is only by a strict adherence to the limitations imposed by the constitution on the Federal Government, that this system works well, and can answer the great ends for which it was instituted. I am opposed, therefore, in any shape, to all unnecessary extension of the powers, or the influence of the Legislature or Executive of the Union over the States, or the people of the States; and, most of all, I am opposed to those partial distributions of favors, whether by legislation or appropriation, which has a direct and powerful tendency to spread corruption through the land; to create an abject spirit of dependence; to sow the seeds of dissolution; to produce jealousy among the different portions of the Union, and finally to sap the very foundations of the Government itself.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Public Lands.

Sir, there is another scheme in relation to the public lands, which, as it addresses itself to the interested and selfish feelings of our nature, will doubtless find many advocates. I mean the distribution of the public lands among the States, according to some ratio hereafter to be settled. Sir, this system of distribution is, in all its shapes, liable to many and powerful objections. I will not go into them at this time, because the subject has recently undergone a thorough discussion in the other House, and because, from present indications, we shall shortly have up the subject here. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

What, then, (asked Mr. H.,) is our true policy on this important subject? I do not profess to have formed any fixed or settled opinions in relation to it. The time has not yet arrived when that question must be decided; and I must reserve for further lights, and more mature reflection, the formation of a final judgment. The public debt must be first paid. For this, these lands have been solemnly pledged to the public creditors. This done, which, if there be no interference with the Sinking Fund, will be effected in three or four years, the question will then be fairly open, to be disposed of as Congress and the country may think just and proper. Without attempting to indicate precisely what our policy ought then to be, I will, in the same spirit which has induced me to throw out the desultory thoughts which I have now presented to the Senate, suggest for consideration, whether it will not be sound policy, and true wisdom, to adopt a system of measures looking to the final relinquishment of these lands on the part of the United States, to the States in which they lie, on such terms and conditions as may fully indemnify us for the cost of the original purchase, and all the trouble and expense to which we may have been put on their account. Giving up the plan of using these lands forever as a fund either for revenue or distribution, ceasing to hug them as a great treasure, renouncing the idea of administering them with a view to regulate and control the industry and population of the States, or of keeping in subjection and dependence the States, or the people of any portion of the Union, the task will be comparatively easy of striking out a plan for the final adjustment of the land question on just and equitable principles. Perhaps, sir, the lands ought not to be entirely relinquished to any State until she shall have made considerable advances in population and settlement. Ohio has probably already reached that condition. The relinquishment may be made by a sale to the State, at a fixed price, which I will not say should be nominal; but certainly I should not be disposed to fix the amount so high as to keep the States for any length of time in debt to the United States. In short, our whole policy in relation to the public lands may perhaps be summed up in the declaration with which I set out, that they ought not to be kept and retained forever as a great treasure, but that they should be administered chiefly with a view to the creation, within reasonable periods, of great and flourishing communities, to be formed into free and independent States; to be vested in due season with the control of all the lands within their respective limits.

WEDNESDAY, January 20.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Foot, which was the subject of discussion yesterday.

Mr. WEBSTER said: I now proceed, sir, to some of the opinions expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina. Two or three topics were touched by him, in regard to which he expressed sentiments in which I do not at all concur.

In the first place, sir, the honorable gentleman spoke of the whole course and policy of the Government towards those who have purchased and settled the public lands, and seemed to think this policy wrong. He held it to have been from the first, hard and rigorous; he was of opinion that the United States had acted towards those who had subdued the Western wilderness, in the spirit of a step-mother; that the public domain had been improperly regarded as a source of revenue; and that we had rigidly compelled payment for that which ought to have been given away. He said we ought to have followed the analogy of other Governments, which had acted on a much more liberal system than ours, in planting colonies. He dwelt particularly upon the settlement of America by colonists from Europe; and reminded us that their Governments had not exacted from these colonists payment for the soil; with them, he said, it had been thought that the conquest of the wilderness was, itself, an equivalent for the soil; and he lamented that we had not followed the example, and pursued the same liberal course towards our own emigrants to the West.

Now, sir, I deny altogether, that there has been any thing harsh or severe in the policy of the Government towards the new States of the West. On the contrary, I maintain that it has uniformly pursued towards those States, a liberal and enlightened system, such as its own duty allowed and required, and such as their interests and welfare demanded. The Government has been no step-mother to the new States; she has not been careless of their interests, nor deaf to their requests; but from the first moment, when the territories which now form those States, were ceded to the Union, down to the time in which I am now speaking, it has been the invariable object of the Government to dispose of the soil, according to the true spirit of the obligation under which it received it; to hasten its settlement and cultivation, as far and as fast as practicable, and to rear the new communities into equal and independent States, at the earliest moment of their being able, by their numbers, to form a regular government.

I do not admit, sir, that the analogy to which the gentleman refers is just, or that the cases are at all similar. There is no resemblance between the cases upon which a statesman can found an argument. The original North American colonists either fled from Europe, like our New England ancestors, to avoid persecution, or came hither at their own charges, and often at the ruin of their fortunes, as private adventurers. Generally speaking, they derived neither succor nor protection from their governments at home. Wide, indeed, is the difference between those cases and ours. From the very origin of the Government, these Western lands, and the just protection of those who had settled or should settle on them, have been the leading objects in our policy, and have led to expenditures, both of blood and treasure, not inconsiderable; not indeed exceeding the importance of the object, and not yielded grudgingly or reluctantly certainly; but yet not inconsiderable, though necessary sacrifices, made for high proper ends. The Indian title has been extinguished at the expense of many millions. Is that nothing? There is still a much more material consideration. These colonies, if we are to call them so, in passing the Alleghany, did not pass beyond the care and protection of their own Government. Wherever they went, the public arm was still stretched over them. A parental Government at home was still ever mindful of their condition, and their wants; and nothing was spared which a just sense of their necessities required. Is it forgotten that it was one of the most arduous duties of the Government, in its earliest years, to defend the frontiers against the Northwestern Indians? Are the sufferings and misfortunes under Harmer and St. Clair not worthy to be remembered? Do the occurrences connected with these military efforts show an unfeeling neglect of Western interests? And here, sir, what becomes of the gentleman's analogy? What English armies accompanied our ancestors to clear the forests of a barbarous foe? What treasures of the exchequer were expended in buying up the original title to the soil? What governmental arm held its agis over our fathers' heads, as they pioneered their way in the wilderness? Sir, it was not till General Wayne's victory in 1794, that it could be said we had conquered the savages. It was not till that period that the Government could have considered itself as having established an entire ability to protect those who should undertake the conquest of the wilderness. And here, sir, at the epoch of 1794, let us pause, and survey the scene. It is now thirty-five years since that scene actually existed. Let us, sir, look back, and behold it. Over all that is now Ohio, there then stretched one vast wilderness, unbroken, except by two small spots of civilized culture, the one at Marietta, and the other at Cincinnati. At these little openings, hardly each a pin's point upon the map, the arm of the frontiersman had levelled the forest, and let in the sun. These little patches of earth, and themselves almost shadowed by the overhanging boughs of that wilderness which had stood and perpetuated itself, from century to century, ever since the creation, were all that had then been rendered verdant by the hand of man. In an extent of hundreds and thousands of square miles, no other surface of smiling green attested the presence of civilization. The hunter's path crossed mighty rivers, flowing in solitary grandeur, whose sources lay in remote and unknown regions of the wilderness. It struck, upon the north, on a vast inland sea, over which the wintry tempests raged as on the ocean; all around was bare creation. It was a fresh, untouched, unbounded, magnificent wilderness! And, sir, what is it now? Is it imagination only, or can it possibly be fact, that presents such a change, as surprises and astonishes us, when we turn our eyes to what Ohio now is? Is it a reality, or a dream, that, in so short a period even as thirty-five years, there has sprung up, on the same surface, an independent State, with a million of people? A million of inhabitants! an amount of population greater than that of all the cantons of Switzerland; equal to one-third of all the people of the United States, when they undertook to accomplish their independence. This new member of the republic has already left far behind her a majority of the old States. She is now by the side of Virginia and Pennsylvania; and in point of numbers, will shortly admit no equal but New York herself.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

But there was another observation of the honorable member, which, I confess, did not a little surprise me. As a reason for wishing to get rid of the public lands as soon as we could, and as we might, the honorable gentleman said, he wanted no permanent sources of income. He wished to see the time when the Government should not possess a shilling of permanent revenue. If he could speak a magical word, and by that word convert the whole capitol into gold, the word should not be spoken. The administration of a fixed revenue, (he said,) only consolidates the Government, and corrupts the people! Sir, I confess I heard these sentiments uttered on this floor not without deep regret and pain.

I am aware that these, and similar opinions, are espoused by certain persons out of the capitol, and out of this Government; but I did not expect so soon to find them here. Consolidation!—that perpetual cry, both of terror and delusion—consolidation! Sir, when gentlemen speak of the effects of a common fund, belonging to all the States, as having a tendency to consolidation, what do they mean? Do they mean, or can they mean, any thing more than that the Union of the States will be strengthened, by whatever continues or furnishes inducements to the people of the States to hold together? If they mean merely this, then, no doubt, the public lands as well as every thing else in which we have a common interest, tends to consolidation; and to this species of consolidation every true American ought to be attached; it is neither more nor less than strengthening the Union itself. This is the sense in which the framers of the constitution use the word consolidation; and in which sense I adopt and cherish it. They tell us, in the letter submitting the constitution to the consideration of the country, that, "in all our deliberations on this subject, we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union—in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety; perhaps our national existence. This important consideration, seriously and deeply impressed on our minds, led each State in the convention to be less rigid, on points of inferior magnitude, than might have been otherwise expected."

This, sir, is General Washington's consolidation. This is the true constitutional consolidation. I wish to see no new powers drawn to the General Government; but I confess I rejoice in whatever tends to strengthen the bond that unites us, and encourages the hope that our Union may be perpetual. And, therefore, I cannot but feel regret at the expression of such opinions as the gentleman has avowed; because I think their obvious tendency is to weaken the bond of our connection. I know that there are some persons in the part of the country from which the honorable member comes, who habitually speak of the Union in terms of indifference, or even of disparagement. The honorable member himself is not, I trust, and can never be, one of these. They significantly declare, that it is time to calculate the value of the Union; and their aim seems to be to enumerate, and to magnify all the evils, real and imaginary, which the Government under the Union produces.

The tendency of all these ideas and sentiments is obviously to bring the Union into discussion, as a mere question of present and temporary expediency; nothing more than a mere matter of profit and loss. The Union to be preserved, while it suits local and temporary purposes to preserve it; and to be sundered whenever it shall be found to thwart such purposes. Union, of itself, is considered by the disciples of this school as hardly a good. It is only regarded as a possible means of good; or, on the other hand, as a possible means of evil. They cherish no deep and fixed regard for it, flowing from a thorough conviction of its absolute and vital necessity to our welfare. Sir, I deprecate and deplore this tone of thinking and acting. I deem far otherwise of the Union of the States; and so did the framers of the constitution themselves. What they said I believe; fully and sincerely believe, that the Union of the States is essential to the prosperity and safety of the States. I am a Unionist, and in this sense a National Republican. I would strengthen the ties that hold us together. Far, indeed, in my wishes, very far distant be the day, when our associated and fraternal stripes shall be severed asunder, and when that happy constellation under which we have risen to so much renown, shall be broken up, and be seen sinking, star after star, into obscurity and night!

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

[The following are the remarks of Mr. HAYNE as delivered on Thursday and to-day.]

Mr. HAYNE began by saying, that when he took occasion, two days ago, to throw out some ideas with respect to the policy of the Government in relation to the public lands, nothing certainly could have been further from his thoughts than that he should be compelled again to throw himself upon the indulgence of the Senate. Little did I expect, said Mr. H., to be called upon to meet such an argument as was yesterday urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER.) Sir, I questioned no man's opinions; I impeached no man's motives; I charged no party, or State, or section of country, with hostility to any other; but ventured, I thought in a becoming spirit, to put forth my own sentiments in relation to a great national question of public policy. Such was my course.

The Senator from Massachusetts tells us that the tariff is not an Eastern measure, and treats it as if the East had no interest in it. The Senator from Missouri insists it is not a Western measure, and that it has done no good to the West. The South comes in, and in the most earnest manner represents to you, that this measure, which we are told "is of no value to the East or West," is "utterly destructive of our interests." We represent to you, that it has spread ruin and devastation through the land, and prostrated our hopes in the dust. We solemnly declare that we believe the system to be wholly unconstitutional, and a violation of the compact between the States and the Union, and our brethren turn a deaf ear to our complaints, and refuse to relieve us from a system "which not enriches them, but makes us poor indeed." Good God! has it come to this? Do gentlemen hold the feelings and wishes of their brethren at so cheap a rate, that they refuse to gratify them at so small a price? Do gentlemen value so lightly the peace and harmony of the country, that they will not yield a measure of this description, to the affectionate entreaties and earnest remonstrances of their friends? Do gentlemen estimate the value of the Union at so low a price, that they will not even make one effort to bind the States together with the cords of affection? And has it come to this? Is this the spirit in which this Government is to be administered? If so, let me tell gentlemen the seeds of dissolution are already sown, and our children will reap the bitter fruit.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) while he exonerates me personally from the charge, intimates that there is a party in the country who are looking to disunion. Sir, if the gentleman had stopped there, the accusation would "have passed by me as the idle wind which I regard not." But, when he goes on to give to his accusation a local habitation and a name, by quoting the expression of a distinguished citizen of South Carolina, (Dr. Cooper,) "that it was time for the South to calculate the value of the Union," and, in the language of the bitterest sarcasm, adds, "surely then the Union cannot last longer than July, 1851," it is impossible to mistake either the allusion or the object of the gentleman. Now I call upon every one who hears me, to bear witness that this controversy is not of my seeking. The Senate will do me the justice to remember, that, at the time this unprovoked and uncalled-for attack was made upon the South, not one word had been uttered by me in disparagement of New England. nor had I made the most distant allusion, either to the Senator from Massachusetts, or the State he represents. But, sir, that gentleman has thought proper, for purposes best known to himself, to strike the South through me, the most unworthy of her servants. He has crossed the border, he has invaded the State of South Carolina, is making war upon her citizens, and endeavoring to overthrow her principles and her institutions. Sir, when the gentleman provokes me to such a conflict, I meet him at the threshold. I will struggle while I have life, for our altars and our firesides, and if God gives me strength, I will drive back the invader discomfited. Nor shall I stop there. If the gentleman provokes the war, he shall have war. Sir, I will not stop at the border; I will carry the war into the enemy's territory, and not consent to lay down my arms, until I shall have obtained "indemnity for the past, and security for the future." It is with unfeigned reluctance that I enter upon the performance of this part of my duty. I shrink almost instinctively from a course, however necessary, which may have a tendency to excite sectional feelings, and sectional jealousies. But, sir, the task has been forced upon me, and I proceed right onward to the performance of my duty; be the consequences what they may, the responsibility is with those who have imposed upon me this necessity. The Senator from Massachusetts has thought proper to cast the first stone, and if he shall find, according to a homely adage, "that he lives in a glass house," on his head be the consequences. The gentleman has made a great flourish about his fidelity to Massachusetts. I shall make no professions of zeal for the interests and honor of South Carolina—of that my constituents shall judge. If there be one State in this Union (and I say it not in a boastful spirit) that may challenge comparison with any other for a uniform, zealous, ardent, and uncalculating devotion to the Union, that State is South Carolina. Sir, from the very commencement of the revolution, up to this hour, there is no sacrifice, however great, she has not cheerfully made; no service she has ever hesitated to perform. She has adhered to you in your prosperity, but in your adversity she has clung to you with more than filial affection. No matter what was the condition of her domestic affairs, though deprived of her resources, divided by parties, or surrounded by difficulties, the call of the country has been to her as the voice of God. Domestic discord ceased at the sound—every man became at once reconciled to his brethren, and the sons of Carolina were all seen crowding together to the temple, bringing their gifts to the altar of their common country. What, sir, was the conduct of the South during the revolution? Sir, I honor New England for her conduct in that glorious struggle. But great as is the praise which belongs to her, I think at least equal honor is due to the South. They espoused the quarrel of their brethren with a generous zeal, which did not suffer them to stop to calculate their interest in the dispute. Favorites of the mother country, possessed of neither ships nor seamen to create commercial rivalry, they might have found in their situation a guarantee that their trade would be forever fostered and protected by Great Britain. But trampling on all considerations, either of interest or of safety, they rushed into the conflict, and, fighting for principle, perilled all in the sacred cause of freedom. Never was there exhibited, in the history of the world, higher examples of noble daring, dreadful suffering, and heroic endurance, than by the whigs of Carolina, during that revolution. The whole State, from the mountains to the sea, was overrun by an overwhelming force of the enemy. The fruits of industry perished on the spot where they were produced, or were consumed by the foe. The "plains of Carolina" drank up the most precious blood of her citizens! Black and smoking ruins marked the places which had been the habitations of her children! Driven from their homes, into the gloomy and almost impenetrable swamps, even there the spirit of liberty survived, and South Carolina (sustained by the example of her Sumters and her Marions) proved by her conduct, that, though her soil might be overrun, the spirit of her people was invincible.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in denouncing what he is pleased to call the Carolina doctrine, has attempted to throw ridicule upon the idea that a State has any constitutional remedy, by the exercise of its sovereign authority, against "a gross, palpable, and deliberate violation of the constitution." He calls it "an idle" or "a ridiculous notion," or something to that effect, and added, it would make the Union "a mere rope of sand." Now, sir, as the gentleman has not condescended to enter into any examination of the question, and has been satisfied with throwing the weight of his authority into the scale, I do not deem it necessary to do more than to throw into the opposite scale the authority on which South Carolina relies, and there, for the present, I am perfectly willing to leave the controversy. The South Carolina doctrine, that is to say, the doctrine contained in an exposition reported by a committee of the Legislature in December, 1823, and published by their authority, is the good old Republican doctrine of '98; the doctrine of the celebrated "Virginia Resolutions" of that year, and of "Madison's Report" of '99. It will be recollected that the Legislature of Virginia, in December, '98, took into consideration the alien and sedition laws, then considered by all Republicans as a gross violation of the Constitution of the United States, and on that day passed, among others, the following resolution:

"The General Assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the Federal Government, as resulting from the compact to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact, and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."

In addition to these resolutions, the General Assembly of Virginia "appealed to the other States, in the confidence that they would concur with that Commonwealth that the acts aforesaid [the alien and sedition laws] are unconstitutional, and that the necessary and proper measures would be taken by each for co-operating with Virginia in maintaining unimpaired the authorities, rights, and liberties, reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

The Legislatures of several of the New England States having, contrary to the expectation of the Legislature of Virginia, expressed their dissent from these doctrines, the subject came up again for consideration, during the session of 1799, 1800, when it was referred to a Select Committee, by whom was made that celebrated report which is familiarly known as "Madison's Report," and which deserves to last as long as the constitution itself. In that report, which was subsequently adopted by the Legislature, the whole subject was deliberately re-examined, and the objections urged against the Virginia doctrines carefully considered. The result was, that the Legislature of Virginia re-affirmed all the principles laid down in the resolutions of 1798, and issued to the world that admirable report which has stamped the character of Mr. Madison as the preserver of that constitution which he had contributed so largely to create and establish. I will here quote, from Mr. Madison's report, one or two passages which bear more immediately on the point in controversy:

"The resolution, having taken this view of the federal compact, proceeds to infer 'that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States, who are parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them.'"

"It appears to your committee to be a plain principle, founded on common sense, illustrated by common practice, and essential to the nature of compacts, that, where resort can be had to no tribunal superior to the authority of the parties, the parties themselves must be the rightful judges, in the last resort, whether the bargain made, has been pursued or violated. The Constitution of the United States was formed by the sanction of the States, given by each, in its sovereign capacity. It adds to the stability and dignity, as well as to the authority of the constitution, that it rests on this legitimate and solid foundation. The States, then, being the parties to the constitutional compact, and in their sovereign capacity, it follows, of necessity, that there can be no tribunal, above their authority, to decide, in the last resort, whether the compact made by them be violated; and, consequently, that, as the parties to it, they must, themselves, decide in the last resort, such questions as may be of sufficient magnitude to require their interposition."

"The resolution has guarded against any misapprehension of its object, by expressly requiring, for such an interposition, 'the case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous breach of the constitution, by the exercise of powers not granted by it.' It must be a case, not of a light and transient nature, but of a nature dangerous to the great purposes for which the constitution was established."

"But the resolution has done more than guard against misconstruction, by expressly referring to cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous nature. It specifies the object of the interposition, which it contemplates to be, solely, that of arresting the progress of the evil of usurpation, and of maintaining the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to the States, as parties to the constitution."

"From this view of the resolution, it would seem inconceivable that it can incur any just disapprobation from those who, laying aside all momentary impressions, and recollecting the genuine source and object of the federal constitution, shall candidly and accurately interpret the meaning of the General Assembly. If the deliberate exercise of dangerous powers, palpably withheld by the constitution, could not justify the parties to it in interposing, even so far as to arrest the progress of the evil, and thereby to preserve the constitution itself, as well as to provide for the safety of the parties to it, there would be an end to all relief from usurped power, and a direct subversion of the rights specified or recognized under all the State constitutions, as well as a plain denial of the fundamental principles on which our independence itself was declared."

But, sir, our authorities do not stop here. The State of Kentucky responded to Virginia, and, on the 10th of November, 1798, adopted those celebrated resolutions, well known to have been penned by the author of the Declaration of American Independence. In those resolutions, the Legislature of Kentucky declare "that the Government created by this compact was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among parties having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions, as of the mode and measure of redress."

At the ensuing session of the Legislature, the subject was re-examined, and, on the 14th of November, 1799, the resolutions of the preceding year were deliberately re-affirmed, and it was, among other things, solemnly declared, "that, if those who administer the General Government be permitted to transgress the limits fixed by that compact, by a total disregard to the special delegations of power therein contained, an annihilation of the State Governments, and the erection, upon their ruins, of a General consolidated Government, will be the inevitable consequence. That the principle and construction contended for, by several of the State Legislatures, that the General Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it, stop nothing short of despotism; since the discretion of those who administer the Government, and not the constitution, would be the measure of their powers. That the several States who formed that instrument, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of its infraction; and, that a nullification, by those sovereignties, of all unauthorized acts, done under color of that instrument, is the rightful remedy."

Time and experience confirmed Mr. Jefferson's opinion on this all-important point. In the year 1821, he expressed himself in this emphatic manner: "It is a fatal heresy to suppose that either our State Governments are superior to the Federal, or the Federal to the State; neither is authorized literally to decide which belongs to itself or its co-partner in Government; in differences of opinion, between their different sets of public servants, the appeal is to neither, but to their employers, peaceably assembled by their representatives in convention." The opinions of Mr. Jefferson, on this subject, have been so repeatedly and so solemnly expressed, that they may be said to have been the most fixed and settled convictions of his mind.

In the protest prepared by him for the Legislature of Virginia, in December, 1825, in respect to the powers exercised by the Federal Government in relation to the Tariff and Internal Improvements, which he declares to be "usurpations of the powers retained by the States, mere interpolations into the compact, and direct infractions of it," he solemnly re-asserts all the principles of the Virginia resolutions of '98, protests against "these acts of the Federal branch of the Government as null and void, and declares that, although Virginia would consider a dissolution of the Union as among the greatest calamities that could befall them, yet it is not the greatest. There is one yet greater: submission to a Government of unlimited powers. It is only when the hope of this shall become absolutely desperate, that further forbearance could not be indulged."

In his letter to Mr. Giles, written about the same time, he says:

"I see as you do, and with the deepest affliction, the rapid strides with which the Federal branch of our Government is advancing towards the usurpation of all the rights reserved to the States, and the consolidation in itself of all powers, foreign and domestic, and that, too, by constructions which leave no limits to their powers, &c. Under the power to regulate commerce, they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, &c. Under the authority to establish post roads, they claim that of cutting down mountains for the construction of roads and digging canals, &c. And what is our resource for the preservation of the constitution? Reason and argument? You might as well reason and argue with the marble columns encircling them, &c. Are we then to stand to our arms, with the hot-headed Georgian? No—[and I say no, and South Carolina has said no]—that must be the last resource. We must have patience and long endurance with our brethren, &c., and separate from our companions only, when the sole alternatives left are a dissolution of our Union with them, or submission to a Government without limitation of powers. Between these two evils, when we must make a choice, there can be no hesitation."

Such, sir, are the high and imposing authorities in support of the "Carolina doctrine," which is, in fact, the doctrine of the Virginia resolutions of 1798.

Sir, at that day the whole country was divided on this very question. It formed the line of demarcation between the federal and republican parties, and the great political revolution which then took place turned upon the very question involved in these resolutions. That question was decided by the people, and by that decision the constitution was, in the emphatic language of Mr. Jefferson, "saved at its last gasp." I should suppose, sir, it would require more self-respect than any gentleman here would be willing to assume, to treat lightly doctrines derived from such high sources. Resting on authority like this, I will ask gentlemen whether South Carolina has not manifested a high regard for the Union, when, under a tyranny ten times more grievous than the alien and sedition laws, she has, hitherto, gone no further than to petition, remonstrate, and solemnly to protest against a series of measures which she believes to be wholly unconstitutional, and utterly destructive of her interests? Sir, South Carolina has not gone one step further than Mr. Jefferson himself was disposed to go, in relation to the very subject of our present complaints; not a step further than the statesmen from New England were disposed to go under similar circumstances; no further than the Senator from Massachusetts himself once considered as within "the limits of a constitutional opposition." The doctrine that it is the right of a State to judge of the violations of the constitution on the part of the Federal Government, and to protect her citizens from the operation of unconstitutional laws, was held by the enlightened citizens of Boston, who assembled in Faneuil Hall, on the 25th January, 1809. They state, in that celebrated memorial, that "they looked only to the State Legislature, who were competent to devise relief against the unconstitutional acts of the General Government. That your power [say they] is adequate to that object, is evident from the organization of the confederacy."

A distinguished Senator from one of the New England States, (Mr. Hillhouse,) in a speech delivered here, on a bill for enforcing the embargo, declared: "I feel myself bound in conscience to declare, lest the blood of those who shall fall in the execution of this measure shall be on my head, that I consider this to be an act which directs a mortal blow at the liberties of my country; an act containing unconstitutional provisions, to which the people are not bound to submit, and to which, in my opinion, they will not submit."

And the Senator from Massachusetts, himself, in a speech delivered on the same subject, in the other House, said: "This opposition is constitutional and legal; it is, also, conscientious. It rests on settled and sober conviction, that such policy is destructive to the interests of the people, and dangerous to the being of the Government. The experience of every day confirms these sentiments. Men who act from such motives are not to be discouraged by trifling obstacles nor awed by any dangers. They know the limit of constitutional opposition; up to that limit, at their own discretion, they will walk, and walk fearlessly." How "the being of the Government" was to be endangered by "constitutional opposition to the embargo," I leave to the gentleman to explain.

Thus, it will be seen, said Mr. H., that the South Carolina doctrine is the republican doctrine of '98; that it was first promulgated by the fathers of the faith; that it was maintained by Virginia and Kentucky in the worst of times; that it constituted the very pivot on which the political revolution of that day turned; that it embraces the very principles the triumph of which, at that time, saved the constitution at its last gasp, and which New England statesmen were not unwilling to adopt, when they believed themselves to be the victims of unconstitutional legislation. Sir, as to the doctrine that the Federal Government is the exclusive judge of the extent, as well as the limitations of its powers, it seems to me to be utterly subversive of the sovereignty and independence of the States. It makes but little difference, in my estimation, whether Congress or the Supreme Court are invested with this power. If the Federal Government, in all or any of its departments, are to prescribe the limits of its own authority, and the States are bound to submit to the decision, and are not to be allowed to examine and decide for themselves, when the barriers of the constitution shall be overleaped, this is practically "a Government without limitation of powers." The States are at once reduced to mere petty corporations, and the people are entirely at your mercy. I have but one word more to add. In all the efforts that have been made by South Carolina to resist the unconstitutional laws which Congress has extended over them, she has kept steadily in view the preservation of the Union, by the only means by which she believes it can be long preserved—a firm, manly, and steady resistance against usurpation. The measures of the Federal Government have, it is true, prostrated her interests, and will soon involve the whole South in irretrievable ruin.

But even this evil, great as it is, is not the chief ground of our complaints. It is the principle involved in the contest—a principle which, substituting the discretion of Congress for the limitations of the constitution, brings the States and the people to the feet of the Federal Government, and leaves them nothing that they can call their own. Sir, if the measures of the Federal Government were less oppressive, we should still strive against this usurpation. The South is acting on a principle she has always held sacred—resistance to unauthorized taxation. These, sir, are the principles which induced the immortal Hampden to resist the payment of a tax of twenty shillings. Would twenty shillings have ruined his fortune? No; but the payment of half twenty shillings, on the principle on which it was demanded, would have made him a slave. Sir, if, in acting on these high motives, if, animated by that ardent love of liberty which has always been the most prominent trait in the Southern character, we should be hurried beyond the bounds of a cold and calculating prudence, who is there, with one noble and generous sentiment in his bosom, that would not be disposed, in the language of Burke, to exclaim, "You must pardon something to the spirit of liberty!"

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Foot's resolution.

Mr. WEBSTER said: In carrying his warfare, such as it was, into New England, the honorable gentleman all along professes to be acting on the defensive. He elects to consider me as having assailed South Carolina, and insists that he comes forth only as her champion, and in her defence. Sir, said Mr. W., I do not admit that I made any attack whatever on South Carolina. Nothing like it. The honorable member, in his first speech, expressed opinions in regard to revenue, and some other topics, which I heard both with pain and with surprise. I told the gentleman that I was aware that such sentiments were entertained out of the Government, but had not expected to find them advanced in it; that I knew there were persons in the South who speak of our Union with indifference, or doubt, taking pains to magnify its evils, and to say nothing of its benefits; that the honorable member himself, I was sure, could never be one of these; and I regretted the expression of such opinions as he had avowed, because I thought their obvious tendency was to encourage feelings of disrespect to the Union, and to weaken its connection. This, sir, is the sum and substance of all I said on the subject. And this constitutes the attack which called on the chivalry of the gentleman, in his opinion, to harry us with such a foray, among the party pamphlets and party proceedings of Massachusetts! If he means that I spoke with dissatisfaction or disrespect of the ebullitions of individuals in South Carolina, it is true. But, if he means that I had assailed the character of the State, her honor, or patriotism; that I had reflected on her history or her conduct; he had not the slightest ground for any such assumption. I did not even refer, I think, in my observations, to any collection of individuals. I said nothing of the recent conventions. I spoke in the most guarded and careful manner, and only expressed my regret for the publication of opinions which I presumed the honorable member disapproved as much as myself. In this it seems I was mistaken. I do not remember that the gentleman has disclaimed any sentiment, or any opinion, of a supposed anti-union tendency, which on all, or any of the recent occasions, has been expressed. The whole drift of his speech has been rather to prove that, in divers times and manners, sentiments equally liable to my objection have been promulgated in New England. And one would suppose that his object, in this reference to Massachusetts, was to find a precedent to justify proceedings in the South, were it not for the reproach and contumely with which he labors, all along, to load these, his own chosen precedents. By way of defending South Carolina from what he chooses to think an attack on her, he first quotes the example of Massachusetts, and then denounces that example in good set terms. This twofold purpose, not very consistent with itself, one would think, was exhibited more than once in the course of his speech. He referred, for instance, to the Hartford Convention. Did he do this for authority, or for a topic of reproach? Apparently for both: for he told us that he should find no fault with the mere fact of holding such a convention, and considering and discussing such questions as he supposes were then and there discussed; but what rendered it obnoxious, was the time in which it was held, and the circumstances of the country, then existing. We were in war, he said, and the country needed all our aid; the hand of Government required to be strengthened, not weakened; and patriotism should have postponed such proceedings to another day. The thing itself, then, is a precedent; the time and manner of it only, a subject of censure. Now, sir, I go much further, on this point, than the honorable member. Supposing, as the gentleman seems to, that the Hartford Convention assembled for any such purpose as breaking up the Union, because they thought unconstitutional laws had been passed, or to consult on that subject, or to calculate the value of the Union; supposing this to be their purpose, or any part of it, then I say the meeting itself was disloyal, and was obnoxious to censure, whether held in time of peace or time of war, or under whatever circumstances. The material question is the object. Is dissolution the object? If it be, external circumstances may make it a more or less aggravated case, but cannot affect the principle. I do not hold, therefore, sir, that the Hartford Convention was pardonable, even to the extent of the gentleman's admission, if its objects were really such as have been imputed to it. Sir, there never was a time, under any degree of excitement, in which the Hartford Convention, or any other convention, could maintain itself one moment in New England, if assembled for any such purpose as the gentleman says would have been an allowable purpose. To hold conventions to decide questions of constitutional law! To try the binding validity of statutes, by votes in a convention! Sir, the Hartford Convention, I presume, would not desire that the honorable gentleman should be their defender or advocate, if he puts their case upon such untenable and extravagant grounds.

Then, sir, the gentleman has no fault to find with these recently promulgated South Carolina opinions. And, certainly, he need have none: for his own sentiments, as now advanced, and advanced on reflection, as far as I have been able to comprehend them, go the full length of all these opinions. I propose, sir, to say something on these, and to consider how far they are just and constitutional. Before doing that, however, let me observe, that the eulogium pronounced on the character of the State of South Carolina, by the honorable gentleman, for her revolutionary and other merits, meets my hearty concurrence. I shall not acknowledge that the honorable member goes before me in regard for whatever of distinguished talent, or distinguished character, South Carolina has produced. I claim part of the honor, I partake in the pride of her great names. I claim them for countrymen, one and all. The Laurenses, the Rutledges, the Pinckneys, the Sumters, the Marions—Americans all—whose fame is no more to be hemmed in by State lines, than their talents and patriotism were capable of being circumscribed within the same narrow limits. In their day and generation, they served and honored the country, and the whole country; and their renown is of the treasures of the whole country. Him, whose honored name the gentleman himself bears—does he suppose me less capable of gratitude for his patriotism, or sympathy for his sufferings, than if his eyes had first opened upon the light in Massachusetts, instead of South Carolina? Sir, does he suppose it in his power to exhibit a Carolina name so bright as to produce envy in my bosom? No, sir, increased gratification and delight, rather. Sir, I thank God that, if I am gifted with little of the spirit which is able to raise mortals to the skies, I have yet none, as I trust, of that other spirit, which would drag angels down. When I shall be found, sir, in my place, here in the Senate, or elsewhere, to sneer at public merit, because it happened to spring up beyond the little limits of my own State or neighborhood; when I refuse, for any such cause, or for any cause, the homage due to American talent, to elevated patriotism, to sincere devotion to liberty and the country; or if I see an uncommon endowment of heaven—if I see extraordinary capacity and virtue in any son of the South—and if, moved by local prejudice, or gangrened by State jealousy, I get up here to abate the tithe of a hair from his just character and just fame, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth!

Sir, let me recur to pleasing recollections; let me indulge in refreshing remembrances of the past; let me remind you that, in early times, no States cherished greater harmony, both of principle and feeling, than Massachusetts and South Carolina. Would to God, that harmony might again return! Shoulder to shoulder they went through the revolution—hand in hand they stood round the administration of Washington, and felt his own great arm lean on them for support. Unkind feeling, if it exist, alienation and distrust, are the growth, unnatural to such soils, of false principles since sown. They are weeds, the seeds of which that same great arm never scattered.

I shall enter on no encomiums upon Massachusetts; she needs none. There she is; behold her, and judge for yourselves. There is her history; the world knows it by heart. The past, at least, is secure. There is Boston, and Concord, and Lexington, and Bunker Hill; and there they will remain forever. The bones of her sons, fallen in the great struggle for independence, now lie mingled with the soil of every State, from New England to Georgia; and there they will lie forever. And, sir, where American liberty raised its infant voice; and where its youth was nurtured and sustained; there it still lives, in the strength of its manhood, and full of its original spirit. If discord and disunion shall wound it; if party strife and blind ambition shall hawk at and tear it; if folly and madness; if uneasiness, under salutary and necessary restraint, shall succeed to separate it from that Union, by which alone its existence is made sure, it will stand, in the end, by the side of that cradle in which its infancy was rocked; it will stretch forth its arm, with whatever of vigor it may still retain, over the friends who may gather round it; and it will fall at last, if fall it must, amidst the proudest monuments of its own glory, and on the very spot of its origin.

There yet remains to be performed, said Mr. W., by far the most grave and important duty, which I feel to be devolved on me, by this occasion. It is to state, and to defend, what I conceive to be the true principles of the constitution, under which we are here assembled. I might well have desired that so weighty a task should have fallen into other and abler hands. I could have wished that it should have been executed by those, whose character and experience give weight and influence to their opinions, such as cannot possibly belong to mine. But, sir, I have met the occasion, not sought it; and I shall proceed to state my own sentiments, without challenging for them any particular regard, with studied plainness, and as much precision as possible.

I understand the honorable gentleman from South Carolina to maintain, that it is a right of the State Legislatures to interfere, whenever, in their judgment, this Government transcends its constitutional limits, and to arrest the operation of its laws.

I understand him to maintain this right, as a right existing under the constitution; not as a right to overthrow it, on the ground of extreme necessity, such as would justify violent revolution.

I understand him to maintain an authority, on the part of the States, thus to interfere, for the purpose of correcting the exercise of power by the General Government, of checking it, and of compelling it to conform to their opinion of the extent of its powers.

I understand him to maintain that the ultimate power of judging of the constitutional extent of its own authority is not lodged exclusively in the General Government, or any branch of it; but that, on the contrary, the States may lawfully decide for themselves, and each State for itself, whether, in a given case, the act of the General Government transcends its power.

I understand him to insist that, if the exigency of the case, in the opinion of any State Government, require it, such State Government may, by its own sovereign authority, annul an act of the General Government, which it deems plainly and palpably unconstitutional.

This is the sum of what I understand from him to be the South Carolina doctrine; and the doctrine which he maintains. I propose to consider it, and to compare it with the constitution. Allow me to say, as a preliminary remark, that I call this the South Carolina doctrine, only because the gentleman himself has so denominated it. I do not feel at liberty to say that South Carolina, as a State, has ever advanced these sentiments. I hope she has not, and never may. That a great majority of her people are opposed to the tariff laws, is doubtless true. That a majority, somewhat less than that just mentioned, conscientiously believe those laws unconstitutional, may probably also be true. But, that any majority holds to the right of direct State interference, at State discretion, the right of nullifying acts of Congress by acts of State legislation, is more than I know, and what I shall be slow to believe.

That there are individuals, besides the honorable gentleman, who do maintain these opinions, is quite certain. I recollect the recent expression of a sentiment, which circumstances attending its utterance and publication justify us in supposing was not unpremeditated. "The sovereignty of the State—never to be controlled, construed, or decided on, but by her own feelings of honorable justice."

[Mr. HAYNE here rose, and said that, for the purpose of being clearly understood, he would state, that his proposition was in the words of the Virginia resolution, as follows:

"That this Assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the Federal Government as resulting from the compact to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no farther valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose, for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."]

Mr. W. resumed: I am quite aware of the existence of the resolution which the gentleman read, and has now repeated, and that he relies on it as his authority. I know the source, too, from which it is understood to have proceeded. I need not say that I have much respect for the constitutional opinions of Mr. Madison; they would weigh greatly with me, always. But, before the authority of his opinion be vouched for the gentleman's proposition, it will be proper to consider what is the fair interpretation of that resolution to which Mr. Madison is understood to have given his sanction. As the gentleman construes it, it is an authority for him. Possibly, he may not have adopted the right construction. That resolution declares, that, in the case of the dangerous exercise of powers not granted to the General Government, the States may interpose to arrest the progress of the evil. But how interpose, and what does this declaration purport? Does it mean no more than that there may be extreme cases, in which the people, in any mode of assembling, may resist usurpation, and relieve themselves from a tyrannical Government? No one will deny this. Such resistance is not only acknowledged to be just in America, but in England, also. Blackstone admits as much, in his theory, and practice, too, of the English constitution. We, sir, who oppose the Carolina doctrine, do not deny that the people may, if they choose, throw off any Government when it becomes oppressive and intolerable, and erect a better in its stead. We all know that civil institutions are established for the public benefit, and that, when they cease to answer the ends of their existence, they may be changed. But I do not understand the doctrine now contended for to be that which, for the sake of distinctness, we may call the right of revolution. I understand the gentleman to maintain, that, without revolution, without civil commotion, without rebellion, a remedy for supposed abuse and transgression of the powers of the General Government lies in a direct appeal to the interference of the State Governments. [Mr. HAYNE here rose: He did not contend, he said,

Mr. Foote's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

for the mere right of revolution, but for the right of constitutional resistance. What he maintained was, that, in case of plain, palpable violation of the constitution, by the General Government, a State may interpose; and that this interposition is constitutional.] Mr. W. resumed: So, sir, I understood the gentleman, and am happy to find that I did not misunderstand him. What he contends for, is, that it is constitutional to interrupt the administration of the constitution itself, in the hands of those who are chosen and sworn to administer it, by the direct interference, in form of law, of the States, in virtue of their sovereign capacity. The inherent right in the people to reform their Government, I do not deny; and they have another right, and that is, to resist unconstitutional laws, without overturning the Government. It is no doctrine of mine, that unconstitutional laws bind the people. The great question is, whose prerogative is it to decide on the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the laws? On that, the main debate hinges. The proposition, that, in case of a supposed violation of the constitution by Congress, the States have a constitutional right to interfere, and annul the law of Congress, is the proposition of the gentleman: I do not admit it. If the gentleman had intended no more than to assert the right of revolution, for justifiable cause, he would have said only what all agree to. But I cannot conceive that there can be a middle course, between submission to the laws, when regularly pronounced constitutional, on the one hand, and open resistance, which is revolution, or rebellion, on the other. I say, the right of a State to annul a law of Congress, cannot be maintained but on the ground of the unalienable right of man to resist oppression; that is to say, upon the ground of revolution. I admit that there is an ultimate violent remedy, above the constitution, and in defiance of the constitution, which may be resorted to, when a revolution is to be justified. But I do not admit that, under the constitution, and in conformity with it, there is any mode in which a State Government, as a member of the Union, can interfere and stop the progress of the General Government, by force of her own laws, under any circumstances whatever.

This leads us to inquire into the origin of this Government, and the source of its power. Whose agent is it? Is it the creature of the State Legislature, or the creature of the people? If the Government of the United States be the agent of the State Governments, then they may control it, provided they can agree in the manner of controlling it; if it be the agent of the people, then the people alone can control it, restrain it, modify, or reform it. It is observable enough, that the doctrine for which the honorable gentleman contends, leads him to the necessity of maintaining, not only that this General Government is the creature of the States, but that it is the creature of each of the States, severally; so that each may assert the power, for itself, of determining whether it acts within the limits of its authority. It is the servant of four and twenty masters, of different wills and different purposes, and yet bound to obey all. This absurdity (for it seems no less) arises from a misconception as to the origin of this Government in its true character. It is, sir, the people's constitution, the people's Government; made for the people; made by the people; and answerable to the people. The people of the United States have declared that this constitution shall be the supreme law. We must either admit the proposition, or dispute their authority. The States are, unquestionably, sovereign, so far as their sovereignty is not affected by this supreme law. But the State Legislatures, as political bodies, however sovereign, are yet not sovereign over the people. So far as the people have given power to the General Government, so far the grant is unquestionably good, and the Government holds of the people, and not of the State Governments. We are all agents of the same supreme power, the people. The General Government and the State Governments derive their authority from the same source. Neither can, in relation to the other, be called primary, though one is definite and restricted, and the other general and residuary. The National Government possesses those powers which it can be shown the people have conferred on it, and no more. All the rest belongs to the State Governments, or to the people themselves. So far as the people have restrained State sovereignty, by the expression of their will, in the Constitution of the United States, so far, it must be admitted, State sovereignty is effectually controlled. I do not contend that it is, or ought to be, controlled farther. The sentiment to which I have referred, propounds that State sovereignty is only to be controlled by its own "feeling of justice;" that is to say, that it is not to be controlled at all: for one who is to follow his own feelings is under no legal control. Now, however men may think this ought to be, the fact is, that the people of the United States have chosen to impose control on State sovereignties. There are those, doubtless, who wish they had been left without restraint; but the constitution has ordered the matter differently. To make war, for instance, is an exercise of sovereignty; but the constitution declares that no State shall make war. To coin money is another exercise of sovereign power; but no State is at liberty to coin money. Again, the constitution says that no sovereign State shall be so sovereign as to make a treaty. These prohibitions, it must be confessed, are a control on the State sovereignty of South Carolina, as well as of the other States, which does not arise "from her own feelings of honorable justice." Such an opinion, therefore, is in defiance of the plainest provisions of the constitution.

There are other proceedings of public bodies which have already been alluded to, and to which I refer again, for the purpose of ascertaining more fully what is the length and breadth of that doctrine, denominated the Carolina doctrine, which the honorable gentleman has now stood up on this floor to maintain. In one of them I find it resolved, that "the tariff of 1828, and every other tariff designed to promote one branch of industry at the expense of others, is contrary to the meaning and intention of the Federal compact; and, as such, a dangerous, palpable, and deliberate usurpation of power, by a determined majority, wielding the General Government beyond the limits of its delegated powers, as calls upon the States which compose the suffering minority, in their sovereign capacity, to exercise the powers which, as sovereigns, necessarily devolve upon them, when their compact is violated."

Observe, sir, that this resolution holds the tariff of 1828, and every other tariff, designed to promote one branch of industry at the expense of another, to be such a dangerous, palpable, and deliberate usurpation of power, as calls upon the States, in their sovereign capacity, to interfere by their own authority. This denunciation, you will please to observe, includes our old tariff of 1816, as well as all others; because that was established to promote the interest of the manufacturers of cotton, to the manifest and admitted injury of the Calcutta cotton trade. Observe again, that all the qualifications are here rehearsed and charged upon the tariff, which are necessary to bring the case within the gentleman's proposition. The tariff is a usurpation; it is a dangerous usurpation; it is a palpable usurpation; it is a deliberate usurpation. It is such a usurpation, therefore, as calls upon the States to exercise their right of interference. Here is a case, then, within the gentleman's principles, and all his qualifications of his principles. It is a case for action. The constitution is plainly, dangerously, palpably, and deliberately violated; and the States must interpose their own authority to arrest the law. Let us suppose the State of South Carolina to express the same opinion, by the voice of her Legislature. That would be very imposing; but what then? Is the voice of one State conclusive? It so happens that, at the very moment when South Carolina resolves that the tariff laws are unconstitutional, Pennsylvania and Kentucky resolve exactly the reverse. They hold those laws to be both highly proper and strictly constitutional. And now, sir, how does the honorable member propose to deal with this case? How does he relieve us from this difficulty, upon any principle of his? His construction gets us into it; how does he propose to get us out?

In Carolina, the tariff is a palpable, deliberate usurpation; Carolina, therefore, may nullify it, and refuse to pay the duties. In Pennsylvania, it is both clearly constitutional, and highly expedient; and there, the duties are to be paid. And yet we live under a Government of uniform laws, and under a constitution, too, which contains an express provision, as it happens, that all duties shall be equal in all the States! Does not this approach absurdity?

If there be no power to settle such questions, independent of either of the States, is not the whole Union a rope of sand? Are we not thrown back again, precisely upon the old Confederation?

It is too plain to be argued. Four and twenty interpreters of constitutional law, each with a power to decide for itself, and none with authority to bind anybody else, and this constitutional law the only bond of their union! What is such a state of things, but a mere connection during pleasure; or, to use the phraseology of the times, during feeling? And that feeling, too, not the feeling of the people, who established the constitution, but the feeling of the State Governments.

In another of the South Carolina addresses, having premised that the crisis requires "all the concentrated energy of passion," an attitude of open resistance to the laws of the Union is advised. Open resistance to the laws, then, is the constitutional remedy, the conservative power of the State, which the South Carolina doctrines teach, for the redress of political evils, real or imaginary. And its authors further say, that, appealing with confidence to the constitution itself, to justify their opinions, they cannot consent to try their accuracy by the courts of justice. In one sense, indeed, sir, said Mr. W., this is assuming an attitude of open resistance in favor of liberty. But what sort of liberty? The liberty of establishing their own opinions, in defiance of the opinions of all others; the liberty of judging and deciding exclusively themselves, in a matter in which others have as much right to judge and decide as they; the liberty of placing their own opinions above the judgment of all others, above the laws, and above the constitution. This is their liberty; and this is the fair result of the proposition contended for by the honorable gentleman. Or, it may be more properly said, it is identical with it, rather than a result from it.

In the same publication, we find the following: "Previously to our revolution, when the arm of oppression was stretched over New England, where did our Northern brethren meet with a braver sympathy than that which sprung from the bosoms of Carolinians? We had no extortion, no oppression, no collision with the king's ministers, no navigation interests springing up in envious rivalry of England."

This seems extraordinary language. South Carolina no collision with the king's ministers in 1775! No extortion! No oppression! But, sir, it is, also, most significant language. Does any man doubt the purpose for which it was penned? Can any one fail to see that it was designed to raise in the reader's mind the question, whether, at this time—that is to say, in

Mr. Foote's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

1833, South Carolina has any collision with the king's ministers, any oppression, or extortion, to fear from England? Whether, in short, England is not as naturally the friend of South Carolina, as New England, with her navigation interests springing up in envious rivalry of England?

Is it not strange, sir, that an intelligent man in South Carolina, in 1828, should thus labor to prove, that, in 1775, there was no hostility, no cause of war between South Carolina and England? That she had no occasion, in reference to her own interest, or from a regard to her own welfare, to take up arms in the revolutionary contest? Can any one account for the expression of such strange sentiments, and their circulation through the State, otherwise than by supposing the object to be, what I have already intimated, to raise the question, if they had no "collision" (mark the expression) with the ministers of King George the Third, in 1775, what collision have they in 1828, with the ministers of King George the Fourth? What is there now, in the existing state of things, to separate Carolina from Old, more, or rather, than from New England?

Resolutions, sir, have been recently passed by the Legislature of South Carolina. I need not refer to them; they go no farther than the honorable gentleman himself has gone, and, I hope, not so far. I content myself, therefore, with debating the matter with him.

And now, sir, what I have first to say on this subject is, that at no time, and under no circumstances, has New England, or any State in New England, or any respectable body of persons in New England, or any public man of standing in New England, put forth such a doctrine as this Carolina doctrine.

The gentleman has found no case, he can find none, to support his own opinions by New England authority. New England has studied the constitution in other schools, and under other teachers. She looks upon it with other regards, and deems more highly and reverently, both of its just authority, and its utility and excellence. The history of her legislative proceedings may be traced; the ephemeral effusions of temporary bodies, called together by the excitement of the occasion, may be hunted up—they have been hunted up. The opinions and votes of her public men, in and out of Congress, may be explored; it will all be in vain. The Carolina doctrine can derive from her neither countenance nor support. She rejects it now; she always did reject it; and till she loses her senses, she always will reject it. The honorable member has referred to expressions on the subject of the embargo law, made in this place by an honorable and venerable gentleman, (Mr. Hillhouse,) now favoring us with his presence. He quotes that distinguished Senator as saying, that, in his judgment, the embargo law was unconstitutional, and that, therefore, in his opinion, the people were not bound to obey it. That, sir, is perfectly constitutional language. An unconstitutional law is not binding; but then it does not rest with a resolution, or a law of a State Legislature, to decide whether an act of Congress be, or be not, constitutional. An unconstitutional act of Congress would not bind the people of this District, although they have no Legislature to interfere in their behalf; and, on the other hand, a constitutional law of Congress does bind the citizens of every State, although all their Legislatures should undertake to annul it, by act or resolution. The venerable Connecticut Senator is a constitutional lawyer, of sound principles, and enlarged knowledge; a statesman, practised and experienced; bred in the company of Washington, and holding just views upon the nature of our Governments. He believed the embargo unconstitutional, and so did others; but what then? Who, did he suppose, was to decide that question? The State Legislatures? Certainly not. No such sentiment ever escaped his lips. Let us follow up, sir, this New England opposition to the embargo laws; let us trace it till we discern the principle which controlled and governed New England, throughout the whole course of that opposition. We shall then see what similarity there is between the New England school of constitutional opinions, and this modern Carolina school. The gentleman, I think, read a petition from some single individual, addressed to the Legislature of Massachusetts, asserting the Carolina doctrine—that is, the right of State interference to arrest the laws of the Union. The fate of that petition shows the sentiments of the Legislature. It met no favor. The opinions of Massachusetts were otherwise. They had been expressed in 1798, in answer to the resolutions of Virginia, and she did not depart from them, nor bend them to the times. Misgoverned, wronged, oppressed, as she felt herself to be, she still held fast her integrity to the Union. The gentleman may find in her proceedings much evidence of dissatisfaction with the measures of the Government, and great and deep dislike to the embargo; all this makes the case so much the stronger for her: for, notwithstanding all this dissatisfaction and dislike, she claimed no right, still, to sever asunder the bonds of the Union. There was heat, and there was anger, in her political feelings. Be it so; her heat or her anger did not, nevertheless, betray her into infidelity to the Government. The gentleman labors to prove that she disliked the embargo as much as South Carolina dislikes the tariff, and expressed her dislike as strongly. Be it so; but did she propose the Carolina remedy? Did she threaten to interfere, by State authority, to annul the laws of the Union? That is the question for the gentleman's consideration.

Let me here say, sir, that if the gentleman's doctrine had been received and acted upon in New England, in the times of the embargo and non-intercourse, we should probably not now have been here. The Government would, very likely, have gone to pieces, and crumbled into dust. No stronger case can ever arise than existed under those laws; no States can ever entertain a clearer conviction than the New England States then entertained; and if they had been under the influence of that heresy of opinion, as I must call it, which the honorable member espouses, this Union would, in all probability, have been scattered to the four winds. I ask the gentleman, therefore, to apply his principles to that case; I ask him to come forth and declare, whether, in his opinion, the New England States would have been justified in interfering to break up the embargo system, under the conscientious opinions which they held upon it? Had they a right to annul that law? Does he admit or deny? If that which is thought palpably unconstitutional in South Carolina, justifies that State in arresting the progress of the law, tell me, whether that which was thought palpably unconstitutional also in Massachusetts, would have justified her in doing the same thing? Sir, I deny the whole doctrine. It has not a foot of ground in the constitution to stand on. No public man of reputation ever advanced it in Massachusetts, in the warmest times, or could maintain himself upon it there at any time.

I wish now, sir, to make a remark upon the Virginia resolutions of 1798. I cannot undertake to say how these resolutions were understood by those who passed them. Their language is not a little indefinite. In the case of the exercise, by Congress, of a dangerous power, not granted to them, the resolutions assert the right, on the part of the State, to interfere, and arrest the progress of the evil. This is susceptible of more than one interpretation. It may mean no more than that the States may interfere by complaint and remonstrance; or by proposing to the people an alteration of the Federal constitution. This would all be quite unobjectionable; or, it may be, that no more is meant than to assert the general right of revolution, as against all Governments, in cases of intolerable oppression. This no one doubts; and this, in my opinion, is all that he who framed the resolutions could have meant by it: for I shall not readily believe that he was ever of opinion that a State, under the constitution, and in conformity with it, could, upon the ground of her own opinion of its unconstitutionality, however clear and palpable she might think the case, annul a law of Congress, so far as it should operate on herself, by her own legislative power.

I must now beg to ask, sir, whence is this supposed right of the States derived? Where do they find the power to interfere with the laws of the Union? Sir, the opinion which the honorable gentleman maintains, is a notion founded on a total misapprehension, in my judgment, of the origin of this Government, and of the foundation on which it stands. I hold it to be a popular Government, erected by the people; those who administer it, responsible to the people; and itself capable of being amended and modified, just as the people may choose it should be. It is as popular, just as truly emanating from the people, as the State Governments. It is created for one purpose; the State Governments for another. It has its own powers; they have theirs. There is no more authority with them to arrest the operation of a law of Congress, than with Congress to arrest the operation of their laws. We are here to administer a constitution emanating immediately from the people, and trusted, by them, to our administration. It is not the creature of the State Governments. It is of no moment to the argument, that certain acts of the State Legislatures are necessary to fill our seats in this body. That is not one of their original State powers—a part of the sovereignty of the State. It is a duty which the people, by the constitution itself, have imposed on the State Legislatures; and which they might have left to be performed elsewhere if they had seen fit. So they have left the choice of President with electors; but all this does not affect the proposition that this whole Government—President, Senate, and House of Representatives—is a popular Government. It leaves it still all its popular character. The Governor of a State (in some of the States) is chosen, not directly by the people, but by those who are chosen by the people, for the purpose of performing, among other duties, that of electing a Governor. Is the Government of a State, on that account, not a popular Government? This Government, sir, is the independent offspring of the popular will. It is not the creature of State Legislatures. Nay, more, if the whole truth must be told, the people brought it into existence, established it, and have hitherto supported it, for the very purpose, amongst others, of imposing certain salutary restraints on State sovereignties. The States cannot now make war; they cannot contract alliances; they cannot make, each for itself, separate regulations of commerce; they cannot lay imposts; they cannot coin money. If this constitution, sir, be the creature of State Legislatures, it must be admitted that it has obtained a strange control over the volitions of its creators.

The people, then, sir, erected this Government. They gave it a constitution; and in that constitution they have enumerated the powers which they bestow on it. They have made it a limited Government. They have defined its authority. They have restrained it to the exercise of such powers as are granted; and all others, they declare, are reserved to the States or to the people. But, sir, they have not stopped here. If they had, they would have accomplished but half their work. No definition can be so clear as to avoid possibility of doubt; no limitation so precise, as to exclude all uncertainty. Who then shall construe this grant of the people? Who shall interpret their will, where it may be supposed they have left it doubtful? With whom do they repose this ultimate right of deciding on the powers of the Government? Sir, they have settled all this in the fullest manner. They have left it with the Government itself, in its appropriate branches. Sir, the very chief end, the main design, for which the whole constitution was framed and adopted, was, to establish a Government that should not be obliged to act through State agency, or depend on State opinion and State discretion. The people had had quite enough of that kind of Government, under the Confederacy. Under that system, the legal action, the application of law to individuals, belonged exclusively to the States. Congress could only recommend; their acts were not of binding force, till the States had adopted and sanctioned them. Are we in that condition still? Are we yet at the mercy of State discretion, and State construction? Sir, if we are, then vain will be our attempt to maintain the constitution under which we sit. But, sir, the people have wisely provided, in the constitution itself, a proper, suitable mode and tribunal for settling questions of constitutional law. There are, in the constitution, grants of powers to Congress, and restrictions on these powers. There are, also, prohibitions on the States. Some authority must, therefore, necessarily exist, having the ultimate jurisdiction to fix and ascertain the interpretation of these grants, restrictions, and prohibitions. The constitution has, itself, pointed out, ordained, and established, that authority. How has it accomplished this great and essential end? By declaring, sir, that "the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. Foote's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

This, sir, was the first great step. By this, the supremacy of the constitution and laws of the United States is declared. The people so will it. No State law is to be valid which comes in conflict with the constitution or any law of the United States. But who shall decide this question of interference? To whom lies the last appeal? This, sir, the constitution itself decides also, by declaring "that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States." These two provisions, sir, cover the whole ground. They are, in truth, the keystone of the arch. With these, it is a constitution; without them, it is a confederacy. In pursuance of these clear and express provisions, Congress established, at its very first session, in the Judicial Act, a mode for carrying them into full effect, and for bringing all questions of constitutional power to the final decision of the Supreme Court. It then, sir, became a Government. It then had the means of self-protection; and, but for this, it would, in all probability, have been now among things which are past. Having constituted the Government, and declared its powers, the people have farther said, that, since somebody must decide on the extent of these powers, the Government shall itself decide; subject, always, like other popular Governments, to its responsibility to the people. And now, sir, I repeat, how is it that a State Legislature acquires any power to interfere? Who or what gives them the right to say to the people, "We, who are your agents and servants for one purpose, will undertake to decide that your other agents and servants, appointed by you for another purpose, have transcended the authority you gave them?" The reply would be, I think, not impertinent: "Who made you a judge over another's servants? To their own masters they stand or fall."

Sir, I deny this power of State Legislatures altogether. It cannot stand the test of examination. Gentlemen may say that, in an extreme case, a State Government might protect the people from intolerable oppression. Sir, in such a case, the people might protect themselves, without the aid of the State Governments. Such a case warrants revolution. It must make, when it comes, a law for itself. A nullifying act of a State Legislature cannot alter the case, nor make resistance any more lawful. In maintaining these sentiments, sir, I am but asserting the rights of the people. I state what they have declared, and insist on their right to declare it. They have chosen to repose this power in the General Government, and I think it my duty to support it, like other constitutional powers.

For myself, sir, I do not admit the jurisdiction of South Carolina, or any other State, to prescribe my constitutional duty, or to settle, between me and the people, the validity of laws of Congress, for which I have voted. I decline her umpirage. I have not sworn to support the constitution according to her construction of its clauses. I have not stipulated, by my oath of office, or otherwise, to come under any responsibility, except to the people, and those whom they have appointed to pass upon the question, whether laws, supported by my votes, conform to the constitution of the country. And, sir, if we look to the general nature of the case, could any thing have been more preposterous than to make a Government for the whole Union, and yet leave its powers subject, not to one interpretation, but to thirteen, or twenty-four, interpretations? Instead of one tribunal, established by all, responsible to all, with power to decide for all, shall constitutional questions be left to four and twenty popular bodies, each at liberty to decide for itself, and none bound to respect the decisions of others; and each at liberty, too, to give a new construction on every new election of its own members? Would any thing with such a principle in it, or rather with such a destitution of all principle, be fit to be called a Government? No, sir. It should not be denominated a constitution. It should be called, rather, a collection of topics, for everlasting controversy; heads of debate for a disputatious people. It would not be a Government. It would not be adequate to any practical good, nor fit for any country to live under. To avoid all possibility of being misunderstood, allow me to repeat again, in the fullest manner, that I claim no powers for the Government, by forced or unfair construction. I admit that it is a Government of strictly limited powers, of enumerated, specified, and particularized powers; and that whatsoever is not granted, is withheld. But notwithstanding all this, and however the grant of powers may be expressed, its limit and extent may yet, in some cases, admit of doubt; and the General Government would be good for nothing, it would be incapable of long existing, if some mode had not been provided, in which these doubts, as they should arise, might be peaceably, but authoritatively, solved.

And now let me run the honorable gentleman's doctrine a little into its practical application. Let us look at his probable modus operandi. If a thing can be done, an ingenious man can tell how it is to be done. Now, I wish to be informed how this State interference is to be put in practice without violence, bloodshed, and rebellion. We will take the existing case of the tariff law. South Carolina is said to have made up her opinion upon it. If we do not repeal it, (as we probably shall not,) she will then apply to the case the remedy of her doctrine. She will, we must suppose, pass a law of her Legislature, declaring the several acts of Congress, usually called the tariff laws, null and void, so far as they respect South Carolina, or the citizens thereof. So far, all is a paper transaction, and easy enough. But the collector at Charleston is collecting the duties imposed by these tariff laws; he, therefore, must be stopped. The collector will seize the goods if the tariff duties are not paid. The State authorities will undertake their rescue: the marshal, with his posse, will come to the collector's aid, and here the contest begins. The militia of the State will be called out to sustain the nullifying act. They will march, sir, under a very gallant leader: for I believe the honorable member himself commands the militia of that part of the State. He will raise the nullifying act on his standard, and spread it out as his banner! It will have a preamble, bearing, that the tariff laws are palpable, deliberate, and dangerous violations of the constitution! He will proceed, with this banner flying, to the custom-house in Charleston:

"All the while,
"Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds."

Arrived at the custom-house, he will tell the collector that he must collect no more duties under any of the tariff laws. This he will be somewhat puzzled to say, by the way, with a grave countenance, considering what hand South Carolina herself had in that of 1816. But, sir, the collector would, probably, not desist at his bidding. Here would ensue a pause: for they say that a certain stillness precedes the tempest. Before this military array should fall on the custom-house, collector, clerks, and all, it is very probable some of those composing it would request, of their gallant commander-in-chief, to be informed a little upon the point of law: for they have, doubtless, a just respect for his opinions as a lawyer, as well as for his bravery as a soldier. They know he has read Blackstone and the constitution, as well as Turenne and Vauban. They would ask him, therefore, something concerning their rights in this matter. They would inquire whether it was not somewhat dangerous to resist a law of the United States. What would be the nature of their offence, they would wish to learn, if they, by military force and array, resisted the execution, in Carolina, of a law of the United States, and it should turn out, after all, that the law was constitutional? He would answer, of course, treason. No lawyer could give any other answer. John Fries, he would tell them, had learned that some years ago. How, then, they would ask, do you propose to defend us? We are not afraid of bullets; but treason has a way of taking people off, that we do not much relish. How do you propose to defend us? "Look at my floating banner," he would reply; "see there the nullifying law!" Is it your opinion, gallant commander, they would then say, that, if we should be indicted for treason, that same floating banner of yours would make a good plea in bar? "South Carolina is a sovereign State," he would reply. That is true; but would the judge admit our plea? "These tariff laws," he would repeat, "are unconstitutional, palpably, deliberately, dangerously." That all may be so; but if the tribunals should not happen to be of that opinion, shall we swing for it? We are ready to die for our country, but it is rather an awkward business, this dying without touching the ground! After all, that is a sort of hemp tax, worse than any part of the tariff. The honorable gentleman would be in a dilemma like that of another great general: he would have a knot before him which he could not untie. He must cut it with his sword: he must say to his followers, Defend yourselves with your bayonets!—and this is war—civil war.

Direct collision, therefore, between force and force, is the unavoidable result of that remedy for the revision of unconstitutional laws which the gentleman contends for. It must happen in the very first case to which it is applied. Is not this the plain result? To resist, by force, the execution of a law, generally, is treason. Can the courts of the United States take notice of the indulgence of a State to commit treason? The common saying, that a State cannot commit treason herself, is nothing to the purpose. Can she authorize others to do it? If John Fries had produced an act of Pennsylvania, annulling the law of Congress, would it have helped his case? Talk about it as we will, these doctrines go the length of revolution. They are incompatible with any peaceable administration of the Government. They lead directly to disunion and civil commotion; and therefore it is, that, at their commencement, when they are first found to be maintained by respectable men, and in a tangible form, I enter my public protest against them all.

The honorable gentleman argues that, if this Government be the sole judge of the extent of its own powers, whether that right of judging be in Congress or the Supreme Court, it equally subverts State sovereignty. This the gentleman sees, or thinks he sees, although he cannot perceive how the right of judging, in this matter, if left to the exercise of State Legislatures, has any tendency to subvert the Government of the Union. The gentleman's opinion may be, that the right ought not to have been lodged with the General Government; he may like better such a constitution as we should have under the right of State interference; but I ask him to meet me on the plain matter of fact; I ask him to meet me on the constitution itself; I ask him if the power is not found there, clearly and visibly found there?

But, sir, what is this danger, and what the grounds of it? Let it be remembered that the Constitution of the United States is not unalterable. It is to continue in its present form no longer than the people, who established it, shall choose to continue it. If they shall become convinced that they have made an injudicious or inexpedient partition and distribution of power, between the State Governments and the General Government, they can alter that distribution at will.

If any thing be found in the national constitution, either by original provision, or subsequent interpretation, which ought not to be in it, the people know how to get rid of it. If any construction be established, unacceptable to them, so as to become, practically, a part of the constitution, they will amend it at their own sovereign pleasure. But while the people choose to maintain it as it is; while they are satisfied with it, and refuse to change it, who has given, or who can give, to the State Legislatures, a right to alter it, either by interference, construction, or otherwise? Gentlemen do not seem to recollect that the people have any power to do any thing for themselves; they imagine there is no safety for them any longer than they are under the close guardianship of the State Legislatures. Sir, the people have not trusted their safety, in regard to the general constitution, to those hands. They have required other security, and taken other bonds. They have chosen to trust themselves, first, to the plain words of the instrument, and to such construction as the Government itself, in doubtful cases, should put on its own powers, under their oaths of office, and subject to their responsibility to them; just as the people of a State trust their own State Governments with a similar power. Secondly, they have reposed their trust in the efficacy of frequent elections, and in their own power to remove their own servants and agents, whenever they see cause. Thirdly, they have reposed their trust in the Judicial power, which, in order that it might be trustworthy, they have made as respectable, as disinterested, and as independent as was practicable. Fourthly, they have seen fit to rely, in case of necessity, or high expediency, on their known and admitted power to alter or amend the constitution, peaceably and quietly, whenever experience shall point out defects or imperfections. And finally, the people of the United States have, at no time, in no way, directly or indirectly, authorized any State Legislature to construe or interpret their high instrument of Government; much less to interfere, by their own power, to arrest its course and operation.

If, sir, the people, in these respects, had done otherwise than they have done, their constitution could neither have been preserved, nor would it have been worth preserving. And, if its plain provisions shall now be disregarded, and these new doctrines interpolated in it, it will become as feeble and helpless a being as its enemies, whether early or more recent, could possibly desire. It will exist, in every State, but as a poor dependent on State permission. It must borrow leave to be; and will be no longer than State pleasure, or State discretion, sees fit to grant the indulgence, and to prolong its poor existence.

But, sir, although there are fears, there are hopes, also. The people have preserved this, their own chosen constitution, for forty years, and have seen their happiness, prosperity, and renown, grow with its growth, and strengthen with its strength. They are now, generally, strongly attached to it. Overthrown by direct assault, it cannot be; evaded, undermined, nullified, it will not be, if we, and those who shall succeed us here, as agents and representatives of the people, shall conscientiously and vigilantly discharge the two great branches of our public trust, faithfully to preserve, and wisely to administer it.

I have thus stated the reasons of my dissent to the doctrines which have been advanced and maintained. I am conscious, sir, of having detained you and the Senate much too long. I was drawn into the debate with no previous deliberation, such as is suited to the discussion of so grave and important a subject. But it is a subject of which my heart is full, and I have not been willing to suppress the utterance of its spontaneous sentiments. I cannot, even now, persuade myself to relinquish it, without expressing, once more, my deep conviction, that, since it respects nothing less than the union of the States, it is of most vital and essential importance to the public happiness. I profess, sir, in my career, hitherto, to have kept steadily in view the prosperity and honor of the whole country, and the preservation of our Federal Union. It is to that Union we owe our safety at home, and our consideration and dignity abroad. It is to that Union that we are chiefly indebted for whatever makes us most proud of our country. That Union we reached only by the discipline of our virtues in the severe school of adversity. It had its origin in the necessities of disordered finance, prostrate commerce, and ruined credit. Under its benign influence, these great interests immediately awoke, as from the dead, and sprang forth with newness of life. Every year of its duration has teemed with fresh proofs of its utility and its blessings; and, although our territory has stretched out wider and wider, and our population spread farther and farther, they have not outrun its protection or its benefits. It has been to us all a copious fountain of national, social, and personal happiness. I have not allowed myself, sir, to look beyond the Union, to see what might lie hidden in the dark recess behind. I have not coolly weighed the chances of preserving liberty, when the bonds that unite us together shall be broken asunder. I have not accustomed myself to hang over the precipice of disunion, to see whether, with my short sight, I can fathom the depth of the abyss below; nor could I regard him as a safe counsellor, in the affairs of this Government, whose thoughts should be mainly bent on considering, not how the Union should be best preserved, but how tolerable might be the condition of the people, when it shall be broken up and destroyed. While the Union lasts, we have high, exciting, gratifying prospects spread out before us, for us and our children. Beyond that, I seek not to penetrate the veil. God grant that, in my day, at least, that curtain may not rise. God grant that, on my vision, never may be opened what lies behind. When my eyes shall be turned to behold, for the last time, the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood! Let their last feeble and lingering glance, rather, behold the gorgeous ensign of the republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original lustre, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured, bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogatory as, What is all this worth? Nor those other words of delusion and folly, Liberty first, and Union afterwards: but everywhere, spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and over the land, and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart—Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable!

Mr. HAYNE said: The gentleman (Mr. WEBSTER) complains of his arguments having been misunderstood in relation to consolidation. He thinks my misapprehension almost miraculous in treating his as an argument in favor of the "consolidation of the Government." Now, sir, what was the point in dispute between us? I had deprecated the consolidation of the Government. I said not one word against the "consolidation of the Union." I went further, and pointed out, and deprecated some of the means, by which this consolidation was to be brought about. The gentleman gets up and attacks my argument at every point, ridicules our fears about "consolidation," and finally reads a passage from a letter of General Washington's, stating that one of the objects of the constitution was "the consolidation of the Union." Surely, sir, under these circumstances, I was not mistaken in saying, that the authority quoted did not apply to the case, as the point in dispute was the "consolidation of the Government," and not of the "Union." But, sir, the gentleman has relieved me from all embarrassment on this point, by going fully into the examination of the Virginia doctrines of '98; and while he denounces them, giving us his own views of the power of the Federal Government; views which, in my humble judgment, stop nothing short of the consolidation of all power in the hands of the Federal Government. Sir, when I last touched on this topic, I did little more than quote the high authorities on which our doctrines rest; but, after the elaborate argument which we have just heard from the gentleman from Massachusetts, it cannot be supposed that I can suffer them to go to the world unanswered. I entreat the Senate, therefore, to bear with me, while I go over, as briefly as possible, the most prominent arguments of the gentleman.

The proposition which I laid down, and from which the gentleman dissents, is taken from the Virginia resolutions of '98, and is in these words: "that in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise by the Federal Government of powers not granted by the compact, (the constitution,) the States who are parties thereto have a right to interpose, for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them." The gentleman insists that the States have no right to decide whether the constitution has been violated by acts of Congress or not, but that the Federal Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of its own powers; and that, in case of a violation of the constitution, however "deliberate, palpable, and dangerous," a State has no constitutional redress, except where the matter can be brought before the Supreme Court, whose decision must be final and conclusive on the subject. Having thus distinctly stated the points in dispute between the gentleman and myself, I proceed to examine them. And here it will be necessary to go back to the origin of the Federal Government. It cannot be doubted, and is not denied, that, before the formation of the constitution, each State was an independent sovereignty, possessing all the rights and powers appertaining to independent nations; nor can it be denied that, after the constitution was formed, they remained equally sovereign and independent, as to all powers not expressly delegated to the Federal Government. This would have been the case, even if no positive provision to that effect had been inserted in that instrument. But to remove all doubt, it is expressly declared, by the tenth article of the amendments of the constitution, that "the powers not delegated to the United States, by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The true nature of the Federal constitution, therefore, is, (in the language of Mr. Madison,) "a compact to which the States are parties"—a compact by which each State, acting in its sovereign capacity, has entered into an agreement with the other States, by which they have consented that certain designated powers shall be exercised by the United States, in the manner prescribed in the instrument. Nothing can be clearer, than that, under such a system, the Federal Government, exercising strictly delegated powers, can have no right to act beyond the pale of its authority, and that all such acts are void. A State, on the contrary, retaining all powers not expressly given away, may lawfully act in all cases where she has not voluntarily imposed restrictions on herself. Here, then, is a case of a compact between sovereigns; and the question arises: What is the remedy for a clear violation of its express terms by one of the parties? And here the plain obvious dictate of common sense is in strict conformity with the understanding of mankind, and the practice of nations in all analogous cases; "that, where resort can be had to no common superior, the parties to the compact must, themselves, be the rightful judges whether the bargain has been pursued or violated." (Madison's Report, p. 20.) When it is insisted by the gentleman that one of the parties (the Federal Government) "has the power of deciding ultimately and conclusively upon the extent of its own authority," I ask for the grant of such a power. I call upon the gentleman to show it to me in the constitution. It is not to be found there. If it is to be inferred from the nature of the compact, I aver that not a single argument can be urged in support of such an inference, in favor of the Federal Government, which would not apply, with at least equal force, in favor of a State. All sovereigns are of necessity equal; and any one State, however small in population or territory, has the same rights as the rest, just as the most insignificant nation in Europe is as much sovereign as France, or Russia, or England.

The very idea of a division of power by compact, is destroyed by a right claimed and exercised by either to be the exclusive interpreter of the instrument. Power is not divided, where one of the parties can arbitrarily determine its limits. A compact between two, with a right reserved to one to expound the instrument according to his own pleasure, is no compact at all, but an absolute surrender of the whole subject matter to the arbitrary discretion of the party who is constituted the judge. This is so obvious, that, in the conduct of human affairs between man and man, a common superior is always looked to as the expounder of contracts. But if there be no common superior, it results, from the very nature of things, that the parties must be their own judges. This is admitted to be the case where treaties are formed between independent nations; and, if the same rule does not apply to the federal compact, it must be because the Federal is superior to the State Government, or because the States have surrendered their sovereignty. Neither branch of this proposition can be maintained for a moment. I have already shown that all sovereigns must, as such, be equal. It only remains therefore to inquire whether the States have surrendered their sovereignty, and consented to reduce themselves to mere corporations. The whole form and structure of the Federal Government, the opinions of the framers of the constitution, and the organization of the State Governments, demonstrate that, though the States have surrendered certain specific powers, they have not surrendered their sovereignty. They have each an independent Legislature, Executive, and Judiciary, and exercise jurisdiction over the lives and property of their citizens. They have, it is true, voluntarily restrained themselves from doing certain acts, but, in all other respects, they are as omnipotent as any independent nation whatever. Here, however, we are met by the argument, that the constitution was not formed by the States in their sovereign capacity, but by the people; and it is therefore inferred that, the Federal Government being created by all the people, must be supreme; and though it is not contended that the constitution may be rightfully violated, yet it is insisted that from the decision of the Federal Government there can be no appeal. It is obvious that this argument rests on the idea of State inferiority. Considering the Federal Government as one whole, and the States merely as component parts, it follows, of course, that the former is as much superior to the latter as the whole is to the parts of which it is composed. Instead of deriving power by delegation from the States to the Union, this scheme seems to imply that the individual States derive their power from the United States, just as petty corporations may exercise so much power, and no more, as their superior may permit them to enjoy. This notion is entirely at variance with all our conceptions of State rights, as those rights were understood by Mr. Madison and others, at the time the constitution was framed. I deny that the constitution was framed by the people in the sense in which that word is used on the other side, and insist that it was framed by the States acting in their sovereign capacity. When, in the preamble of the constitution, we find the words, "we the people of the United States," it is clear they can only relate to the people as citizens of the several States, because the Federal Government was not then in existence.

We accordingly find, in every part of that instrument, that the people are always spoken of in that sense. Thus, in the second section of the first article it is declared, that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year, by the people of the several States." To show that, in entering into this compact, the States acted in their sovereign capacity, and not merely as parts of one great community, what can be more conclusive than the historical fact that, when every State had consented to it except one, she was not held to be bound? A majority of the people in any State bound that State, but nine-tenths of all the people of the United States could not bind the people of Rhode Island, until Rhode Island, as a State, had consented to the compact. It cannot be denied that, at the time the constitution was framed, the people of the United States were members of regularly organized Governments, citizens of independent States; and unless these State Governments had been dissolved, it was impossible that the people could have entered into any compact but as citizens of these States. Suppose an assent to the constitution had been given by all the people within a certain district of any State, but that the State, in its sovereign capacity, had refused its assent: would the people of that district have become citizens of the United States? Surely not. It is clear, then, that in adopting the constitution, the people did not act, and could not have acted, in any other character than as citizens of their respective States. And if, on the adoption of the constitution, they became citizens of the United States, it was only by virtue of that clause in the constitution which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." In choosing members to the convention, the States acted through their Legislatures, by whose authority the constitution, when framed, was submitted for ratification to conventions of the people, the usual and most appropriate organ of the sovereign will. I am not disposed to dwell longer on this point, which does appear to my mind to be too clear to admit of controversy. But I will quote from Mr. Madison's report, which goes the whole length in support of the doctrines for which I have contended:

"The other position involved in this branch of the resolution, namely: 'that the States are parties to the constitution, or compact,' is, in the judgment of the committee, equally free from objection. It is indeed true, that the term 'States' is sometimes used in a vague sense, and sometimes in different senses, according to the subject to which it is applied. Thus, it sometimes means the separate sections of territory occupied by the political societies within each; sometimes the particular governments established by those societies; sometimes those societies as organized into those particular governments; and, lastly, it means the people composing those political societies, in their highest sovereign capacity. Although it might be wished that the perfection of language admitted of less diversity in the signification of the same words, yet little inconvenience is produced by it where the true sense can be collected with certainty from the different applications. In the present instance, whatever different constructions of the term 'States,' in the resolution, may have been entertained, all will at least concur in that last mentioned; because, in that sense the constitution was submitted to the 'States;' in that sense the 'States' ratified it; and in that sense of the term 'States,' they are consequently parties to the compact, from which the powers of the Federal Government result."

Having now established the position that the constitution was a compact between sovereign and independent States, having no common superior, "it follows, of necessity," (to borrow the language of Mr. Madison,) "that there can be no tribunal above their authority to decide, in the last resort, whether the compact made by them be violated, and consequently, that, as the parties to it, they must themselves decide, in the last resort, such questions as may be of sufficient magnitude to require their interposition."

But, the gentleman insists that the tribunal provided by the constitution for the decision of controversies between the States and the Federal Government, is the Supreme Court. And here again I call for the authority on which the gentleman rests the assertion, that the Supreme Court has any jurisdiction whatever over questions of sovereignty between the States and the United States. When we look into the constitution we do not find it there. I put entirely out of view any act of Congress on the subject. We are not looking into the laws, but the constitution.

It is clear that questions of sovereignty are not the proper subjects of judicial investigation. They are much too large, and of too delicate a nature, to be brought within the jurisdiction of a court of justice. Courts, whether supreme or subordinate, are the mere creatures of the sovereign power designed to expound and carry into effect its sovereign will. No independent State ever yet submitted to a Judge on the bench, the true construction of the compact between himself and another sovereign. All courts may incidentally take cognizance of treaties, where rights are claimed under them; but who ever heard of a court making an inquiry into the authority of the agents of the high contracting parties to make the treaty—whether its terms had been fulfilled, or whether it had become void, on account of a breach of its conditions on either side? All these are political, and not judicial questions. Some reliance has been placed on those provisions of the constitution which constitute "one Supreme Court;" which provide that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties;" and which declare that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties, &c., shall be the supreme law of the land," &c. Now, as to the name of the Supreme Court, it is clear that the term has relation only to its supremacy over the inferior courts provided for by the constitution, and has no reference whatever to any supremacy over the sovereign States. The words are, "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish," &c. Though jurisdiction is given "in cases arising under the constitution," yet it is expressly limited to "cases in law and equity," showing conclusively that this jurisdiction was incidental merely to the ordinary administration of justice, and not intended to touch high questions of conflicting sovereignty. When it is declared that the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, it is manifest that no indication is given either as to the power of the Supreme Court to bind the States by its decision, nor as to the course to be pursued in the event of laws being passed not in pursuance of the constitution. And I beg leave to call gentlemen's attention to the striking fact, that the powers of the Supreme Court, in relation to questions arising under the laws and the constitution, are co-extensive with those arising under treaties. In all of these cases the power is limited to questions arising "in law and equity," that is to say, to cases where jurisdiction is incidentally acquired in the ordinary administration of justice. But, as with regard to treaties, the Supreme Court has never assumed jurisdiction over questions arising between the sovereigns who are parties to it, so under the constitution they cannot assume jurisdiction over questions arising between the individual States and the United States.

If they should do so, they would be acting entirely out of their sphere. Umpires are indeed sometimes appointed by special agreement, but, in the case before us, there can be no pretence that the Supreme Court have been specially constituted umpires. But, if the Judiciary are, from their character and the peculiar scope of their duties, unfit for the high office of deciding questions of sovereignty, much more strongly is the Supreme Court disqualified from assuming the umpirage between the States and the United States; because it is created by, and is indeed merely one of the departments of, the Federal Government. The United States have a Supreme Court; each State has also its Supreme Court. Both of them, in the ordinary administration of justice, must of necessity decide on the constitutionality of laws; but when it becomes a question of sovereignty between these two independent Governments, the subject matter is equally removed from the jurisdiction of both. If the Supreme Court of the United States can take cognizance of such a question, so can the Supreme Courts of the States. But, sir, can it be supposed for a moment, that, when the States proceeded to enter into the compact, called the Constitution of the United States, they could have designed, nay, that they could, under any circumstances, have consented to leave to a court to be created by the Federal Government, the power to decide, finally, on the extent of the powers of the latter, and the limitations on the powers of the former? If it had been designed to do so, it would have been so declared, and assuredly some provision would have been made to secure, as umpires, a tribunal somewhat differently constituted from that whose appropriate duty is the ordinary administration of justice. But to prove, as I think conclusively, that the Judiciary were not designed to act as umpires, it is only necessary to observe that, in a great majority of cases, that court could manifestly not take jurisdiction of the matters in dispute. Whenever it may be designed by the Federal Government to commit a violation of the constitution, it can be done, and always will be done, in such a manner as to deprive the court of all jurisdiction over the subject. Take the case of the tariff and internal improvements; whether constitutional or unconstitutional, it is admitted that the Supreme Court have no jurisdiction. Suppose Congress should, for the acknowledged purpose of making an equal distribution of the property of the country, among States or individuals, proceed to lay taxes to the amount of fifty millions of dollars a year. Could the Supreme Court take cognizance of the act laying the tax, or making the distributions? Certainly not. Take another case, which is very likely to occur. Congress have the unlimited power of taxation. Suppose them also to assume an unlimited power of appropriation. Appropriations of money are made to establish presses, promote education, build and support churches, create an order of nobility, or any other unconstitutional object; it is manifest that, in none of these cases, could the constitutionality of the laws making those grants be tested before the Supreme Court. It would be in vain that a State should come before the judges with an act appropriating money to any of these objects, and ask of the court to decide whether these grants were constitutional. They could not even be heard; the court would say, they had nothing to do with it; and they would say rightly. It is idle, therefore, to talk of the Supreme Court affording any security to the States, in cases where their rights may be violated by the exercise of unconstitutional powers, on the part of the Federal Government. On this subject Mr. Madison, in his report, says: "But it is objected, that the judicial authority is to be regarded as the sole expositor of the constitution in the last resort; and it may be asked, for what reason the declaration by the General Assembly, supposing it to be theoretically true, could be required at the present day, and in so solemn a manner? On this objection it might be observed, first, that there may be instances of usurped power, which the forms of the constitution would never draw within the control of the Judicial Department: Secondly, that, if the decision of the Judiciary be raised above the authority of the sovereign parties to the constitution, the decisions of the other departments, not carried by the forms of the constitution before the Judiciary, must be equally authoritative and final with the decisions of that department. But the proper answer to the objection is, that the resolution of the General Assembly relates to those great and extraordinary cases in which all the forms of the constitution may prove ineffectual against infractions dangerous to the essential rights of the parties to it. The resolution supposes that dangerous powers, not delegated, may not only be usurped and executed by the other departments, but that the Judicial Department also may exercise or sanction dangerous powers beyond the grant of the constitution, and consequently, that the ultimate right of the parties to the constitution to judge whether the compact has been dangerously violated, must extend to violations by one delegated authority, as well as by another—by the Judiciary as well as by the Executive or Legislative.

"However true, therefore, it may be, that the Judicial Department is, in all questions submitted to it by the forms of the constitution, to decide in the last resort, this resort must necessarily be deemed the last in relation to the authorities of the other departments of the Government; not in relation to the rights of the parties to the constitutional compact, from which the judicial as well as the other departments hold their delegated trusts. On any other hypothesis the delegation of judicial power would annul the authority delegating it; and the concurrence of this department with the others in usurped powers, might subvert forever, and beyond the possible reach of any rightful remedy, the very constitution which all were instituted to preserve."

If, then, the Supreme Court are not, and, from their organization, cannot, be the umpires in questions of conflicting sovereignty, the next point to be considered is, whether Congress themselves possess the right of deciding conclusively on the extent of their own powers. This I know is a popular notion, and it is founded on the idea that, as all the States are represented here, nothing can prevail which is not in conformity with the will of the majority; and it is supposed to be a republican maxim "that the majority must govern." Now, sir, I admit that much care has been taken to secure the States and the people from rash and unadvised legislation. The organization of two houses, the one the Representatives of the States, and the other of the people, manifest an anxiety to secure equality and justice in the operation of the federal system. But all this has done no more than to secure us against any laws but such as should be assented to by a majority of the Representatives in the two Houses of Congress.

Now will any one contend that it is the true spirit of this Government that the will of a majority of Congress should, in all cases, be the supreme law? If no security was intended to be provided for the rights of the States, and the liberty of the citizen, beyond the mere organization of the Federal Government, we should have had no written constitution, but Congress would have been authorized to legislate for us, in all cases whatever; and the acts of our State Legislatures, like those of the present legislative councils in the Territories, would have been subjected to the revision and control of Congress. If the will of a majority of Congress is to be the supreme law of the land, it is clear the constitution is a dead letter, and has utterly failed of the very object for which it was designed—the protection of the rights of the minority. But when, by the very terms of the compact, strict limitations are imposed on every branch of the Federal Government, and it is, moreover, expressly declared that all powers, not granted to them, "are reserved to the States or to the people," with what show of reason can it be contended that the Federal Government is to be the exclusive judge of the extent of its own powers? A written constitution was resorted to in this country, as a great experiment, for the purpose of ascertaining how far the rights of a minority could be secured against the encroachments of majorities—often acting under party excitement and not unfrequently under the influence of strong interests. The moment that constitution was formed, the will of a majority ceased to be the law except in cases that should be acknowledged by the parties to it to be within the constitution, and to have been thereby submitted to their will. But when Congress (exercising a delegated and strictly limited authority) pass beyond these limits, their acts become null and void, and must be declared to be so by the courts in cases within their jurisdiction; and may be pronounced to be so by the States themselves, in cases not within the jurisdiction of the courts, or of sufficient importance to justify such an interference. I will put the case strongly. Suppose, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, the Federal Government, in its three ruling branches, should (at some future day) be found "to be in combination to strip their colleagues, the State authorities, of the powers reserved by them, and to exercise themselves all powers, foreign and domestic," would there be no constitutional remedy against such a usurpation? If so, then Congress is supreme and your constitution is not worth the parchment on which it is written. What the gentleman calls the right of revolution would exist, and could be exerted as well, without a constitution as with it.

It is in vain to tell us that all the States are represented here. Representation may, or may not, afford security to the people. The only practical security against oppression, in representative Governments, is to be found in this, that those who impose the burthens are compelled to share them. Where there are conflicting interests, however, and a majority are enabled to impose burthens on the minority, for their own advantage, it is obvious that representation, on the part of that minority, can have no other effect, than to "furnish an apology for the injustice." What security would a representation of the American colonies in the British Parliament have afforded to our ancestors? What would be the value of a West India representation there now? Of what value is our representation here, on questions connected with the "American System," where (to use the strong language of a distinguished statesman) the "imposition is laid, not by the Representatives of those who pay the tax, but by the Representatives of those who are to receive the bounty?" Sir, representation will afford us ample security, if the Federal Government shall be strictly confined within the limits prescribed by the constitution, and if, limiting its action to matters in which all have a common interest, the system shall be made to operate equally over the whole country. But it will afford us none if the will of an interested majority shall be the supreme law, and Congress shall undertake to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever. Before I leave this branch of the subject, I must remark, that, while gentlemen admit, as they do, that the courts may nullify an act of Congress, by declaring it to be unconstitutional, it is impossible for them to contend that Congress are the final judges of the extent of their own powers.

I think I have now shown that the right of a State to judge of infractions of the constitution, on the part of the Federal Government, results from the very nature of the compact: and that, neither by the express provisions of that instrument, nor by any fair implication, is such a power reserved to the Federal Government, or any of its departments—executive, legislative, or judicial. But I go farther, and contend that the power in question may be fairly considered as reserved to the States, by that clause of the constitution before referred to, which provides that all powers not delegated to the United States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

No doubt can exist, that, before the States entered into the compact, they possessed the right, to the fullest extent, of determining the limits of their own powers—it is incident to all sovereignty. Now, have they given away that right, or agreed to limit or restrict it in any respect? Assuredly not. They have agreed that certain specific powers shall be exercised by the Federal Government; but the moment that government steps beyond the limits of its charter, the right of the States "to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them," is as full and complete as it was before the constitution was formed. It was plenary then, and never having been surrendered, must be plenary now. But what then, asks the gentleman? A State is brought into collision with the United States in relation to the exercise of unconstitutional powers: who is to decide between them? Sir, it is the common case of difference of opinion between sovereigns as to the true construction of a compact. Does such a difference of opinion necessarily produce war? No. And if not among rival nations, why should it do so among friendly States? In all such cases, some mode must be devised by mutual agreement, for settling the difficulty; and most happily for us that mode is clearly indicated in the constitution itself, and results, indeed, from the very form and structure of the Government. The creating power is three-fourths of the States. By their decision, the parties to the compact have agreed to be bound, even to the extent of changing the entire form of the Government itself; and it follows, of necessity, that, in case of a deliberate and settled difference of opinion between the parties to the compact, as to the extent of the powers of either, resort must be had to their common superior—(that power which may give any character to the constitution they may think proper) viz: three-fourths of the States. This is the view of the matter taken by Mr. Jefferson himself, who, in 1821, expressed himself in this emphatic manner: "It is a fatal heresy to suppose that either our State Governments are superior to the Federal or the Federal to the State; neither is authorized literally to decide what belongs to itself, or its co-partner in Government, in difference of opinion between their different sets of public servants; the appeal is to neither, but to their employers, peaceably assembled by their representatives in convention."

But it has been asked, why not compel a State, objecting to the constitutionality of a law, to appeal to her sister States, by a proposition to amend the constitution? I answer, because such a course would, in the first instance, admit the exercise of an unconstitutional authority, which the States are not bound to submit to, even for a day, and because it would be absurd to suppose that any redress could ever be obtained by such an appeal, even if a State were at liberty to make it. If a majority of both Houses of Congress should, from any motive, be induced, deliberately, to exercise "powers not granted," what prospect would there be of "arresting the progress of the evil," by a vote of three-fourths? But the constitution does not permit a minority to submit to the people a proposition for an amendment to the constitution. Such a proposition can only come from "two-thirds of the two Houses of Congress, or the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States." It will be seen, therefore, at once, that a minority, whose constitutional rights are violated, can have no redress by an amendment of the constitution. When any State is brought into direct collision with the Federal Government, in case of an attempt, by the latter, to exercise unconstitutional powers, the appeal must be made by Congress, (the party proposing to exert the disputed power,) in order to have it expressly conferred, and, until so conferred, the exercise of such authority must be suspended. Even in cases of doubt such an appeal is due to the peace and harmony of the Government. On this subject our present Chief Magistrate, in his opening message to Congress, says: "I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and where its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations. Upon this country, more than any other, has, in the providence of God, been cast the especial guardianship of the great principle of adherence to written constitutions. If it fall here, all hope in regard to it will be extinguished. That this was intended to be a Government of limited and specific, and not general powers, must be admitted by all; and it is our duty to preserve for it the character intended by its framers. The scheme has worked well. It has exceeded the hopes of those who devised it, and become an object of admiration to the world. Nothing is clearer, in my view, than that we are chiefly indebted for the success of the constitution under which we are now acting, to the watchful and auxiliary operation of the State authorities. This is not the reflection of a day, but belongs to the most deeply rooted convictions of my mind. I cannot, therefore, too strongly or too earnestly, for my own sense of its importance, warn you against all encroachments upon the legitimate sphere of State sovereignty. Sustained by its healthful and invigorating influence, the Federal system can never fall."

But the gentleman apprehends that this will "make the Union a rope of sand." Sir, I have shown that it is a power indispensably necessary to the preservation of the constitutional rights of the States, and of the people. I now proceed to show that it is perfectly safe, and will practically have no effect but to keep the Federal Government within the limits of the constitution, and prevent those unwarrantable assumptions of power, which cannot fail to impair the rights of the States, and finally destroy the Union itself. This is a Government of checks and balances. All free Governments must be so. The whole organization and regulation of every department of the Federal as well as of the State Governments, establish, beyond a doubt, that it was the first object of the great fathers of our Federal system to interpose effectual checks to prevent that over-action, which is the besetting sin of all Governments, and which has been the great enemy to freedom over all the world. There is an obvious and wide distinction between the power of acting, and of preventing action—a distinction running through the whole of our system. No one can question that, in all really doubtful cases, it would be extremely desirable to leave things as they are. And how happy would it be for mankind, and how greatly would it contribute to the peace and tranquillity of this country, and to that mutual harmony on which the preservation of the Union must depend, that the Federal Government (confining its operations to subjects clearly federal) should only be felt in the blessings which it dispenses. Look, sir, at our system of checks. The House of Representatives checks the Senate, the Senate checks the House, the Executive checks both, the Judiciary checks the whole; and it is in the true spirit of this system, that the States should check the Federal Government, at least so far as to preserve the constitution from "gross, palpable, and deliberate violations," and to compel an appeal to the amending power, in cases of real doubt and difficulty. That the States possess this right seems to be acknowledged by Alexander Hamilton himself. In the 51st number of the Federalist he says, "that, in a single republic, all the powers surrendered by the people are submitted to the administration of a single government, and usurpations are guarded against by a division of the government into separate departments. In the compound republic of America, the power surrendered by the people is first divided between two distinct governments, and then the portion allotted to each, subdivided into separate departments; hence a double security arises to the rights of the people. The different governments will control each other, at the same time each will be controlled by itself."

I have already shown, that it has been fully recognized by the Virginia resolutions of '98, and by Mr. Madison's report on these resolutions, that it is not only "the right but the duty of the States" to "judge of infractions of the constitution," and "to interpose for maintaining, within their limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."

Mr. Jefferson, on various occasions, expressed himself in language equally strong. In the Kentucky resolutions, of '98, prepared by him, it is declared that the Federal Government "was not made the exclusive and final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among parties having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself as well of infractions as the mode and measure of redress."

In the Kentucky resolutions of '98, it is even more explicitly declared, "that the several States which formed the constitution, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of the infraction, and to redress it by such measures as they may think proper."

tionable right to judge of its infractions, and that a nullification by those sovereignties of all unauthorized acts done under color of that instrument, is the rightful remedy."

But the gentleman says this right will be dangerous. Sir, I insist, that, of all the checks that have been provided by the constitution, this is by far the safest, and the least liable to abuse. It is admitted by the gentleman, that the Supreme Court may declare a law to be unconstitutional and check your further progress. Now, the Supreme Court consists of only seven judges; four are a quorum, three of whom are a majority, and may exercise this mighty power. Now, the judges of this court are without any direct responsibility, in matters of opinion, and may certainly be governed by any of the motives which it is supposed will influence a State in opposing the acts of the Federal Government. Sir, it is not my desire to excite prejudice against the Supreme Court. I not only entertain the highest respect for the individuals who compose that tribunal, but I believe they have rendered important services to the country; and that, confined within their appropriate sphere, (the decision of questions "of law and equity," they will constitute a fountain from which will forever flow the streams of pure and undefiled justice, diffusing blessings throughout the land. I object, only, to the assumption of political power, by the Supreme Court—a power which belongs not to them, and which they cannot safely exercise. But, surely, a power which the gentleman is willing to confide to three judges of the Supreme Court, may safely be intrusted to a sovereign State. Sir, there are so many powerful motives to restrain a State from taking such high ground as to interpose her sovereign power to protect her citizens from unconstitutional laws, that the danger is not that this power will be wantonly exercised, but that she will fail to exert it, even on proper occasions.

A State will be restrained by a sincere love of the Union. The people of the United States cherish a devotion to the Union, so pure, so ardent, that nothing short of intolerable oppression can ever tempt them to do any thing that may possibly endanger it. Sir, there exists, moreover, a deep and settled conviction of the benefits which result from a close connection of all the States for purposes of mutual protection and defence. This will co-operate with the feelings of patriotism to induce a State to avoid any measures calculated to endanger that connection. A State will always feel the necessity of consulting public opinion, both at home and abroad, before she resorts to any measures of such a character. She will know that, if she acts rashly, she will be abandoned even by her own citizens, and will utterly fail in the object she has in view. If, as is asserted in the Declaration of Independence, all experience has proved that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to resort to measures for redress why should this case be an exception, where so many additional motives must always be found for forbearance? Look at our own experience on this subject. Virginia and Kentucky, so far back as '98, avowed the principles for which I have been contending—principles which have never since been abandoned; and no instance has yet occurred in which it has been found necessary, practically, to exert the power asserted in those resolutions.

If the alien and sedition laws had not been yielded to the force of public opinion, there can be no doubt that the State of Virginia would have interposed to protect her citizens from its operation. And, if the apprehension of such an interposition by a State should have the effect of restraining the Federal Government from acting, except in cases clearly within the limits of their authority, surely no one can doubt the beneficial operation of such a restraining influence. Mr. Jefferson assures us that the embargo was actually yielded up, rather than force New England into open opposition to it. And it was right to yield it, sir, to the honest convictions of its unconstitutionality entertained by so large a portion of our fellow-citizens. If the knowledge that the States possess the constitutional right to interpose, in the event of "gross, deliberate, and palpable violations of the constitution," should operate to prevent a perseverance in such violations, surely the effect would be greatly to be desired. But there is one point of view in which this matter presents itself to my mind with irresistible force. The Supreme Court, it is admitted, may nullify an act of Congress, by declaring it to be unconstitutional. Can Congress, after such a nullification, proceed to enforce the law, even if they should differ in opinion from the Court? What, then, would be the effect of such a decision? And what would be the remedy in such a case? Congress would be arrested in the exercise of the disputed power, and the only remedy would be an appeal to the creating power, three-fourths of the States, for an amendment of the constitution. And by whom must such an appeal be made? It must be made by the party proposing to exercise the disputed power. Now I will ask whether a sovereign State may not be safely intrusted with the exercise of a power, operating merely as a check, which is admitted to belong to the Supreme Court, and which may be exercised every day, by any three of its members? Sir, no ideas that can be formed of arbitrary power on the one hand, and abject dependence on the other, can be carried further than to suppose that three individuals, mere men, "subject to like passions with ourselves," may be safely intrusted with the power to nullify an act of Congress, because they conceive it to be unconstitutional; but that a sovereign and independent State, even the great State of New York, is bound, implicitly, to submit to its operation, even where it violates, in the grossest manner, her own rights, or the liberties of her citizens. But we do not contend that a common case would justify the interposition.

This is "the extreme medicine of the State," and cannot become our daily bread.

Mr. Madison, in his report, says:

"It does not follow, however, that, because the States, as sovereign parties to their constitutional compact, must ultimately decide whether it has been violated; that such a decision ought to be interposed either in a hasty manner, or on doubtful and inferior occasions. Even in the case of ordinary conventions, between different nations, where, by the strict rule of interpretation, a breach of a part may be deemed a breach of the whole; every part being deemed a condition of every other part, and of the whole, it is always laid down, that the breach must be both wilful and material, to justify an application of the rule. But in the case of an intimate and constitutional Union, like that of the United States, it is evident that the interposition of the parties, in their sovereign capacity, can be called for by occasions, only, deeply and essentially affecting the vital principles of their political systems."

"The resolution has, accordingly, guarded against any misapprehension of its object, by expressly requiring, for such an interposition, 'the case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous breach of the constitution, by the exercise of powers not granted by it.' It must be a case, not of a light and transient nature, but of a nature dangerous to the great purposes for which the constitution was established. It must be a case, moreover, not obscure or doubtful in its construction, but plain and palpable. Lastly, it must be a case, not resulting from a partial consideration, or hasty determination, but a case stamped with a final consideration and deliberate adherence. It is not necessary, because the resolution does not require that the question should be discussed how far the exercise of any particular power, ungranted by the constitution, would justify the interposition of the parties to it; as cases might easily be stated which none would contend ought to fall within that description, and cases, on the other hand, might, with equal ease, be stated, so flagrant and so fatal, as to unite every opinion in placing them within the description."

"But the resolution has done more than guard against misconstruction, by expressly referring to cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous nature. It specifies the object of the interposition which it contemplates, to be, solely, that of arresting the progress of the evil of usurpation, and of maintaining the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to the States, as parties to the constitution."

No one can read this without perceiving that Mr. Madison goes the whole length in support of the principles for which I have been contending.

The gentleman has called upon us to carry out our scheme practically. Now, sir, if I am correct in my view of this matter, then it follows, of course, that the right of a State being established, the Federal Government is bound to acquiesce in a solemn decision of a State, acting in its sovereign capacity, at least so far as to make an appeal to the people for an amendment to the constitution. This solemn decision of a State (made either through its Legislature, or a convention, as may be supposed to be the proper organ of its sovereign will—a point I do not propose now to discuss) binds the Federal Government, under the highest constitutional obligation, not to resort to any means of coercion against the citizens of the dissenting State. How, then, can any collision ensue between the Federal and State Governments, unless, indeed, the former should determine to enforce the law by unconstitutional means? What could the Federal Government do, in such a case? Resort, says the gentleman, to the courts of justice. Now, can any man believe, that, in the face of a solemn decision of a State, that an act of Congress is "a gross, palpable, and deliberate violation of the constitution," and the interposition of its sovereign authority to protect its citizens from the usurpation, that juries could be found ready merely to register the decrees of the Congress, wholly regardless of the unconstitutional character of their acts? Will the gentleman contend that juries are to be coerced to find verdicts at the point of the bayonet? And if not, how are the United States to enforce an act solemnly pronounced to be unconstitutional? But, if the attempt should be made to carry such a law into effect, by force, in what would the case differ from an attempt to carry into effect an act nullified by the courts, or to do any other unlawful and unwarrantable act? Suppose Congress should pass an agrarian law, or a law emancipating our slaves, or should commit any other gross violation of our constitutional rights, will any gentleman contend that the decision of every branch of the Federal Government, in favor of such laws, could prevent the States from declaring them null and void, and protecting their citizens from their operation?

Sir, if Congress should ever attempt to enforce any such laws, they would put themselves so clearly in the wrong, that no one could doubt the right of the State to exert its protecting power.

Sir, the gentleman has alluded to that portion of the militia of South Carolina with which I have the honor to be connected, and asked how they would act in the event of the nullification of the tariff law by the State of South Carolina? The tone of the gentleman, on this subject, did not seem to me as respectful as I could have desired. I hope, sir, no imputation was intended.

[Mr. WEBSTER. "Not at all; just the reverse."]

Well, sir, the gentleman asks, what their leaders would be able to read to them out of Coke upon Littleton, or any other law book, to justify their enterprise? Sir, let me assure the gentleman that, whenever any attempt shall be made from any quarter, to enforce unconstitutional laws, clearly violating our essential rights, our leaders (whoever they may be) will not be found reading black letter from the musty pages of old law books. They will look to the constitution, and when called upon, by the sovereign authority of the State, to preserve and protect the rights secured to them by the charter of their liberties, they will succeed in defending them, or "perish in the last ditch."

Sir, I will put the case home to the gentleman. Is there any violation of the constitutional rights of the States, and the liberties of the citizen, (sanctioned by Congress and the Supreme Court,) which he would believe it to be the right and duty of a State to resist? Does he contend for the doctrine of "passive obedience and non-resistance?" Would he justify an open resistance to an act of Congress, sanctioned by the courts, which should abolish the trial by jury, or destroy the freedom of religion, or the freedom of the press? Yes, sir, he would advocate resistance in such cases; and so would I, and so would all of us. But such resistance would, according to his doctrine, be revolution; it would be rebellion. According to my opinion, it would be just, legal, and constitutional resistance. The whole difference between us, then, consists in this: The gentleman would make force the only arbiter in all cases of collision between the States and the Federal Government. I would resort to a peaceful remedy, the interposition of the State to "arrest the progress of the evil," until such time as "a convention (assembled at the call of Congress, or two-thirds of the States) shall decide to which they mean to give an authority claimed by two of their organs." Sir, I say with Mr. Jefferson, (whose words I have here borrowed,) that "it is the peculiar wisdom and felicity of our constitution to have provided this peaceable appeal, where that of other nations" (and I may add that of the gentleman) "is at once to force."

The gentleman has made an eloquent appeal to our hearts in favor of union. Sir, I cordially respond to that appeal. I will yield to no gentleman here in sincere attachment to the Union; but it is a union founded on the constitution, and not such a union as that gentleman would give us, that is dear to my heart. If this is to become one great "consolidated Government," swallowing up the rights of the States, and the liberties of the citizen, "riding over the plundered ploughmen and beggared yeomanry," the Union will not be worth preserving. Sir, it is because South Carolina loves the Union, and would preserve it forever, that she is opposing now, while there is hope, those usurpations of the Federal Government which, once established, will, sooner or later, tear this Union into fragments. The gentleman is for marching under a banner, studded all over with stars, and bearing the inscription Liberty and Union. I had thought, sir, the gentleman would have borne a standard, displaying in its ample folds a brilliant sun, extending its golden rays from the centre to the extremities, in the brightness of whose beams the "little stars" hide their diminished heads." Ours, sir, is the banner of the constitution: the twenty-four stars are there, in all their undiminished lustre: on it is inscribed, Liberty—the Constitution—Union. We offer up our fervent prayers to the Father of all Mercies that it may continue to wave, for ages yet to come, over a free, a happy, and a united people.

Mr. WEBSTER now took the floor, in conclusion, and said: A few words, Mr. President, on this constitutional argument, which the honorable gentleman has labored to reconstruct.

His argument consists of two propositions, and an inference. His propositions are—

1. That the constitution is a compact between the States.

2. That a compact between two, with authority reserved to one to interpret its terms, would be a surrender to that one, of all power whatever.

3. Therefore, (such is his inference,) the General Government does not possess the authority to construe its own powers.

Now, sir, who does not see, without the aid of exposition or detection, the utter confusion of ideas, involved in this, so elaborate and systematic argument?

The constitution, it is said, is a compact between States; the States, then, and the States only, are parties to the compact. How comes the General Government itself a party? Upon the honorable gentleman's hypothesis, the General Government is the result of the compact, the creature of the compact, not one of the parties to it. Yet the argument, as the gentleman has now stated it, makes the Government itself one of its own creators. It makes it a party to that compact to which it owes its own existence.

For the purpose of erecting the constitution on the basis of a compact, the gentleman considers the States as parties to that compact; but as soon as his compact is made, then he chooses to consider the General Government, which is the offspring of that compact, not its offspring, but one of its parties; and so, being a party, has not the power of judging on the terms of compact. Pray, sir, in what school is such reasoning as this taught?

If the whole of the gentleman's main proposition were conceded to him, that is to say—if I admit for the sake of the argument, that the constitution is a compact between States, the inferences which he draws from that proposition are warranted by no just reason. Because, if the constitution be a compact between States, still, that constitution or that compact, has established a Government, with certain powers; and whether it be one of those powers, that it shall construe and interpret for itself the terms of the compact, in doubtful cases, can only be decided by looking to the compact, and inquiring what provisions it contains on this point. Without any inconsistency with natural reason, the Government, even thus created, might be trusted with this power of construction. The extent of its powers, therefore, must still be sought for in the instrument itself.

If the old confederation had contained a clause, declaring that resolutions of the Congress should be the supreme law of the land, any State law or constitution to the contrary notwithstanding, and that a Committee of Congress, or any other body created by it, should possess judicial powers, extending to all cases arising under resolutions of Congress, then the power of ultimate decision would have been vested in Congress, under the confederation, although that confederation was a compact between States; and for this plain reason, that it would have been competent to the States, who alone were parties to the compact, to agree who should decide in cases of dispute arising on the construction of the compact.

For the same reason, sir, if I were now to concede to the gentleman his principal propositions, viz: that the constitution is a compact between States, the question would still be, what provision is made, in this compact, to settle points of disputed construction, or contested power, that shall come into controversy? And this question would still be answered, and conclusively answered, by the constitution itself. While the gentleman is contending against construction, he himself is setting up the most loose and dangerous construction. The constitution declares that the laws of Congress shall be the supreme law of the land. No construction is necessary here. It declares, also, with equal plainness and precision, that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to every case arising under the laws of Congress. This needs no construction, here is a law, then, which is declared to be supreme; and here is a power established, which is to interpret that law. Now, sir, how has the gentleman met this? Suppose the constitution to be a compact, yet here are its terms, and how does the gentleman get rid of them? He cannot argue the seal off the bond, nor the words out of the instrument. Here they are—what answer does he give to them? None in the world, sir, except that the effect of this would be to place the States in a condition of inferiority; and because it results, from the very nature of things, there being no superior, that the parties must be their own judges! Thus closely and cogently does the honorable gentleman reason on the words of the constitution. The gentleman says, if there be such a power of final decision in the General Government, he asks for the grant of that power. Well, sir, I show him the grant—I turn him to the very words—I show him that the laws of Congress are made supreme; and that the judicial power extends, by express words, to the interpretation of these laws. Instead of answering this, he retreats into the general reflection, that it must result, from the nature of things, that the States, being parties, must judge for themselves.

I have admitted, that, if the constitution were to be considered as the creature of the State Governments, it might be modified, interpreted, or construed, according to their pleasure. But, even in that case, it would be necessary that they should agree. One, alone, could not interpret it conclusively; one, alone, could not construe it; one, alone, could not modify it. Yet the gentleman's doctrine is, that Carolina, alone, may construe and interpret that compact which equally binds all, and gives equal rights to all.

So then, sir, even supposing the constitution to be a compact between the States, the gentleman's doctrine, nevertheless, is not maintainable; because, first, the General Government is not a party to that compact, but a Government established by it, and vested by it with the powers of trying and deciding doubtful questions; and secondly, because, if the constitution be regarded as a compact, not one State only, but all the States, are parties to that compact, and one can have no right to fix upon it her own peculiar construction.

So much, sir, for the argument, even if the premises of the gentleman were granted, or could be proved. But, sir, the gentleman has failed to maintain his leading proposition. He has not shown, it cannot be shown, that the constitution is a compact between State Governments. The constitution itself, in its very front, refutes that proposition: it declares that it is ordained and established by the people of the United States. So far from saying that it is established by the Governments of the several States, it does not even say that it is established by the people of the several States; but it pronounces that it is established by the people of the United States in the aggregate. The gentleman says, it must mean no more than that the people of the several States, taken collectively, constitute the people of the United States; be it so, but it is in this, their collective capacity; it is as all the people of the United States that they establish the constitution. So they declare; and words cannot be plainer than the words used.

When the gentleman says the constitution is a compact between the States, he uses language exactly applicable to the old confederation. He speaks as if he were in Congress before 1789. He describes fully that old state of things then existing. The confederation was, in strictness, a compact; the States, as States, were parties to it. We had no other General Government. But that was found insufficient, and inadequate to the public exigencies. The people were not satisfied with it, and undertook to establish a better. They undertook to form a General Government, which should stand on a new basis—not a confederacy, not a league, not a compact between States, but a constitution; a popular Government, founded in popular election, directly responsible to the people themselves and divided into branches, with prescribed limits of power, and prescribed duties. They ordained such a Government; they gave it the name of a constitution, and therein they established a distribution of powers between this, their General Government, and their several State Governments. When they shall become dissatisfied with this distribution, they can alter it. Their own power over their own instrument remains. But, until they shall alter it, it must stand as their will, and is equally binding on the General Government and on the States.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

The gentleman, sir, finds analogy, where I see none. He likens it to the case of a treaty, in which, there being no common superior, each party must interpret for itself, under its own obligation of good faith. But this is not a treaty, but a constitution of Government, with powers to execute itself, and fulfil its duties.

I admit, sir, that this Government is a Government of checks and balances; that is, the House of Representatives is a check on the Senate, and the Senate is a check on the House, and the President is a check on both. But I cannot comprehend him, or, if I do, I totally differ from him, when he applies the notion of checks and balances to the interference of different Governments. He argues that, if we transgress, each State, as a State, has a right to check us. Does he admit the converse of the proposition, that we have a right to check the States? The gentleman's doctrines would give us a strange jumble of authorities and powers, instead of Governments of separate and defined powers. It is the part of wisdom, I think, to avoid this; and to keep the General Government and the State Governments, each in its proper sphere, avoiding, as carefully as possible, every kind of interference.

Finally, sir, the honorable gentleman says, that the States will only interfere, by their power, to preserve the constitution. They will not destroy it, they will not impair it—they will only save, they will only preserve, they will only strengthen it! Ah, sir, this is but the old story. All regulated Governments, all free Governments, have been broken up by similar disinterested and well-disposed interference! It is the common pretence. But I take leave of the subject.

TUESDAY, February 2.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

Mr. BENTON * said: Among the novelties of this debate, is that part of the speech of the

Senator from Massachusetts which dwells with such elaboration of argument and ornament, upon the love and blessings of Union—the hatred and horror of disunion. It was a part of the Senator's speech which brought into full play the favorite Ciceronian figure of amplification. It was up to the rule in that particular. But, it seemed to me, that there was another rule, and a higher, and a precedent one, which it violated. It was the rule of propriety; that rule which requires the fitness of things to be considered; which requires the time, the place, the subject, and the audience, to be considered; and condemns the delivery of the argument, and all its flowers, if it fails in congruence to these particulars. I thought the essay upon union and disunion had so failed. It came to us when we were not prepared for it; when there was nothing in the Senate, nor in the country, to grace its introduction; nothing to give, or to receive, effect to, or from, the impassioned scene that we witnessed. It may be, it was the prophetic cry of the distracted daughter of Priam, breaking into the council, and alarming its tranquil members with vaticinations of the fall of Troy; but to me, it all sounded like the sudden proclamation for an earthquake, when the sun, the earth, the air, announced no such prodigy; when all the elements of nature were at rest, and sweet repose pervading the world. There was a time, and you, and I, and all of us, did see it, sir, when such a speech would have found, in its delivery, every attribute of a just and rigorous propriety! It was at a time, when the five-striped banner was waving over the land of the North! when the Hartford Convention was in session! when the language in the capitol was, "Peaceably, if we can; forcibly, if we must!" when the cry, out of doors, was, "the Potomac the boundary; the negro States by themselves! The Alleghanies the boundary; the Western savages by themselves! The Mississippi the boundary, let Missouri be governed by a prefect, or given up as a haunt for wild beasts!" That time was the fit occasion for this speech; and if it had been delivered then, either in the hall of the House of Representatives, or in the den of the convention, or in the high way, among the bearers and followers of the five-striped banner, what effects must it not have produced! What terror and was to be effected constitutionally by the co-operation of the States in appealing to public sentiment and influencing the elections. Taking Mr. Hayne's speech and doctrine in this sense, he considered Mr. Webster's attribution of a disunion design in South Carolina to be groundless and unfounded, and brought forward as a set-off to the old Hartford Convention business in New England. And thus, viewing the imputed disunion design as unfounded, and merely produced as a counterpoise to the imputation against New England, he made a few remarks to that effect, and to show that the supremacy of the Supreme Court was over inferior courts, and not over the States and Congress. These remarks are here given, and show the sense in which they were spoken.

* Mr. Benton spoke fully on other branches of this debate, but nothing on the nullification branch of it. He did not then believe in any design of forcible resistance to the Tariff laws of the United States; nor did he believe in that design until the enactment of the South Carolina nullifying ordinance of November, 1852. He believed at the time of the debate that Mr. Hayne spoke, as he alleged, in the Virginia sense of nullification; that is—that the act in question was null and void, as being against the constitution, but to be obeyed while it remained unrepealed; and that its repeal consternation among the plotters of disunion! But, here, in this loyal and quiet assemblage, in this season of general tranquillity and universal allegiance, the whole performance has lost its effect for want of affinity, connection, or relation, to any subject depending, or sentiment expressed, in the Senate; for want of any application, or reference, to any event impending in the country.

I now take leave of this part of my subject, with one expression of unmixed satisfaction, at a part, a very small part, of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts; it is the part in which he disclaimed, in reply to an inquiry from you, sir, the imputation of a change of policy on the Tariff and Internal Improvement questions. Before that disclaimer was heard, a thousand voices would have sworn to the imputation; since, no one will swear it. And the reason given for not referring to you, for not speaking at you, was decent and becoming. You have no right of reply, and manhood disdains to attack you. This I comprehend to have been the answer, and the reason so promptly given by the Senator from Massachusetts in reply to your inquiry. I am pleased at it. It gives me an opportunity of saying there was something in that speech which commands my commendation, and, at the same time, relieves me from the duty of stating to the Senate a reason why the presiding officer, being Vice President of the United States, should not be struck at from this floor. He cannot reply, and that disability is his shield in the eyes of all honorable men.

I touched it incidentally, towards the conclusion of my speech of yesterday, on the large—I think I may say despotic—power, claimed by the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) for the Federal Supreme Court, over the independent States, whose voluntary union has established this confederacy. I touched incidentally upon it, and now recur to it for the purpose of making a single remark, and presenting a single illustration of the consequences of that doctrine. That court is called supreme; but this character of supremacy, which the Federal constitution bestows upon it, has reference to inferior courts—the District and Circuit Courts—and not to the States of this Union. A power to decide on the Federal constitutionality of State laws, and to bind the States by the decision, in all cases whatsoever, is a power to govern the States. It is a power over the sovereignty of the States; and that power includes, in its practical effects, authority over every minor act and proceeding of the States. The range of Federal authority was large, under the words of the constitution; it is becoming unlimited under the assumption of implied powers. The room for conflict between Federal and State laws was sufficiently ample, in cultivating the clear and open field of the expressed powers; when the exploration of the wilderness of implications is to be added to it, the recurrence of these conflicts becomes incessant and universal, covering all time, and meeting at every point of Federal or State policy. The annihilation of the States, under a doctrine which would draw all these conflicts to the Federal Judiciary, and make its decisions binding upon the States, and subjected to the penalties of treason all who resisted the execution of these decrees, would produce that consequence. It would annihilate the States! It would reduce them to the abject condition of provinces of the Federal Empire! It would enable the dominant party in Congress, at any moment, to execute the most frightful designs. Let us suppose a case—one by no means improbable—on the contrary almost absolutely certain, in the event of the success of certain measures now on foot: The late Mr. King, of New York, when a member of the American Senate, declared, upon this floor, that slavery in these United States, in point of law and right, did not exist, and could not exist, under the nature of our free form of Government; and that the Supreme Court of the United States would so declare it. This declaration was made about ten years ago, in the crisis and highest paroxysm of the Missouri agitation. Since then, we have seen this declaration repeated and enforced, in every variety of form and shape, by an organized party in all the non-slaveholding States. Since then, we have seen the principles of the same declaration developed in legislative proceedings, in the shape of committee reports and public debate, in the halls of Congress. Since then, we have had the D'Auterive case, and seen a petition presented from the Chair of the House of Representatives, Mr. JOHN W. TAYLOR being Speaker, in which the total destruction of all the States that would not abandon slavery was expressly represented as a sublime act. With these facts before us, and myriads of others which I cannot repeat, but which are seen by all, the probability of a federal legislative act against slavery rises in the scale, and assumes the character of moral certainty, in the event of the success of certain designs now on foot. So much for what may happen in Congress. Now for the Judiciary. I have just referred to the declaration of an ex-Senator, (Mr. KIVE of New York,) of all others the best acquainted with the arcana of his party; who was to that party, for a full quarter of a century, the law and the prophets; for a bold assertion of what the Supreme Court would do in a question of existence, or non-existence, of slavery in the United States. He openly asserted the Supreme Court would declare that no such thing could exist! It is not to be presumed that that aged, experienced, informed and responsible Senator would have hazarded an assertion of such dire and dreadful import; an assertion so delicately affecting the judges then on the bench of that court; a majority of them his personal and political friends; and looking to such disastrous consequences to the Union, without probable, if not certain, ground for the basis of his assertion. That he had such grounds, so far at least as one of the judges was concerned, seems to be incontestable. A charge delivered to a grand jury by Mr. Justice Story, at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in the month of May, 1820—for the date is material—it tallies, in point of time, with the assertion in the Senate, and was classed for review as an article of politics, in the North American Review, with the substance of Mr. King's two speeches on the floor of the Senate, which were the signal for the Missouri strife—a signal as well understood and as implicitly obeyed, as the signal for battle in the Roman camp, when the Red Mantle of the Consul was hung on the outside of the tent. This charge, to a grand jury, establishes the fact of authority for the assertion of Mr. King so far at least as one of the Judges is concerned. But as every man should be judged by his own words, and not upon the recital of another, let the charge itself be read; let the Judge announce his own sentiments, in his own language.

The Charge—Extract.

"The existence of slavery under any shape is so repugnant to the natural rights of man and the dictates of justice, that it seems difficult to find for it any adequate justification. It undoubtedly had its origin in times of barbarism, and was the ordinary lot of those who were conquered in war. It was supposed that the conqueror had a right to take the life of his captive, and by consequence might well bind him to perpetual servitude. But the position itself on which this supposed right is founded is not true. No man has a right to kill his enemy, except in cases of absolute necessity; and this absolute necessity ceases to exist, even in the estimation of the conqueror himself, when he has spared the life of his prisoner. And even if, in such cases, it were possible to contend for the right of slavery, as to the prisoner himself, it is impossible that it can justly extend to his innocent offspring, through the whole line of descent. I forbear, however, to touch on this delicate topic, not because it is not worthy of the most deliberate attention of all of us, but it does not properly fall in my province on the present occasion."

"And, gentlemen, how can we justify ourselves, or apologize for an indifference to this subject? Our constitutions of government have declared that all men are born free and equal, and have certain unalienable rights, among which are the right of enjoying their lives, liberty, and property, and seeking and obtaining their own safety and happiness. May not the miserable African ask, 'Am I not a man and a brother?' We boast of our noble strength against the encroachments of tyranny, but do we forget that it assumed the mildest form in which authority ever assailed the rights, and yet there are men amongst us who think it no wrong to condemn the shivering negro to perpetual slavery."

"We believe in the Christian religion. It commands us to have good will to all men; to love our neighbors as ourselves, and to do unto all men as we would they should do unto us. It declares our accountability to the Supreme God for all our actions, and holds out to us a state of future rewards and punishments, as the sanction by which our conduct is to be regarded. And yet there are men, calling themselves Christians, who degrade the negro by ignorance to a level with the brutes, and deprive him of all the consolations of religion. He alone, of all the rational creation, they seem to think, is to be at once accountable for his actions, and yet his actions are not to be at his own disposal; but his mind, his body, and his feelings are to be sold to perpetual bondage."

We will take the case of slavery then as the probable, and in the event of the success of certain designs now on foot, as the certain one, on which the new doctrine of judicial supremacy over the States may be tried. The case of the Georgia Cherokees is a more proximate, and may be a precedent one; but as no intimation of the possible decision of the court in that case has been given, I shall pretermit it, and limit myself to the slavery case, in which the declaration of Mr. King, and the charge of one of the judges, leaves me at liberty to enter, without guilt of intrusion, into that sanctum sanctorum of the judiciary—the privy chamber of the judges—the door of which has been flung wide open. Let us suppose then that a law of Congress passes, declaring that slavery does not exist in the United States—that the States south of the Potomac and Ohio, with Missouri from the West of the Mississippi, deny the constitutionality of the law—that the Supreme Court takes cognizance of the denial—commands the refractory States to appear at its bar—decides in favor of the law of Congress, and puts forth the decree which, according to the new doctrine, it is treason to resist! What next? Either acquiescence or resistance, on the part of the slave States. Acquiescence involves, on the part of the States towards this court, a practical exemplification of the old slavish doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance which the Sacheverells of Queen Anne's time preached and promulgated in favor of the King against the subject; with all the mischief, superadded, of turning loose two millions of slaves here, as the French National Convention and their agents, Santhonax and La Croix, had turned loose the slaves of the West India islands. Resistance incurs all the guilt of treason and rebellion; draws down upon the devoted States the troops and fanatics of the Federal Government; arms all the negroes according to the principle declared in D'Aute-ri-ve's case, and calls in, by way of attending to the women and children, the knife and the hatchet of those Georgia Cherokees which it is now the organized policy of a political party to retain, and maintain, in the bosom of the South.

Indian Agencies.

The bill authorizing the President of the United States to divide Indian agencies in certain cases was read the second time; when

Mr. WHITE, the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, said, that the bill originated from a resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BENTON,) and was framed by the committee after an examination into the subject, together with such information as the committee had before them. The bill contained nothing which would compel the President to divide any of the Indian agencies; it merely provided that he might do it, when the public good, and the convenience and comfort of the agents themselves might, in his opinion, require it; there being no additional expense created by the provisions of the bill, as the compensation now given to one agent was to be divided when the agency was divided. It appeared to the committee that many of the Indian tribes were divided into different bands, residing at remote points from each other, and the consequence was, that the agents for such tribes, selecting their own places of residence, either located themselves in one of the frontier towns, or resided with one of the separate bands, and thus the business of the Government could not be as well transacted as if the agent had all the Indians under his care, placed immediately within his own view. If the agent selected the town of one of the bands belonging to the tribe placed under his superintendence, for his place of residence, instead of the other, jealousies and heart-burnings were engendered; and the band that believed itself to be neglected were too apt to accuse him of partiality and injustice. In some instances, agents had two distinct tribes placed under their superintendence, and thus a greater inconvenience was created than where one tribe was divided into two bands. Under every view which the committee had been able to take of the subject, they were of opinion that the adoption of the measure proposed in the bill would be productive of much good, without the possibility of any disadvantage resulting from it.

Mr. BAXTON said that, from the information he had received from those who had been employed among the Indians, and who had, therefore, an ample opportunity of judging of the policy of the proposed measure, he was inclined to the opinion that it was a bad one. He thought it impolitic to create further division of the Indian tribes by extending statutory discretion to the Executive of the United States. One of the greatest evils which now afflicts the Indian tribes, may be traced to the ambition, divisions, and dissensions, of petty chiefs, who claimed distinctions, presents, and power, from their respective tribes. Mr. B. stated that the more closely the Indians were brought together in their relations with the General Government the better: for the experience of those engaged in Indian affairs proves that consolidation is much more desirable than separation. The latter encouraged that ambitious spirit by which the Government was already too much harassed; the disunion of small chiefs, forming separate bands to promote their own evil purposes. Each of these wished to be head of his little band; and this may be considered one of the greatest evils which the Indians and the Government had to contend with. Under these views he had come to the conclusion that it would be better to consolidate the Indians, than to pass a law by which they would be separated. The truth is, said Mr. B., a general complaint has long prevailed against our Indian agents. Instead of living with the tribe or nation for which they are appointed agents, they settle themselves in one of our frontier towns, at a great distance from many of these Indians who have to transact business with them. This evil, Mr. B. thought, would be increased by the proposed law; as it was not to be supposed that an agent could bestow as much attention to the business when the compensation is to be so reduced, as he would devote when receiving a more liberal salary. The President, under the operation of the law, will be constantly harassed with the broils of little chiefs and petty agents.

Mr. WHITE replied that he thought, with the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BAXTON,) that the soundest policy would be to pursue that course which tended to concentrate the individuals belonging to the same tribe of Indians, in preference to permitting them to be divided in various bands; and he was inclined to think that the adoption of the measure before the Senate would produce a result contrary to that apprehended by the Senator from Missouri, (Mr. BAXTON,) who had last addressed the Senate. Under the present state of things, it might be the policy of individuals residing with the Indian tribes (consulting their own comforts) to encourage their division into distinct bands, as they would, in such case, be sure of finding an apology for residing with neither subdivisions of the tribe; while, on the other hand, if the bill should pass, they would find it their interest to prevent any separation of the tribe under their care; knowing that, if the President did divide the agency, he would divide, also, the emoluments attached to it. It was highly probable that, if the Indian agents themselves were consulted, a variety of opinions would be received from them in relation to the measure; some would believe it would produce much good, while others would be of a contrary opinion. Take, for instance, the case of the Chippewas, who were divided into three bands; one of which had, when necessary to transact its business with the Indian agent, to travel a considerable distance, and through the borders of the country of the Sioux, with whom they were frequently at war: a division of the agency, therefore, in this case at least, would tend to prevent collision, and perhaps bloodshed. Under all these circumstances, Mr. W. was of opinion that placing the power proposed by the bill in the hands of the President, would be the means, not only of providing against disunion among the Indians themselves, but of making it the interest of the agents to use all the influence they might possess to discourage discord, and of taking away any excuse they might have for residing at a distance from the tribes placed under their superintendence. He (Mr. W.) had no personal intercourse, it was true, with those tribes which were to be affected by the bill; gentlemen who lived nearer doubtless possessed more information in relation to them than he did; but he had seen letters from several Indian agents, recommending the measure now under discussion, though the gentleman from Missouri might have received information of a contrary nature; and from these and other information which had been before the committee, he was perfectly satisfied with its expediency.

Mr. BAXTON observed that it was, perhaps, unnecessary for him to say any thing on the subject, after the explanation that had been given by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, (Mr. WHITE.) Mr. B. said that there was no doubt but agents would be opposed to the present arrangement; that they were opposed to living among the Indian tribes, and this was one of the greatest causes of jealousy and hatred. One band of the Osages separated from their nation on the last day of receiving the donation, charging the agent with partiality. Evils of a similar character were constantly occurring; besides, one tribe, in passing to and from the agency, comes in collision with another tribe, and thus irritations and quarrels were continued. He, Mr. B., knew of no plan by which these evils would be more effectually prevented than by the operation of the proposed measure. He observed that the bill does not authorize the President to divide the Indian tribes, but merely, when a division already exists, to appoint a separate agent. He thought that a division of salary corresponding with the division of labor would have a salutary tendency, both with regard to the Indians themselves, and the agents appointed to regulate their concerns.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time—yeas 30, nays 9.

MONDAY, February 8.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

Mr. ROWAN said: The epithet of supremacy, which is so unceasingly applied to the court, is calculated to swell the volume of their power, in the minds of the unthinking. Its supremacy is entirely relative, and imports only that appellate and corrective jurisdiction which it may exercise over the subordinate courts of the General Government. The appellate court of every State is just as supreme as it is; and in the same way, and for the same reasons. It is not supreme in reference to the other departments of the Government; nor has it any supremacy in reference to the States; and yet the gentleman (Mr. WEBSTER) will have it that this

Supreme Court, which derives its title of supremacy from its control over the proceedings of inferior judicial tribunals, shall control and restrain the Supreme Courts of the States, and the States themselves. That the mere modicum of judicial power which they are permitted by the States to exercise, shall be exerted to control them in the exercise of their sovereign power.

Sir, I deny that it was the intention of the States, in the formation of the constitution, to invest that tribunal with the power of doing any political act whatever. The power accorded to that court was purely judicial, and was intended to be so. If it had been intended that they should exercise the political power, which is not asserted for them, its exercise would have been subjected to some checks, to some responsibility. It cannot be reasonably supposed that, after subjecting the exercise of political power by all the other functions of the Government, to judicious and well-devised checks, it was intended to subject all to the unchecked and irresponsible power of this court. But, upon this point, I have given my opinions in a previous part of my argument. I must, however, be permitted to say, that the judges, in the States, as well as in the General Government, even in reference to the exercise of their mere judicial powers, are left by the constitutions dangerously irresponsible. The independence of the Judiciary has, in my opinion, been greatly misconceived. Sir, the true independence of the judges consists in their dependence upon, and responsibility to, the people. The surest exemption from dependence upon any is independence upon all. In free governments, we have nothing more stable than the will of the people. To be independent of that, is to rebel against the principles of free government. It is a dependence upon, and a conscious responsibility to, the will of the people, that will best secure the judge from local, partial, and personal influences. But on what principle should those who administer the laws be less responsible to the people than those who make them? The laws operate as they are expounded, not as they are made. It is in the exposition of them that they operate oppressively; and all responsibility is to secure against oppression. But there can be no oppression, or scarcely any, without the consent of the judges. The judges are irresponsible, and the people are everywhere oppressed? But I hold it to be universally true that all power which may be irresponsibly exercised, will be exercised oppressively. It has always been so; it always will be so; for the judges are but men.

But to return to the judges of the Supreme Court. They are authorized "to take jurisdiction of all causes in law and equity, arising under the constitution, laws of Congress, and treaties made pursuant to it;" and that constitution, together with the treaties, and the laws of Congress made pursuant to it, are to be the "supreme law of the land." This is their power; and this the character and force of the constitution, laws of Congress, and treaties. Now, suppose there shall exist, between two of the States, a dispute as to territorial boundary, and the Congress shall pass a law giving the disputed territory to one of the contending States; and suppose the judges shall affirm the validity of this law; must the State whose territory has been thus invaded and taken from it by Congress submit to the decision, or incur the guilt of rebellion? Is that to be the practical operation of the gentleman's doctrine? Or, suppose the territorial boundary of any one of the States shall be altered by treaty, and a portion of its territory transferred to a foreign power, and the Supreme Court were to decide that the treaty was constitutional, must the State thus dismembered acquiesce, or, by resisting, be denounced as a rebel? And would the gentleman assert that this operation was merely imposing a salutary restraint upon State sovereignty? Now, sir, I deny that the power to declare a law of Congress, or of any of the States, unconstitutional, was ever conferred, or intended to be conferred, upon the judiciary of any of the States, or of the General Government, as a direct substantive power. The exercise of this power is incidental to the exercise of the mere judicial power which was conferred. The validity of a law, involved by a case, may be incidentally decided, in deciding the law and justice of the case. But the decision must be made with an eye to the law and justice of the case, and not in reference to the just or unjust exercise of the legislative power which was exerted in making the law. Not in the view to check, control, or restrain the legislative power. It must be given in the exercise of merely a judicial, and not of political power.

Thus exercising its jurisdiction, the court would command the respect and confidence of the people as a judicial tribunal. But when it merges its appropriate judicial, in an assumed political character; when it exchanges its ermine for the woolsock and the mace, and asserts its right to impose restraints upon the sovereignty of the States, it should be treated as a usurper, and driven back by the States within its appropriate judicial sphere. It is due from the States to their own self-respect, and the just rights of their citizens, to assert that they are competent to decide upon every question involving their own sovereignty; and that, to neglect to maintain it, would be to renounce the character in which they formed the constitutional compact of union. That the maintenance of its own sovereignty unimpaired, by each of the States, is essential to the liberty of the people, and to the preservation of the Union, and that, to submit their sovereignty to the control of the Judiciary, would be to substitute a judicial oligarchy for the free institutions employed for self-government by the people.

All the purposes for which civil society was instituted would be defeated in the control of the States by the Judiciary. Nothing less than sovereign power is competent to the management of the concerns of a State, and nothing less was pledged by the States, in the social compact, for the protection of the people. The State cannot redeem this pledge, if it shall be controlled by the Judiciary. The Judiciary will govern, and not the State: for that power that governs those who govern, governs those who are governed; and how can a State protect its citizens from oppression, if it is itself liable to be oppressed by their oppressor? So that a State is under a political necessity to vindicate its sovereignty from any salutary restraints which the Supreme Court may attempt to inflict upon it, by resistance, or whatever means it may.

For security against oppression from abroad, we look to the sovereign power of the United States, to be exerted according to the compact of union; for security against oppression from within, or domestic oppression, we look to the sovereign power of the State. Now, all sovereigns are equal: the sovereignty of the State is equal to that of the Union: for the sovereignty of each is but a moral person. That of the State and that of the Union are each a moral person, and in that respect precisely equal. In physical force, the latter greatly transcends the former; but, in essential sovereignty, they are not only naturally but necessarily equal: just as the sovereignty of the State of Delaware is equal to that of New York, or of Russia, though the physical power of those sovereignties are vastly different.

The unrestrained exercise of the sovereign power of the Union is necessary to all the purposes of the Union; and is it not as necessary that the sovereign power of the State should be unrestrained, as to all domestic purposes? and can any reason be assigned why the latter, more than the former, should be restrained by the Supreme Court? No reason can exist for the restraint of the one, that does not equally apply to the other. But, in truth, the idea of controlling a sovereign State is so inconceivable that I do not know in what terms to combat it.

I must be indulged in some further inquiries in relation to the unfitness of the judges of the Supreme Court for the exercise of this controlling power over the sovereignty of the States, which the Senator from Massachusetts has asserted for them. What is there belonging to that court which can, in the contemplation of sober reason, entitle it to the exercise of that transcendent and all-absorbing power? Are the judges peculiarly gifted, and exempt from the frailties incident to human nature? Are they, and will they always be, pure and infallible? Will they always be free from the influence of the selfish principle, against which all free States have so sedulously endeavored to guard in their constitutions? On the contrary, are they not, will they not always be, subject to those impulses of ambition, those prejudices and partialities, which are uniformly displayed by those who are at all concerned in the discussion or decision of political questions? I have no reference to the present incumbents; they are, some of them, talented, and all respectable men; they have my respect, and if they possessed the power of controlling sovereigns, they ought to be worshipped, because their likeness has never existed beneath the sun. But I would ask again, if any reasonable man can suppose that there is more safety to the rights of the Union, or of the States, in the wisdom and patriotism of the seven men who compose that court, than in the wisdom and patriotism of the million and a half of people who compose the State of New York, or even the fifty or sixty thousand who compose the little State of Delaware? Must the saying of the wise man be reversed in favor of that court? Is it no longer true that "there is safety in a multitude of counsel?"

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

Does the gentleman pretend to have discovered that the converse of the proposition is true? I am sure that he will prefer no such pretensions for it has been long the known belief of aristocrats, of monarchs, and of despots. With them, it has been, and always will be, a cherished truth, a truth sustained by their votaries, and enforced by themselves, at all times, and everywhere. The monarch who proclaimed that "there was safety in a multitude of counsel," did not himself act upon the principle which he avowed. This principle, so dear to republics, was asserted under the inspiration of that wisdom which distinguished the monarch of Judea from all other men, of that wisdom which is from above. May I not conclude, then, that no argument in favor of the power asserted for that court can justly be drawn from the paucity of its numbers? and that every argument which can be drawn from the number of the judges is against confiding to them a control over the States? Sir, if we refer to what may always be supposed to be the wisdom, purity, and patriotism of the judges of that court, we cannot suppose that there will ever be a time when even the smallest State in the Union will not have, engaged in administering its Government, a much greater number of men, any of whom will, in these respects, be the equals of the judges. They will not only be their equals in patriotism, intelligence, and integrity, but greatly their superiors in an intimate practical acquaintance with the condition of the people, their habits, manners, customs, wants, and enjoyments. And, in addition to these, there will always be in the State a great many citizens, as enlightened and as pure as either of the judges, or the State functionaries, whose vigilance will be employed in checking the officials, and restraining them within the sphere of their duty.

And, let me ask, if the enlightened functionaries of the State, and its enlightened citizens, will not always be as much interested in the correct administration of the Governments, General and State, in the happiness of the people, and in the perpetuity and prosperity of the Union, as those same judges can be supposed to be? By what reason, then, can it be supposed the framers of the constitution were influenced to have accorded such power to the judges? It is not expressly given in the constitution: it is presumed to have been given by implication. But how can we obtain the power by implication from that instrument, unless we can reasonably suppose that those who framed it meant to confer it? But, when we consider that this court forms one department of the Government, which Government is supposed to have encroached upon the sovereignty of a State, can we believe that the States, in forming the constitution, intended to arm the court with the power of deciding upon the legitimacy of its own encroachments? with the power of conserving its own usurpations by its own decisions? A law of Congress, made in pursuance of the constitution, is admitted, on all sides, to be supreme, and will be acquiesced in and conformed to by the States. The question is, whether a law in violation of the constitution is supreme, or can be made so by the court? Whether a State cannot form an opinion as to its invalidity, and interpose its veto, where its operation goes to deprive the State of its sovereign power? I contend that neither weakness nor idiocy can be ascribed to a sovereign State; and, therefore, that a State may both think and act in the maintenance of its sovereignty.

Who ever before thought that one of the parties to a contest was a competent judge of the matter in dispute? For, although the General Government was no party to the constitutional compact of union—that having been formed by the States, who are the only parties to it—yet the Government, which was created by that compact, when it encroaches upon the sovereign power of a State, may justly be considered, quoad the dispute, as a party to the contest with the State, and, therefore, unfit to decide the matter in controversy. The case, it would seem to me, need but be stated to secure, with all intelligent men, the reprobation of the doctrine contended for on the part of the court. Even in a contest between school children, about their toys, or their amusements, neither will agree to let the other decide the matter in dispute. Sir, who does not perceive that the specification of the powers to be exercised by the General Government was entirely useless, if it was intended that those who were to exercise them were to be the exclusive and final judges of the extent and legitimacy of their exercise?

But the power asserted for the court, by the honorable Senator, is unreasonable in other views. If, then, those who formed the constitution had intended to invest this tribunal with the political power of checking and regulating the Legislative and Executive Departments of the General Government, and of imposing certain salutary restraints upon the sovereignties of the States, they would not only have expressed that intention, but would have adopted and suited the forms of the constitution to the full and efficient exercise of that power. Have they done so? This question must be answered in the negative by all who have paid the slightest attention to the specification of the powers, allowed to be exercised by the General Government, and to the powers reserved to be exercised by the States. Let us suppose that the House of Representatives were to refuse to permit the members, or a portion of them, from a particular State, to take their seats in the legislative hall of Congress; and suppose the Senate were to do the like, in relation to the Senators from any one of the States; or that any one of the States, or even a majority of them, were to refuse to elect Senators to Congress, or that a State were to make a treaty with a foreign power, or were to coin money; or let us suppose, further, that a person charged in any one of the States with treason, felony, or other crime, were to flee to another, and that other were to refuse, upon the demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, to deliver him up, to be removed for trial to the State having jurisdiction of the crime: by what forms of the constitution can the judicial power of the United States interfere in any of these cases, or in a hundred others which might be named? Sir, this mighty State-conserving power will be found, when subjected to the scrutiny of reason, to consist more in the fancy of those who are desirous to see one splendid central government supply the place of the sovereign States, than in the nature and genius of our Governments, or in the intention of the States in forming the constitutional compact of union. And the great error which lies at the root of this monstrous doctrine, is in the erroneous supposition that the States, when they formed the constitution, divested themselves of, and delegated to, the General Government, all the sovereign power which may be rightly-exercised by the latter, and that they are less sovereign by so much power as may be thus exercised. That this sovereign power, so delegated by the constitution, is mysteriously lodged in that instrument, and exercised by the General Government in virtue of that lodgment. Sir, let me just say that sovereign power is an article that will not keep cold. Others think that this power abides in the functionaries of the Government, and almost all believe, that, let it be lodged where it may, it is out of the States and belongs to the General Government. That those who formed the constitution cut the sovereignty of each State into two parts, and gave much the largest portion to the General Government. I hope that I have, in a previous part of my argument, sufficiently refuted those erroneous, and, as I think, mischievous notions, and proved that sovereignty cannot exist in a divided state; that its unity and its life are inseparable; and let me here add, that you might as well divide the human will; we can conceive of ten thousand diversities of its operation, but we cannot conceive of its separation into parts, neither can we conceive of the separation of sovereignty. It is the will of civil society; which society is a person whose will, in all its modes of operation, like the will of a human being, cannot, without destroying the person, be divided or separated into parcels; for then it will be extinguished, not divided.

But, I may be asked, to what tribunal I would refer a question, involving the sovereign power of a State? I answer, most certainly not to the assailant of that power, not to the General Government, which shall have usurped it, and still less to the judicial department of that Government. And in my turn, I would ask to what tribunal should be referred an encroachment by the Supreme Court upon the sovereign power of a State; for that court can not only affirm an unconstitutional law, which assails the sovereignty of a State, but it can, by construction, (as we have in too many instances seen,) give an unconstitutional efficacy to a perfectly constitutional law. It can, as we have seen, usurp the exercise of legislative power, and under the denomination of rules of court, make laws under which the citizens of a State may be imprisoned contrary to law. Sir, the Congress have been obliged to interpose to prevent the exercise of this usurped power of the judges over the citizens of at least one of the States; I mean the State of Kentucky. And now, sir, the power of that State to legislate over its own soil, awaits upon the docket the decision of that tribunal.

But suppose the Congress, instead of restraining, as it did, the judges of that court, from incarcerating the citizens under color of their rules of court, and contrary to the laws of the State, had refused to interfere; to what tribunal must the State have appealed for the protection of her citizens against lawless incarceration? The honorable Senator would say, to the Supreme Court; to that very tribunal which had committed the outrage. I answer emphatically, no. The sovereign power of the State should have been exerted for the protection of its own citizens. It can and ought to refuse to the court the use of its prisons, for purposes so oppressive to its citizens, and subversive of its sovereign power. It ought to exert its own governmental machinery to the extent of all their aptitudes, and of its own power, to protect its own citizens against aggressions so lawless and so enormous.

In such a case, the State should appeal to its own sovereign power, and decide for itself. Indeed, in every case involving its sovereignty, it must do so, or renounce its sovereign character. Whether it shall exert its self-protecting power, through the organs of its government, or through a convention, or by what other means it may, will depend upon the character of the aggression. Every State must speak its will through one or the other of those mediums. It may use the former or employ the latter, according to its own opinion of their respective fitness for the urgency.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

And what, you will ask me, will be the result of this resistance by a State, of an unconstitutional law of Congress, or an unconstitutional decision of the Supreme Court? I answer, that the first result will be, the preservation of the sovereignty of the State, and of the liberty of its citizens, at least for a time. The next result will be, that the attention of the people of the other States will be awakened to the aggression, and the Congress, or the Supreme Court, whichever shall have been the aggressor, will be driven back, into the sphere of its legitimacy, by the rebuking force of public opinion. Such was the result of the nullifying resolutions of the States of Virginia and Kentucky, in relation to the alien and sedition laws. And such was the rebuking effect of public opinion in relation to the famous compensation law.

But if these results should not follow, you ask me what next? Must the State forbear to resist the aggression upon her sovereignty, and submit to be shorn of it altogether? I answer, no, sir, no; that she must maintain her sovereignty by every means within her power. She is good for nothing, even worse than good for nothing, without it. This, you will tell me, must lead to civil war. To war between the General Government and the resisting State. I answer, not at all, unless the General Government shall choose to consecrate its usurpations by the blood of those it shall have attempted to oppress. And if the States shall be led, by apprehensions of that kind, to submit to encroachments upon their sovereignties, they will most certainly not remain sovereigns long. Fear is a bad counsellor, of even an individual; it should never be consulted by a sovereign State.

No, sir, it is in the power of Congress, instead of shedding the blood of the citizens, who assert the sovereignty of their State and resist its prostration, to refer the question to an infinitely more exalted tribunal than the Supreme Court. I mean to the States of this Union. They formed the constitution; they are fit judges of questions involving sovereignty, being themselves sovereigns. The fifth article of the constitution provides for the case. It reads thus: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary to propose amendments to this constitution, &c., &c., which when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, (not of the people at large, but of the States,) shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of this constitution." Three-fourths of the States constitute the august tribunal to which Congress can refer the question. To this tribunal the State can have no objection, because it was created by the constitutional compact; because the power of amending the constitution was accorded to it in that compact.

I state the case thus: The powers which the States, in their constitutional compact, have allowed the General Government to exercise, are special. The agents of the United States, in the exercise of those special powers, have, as one of the States alleges, transcended their specific limits, and infringed upon their sovereignty. The State resists the exercise of the power of which it complains, as unauthorized by any stipulation in the compact, and as incompatible with its own rights and duties as a sovereign. The agents, as functionaries of the General Government, say that the exercise of the obnoxious power is within their legitimate competency; but rather than be thought fastidiously nice, or perversely obstinate, modestly propose that the Supreme Court shall decide the matter. The State replies that it cannot, without violating every principle of congruity and self-respect, submit any question, in relation to its own sovereignty, to any portion of the subalterns of the States. That it is itself, in virtue of its sovereignty, the judge of its own rights, and bound as a sovereign to maintain them. That while a sovereign State cannot decently be supposed to violate the clear rights of the General Government, it cannot reasonably be required to surrender its own obvious rights to the assertion of dubious powers on the part of that Government. That the right of sovereignty in the State is clear and unquestionable. That the right, under the alleged authority of which its sovereignty has been assailed, if it exists at all, must exist in specific grant. That the denial of its legitimate existence by a sovereign State ought to induce the General Government either to abstain from exercising it, or to call upon the States to remove all doubt about its legitimacy, in an amendment to the constitution, by the concurrent vote of three-fourths of their number.

Let me urge that this reply of the State is very reasonable, infinitely more so than the proposition on the part of the General Government, to which it is made. For if the power in question does not exist in the constitution, and is believed to be necessary for any of the great objects of the Union, the States will, by an amendment to the constitution, accord its exercise to the General Government. Or if its existence in the constitution is dubious, they will, by an amendment couched in explicit terms, remove all doubt; and thus, sir, the Government will avoid the tumult, confusion, and, perhaps, bloodshed, which might be connected with any attempt on the part of the General Government to divest a State of its sovereignty, and subdue it by force into vassalage. This is the course which the General Government ought to take in a question between itself and a sovereign State, in relation to the sovereignty of the latter, and the legitimacy of the power exerted by itself, in derogation of that sovereignty.

I say that Congress should take this course—that Congress should make the appeal to the tribunal of the States, because it claims to exercise a special power, and reason requires that, when the existence of the power, or the legitimacy of its exercise, is questioned by a sovereign State, it should be able to show its authority free from all doubt. It is upon rational principle that, in all Governments, courts of special and limited jurisdiction are required to accompany their acts with the authority by which they were done; and their doings, unless their power to act is clearly shown, are considered as lawless and void. Sir, this principle limits the exercise of all special powers, whether legislative, executive, or judicial. A common corporation, chartered by a State, must be able to show in its charter an explicit authority for whatever power it claims to exercise, and its acts are void, unless its power to do them is explicitly granted in its charter. If the power under which it claims to act be dubious, instead of persisting to act, it must obtain from the Legislature an amendment of its charter, or abandon its claim to the power of acting quoad. Now all the reasons which apply to the smallest corporation, in relation to its chartered powers, apply with equal, with increased force, to the Government of the United States, and to the constitution, its charter. It is a stupendous corporation, and becomes fearful in powers, when it claims for its judicial department the exclusive right of legalizing, by its decisions, the encroachments made by itself upon the sovereignty of the States. The constitution is its charter. Its powers are special and limited. To be safely exercised, they must be confined within the clear limits of the charter. If those limits may be transcended, all limitation was useless. If dubious powers may be exercised and enforced, then specification was useless. It is upon this principle that officers of Government, before they can do any official act, must exhibit their commissions—their authority. No man occupies a seat in this body, without having exhibited a clear title to it; and it might as reasonably be urged that he could take his seat by force, without exhibiting title, or upon a doubtful title, as that the General Government shall exert by force, a non-existing or dubious power. If a doubt had existed in the title of the honorable Senator to a seat in this body, he would have to go back and get his title so amended as to remove all doubt, before he could occupy his seat. So the Congress, in relation to the exercise of even a doubtful power, should go back to the States, and obtain, by an amendment of their title, a removal of all doubt as to its legitimacy.

But another reason why Congress, and not the injured and resisting State, should make the appeal to the tribunal of the States, is, that an appeal by the State would be as unavailing as it would be unwise. A majority of the States have passed the obnoxious and questionable law complained of by the State. The State therefore cannot make the appeal efficiently; the Congress can. The State cannot do more than she has done. She must only poise herself upon her sovereignty, and resist its prostration. The Congress can do more. It can appeal to and obtain from the States an explicit decision of the question. And if it shall fail to make the appeal, and obtain the decision of that tribunal affirming its power, it shall decline all further attempts to exert it. But again, the State is acknowledged to be a sovereign, and its sovereignty is acknowledged to be necessary to the liberty of its citizens, and its own existence as a State. Its power is primitive, clear, and certain. That of the Government by which it is assailed is derivative and doubtful; can any reasonable man say that the former should yield to the latter, upon any other principle than that the latter is as abundant in force as it is deficient in right? Reason itself would say, that the natural state of things should remain unaltered, unless the authority for removing or altering them shall be full, clear, and legitimate.

Throughout this debate the States have been treated as restless, querulous, impatient, disorganizing beings. It seems to have been taken for granted that they are either too dull to comprehend the provisions of the constitution, or too unprincipled to observe and maintain them. That the zeal to maintain the Union and support the constitution, by which it was formed, is exclusively with the functionaries of the General Government, that the States feel none of it. Now, let us examine into this matter a little. All intelligent men act from motive. The States that formed the Union were composed of intelligent men. The motives which led to the formation of the constitution were, to promote the happiness, tranquillity, liberty, and security, of the people of the States. In furtherance of these great objects, the States agreed, in that instrument, to exert their sovereign power jointly, in making war, peace, and treaties, and levying money, and regulating commerce, &c. Their powers were to be exerted through the agency of the General Government. Now, can it be supposed that the motives which led to the formation of the Union have ceased to exist—have evaporated? That the people of the States are less inclined to be happy, tranquil, prosperous, secure, and free, now, than they were when the Union was formed? Or that their perceptions of its utility are less distinct and strong now, than its beneficial effects have been experienced, than they were then, when its beneficial effects were only anticipated? The States made the constitution, and formed a more perfect Union, under the conviction that it was needed. Have occurrences since that time been calculated to prove that their convictions of its utility and necessity were erroneous? Have they given any indications to that effect? I believe not. On the contrary, they have evinced, from the period of its formation, up till this very moment in which I am speaking, no sentiment in relation to any subject, so strongly as that of an affectionate regard for, and devotion to, the Union. Why then this inquietude about the

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

Union? Why is the gentleman inspired at this time with such a devotion to its consolidation? There was a time, during the late war, when some zeal on that subject was felt; but at that time, the reasons for it were apparent to all. For myself I regard it as the union of twenty-four sovereign States, and rely more upon their intelligence and zeal for its support and continuance, than I do upon the power of the Supreme Court, or the inordinate zeal of any given number of politicians. It is upon the people of the States, and not upon the politicians, that solid reliance is to be placed for the continuance and just operation of all our institutions. They will maintain and vindicate the Union, not for the purpose of imposing certain salutary restraints upon the sovereignty of the States, but for the high purposes and objects for which it was formed. Utility was the object for which it was formed; and while it subserves that purpose, it will be maintained. But when purposes of splendor and magnificence, of pageantry and parade, shall supersede those for which it was formed; whenever it shall be supposed that the sovereign States of which it is composed must be whipped by the patriotic functionaries of the General Government into the support of it; whenever its continuance shall be made to depend upon the power of the Supreme Court, exerted in subduing to its support the sovereign States; whenever the compact of Union shall be so construed as to give to the General Government the right of deciding upon the validity of its own encroachments upon the sovereignties of the States; and, let me add, whenever the States cease to maintain their sovereignty, and their own competency to maintain it against the encroachments of the General Government, then, indeed, will the duration of this Union become problematical.

We should never forget that the greatest good, when perverted, becomes the greatest evil. The Union, while it continues to be what it was when it was formed, and what it was intended it should continue to be, a Union of free, sovereign, and independent States, will be considered by the States as the greatest conceivable political good; and for the maintenance and support of which the people of the States would, when the occasion should demand it, pour out their blood like water. But, even in their high estimation of it, they do not hold it as the greatest good. There is one still better, still more precious, which they rate infinitely higher. It is their liberty; and for the people to be free, the States must be free; and no State can be free, the sovereignty of which is subject to the control of another—is subject to certain restraints, however salutary, imposed by the judicial department of another Government. But, I feel confident that, while ever the Union conduces to the maintenance of the freedom of the States, the people of the States will maintain it; and whenever it shall be made the instrument of tyranny and oppression, they will cast it off and form one more perfect. That is, if they retain the spirit of freedom: if they do not, it matters but little what kind of Government they have.

And, indeed, upon the doctrine of the honorable Senator, relative to the power of the Supreme Court over the sovereignty of the States, I cannot see what is to prevent a perfect consolidation of the Government, and consequent monarchy or despotism. We have now, if he is right, a fearful oligarchy. Nothing but the forbearance of that tribunal can save us; we are denied the right of saving ourselves. The States must yield obedience to their sovereign mandate; must doff their sovereignty at the nod of the judges. They cannot interpose their veto, but must submit to any salutary restraints which the judges may choose to inflict upon their sovereignties. Sir, the power of imperial Rome, in her proudest days, was not superior to that asserted by the gentleman for the Supreme Court, nor were the humblest of her provinces in a condition more abject than that of these States, according to his doctrine.

Now, sir, what is the condition of these States? They are not to resist encroachments upon their own sovereignty; resistance with them is crime. The Congress will not resist encroachments made by the Judiciary upon State sovereignty, because that encroachment is but a salutary restraint, and because the decision of the court may, and no doubt often will, be but an affirmation of encroachment by the legislative department of the General Government; so that, sooner or later, State rights will be named only to point a sarcasm, or to excite a smile of derision. Indeed a smile of that kind may even now be seen mantling upon the faces of some gentlemen when that subject is named. Sir, these rights are exercised by the States in relation to subjects within their own territorial limits, and in a manner so little imposing as to attract but little attention from without. The exercise of them is as obscure as it is beneficial. A State, in regulating its domiciliary concerns, exerts its sovereign power without its exterior trappings; without the usual lustre and imposing glare of national sovereignty. It never appears in court dress. It has no navy, no army, no diplomacy, no boundless revenue. In relation to all these subjects, the sovereign power of each is exercised jointly with that of the others. The General Government, through whose agency the sovereign power of the States jointly is exerted, in relation to all these subjects, without having any national characteristic, without being more than a mere fiduciary for the States, is surrounded with the splendors and the patronage of a nation. And there is reason to apprehend that there are many influenced by appearances, not less disposed to ascribe to it unqualified power, than some of its functionaries are to assume and exercise it.

But the whole argument of the gentleman has gone upon the predication that the States are to be kept in order by coercion only. That, but for the controlling power of the Supreme Court, they would transcend their appropriate spheres, and usurp the powers assigned by the constitution to the General Government. Now, sir, in what instance, I would ask, has any State displayed such a disposition? What exertion of power, by any one of them, since the formation of the constitution, has been of that character? When did any one of the States attempt to make a treaty with a foreign power, or with any of the other States? Has any of them attempted to make war, to coin money, to regulate commerce, to grant letters of marque and reprisal, to erect a navy, to raise and support armies? or to do any other act, or exercise any of the great powers separately, which they had agreed in the constitution to exercise jointly? Has any State failed to send its proportion of members to the House of Representatives, or its two members to the Senate of the United States; or denied full faith and credit to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of the other States? No State has violated, or attempted to violate, the constitution, in any of these particulars. I mention them, because in no one of them could the Judiciary have interposed its restraining power, even if it were possessed by that department to the extent contended for. It could not, by the forms of the constitution, have reached any one of the cases, by any conceivable exertion of its power. What, then, restrained the States from violating the constitution, in any of the particulars which I have enumerated? If they are as prone to transcend the limits of their power as they are represented to be, one would think that, in the course of fifty years, some instance of violation must have occurred. No, sir; the security of the constitution from inroads upon it by the States, is to be found in that wisdom which is always associated with sovereignty. If the confluent will and the concentrated wisdom of the people who compose a State, is not to be confided in, on what else under Heaven, I ask, can confidence be placed? That will is necessarily pure, because it is the will of the people; not as people, but as citizens. It is the will of all in relation to each, and of no one in relation to himself specially; and there is not a man, or set of men, on earth, who, if they can be freed from selfish influences, will not act justly. Sir, that is the condition of the citizens of the States; their sentiments are all of that character; they are discolored in their operation by the selfish influences of the political fiduciaries through whose agency they take effect; and this discoloration, which is produced by the functionaries, is charged upon the citizens. It is the functionaries, then, and not the citizens, who are to be feared; and those of the General Government not less than those of the States; and with both, those are most to be feared who are least responsible to the citizens; and, therefore, the Judiciary is more to be dreaded than any other department. What motives, let me repeat, can the States have, to weaken or destroy the Union? They formed it, and, after all, they have the power of maintaining or destroying it. It lives in the breath of their nostrils; in their intelligence; in their affections; and their conscious need of it. It was not formed by them under the coercive influence of the Supreme Court; it was the offspring of the unrestrained and unconstrained sovereignties of the States. Sir, the doctrine contended for is parricidal: it is for the destruction of the parent by its offspring: it is not the doctrine of Jefferson, or Madison, or Hamilton. But I am averse from quotation; a doctrine should be approved or reprobated, not because it has, or has not, the sanction of this or that distinguished man, but because it is intrinsically right or wrong. I am opposed to the government of living men, still more of the dead. Our Government should be that of laws, through the agency only of men. Every civil society, large enough to constitute and maintain itself as a State, should govern itself by its own will, through the medium of such devices as its wisdom shall select. It should act jointly with its associates, in reference to foreign objects, and separately in reference to its interior concerns; but it should maintain its sovereignty by all means, and at all hazards: for there is not, in the catalogue of evils, a single one so much to be deprecated by a State as the prostration of its sovereignty: it is the loss of their liberty, to the people who compose it.

Every policy which has a tendency to humiliate the States, either by force or seduction, should, in my opinion, be deprecated. It is a tendency towards the consolidation of the Government, and the slavery of the people. Revenue, for the same reasons, should not be unnecessarily accumulated in the public treasury. The money, not needed by the Government, should not be exacted from the people. It should be left in their pockets; there it increases the incentives to industry, and the facilities to reward it. When the treasury of a monarch overflows, his subjects bleed: for war is the game at which monarchs delight to play, when they have money to bet. When the revenues of a republic are redundant, speculation, fraud, and corruption nestle about the treasury. Among free governments, that is the best which promotes the happiness and protects the rights of the people, at the least expense. The people get their money by labor: whatever the Government takes of it, more than is necessary to pay the just expenses of its administration, is, to the extent of the excess, an infliction of slavery upon them. Revenue beyond the necessary expenses of this Government can only be necessary for purposes of consolidation not of the Union, but of the Government.

Every institution of man is purer at its commencement than at any after period of its history. There is in all human institutions a fatal proclivity to degeneracy: even the institutions of our holy religion degenerate. Hence the people of every Government have their choice between reform and revolution. They must do the one, experience the other, or submit to vassalage. But even reform is derided now. No doctrines are well received that do not tend to centre all power in the General Government, and conduce to the annihilation of the sovereignty of the States, and the erection upon their ruins of a magnificent empire!

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

I am, with my whole heart, and in all its feelings, in favor of the Union; but it is the Union of the States, and not an indiscriminate union of the people. I would not, by construction, or otherwise, reduce the States to mere petty corporations, and make them subservient to a judicial oligarchy—to a great central power of any kind. I would have the Union to consist of the free, sovereign, and independent States, of which it was intended by the constitution to be composed; I would have the citizens of each to look to their State for the security and enjoyment of their rights and their liberty. The Union which I advocate is also represented by the stripes and the stars. Each stripe a State, and each star its sovereignty. I would not mingle the stripes or blot out a star for any earthly consideration; and I would have each star to brighten with its benign and unclouded light the whole sphere of State sovereignty; I would have them all to shine with confluent lustre throughout the legitimate sphere of the Union. The stripes should thus wave, and the stars thus shine, if my wishes were consulted, until even Time himself should be enfeebled with age.

[From Friday, Feb. 12th, to Wednesday, the 17th, (Saturday and Sunday excepted) the Senate was chiefly occupied in the consideration of Executive business.]

FRIDAY, February 19.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. Foot.

Mr. HOLMES addressed the Senate, as follows:

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. ROWAN) has discussed the question of the ultimate tribunal which is to decide a controversy that involves the powers of the United States and a particular State. His notions in regard to the social and the political compact are too refined, sublimated, and anti-constitutional for me. I shall seize upon his inferences, and, in my old-fashioned and clumsy way, take up the argumentum ab inconvenienti and pursue his conclusions to their final results. I shall not stop to inquire whether some other tribunal than the Supreme Court might not have been devised more impartial and wise. Nor shall I insist that this Supreme Court may not have erred in extending the federal at the expense of the State rights. It is in the nature of man thus to err. And if any error has occurred in its decisions on constitutional questions, I readily admit that these errors have not very frequently been in favor of "State rights," against the federal powers. But I cannot well perceive what other tribunal could have been invented which would have done better. That Congress, according to his suggestion, should have been this court of appellate jurisdiction in these cases, is to me a strange proposition. The small States would scarcely feel very safe in the hands of the popular branch; and how the judicial decision could be made, whether by a joint or a concurrent vote, he has not informed us.

It, however, is enough for me, that the constitution has vested the power here contended for, in express terms, in the Supreme Court. This constitution, and the laws made pursuant to its authority, are to be "the supreme law of the land, any constitution or law of a State to the contrary notwithstanding." A Supreme Court is established, having original jurisdiction in few cases, appellate jurisdiction in all others arising under the constitution and laws made pursuant thereto. The laws of the United States are made supreme, and those of the States subordinate; and the court is to be the final tribunal in deciding upon these supreme laws. Now to suppose that the laws of the Union are supreme, and those of the States are subordinate, and that the State courts, in their decisions upon them, are supreme, and those of the United States are subordinate, is an utter absurdity. The very statement of the proposition proves that it is perfectly ridiculous. Allow a State, in a controversy of this kind, to decide ultimately and definitely, and to carry its decision into full effect, and you are retranslated into the old confederation, if nothing worse. The principal and almost the only defect in that confederation was, that it was advisory or directory, but not coercive. This coercive power was almost all that was wanted. If we have not that, "all we have gained is naught but empty boast of old achievement, and despair of new."

But the Senator from Kentucky, as I understood him, takes another ground: that a sovereign State has no power to surrender any portion of its sovereignty. I confess, sir, that unless others very much misunderstood this word sovereignty, it is very much misunderstood by me. I had supposed that a sovereign was he who had a right to execute his own will without any legal restraint or control. This is absolute sovereignty, and in this sense scarcely a civilized nation on earth is absolutely sovereign, as there is no one which is not subject to the law of nations, either prescriptive or conventional.

Man, in a state of nature, is an absolute sovereign, being subject to no legal restraint, and having the right to execute his will in defiance of legal control. If then a State cannot renounce any portion of its sovereignty, neither can man; he cannot surrender any portion of his natural rights for the better security of the rest. If he can surrender no portion of them, much less can he surrender the whole. And as subjugation must be by force or surrender, and as force may always be resisted by force, why may not the slave, having more bodily strength than his master, rise up against him and subdue him? Remember that these are not my premises. I only take his, and follow them out in all their results. I forbear to pursue this train in the argument lest I should disturb the terrific ghost of the "Missouri question," which has so much affected the nerves of the Senator from Missouri. Thus we see how dangerous it is to go back behind the constitutional enactments to unsettle what has been already settled. But, sir, it is inexpedient that I should discuss this subject farther. The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) has done it ample justice. It were vain for me to attempt to add any thing to what he has said. I do not aspire to do him even justice, much less to compliment him. But I will say that, in my view, his argument on this point is unanswered and unanswerable. It was on this question, between that gentleman and the Senator from South Carolina, that the Senator from Missouri introduced his chaste, elegant, and classic figure of the "kick-up-horse, and the monkey on his back." I did not really perceive its application. I suppose by the "kick-up-horse," he intended the Senator from Massachusetts, but who was his "monkey?" If this was intended as another salute, it was a little uncourteous, to say the least.

The Senator from Kentucky considers the question of internal improvement as settled, and he yields to the doctrine as res judicata; and so do I. And if so in that case, why not in this? If there is any one principle in our constitution that has more than another been settled by legislation, adjudication, and general acquiescence, it is this: that, in a conflict of power between the United States and a State, the final efficient tribunal is the Supreme Court. Virginia had pronounced the alien and sedition laws unconstitutional, and transmitted her resolutions to the Legislatures of other States. I will read you the answer of Massachusetts: "This Legislature are persuaded that the decision of all cases of law and equity arising under the Constitution of the United States, and the construction of all laws made in pursuance thereof, are exclusively vested by the people in the judicial courts of the United States; that the people in that solemn compact which is declared the supreme law of the land, have not constituted the State Legislatures the judges of the acts or measures of the Federal Government." At this time it will be remembered that Virginia was in a political minority and Massachusetts in a majority in the federal councils. After this when the scales had shifted, and the balance was the other way, it seems there was great excitement in Pennsylvania on the decision of the federal court in Olmstead's case. So great was it that the militia were ordered out to resist the marshal, and they actually took the field, under a General Bright. But this mighty army levied no war; the marshal executed his precept, and the peace was not at all disturbed; and the Legislature of that State adopted the constitutional mode of redress for the supposed grievance. They proposed to amend the constitution and establish some other tribunal to determine such controversies, and transmitted their resolutions to the other States. Virginia was now in a political majority, and I will read you the unanimous opinion of her Senate on the subject. The committee who had the resolutions of Pennsylvania under consideration were "of opinion that a tribunal is already provided by the Constitution of the United States, viz: the Supreme Court, more eminently qualified, from their habits and duties, from the mode of their selection, and from the tenure of their offices, to decide the dispute aforesaid in an enlightened and impartial manner, than any other tribunal which could be created." The report gives the reasons for the opinion, and was unanimously accepted. Gentlemen will find it quoted in the case of Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheaton, 358. The decisions of this tribunal have always been submitted to as the last resort in these questions, and I regret to hear its doctrines denounced at this day as damnable, and the court as a tyrannical "Star Chamber." But suppose a State to consider herself aggrieved in a case plain and palpable, there are three constitutional modes in which she can obtain redress: first, by the judiciary; second, by an appeal to the people at the polls and ballot-boxes; third, by calling upon the States to amend the constitution. Now suppose all these fail, and the grievance is, in the opinion of the State, as plain and palpable as ever, one of two courses must be pursued: our own decisions must be enforced, and the State coerced; or, adopting the opinion of a late Senator from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) if a State will not submit, let her go. Withdraw your power and protection, send home her Senators and Representatives, and let the State set up for itself, and, in a very short time, it will come back and supplicate you to receive it again.

And should either of the enterprising youths of the family of the West, the East, or the South, become discontented, and wish to leave his father's house, and ask for the portion which belongs to him, and we should deal it out to him and let him go, and he should take a journey into a far country, and there "waste his substance in riotous living," or some other way, (for waste it he surely would,) and there should be "a famine in the land, and he should begin to be in want," and to "feed upon husks," and "no one should give unto him," he would then "come to himself," and begin to reflect, (for adversity is an excellent school for reflection,) and would say, "how many hired servants in my father's house have bread enough and to spare," (and here the analogy is very close, for many of our servants have enough and to spare,) "and I perish with hunger; I will arise and go to my father, acknowledge my guilt and folly, and that I am unworthy to be his son, and beg to be received as a servant;" and he should come: now, here too, "the father would see him while he was yet a great way off, have compassion on him, run out to meet him, fall upon his neck and kiss him, order a new robe to be put on him, and the fattened calf to be killed;" and we should all be merry together. So that, instead of the "blood and carnage" which the Senator from Missouri seems so willing to predict, I am inclined to believe the whole affair would be settled in this good-natured, affectionate family way. I regret to hear disunion and civil discord so often predicted or threatened with so much apparent exultation, and I respond to the Senator from Massachusetts, the Union—the Union, in the exercise of all its legitimate powers—the Union forever!

TUESDAY, February 28.

Abolition of Duties, Taxes, &c.

Mr. BENTON said he rose to ask the leave for which he gave notice on Friday last; and in doing so, he meant to avail himself of the parliamentary rule, seldom followed here, but familiar in the place from whence we drew our rules—the British Parliament—and strictly right and proper, when any thing new is to be proposed, to state the clauses, and make up an exposition of the principles of his bill before he submitted the formal motion for leave to bring it in. And, before I do this, (said Mr. B.) I will make a single remark, to justify myself for presuming to propose a bill upon a subject which is already reported upon, by the able and experienced Committee of Finance. My justification is, that the bill of that committee does not present the best mode of accomplishing its own object; that a better one can be devised; and being myself the first mover of the great plan of abolishing unnecessary duties, on the extinguishment of the public debt, it is a natural effect of the meditation which I have bestowed on the question, that something should have occurred to me, which has not presented itself to the minds of others. This seems to be the case. Several bills have been reported for the abolition of duties; one in this chamber; some in the other end of the House; and no one has presented the subject under my point of view. Good or bad, my plan is at least new, a bill of its own sort; a bill without precedent in the legislation of the country; and, bringing it forward, I discharge a duty to the Union, and to the public councils of which I am a member; and have no other wish but that the wisdom and patriotism of the Senate, from all that is presented, may select and prefer that which is best for the people of these States.

The title of my bill is adapted to its contents, and discloses its object as distinctly as the compendious nature of a title will admit. I will read it:

"A bill to provide for the abolition of unnecessary duties; to relieve the people from sixteen millions of taxes; and to improve the condition of the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation of the United States."

The tenor of it is, not to abolish, but to provide for the abolition of the duties. This phraseology announces, that something in addition to the statute—some power in addition to that of the Legislature, is to be concerned in accomplishing the abolition. Then the duties for abolition are described as unnecessary ones; and under this idea is included the twofold conception, that they are useless, either for the protection of domestic industry, or for supplying the treasury with revenue. The relief of the people from sixteen millions of taxes is based upon the idea of an abolition of twelve millions of duties; the additional four millions being the merchant's profit upon the duty he advances; which profit the people pay as a part of the tax, though the Government never receives it. It is the merchant's compensation for advancing the duty, and is the same as his profit upon the goods. The improved condition of the four great branches of national industry as presented is the third object of the bill; and their relative importance, in my estimation, classes itself according to the order of my arrangement. Agriculture, as furnishing the means of subsistence to man, and as the foundation of every thing else, is put foremost; manufactures as preparing and fitting things for our use, stands second; commerce, as exchanging the superfluities of different countries, comes next; and navigation, as furnishing the chief means of carrying on commerce, closes the list of the four great branches of national industry. Though classed according to their respective importance, neither branch is disparaged. They are all great interests—all connected—all dependent upon each other—friends in their nature—for a long time friends in fact, under the operations of our Government; and only made enemies to each other, as they now are, by a course of legislation, which the approaching extinguishment of the public debt presents a fit opportunity for reforming and ameliorating. The title of my bill declares the intention of the bill to improve the condition of each of them. The abolition of sixteen millions of taxes would itself operate a great improvement in the condition of each; but the intention of the bill is not limited to that incidental and consequential improvement, great as it may be; it proposes a positive, direct, visible, tangible, and countable benefit to each; and this I shall prove and demonstrate, not in this brief illustration of the title of my bill, but at the proper places, in the course of the examination into its provisions and exposition of its principles.

I will now proceed with the bill, reading each section in its order; and making the remarks upon it which are necessary to explain its object and to illustrate its operation.

The First Section.

"That, for the term of ten years, from and after the first day of January, in the year 1832, or, as soon thereafter as may be agreed upon between the United States and any foreign power, the duties now payable on the importation of the following articles, or such of them as may be agreed upon, shall cease and determine, or be reduced, in favor of such countries as shall, by treaty, grant equivalent advantages to the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation of the United States, viz: coffee, cocoa, olives, olive oil, figs, raisins, prunes, almonds, currants, camphor, alum, opium, quicksilver, Spanish brown, copperas, tin and brass, in sheets and plates for manufacturers' use, black bottles and demijohns, silks, wines, linens, cambrics, lawns, Canton crapes, cashmere shawls, gauze, ribbons, straw mats, bolting cloths, thread and silk lace, bombazine and worsted stuff goods, spirits not made of grain, nor coming in competition with domestic spirits; on the following description of cotton goods not manufactured in the United States, viz: chintzes, muslins, cambrics, velvet cords, china and porcelain, and Brussels carpeting, Peruvian bark, chronometers, sextants, parts of watches, amber, pine apples, juniper berries and oil of juniper, Italian and French crapes, gall nuts, essence of bergamot and other essences, used as perfumes, madder, turtle shell, and ox horn tips.

"Also on woollen goods, not manufactured in the United States, and necessary in carrying on the Indian trade.

"Also, Indian gartering, vermilion, taffeta, ribbons, pocket looking-glasses, beads, Indian awls, brass inlaid knives, scarlet-milled caps, sturgeon twine."

This section contains the principle which I consider as new—that of abolishing duties by the joint act of the Legislative and Executive Departments. The idea of equivalents, which the section also presents, is not new, but has for its sanction high and venerated authority, of which I shall not fail to avail myself. That we ought to have equivalents for abolishing ten or twelve millions of duties on foreign merchandise, is most clear. Such an abolition will be an advantage to foreign powers, for which they ought to compensate us, by reducing duties to an equal amount upon our productions. This is what no law, or separate act of our own, can command. Amicable arrangements alone, with foreign powers, can effect it; and to free such arrangements from serious, perhaps insuperable difficulties, it would be necessary first to lay a foundation for them in an act of Congress. This is what my bill proposes to do. It proposes that Congress shall select the articles for abolition of duty, and then leave it to the Executive to extend the provisions of the act to such powers as will grant us equivalent advantages. The articles enumerated for abolition of duty are of kinds not made in the United States, so that my bill presents no ground of alarm or uneasiness to any branch of domestic industry.

The acquisition of equivalents is a striking feature in the plan which I propose, and for that I have the authority of him whose opinions will never be invoked in vain, while republican principles have root in our soil. I speak of Mr. Jefferson, and of his report on the commerce and navigation of the United States, in the year '98, an extract from which I will read:

The Extract.

"Such being the restrictions on the commerce and navigation of the United States, the question is, in what way they may best be removed, modified, or counteracted?"

"As to commerce, two methods occur: 1. By friendly arrangements with the several nations with whom these restrictions exist: or, 2. By the separate act of our own legislatures, for counteracting their effects.

"There can be no doubt but that, of these two, friendly arrangements is the most eligible. Instead of embarrassing commerce under piles of regulating laws, duties, and prohibitions, could it be relieved from all its shackles, in all parts of the world—could every country be employed in producing that which nature has best fitted it to produce, and each be free to exchange with others mutual surpluses for mutual wants, the greatest mass possible would then be produced, of those things which contribute to human life and human happiness; the numbers of mankind would be increased, and their condition bettered.

"Would even a single nation begin with the United States this system of free commerce, it would be advisable to begin it with that nation; since it is one by one only that it can be extended to all. Where the circumstances of either party render it expedient to levy a revenue, by way of impost on commerce, its freedom might be modified in that particular, by mutual and equivalent measures, preserving it entire in all others.

"Some nations not yet ripe for free commerce, in all its extent, might be willing to mollify its restrictions and regulations for us, in proportion to the advantages which an intercourse with us might offer. Particularly they may concur with us in reciprocating the duties to be levied on each side, or in compensating any excess of duty, by equivalent advantages of another nature. Our commerce is certainly of a character to entitle it to favor in most countries. The commodities we offer are either necessities of life, or materials for manufacture, or convenient subjects of revenue; and we take in exchange either manufactures, when they have received the last finish of art and industry, or mere luxuries. Such customers may reasonably expect welcome and friendly treatment at every market—customers, too, whose demands, increasing with their wealth and population, must very shortly give full employment to the whole industry of any nation whatever, in any line of supply they may get into the habit of calling for from it.

"But, should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter-prohibitions, duties, and regulations, also. Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them."

The plan which I now propose adopts the idea of equivalents and retaliation to the whole extent recommended by Mr. Jefferson. It differs from his plan in two features: first, in the mode of proceeding, by founding the treaties abroad upon a legislative act at home; secondly, in combining protection with revenue, in selecting articles of exception to the system of free trade. This degree of protection he admitted himself, at a later period of his life. It corresponds with the recommendation of President Washington to Congress, in the year '90, and with that of our present Chief Magistrate, to ourselves, at the commencement of the present session of Congress. I will read them, to sustain and support the principles on which my bill is founded.

"Our safety and interest require that we should promote such manufactures as tend to render us independent on others for essential, particularly for military supplies."

President Jackson, in 1829.

"It may be regretted that the complicated restrictions which now embarrass the intercourse of nations could not, by common consent, be abolished, and commerce allowed to flow in those channels to which individual enterprise—always its surest guide—might direct it. But we must ever expect selfish legislation in other nations; and are, therefore, compelled to adapt our own to their regulations, in the manner best calculated to avoid serious injury, and to harmonize the conflicting interests of our agriculture, our commerce, and our manufactures. * * * The general rule to be applied in graduating the duties upon articles of foreign growth or manufacture is that which will place our own in fair competition with those of other countries; and the inducements to advance even a step beyond this point are controlling in regard to those articles which are of primary necessity in time of war."

These extracts from the Presidents Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson, cover all the principles which are contained in my bill; the mode of action, the means of putting them into operation, is the only part that is new and original. To this part I can see no objection but to its novelty: for it is free from all difficulty on the score of constitutionality or expediency, and combines the advantages of equivalents with those of retaliation: for, if any nation refuses to reciprocate an abolition or reduction of duties with us, our heavy duties remain in force against her, and she pays the penalty of her refusal in the loss of some essential branch of her trade with us.

I will not now stop to dilate upon the benefit which will result to every family from an abolition of duties which will enable them to get all the articles enumerated in my bill for about one-third, or one-half less, than is now paid for them. Let any one read over the list of articles, and then look to the sum total which he now pays out annually for them, and from that sum deduct near fifty per cent., which is about the average of the duties and merchant's profit included, with which they now come charged to him. This deduction will be his saving under one branch of my plan—the abolition clause. To this must be added the gain under the clause to secure equivalents in foreign markets; and the two being added together, the saving in purchases at home being added to the gain in sales abroad, will give the true measure of the advantages which my plan presents.

Let us now see whether the agriculture and manufactures of the United States do not require better markets abroad than they possess at this time. What is the state of these markets? Let facts reply. England imposes a duty of three shillings sterling a pound upon our tobacco, which is ten times its value. She imposes duties equivalent to prohibition on our grain and provisions; and either totally excludes, or enormously taxes, every article, except cotton, that we send to her ports. In France, our tobacco is subject to a royal monopoly, which makes the king the sole purchaser, and subjects the seller to the necessity of taking the price which his agents will give. In Germany, our tobacco, and other articles, are heavily dutied, and liable to a transit duty, in addition, when they have to ascend the Rhine, or other rivers, to penetrate the interior. In the West Indies, which is our great provision market, our beef, pork, and flour, usually pay from eight to ten dollars a barrel; our bacon, from ten to twenty-five cents a pound; live hogs, eight dollars each; corn, corn meal, lumber, whiskey, fruit, vegetables, and every thing else, in proportion; the duties in the different islands, on an average, equaling or exceeding the value of the article in the United States. We export about forty-five millions of domestic productions, exclusive of manufactures, annually; and it may be safely assumed, that we have to pay near that sum in the shape of duties, for the privilege of selling these exports in foreign markets. So much for agriculture. Our manufactures are in the same condition. In many branches they have met the home demand, and are going abroad in search of foreign markets. They meet with vexatious restrictions, peremptory exclusions, or oppressive duties, wherever they go. The quantity already exported entitles them to national consideration, in the list of exports. Their aggregate value for 1828 was about five millions of dollars, comprising domestic cottons, to the amount of a million of dollars; soap and candles, to the value of nine hundred thousand dollars; boots, shoes, and saddlery, five hundred thousand dollars; hats, three hundred thousand dollars; cabinet, coach, and other wooden work, six hundred thousand dollars; glass and iron, three hundred thousand dollars; and numerous smaller items. This large amount of manufactures pays their value, in some instances more, for the privilege of being sold abroad; and, what is worse, they are totally excluded from several countries from which we buy largely. Such restrictions and impositions are highly injurious to our manufactures; and it is incontestably true, the amount of exports prove it, that what most of them now need is, not more protection at home, but a better market abroad; and it is one of the objects of this bill to obtain such a market for them.

It appears to me, said Mr. B., to be a fair and practicable plan, combining the advantages of legislation and negotiation, and avoiding the objections to each. It consults the sense of the people, in leaving it to their representatives to say on what articles duties shall be abolished for their relief; on what they shall be retained for protection and revenue; it then secures the advantage of obtaining equivalents, by referring it to the Executive to extend the benefit of the abolition to such nations as shall reciprocate the favor. To such as will not reciprocate, it leaves every thing as it now stands. The success of this plan can hardly be doubted. It addresses itself to the two most powerful passions of the human heart—interest and fear; it applies itself to the strongest principles of human action—profit and loss. For, there is no nation with whom we trade, but will be benefited by the increased trade of her staple productions, which will result from a free trade in such productions; none that would not be crippled by the loss of such a trade, which loss would be the immediate effect of rejecting our system. Our position enables us to command the commercial system of the globe; to mould it to our own plan, for the benefit of the world and ourselves. The approaching extinction of the public debt puts it into our power to abolish twelve millions of duties, and to set free more than one-half of our entire commerce. We should not forego, nor lose the advantages of such a position. It occurs but seldom in the life of a nation, and once missed, is irretrievably gone, to the generation at least, that saw and neglected the golden opportunity. We have complained, and justly, of the burthens upon our exports in foreign countries; a part of our tariff system rests upon the principle of retaliation for the injury thus done us. Retaliation, heretofore, has been our only resource: but reciprocity of injuries is not the way to enrich nations any more than individuals. It is an "unprofitable contest," under every aspect. But the present conjuncture, payment of the public debt, in itself a rare and almost unprecedented occurrence in the history of nations, enables us to enlarge our system; to present a choice of alternatives: one fraught with good, the other charged with evil, to for-sign nations. The participation, or exclusion, from forty millions of free trade, annually increasing, would not admit of a second thought, in the head of any nation with which we trade. To say nothing of her gains in the participation in such a commerce, what would be her loss in the exclusion from it? How would England, France, or Germany, bear the loss of their linen, silk, or wine trade, with the United States? How could Cuba, St. Domingo, or Brazil, bear the loss of their coffee trade with us? They could not bear it at all. Deep and essential injury, ruin of industry, seditions, and bloodshed, and the overthrow of administrations, would be the consequence of such loss. Yet such loss would be inevitable, (and not to the few nations, or in the articles only which I have mentioned, for I have put a few instances only by way of example,) but to every nation with whom we trade, that would not fall into our system, and throughout the whole list of essential articles to which our abolition extends. Our present heavy duties would continue in force against such nations; they would be abolished in favor of their rivals. We would say to them, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, free trade and navigation is not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations! But I feel entire confidence that it would not be necessary to use the language of menace or coercion. Amicable representations, addressed to their sense of self-interest, would be more agreeable, and not less effectual. The plan cannot fail! It is scarcely within the limits of possibility that it should fail! And if it did, what then? We have lost nothing. We remain as we were. Our present duties are still in force, and Congress can act upon them one or two years hence, in any way they please.

Here, then, is the peculiar recommendation to my plan, that, while it secures a chance, little short of absolute certainty, of procuring an abolition of twelve millions of duties upon our exports in foreign countries, in return for an abolition of twelve millions of duties upon imports from them, it exposes nothing to risk; the abolition of duty upon the foreign article here being contingent upon the acquisition of the equivalent advantage abroad.

I close this exposition of the principles of the first section of my bill with the single remark, that these treaties for the mutual abolition of duties should be for limited terms, say for seven or ten years, to give room for the modifications which time, and the varying pursuits of industry, may show to be necessary. Upon this idea, the bill is framed, and the period of ten years inserted by way of suggestion and exemplification of the plan. Another feature is too obvious to need a remark, that the time for the commencement of the abolition of duties is left to the Executive, who can accommodate it to the state of the revenue and the extinction of the public debt.

Abolition of Duties, Taxes, &c.

[SENATE]

Second Section.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December, in the year 1831, the duties now payable on the following articles, imported from countries with which the United States have no diplomatic relations, shall be reduced one-half; and, after the 31st of December, 1833, shall cease and determine entirely, to wit: teas, mace, cloves, cinnamon, nutmegs, cassia, ginger, ivory, Turkey carpets, Cashmere shawls."

This section presents an exception to the principle of the bill; it dispenses with the idea of obtaining equivalents in the enumerated articles. The exception is the effect of necessity; the articles excepted being desirable to us, and obtained from powers with whom we have no treaties. The exception is unavoidable, but it is not wholly disadvantageous. We shall get the articles for one-third and one-half less than we now pay for them; and if two or three millions of revenue should be suddenly wanted, they present the ready means of raising it. The abolition being by law alone, the duty may be laid again by law whenever needed.

Third Section.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December, in the year 1831, a duty of thirty-three and a third per cent. on the value, shall be levied on all furs and raw hides imported into the United States, from countries which shall not have secured their free admission by granting equivalent advantages to the like productions of the United States."

This section, to a superficial observer, may seem to militate against the plan of the bill; but the inconsistency is in appearance only. It harmonizes completely with the spirit of the bill. It provides for a future, eventual, and contingent duty, upon two articles now introduced, free of duty, to a great amount. The terms in which the section is drawn show that its object is to obtain equivalents for their future free importation; and the following table of their annual imports, for the last nine years, will show the great value of the argument which they will put into the hands of the Executive, in the negotiations to which the section may give rise.

The Table.

Years ending 30th Sept.	Value of Furs.	Raw Hides and Skins.	Total Value.
1821.....	224,198	892,580	1,116,778
1822.....	296,339	2,041,463	2,337,802
1823.....	273,083	2,084,082	2,357,170
1824.....	323,630	2,142,168	2,465,798
1825.....	347,163	2,921,863	3,269,021
1826.....	388,955	2,825,526	3,214,481
1827.....	347,347	1,480,349	1,827,696
1828.....	458,586	1,804,302	2,262,788
1829.....	880,633	2,251,809	2,532,442
	2,969,333	17,158,997	20,603,730

The aggregate exceeds twenty millions of dollars for the short period of the last nine years. And these free importations, so injurious to the fur trader, and the farmers who raise cattle and want a market for their skins, are derived from countries who exclude, or heavily tax, our furs and raw hides, and the articles manufactured out of them. They come, chiefly, from the Southern republics and Great Britain. If such large importations are to continue free, let those who enjoy the benefit reciprocate the favor. Let them abolish duties on American furs and American hats. Let them abolish duties on our raw hides; and where the privilege of sending hides would not be beneficial to us, as in the Southern republics, let something else be substituted for the abolition; as distilled spirits, manufactures of leather, cotton, glass, wood, &c. If they do not reciprocate advantages, thus offered, the penalty of their own election falls upon them. They incur the consequence denounced by Mr. Jefferson in the patriotic declaration, that free trade is not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations.

Here, sir, I make a single remark to illustrate the neglect with which the West has been treated in the progress of the tariff policy. The West produces furs and raw hides; they are leading articles of Western industry; yet no protection has been extended to them; the protective policy has never reached them; the country has been filled with foreign hides and foreign furs, free of duty, while the furs and hides of the United States, and the articles manufactured from them, are met by prohibitions, or heavy duties, in all quarters of the globe.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December, in the year ———, the amount levied on foreign tonnage for 'light money,' shall cease and determine, in favor of the ships of such nations as shall grant the like, or an equivalent favor to the merchant ships of the United States."

The object of this section is to gain some little relief for our navigating interest in foreign ports. The amount now paid by foreigners for "light money," that is to say, as a tribute to our light-houses, is about fifteen thousand dollars per annum. Such a sum is no object to the treasury of the United States, yet it is something to our ship-owners, for whose benefit the abolition of this small tax is intended. Nominally, it is a relief to foreigners; in reality, to our own navigators. The foreigners cannot be relieved here until the corresponding relief is secured abroad; and, as our shipping is most numerous, we may gain much more than we relinquish.

Fifth Section.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December, in the year ———, the duties now payable on tonnage, passports, and clearances, and on the re-exportation of imported articles, shall cease and determine."

The amount of these little taxes and duties is about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum. The Treasury will have no occasion for that sum after the extinguishment of the public debt; and being left in the pockets of the ship-owners and merchants, will be felt as an advantage by them, and not missed as a loss by the Government.

Sixth Section.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December next, the duty now payable on the importation of alum salt, coarse or ground, shall cease and determine; and from and after the same day, all laws authorizing allowances to fishing vessels, and bounties on the exportation of pickled fish, shall be, and the same hereby are, repealed."

This section stands out as a clear exception to the peculiar policy of the bill—that of obtaining equivalents by treaty stipulation. The section proposes a speedy repeal of the duty on this description of salt, and by operation of law alone. The reasons for this exception are—first, in the prime necessity and universality of the use of the article; secondly, in the small object it would present for negotiation, the number of powers from which we get salt being above a dozen, which would render abolition by negotiation tedious and dilatory, and the amount of duty relinquished to each, too inconsiderable to affect her policy, while the aggregate to us is great; thirdly, in the necessity of repealing the fishing bounties and allowances, which are dependent upon the duty on this description of foreign salt, and must stand or fall with that duty.

I have now finished the exposition of the features and principles of my bill; but justice to my plan and to myself will not permit me to stop here. The plan is new; and whatever is new has the prejudices of time and age to encounter, and the fears of timidity and caution to overcome. Its novelty will excite many enemies; the reasons which I may give, and which are the fruit of much research and meditation, may satisfy some and convert them into friends.

It certainly presents the tariff question under a new point of view to the American people.

That question has heretofore rested upon two great principles:

1. PROTECTION; 2. RETALIATION.

Under the first principle we sought a home supply of articles essential to our general independence, and to our safety in time of war.

Under the second principle we retaliate upon other nations the evils of their own policy in piling duties upon our productions.

It is not to be dissembled that the tariff policy, on both principles, has powerfully appealed to the sympathies and the patriotism of the American people, and while kept within reasonable limits had the general approbation of all quarters of the Union; North, South, West, and Centre. The tariff policy has been in force in these States forty years, and has only excited discontent within the last ten or fifteen years, and since it has been pushed beyond its own principles. The results are, increased duties at home and abroad; imports burthened, and exports burthened—the candle lit at both ends.

Under the plan which I propose, the tariff question will present itself to the people in this point of view:

1. Protection to every essential branch of industry.
2. Retaliation, as an alternative, where equivalents are refused.
3. Reciprocity of benefits instead of reciprocity of injuries.
4. The abolition of twelve millions of duties, at home, on imports.
5. The abolition of an equal amount of duties, abroad, on exports.
6. Discrimination between the articles which a wise policy requires, or does not require, to be made at home, and between the nations which grant or refuse us equivalents.
7. Increased importations of gold and silver.
8. Increased value of the internal trade with Mexico.

The results of the new plan, according to this view of its advantages, would be overwhelming in its favor. Let us verify these results, and justify these views.

In the first place, under the protecting principle which it contains, duties will remain on foreign articles, rivals of our own industry, to the amount of about ten millions of dollars. The support of the Government will require this sum, and the raising of this sum will give protection to our domestic industry; it will give it as an incident to the collection of revenue, and to this there will be no objection in any part of the Union.

In the second place, we shall terminate the unprofitable contest which we are now carrying on with foreign nations—a contest in which the only question is, which shall do most harm to the commerce of the other—and substitute for it a beneficial rivalry in the walks of free trade, based upon the unfettered exchange of surplus productions, to the amount of forty millions at the start, to increase annually with the rapid growth and expansion of these young athletic States.

In the third place, the abolition of twelve millions of duties will be the repeal of sixteen millions of taxes, counting the merchant's profit at 33½ per cent.; and this repeal will be felt in every family in the purchase of its necessities, its comforts, and its luxuries. Linen for the person, the table, and the bed, would be one-third cheaper. Coffee would be seven cents cheaper in the pound; tea, one-third; wines and silks, one-third; and so of all the articles enumerated in the bill. Every family would save one-third, or upwards, of its annual store account; every State would retain, within its limits, its proportion of these sixteen millions; and all the shame and mischief of plotting and combining, and wrangling, here, about the division of so much spoil, would be avoided.

In the fourth and fifth places, the principle of equivalents would gain an abolition of duties on our productions in foreign ports, equal to the abolition made here upon foreign productions. We would buy cheaper and sell higher. Instead of paying the value, and, in some instances, ten times the value of our products, for the privilege of selling them in a foreign market, we would get these foreign duties reduced to a reasonable amount. Our productions are chiefly dutied in foreign countries, not for protection, but for revenue; and the experience of all nations, and especially of Great Britain, proves that revenue is productive in proportion to its moderation and fairness; smuggling and non-consumption always disappointing the calculations of short-sighted cupidity in the imposition of enormous duties. But these will be arguments for our Ministers abroad, which they will handle with more ability than I can pretend to.

In the sixth place, the principle of discrimination which my plan, for the first time in the progress of the tariff policy, introduces and establishes, will admit of a salutary distinction in the selection of articles for protection, and in the application of retaliatory measures to impracticable nations. Thus far there has been no discrimination, either in articles at home or nations abroad, in our tariff policy. To protect articles which can, and ought to be, made at home, we have dutied, and that most heavily, not only the cherished article, but all others belonging to the same branch, though of kinds not made, nor necessary to be made, in the United States. Blankets and strouds for the Indian trade, fine cottons, alum salt—I mention a few articles by way of example—are evidences of this want of discrimination. Among nations, this want of discrimination has been equally palpable. Great Britain has been severe upon our tobacco, grain, and provisions; to retaliate upon her we have been severe, not only upon her productions, but upon the productions of France, Germany, and all the nations with whom we trade. This want of discrimination among nations may be the necessary effect of regulating our tariff by law alone. If so, the argument becomes still stronger in favor of my plan by law and negotiation combined, which admits of discrimination; which offers the same advantageous terms to all nations, and leaves retaliatory duties in force against those only which justly incur our resentment, by refusing to receive our productions upon the terms that we offer to receive theirs. To them I say, in the thrice-repeated language of the great Jefferson, "Free trade is not to be given in exchange for vexations and restrictions!"

Seventhly, in obtaining increased importations of gold and silver. The United States have no silver or gold mines, except those in my native State, (North Carolina.) They are dependent upon foreign countries for their supply of these metals. To the amount of one or two millions they are obtained from the West Indies, and other neighboring countries, in return for domestic productions, chiefly provisions. But the main supply is obtained by the circuitous operation of sending our tobacco, cotton, and rice, to Europe, exchanging them for fine goods, and selling these goods in the southern republics. Our trade with Mexico is a complete illustration of this process. We obtained from her, in 1828—taking the last year to which the returns are made up and printed—four millions of dollars in gold and silver, and seven hundred thousand dollars' worth of other products; we exported to her about seven hundred thousand dollars' worth of our domestic products, just enough to balance hers, leaving the whole amount of gold and silver to have been acquired by other exchanges. What were these exchanges? They were the fine cloths and cassimeres, the linens, silks, cambrics, muslins, rich carpets, wines, and porcelain, which our cotton and tobacco had bought in Europe, and which were either carried direct to Mexico, or re-exported from this country under the system of drawbacks. This makes it clear, that whatever will facilitate the exchange of our cotton and tobacco for the fine goods of Europe, will enhance the importation of the precious metals into the United States; and nothing can facilitate this exchange so much as reductions of duty upon the articles which compose it. The cotton plantations and tobacco fields of the South and West are thus the gold and silver mines of the United States; and blind, stupid, and suicidal is the policy which would destroy these fields and plantations!

Eighthly, in promoting the internal trade with Mexico. This trade is carried on partly in domestic, partly in European goods. Its present returns are about a quarter of a million of dollars. So far as foreign goods enter into its amount, there is a loss to the trader of the whole amount of the duty paid; the want of custom-houses on the frontiers rendering the application of the drawback system difficult and objectionable. The abolition of duties on the foreign articles used in that trade, chiefly fine goods, would put the inland trader on a footing with the shipper from the seaport, and probably enhance the returns of the trade, in a brief period, from a quarter of a million, to one or two millions of dollars.

These are the results of my plan, verified as fully as established facts, fair inductions, and probabilities approaching to certainty, can verify any untried experiment. They are the results of free trade, qualified by the policy of protection and the necessities of revenue; two qualifications which, in my view, reduce themselves to one: for they are convertible propositions—the revenue resulting from the protection, and the protection from the revenue. Anti-tariff citizens can have no objection to it, for they admit the protection which springs from a fair exercise of the revenue-raising power; the supporters of the tariff policy, and especially the real manufacturers—not the political ones—but the actual owners and workers, can have no objection to it, for it leaves them all their present protection, procures them better markets abroad, gives them comforts and necessities, as tea, coffee, &c., cheaper than they now get them, and facilitates the acquisition of the material to several branches of manufacture, as the umbrella, the hat, the lady's shoe, bonnet, &c., in which silk is an essential part; and which will be got one-third cheaper when the duty on that article is abolished.

This being the case, the "crowning mercy" of my plan would be the speedy death and burial of the tariff question, and, with its interment, a restoration of that harmony of the Union which all true patriots desire, and which the progress of this question has so greatly impaired.

The last section of my bill still remains to be considered. It is the one which proposes to abolish the duty upon alum salt, and to repeal the laws which authorize the fishing bounties and allowances.

To spare to any gentleman, said Mr. B., the supposed necessity of rehearsing to me a lecture upon the importance of the fisheries, I will premise that I have some acquaintance with the subject; that I know the fisheries to be valuable, for the food they produce, the commerce they create, the mariners they perfect, the employment they give to artisans in the building of vessels, and the consumption of wood, hemp, and iron. I also know that the fishermen applied for the bounties, at the commencement of our present form of Government, which the British give to their fisheries, and that it was denied them upon the report of the Secretary of State, (Mr. Jefferson;) and I have lately read the six dozen acts of Congress, general and particular, passed in the last forty years, from 1789 to 1829, inclusive, giving the bounties and allowances, which it is my present purpose to abolish, with the duty on alum salt, which is the foundation upon which all this superstructure of legislative enactments has been reared.

I say the salt tax, and especially the tax on alum salt, which is the kind required for the fisheries, is the foundation of all these bounties and allowances; and that, as they grew up together, it is fair and regular that they should sink and fall together.

To prove this, let the laws speak.

The Laws.

1. Act of Congress, 1789, grants five cents a barrel on pickled fish, and salted provisions, and five cents a quintal on dried fish, exported from the United States, in lieu of a drawback of the duties imposed on the importation of the salt used in curing such fish and provisions.

N. B. Duty on salt, at that time, six cents a bushel.

2. Act of 1790 increases the bounty in lieu of drawback to ten cents a barrel on pickled fish and salted provisions, and ten cents a quintal on dried fish. The duty on salt being then raised to twelve cents a bushel.

3. Act of 1792 repeals the bounty in lieu of drawback on dried fish, and in lieu of that, and as a commutation and equivalent therefor, authorizes an allowance to be paid to vessels in the cod fishery (dried fish) at the rate of one dollar and fifty cents a ton on vessels of twenty to thirty tons; two dollars and fifty cents on tonnage of vessels above thirty tons; with a limitation of one hundred and seventy dollars for the highest allowance to any vessel.

4. A supplementary act, of the same year, adds twenty per cent. to each head of these allowances.

5. Act of 1797 increases the bounty on salted provisions to eighteen cents a barrel; on pickled fish to twenty-two cents a barrel; and adds thirty-three and a third per cent. to the allowance in favor of the cod fishing vessels. Duty on salt, at the same time, being raised to twenty cents a bushel.

6. Act of 1799 increases the bounty on pickled fish to thirty cents a barrel, on salted provisions to twenty-five.

7. Act of 1800 continues all previous acts (for bounties and allowances) for ten years, and makes this proviso: That these allowances shall not be understood to be continued for a longer time than the correspondent duties on salt, respectively, for which the said additional allowances were granted, shall be payable.

8. Act of 1807 repeals all laws laying a duty on imported salt, and for paying bounties on the exportation of pickled fish and salted provisions, and making allowances to fishing vessels—Mr. Jefferson being then President.

9. Act of 1818 gives a bounty of twenty cents a barrel on pickled fish exported, and allows to the cod fishing vessels at the rate of two dollars and forty cents the ton for vessels between twenty and thirty tons, four dollars a ton for vessels above thirty, with a limitation of two hundred and seventy-two dollars for the highest allowance; and a proviso, that no bounty or allowance should be paid unless it was proved to the satisfaction of the collector that the fish was wholly cured with foreign salt, and the duty on it secured or paid. The salt duty, at the rate of twenty cents a bushel, was revived as a war tax, at the same time. Bounties on salted provisions were omitted.

10. Act of 1816 continued the act of 1818 in force, which, being for the war only, would otherwise have expired.

11. Act of 1819 increases the allowance to vessels in the cod fishery to three dollars and fifty cents a ton on vessels from five to thirty; to four dollars a ton on vessels above thirty tons; with a limitation of three hundred and sixty dollars for the maximum allowance.

Abolition of Duties, Taxes, &c.

[SENATE.]

12. Act of 1828 authorizes the mackerel fishing vessels to take out licenses like the cod fishing vessels, under which it is reported by the vigilant Secretary of the Treasury, that money is illegally drawn by the mackerel vessels—the newspapers say to the amount of thirty to fifty thousand dollars per annum.

These recitals of legislative enactments are sufficient to prove that the fishing bounties and allowances are bottomed upon the salt duty, and must stand or fall with that duty. I will now give my reasons for proposing to abolish the duty on alum salt, and will do it in the simplest form of narrative statement; the reasons themselves being of a nature too weighty and obvious to need, or even to admit, of coloring or exaggeration from arts of speech.

1. Because it is an article of indispensable necessity in the provision trade of the United States. No beef or pork for the army or navy, or for consumption in the South, or for exportation abroad, can be put up except in this kind of salt. If put up in common salt, it is rejected absolutely by the commissaries of the army and navy, and if taken to the South must be repacked in alum salt, at an expense of one dollar and twelve and a half cents a barrel, before it is exported, or sold for domestic consumption. The quantity of provisions which require this salt, and must have it, is prodigious, and annually increasing. The exports of 1828 were, of beef, sixty thousand barrels, of pork, fifty-four thousand barrels, of bacon, one million nine hundred thousand pounds weight, butter and cheese, two million pounds weight. The value of these articles was two millions and a quarter of dollars. To this amount must be added the supply for the army and navy, and all that was sent to the South for home consumption, every pound of which had to be cured in this kind of salt, for common salt will not cure it. The Western country is the great producer of provisions; and there is scarcely a farmer in the whole extent of that vast region whose interest does not require a prompt repeal of the duty on this description of salt.

2. Because no salt of this kind is made in the United States, nor any rival to it, or substitute for it. It is a foreign importation, brought from various islands in the West Indies, belonging to England, France, Spain, and Denmark; and from Lisbon, St. Ubes, Gibraltar, the Bay of Biscay, and Liverpool. The principles of the protecting system do not extend to it: for no quantity of protection can produce a home supply. The present duty, which is far beyond the rational limit of protection, has been in force near thirty years, and has not produced a pound. We are still thrown exclusively upon the foreign supply. The principles of the protecting system can only apply to common salt, the product of which is considerable in the United States; and upon that kind, the present duty is proposed to be left in full force.

3. Because the duty is enormous, and quadruples the price of the salt to the farmer. The original value of salt is about fifteen cents the measured bushel of eighty-four pounds. But the tariff substitutes weight for measure, and fixes that weight at fifty-six pounds, instead of eighty-four. Upon that fifty-six pounds, a duty of twenty cents is laid. Upon this duty, the retail merchant has his profit of eight or ten cents, and then reduces his bushel from fifty-six to fifty pounds. The consequence of all these operations is, that the farmer pays about three times as much for a weighed bushel of fifty pounds, as he would have paid for a measured bushel of eighty-four pounds, if this duty had never been imposed.

4. Because the duty is unequal in its operation, and falls heavily on some parts of the community, and produces profit to others. It is a heavy tax on the farmers of the West, who export provisions; and no tax at all, but rather a source of profit, to that branch of the fisheries to which the allowances of the vessels apply. Exporters of provisions have the same claim to these allowances that exporters of fish have. Both claims rest upon the same principle, and upon the principle of all drawbacks, that of refunding the duty paid on the imported salt, which is re-exported on salted fish and provisions. The same principle covers the beef and pork of the farmer which covers the fish of the fisherman; and such was the law, as I have shown, for the first eighteen years that these bounties and allowances were authorized. Fish and provisions fared alike from 1789 to 1807. Bounties and allowances began upon them together, and fell together, on the repeal of the salt tax, in the second term of Mr. Jefferson's administration. At the renewal of the salt tax, in 1813, at the commencement of the late war, they parted company, and the law, in the exact sense of the proverb, has made fish of one and flesh of the other ever since. The fishing interest is now drawing about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually from the Treasury; the provision raisers draw not a cent, while they export more than double as much, and ought, upon the same principle, to draw more than double as much money from the Treasury.

5. Because it is the means of drawing an undue amount of money from the public Treasury, under the idea of an equivalent for the drawback of duty on the salts used in the curing of fish. The amount of money actually drawn in that way is about four millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and is now going on at the rate of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, and constantly augmenting. That this amount is more than the legal idea recognizes, or contemplates, is proved in various ways. 1. By comparing the quantity of salt supposed to have been used, with the quantity of fish known to have been exported, within a given year. This test, for the year 1828, would exhibit about seventy millions of pounds weight of salt on about forty millions of pounds weight of fish. This would suppose about a pound and three-quarters of salt upon each pound of fish. 2. By comparing the value of the salt supposed to have been used, with the value of the fish known to have been exported. This test would give two hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars for the salt duty on about one million of dollars' worth of fish; making the duty one-fourth of its value. On this basis, the amount of the duty on the salt used on exported provisions would be near six hundred thousand dollars. 8. By comparing the increasing allowances for salt with the decreasing exportation of fish. This test, for two given periods, the rate of allowance being the same, would produce this result: In the year 1820, three hundred and twenty-one thousand four hundred and nineteen quintals of dried fish exported, and one hundred and ninety-eight thousand seven hundred and twenty-four dollars paid for the commutation of the salt drawback: 1828, two hundred and sixty-five thousand two hundred and seventeen quintals of dried fish exported, and two hundred and thirty-nine thousand one hundred and forty-five dollars paid for the commutation. These comparisons establish the fact that money is unlawfully drawn from the Treasury by means of these fishing allowances, bottomed on the salt duty, and that fact is expressly stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Ingham,) in his report upon the finances, at the commencement of the present session of Congress. [See page 8 of the report.]

6. Because it has become a practical violation of one of the most equitable clauses in the Constitution of the United States—the clause which declares that duties, taxes, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the Union. There is no uniformity in the operation of this tax. Far from it. It empties the pockets of some, and fills the pockets of others. It returns to some five times as much as they pay, and to others it returns not a cent. It gives to the fishing interest two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, and not a cent to the farming interest, which, upon the same principle, would be entitled to six hundred thousand dollars per annum.

7. Because this duty now rests upon a false basis—a basis which makes it the interest of one part of the Union to keep it up, while it is the interest of other parts to get rid of it. It is the interest of the West to abolish this duty; it is the interest of the Northeast to perpetuate it. The former loses money by it; the latter makes money by it; and a tax that becomes a money-making business is a solecism of the highest order of absurdity. Yet such is the fact. The Treasury records prove it, and it will afford the Northeast a brilliant opportunity to manifest their disinterested affection to the West, by giving up their own profit in this tax, to relieve the West from the burthen it imposes upon her.

8. Because the repeal of the duty will not materially diminish the revenue, nor delay the extinguishment of the public debt. It is a tax carrying money out of the Treasury, as well as bringing it in. The issue is two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, perhaps the full amount which accrues on the kind of salt to which the abolition extends. The duty, and the fishing allowances bottomed upon it, falling together as they did when Mr. Jefferson was President, would probably leave the amount of revenue unaffected.

9. Because it belongs to an unhappy period in the history of our Government, and came to us, in its present magnitude, in company with an odious and repudiated set of measures. The maximum of twenty cents a bushel on salt was fixed in the year '98, and was the fruit of the same system which produced the alien and sedition laws, the eight per cent. loans, the stamp act, the black cockade, and the standing army in time of peace. It was one of the contrivances of that disastrous period for extorting money from the people, for the support of that strong and splendid Government which was then the cherished vision of so many exalted heads. The reforming hand of Jefferson overthrew it, and all the superstructure of fishing allowances which was erected upon it. The exigencies of the late war caused it to be revived, for the term of the war, and the interest of some, and the neglect of others, have permitted it to continue ever since. It is now our duty to sink it a second time. We profess to be disciples of the Jeffersonian school; let us act up to our profession, and complete the task which our master set us.

This concludes what I have to say on the present occasion. I flatter myself that I have vindicated the title of my bill; that I have shown it to be a bill to provide for the abolition of unnecessary duties; to relieve the people from sixteen millions of taxes; and to improve the condition of the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, of the United States. I now submit my motion, in form, for leave to bring it in.

[The leave was thereupon granted, and the bill read the first time.]

WEDNESDAY, February 24.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

MR. WOODBURY said: The alien and sedition laws soon after brought the hostile parties to a crisis; and then the strong reasoning of Mr. Madison, in the Virginia resolutions of 1798, and the acute mind of Mr. Jefferson, in those of Kentucky, and the whole influence of their democratic coadjutors throughout the Union, were concentrated against those alarming doctrines, and their fatal, practical consequences. One of the Virginia resolutions was in these words: (Virg. Res. p. 4.)

"That this Assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the Federal Government, as resulting from the compact to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no farther valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

Another resolution is in these words: (Virg. Res. p. 9.)

"That the General Assembly doth also express its deep regret that a spirit has, in sundry instances, been manifested by the Federal Government to enlarge its power, by the forced constructions of the constitutional charter which defines them; and that indications have appeared of a design to expound certain general phrases, which, having been copied from the very limited grant of powers in the former articles of confederation, were the less liable to be misconstrued, so as to destroy the meaning and effect of the particular enumeration, which necessarily explains and limits the general phrases, and so as to consolidate the States by degrees into one sovereignty; the obvious tendency and inevitable result of which would be, to transform the present republican system of the United States into an absolute, or, at best, a mixed monarchy."

Mr. Jefferson, in his letters, has followed up the same ideas, and never parted, till he parted with life itself, from this democratic view of the constitutional compact.

"You will have learned that an act for internal improvement, after passing both Houses, was negatived by the President. The act was founded, avowedly, on the principle that the phrase in the constitution, which authorizes Congress 'to lay taxes, to pay debts, and provide for the general welfare,' was an extension of the powers specifically enumerated to whatever would promote the general welfare; and this, you know, was the federal doctrine. Whereas, our tenet ever was, (and indeed it is almost the only landmark which now divides the federalists from the republicans,) that Congress had not unlimited powers to provide for the general welfare, but were restrained to those specifically enumerated; and that, as it was never meant they should provide for that welfare but by the exercise of the enumerated powers, so it could not have been meant they should raise money for purposes which the enumeration did not place under their action; consequently, that the specification of powers is a limitation of the purposes for which they may raise money."—4 Jeff. Works, 306.

The Virginia Resolutions, p. 13, say further:

"Whether the exposition of the general phrases here combated, would not, by degrees, consolidate the States into one sovereignty, is a question concerning which the committee can perceive little room for difference of opinion. To consolidate the States into one sovereignty, nothing more can be wanted than to supersede their respective sovereignties in the cases reserved to them, by extending the sovereignty of the United States to all cases of the 'general welfare,' that is to say, to 'all cases whatever.'"

Who is so blind as not to see, in the approaching condition of our Government, on the extinguishment of the national debt, and with our present enormous duties retained, creating a vast surplus revenue of ten or fifteen millions of dollars; who does not see a cause of new and most fearful apprehension to the States, if all that surplus, as well as all the public lands, can, and shall be employed under the General Government, in objects that Government may think conducive to the "common good," or "general welfare?" Who does not see a door opened to favoritism and corruption, which may let in irretrievable ruin to sound political justice and equality, and overwhelm every vestige of State independence? Who does not see—I care not by whose hands administered—I say the same in a majority as when in a minority—I say the same under this as under the last administration—who does not see a power never contemplated at the formation of the constitution, and which can never be exercised under our present political system, without tainting to the core, both those who exercise and those who feel it? Do I say this because hostile to internal improvements? No! But because hostile to the degeneracy, if not the ruin of our confederacy; and because I would advance internal improvements at the expense of the States and individuals, and not at the expense of the Union. I would do it the only way they ever can be advanced, with safety and usefulness—according to the resolution of New Hampshire, before read; and in those cases only in which individuals and States can see their private and local interest to be so much promoted by these improvements, as to warrant the undertakings by themselves.

Has it then come to this, under such a Government, that one of the parties cannot, in any way, interpose and correct its ruinous tendencies, and its insidious constructions, when the great exigencies of the country demand it? I think there has been more apparent than real difference on this point, in the present debate. Most must admit that they can interfere in some way; so said the fathers of democracy in '98; so said the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions; and so do those say whom I represent. They can interpose in various ways. My theory on this subject may vary more in form than substance from other gentlemen's, but, as each speaks for himself on this floor, I may be permitted to state briefly it is this: that the parties to the constitution are the agents of the people and the States, placed in the General Government on the one hand, and the agents of the people placed in their State Governments on the other hand; and that the people separated from their agents, are only the great primary power and foundation of the whole, never acting as one whole upon or about the constitution, either legislatively, executive, or judicially; but acting on it, in those forms, or any others, only by their agents in the States and in the General Government. But the people themselves are still a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself; and, entrench yourselves as you may, to the teeth, in parchments and constructions, they, by their agents, in convention in the States, can abolish every institution, political or civil, of the Union or of the respective States.

The parties, then, in collision as to the extent of the powers given by the constitution of the Union, are seldom the people with their agents of either class, and never so any length of time without a sufficient redress; but the opposing parties are generally, on the one hand, the agents of the people and the States, under that constitution, and on the other hand, their agents under the State constitutions. I say the agents of the people and States in the General Government, as the States are technically represented here, in the Senate, and may always technically and solely choose all the electors of the executive branch. The former, acting in the administration of the General Government, causes the former, properly enough in common parlance, to be called the General Government, and the latter the States. The people, as such, unless in a revolutionary condition, cannot cast a single vote, hold a single town meeting, or lay out a road of ordinary highway, except through State power and State agency. I shall not repeat what reasoning and illustration the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. ROWAN) and South Carolina (Mr. HAYNE) have adduced, in proof of these views, but merely cite a clause, in the Virginia resolutions of '98, to show, that these views, whether right or wrong, were the views of the fathers of the democratic party, and if I err, I err with the Platos and Socrates of my political faith. (Virg. Res. p. 8.)

"The other position involved in this branch of the resolution, namely, 'that the States are not parties to the constitution or compact,' is, in the judgment of the committee, equally free from objection. It is indeed true that the term 'States' is sometimes used in a vague sense, and sometimes in different senses, according to the subject to which it is applied. Thus it sometimes means the separate sections occupied by the political societies within each; sometimes the particular governments established by those societies; sometimes those societies as organized into those particular governments; and lastly, it means the people composing those political societies in their highest political sovereign capacity. Although it might be wished that the perfection of language admitted less diversity in the signification of the same words, yet little inconvenience is produced by it, where the true sense can be collected with certainty from the different applications. In the present instance, whatever different constructions of the term 'States,' in the resolution, may have been entertained, all will at least concur in that last mentioned; because in that sense the constitution was submitted to the 'States;' in that sense the 'States' ratified it; and in that sense of the term 'States' they are consequently parties to the compact from which the powers of the Federal Government result."

The States, then, being one party, is it to be contended that still the other party, the General Government, may adopt any extended construction of the powers granted under the constitution, without any efficient right on the part of the States to murmur, remonstrate, alter, or resist? Certainly not, I should think, on either side of the debate. But how far can they go, and "where shall their proud waves be staid?" The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, a tribunal appointed, organized, and accountable only to one party to the Government, and one party to the decision, is urged on us to be the great final balance wheel of the whole machinery. But if the States be another party to the compact, it is manifest that, on ordinary principles of compact, they have the same right as the opposite party, or its agents, to decide on the extent of the compact. This is conceded between two parties, in the case of treaties, and in the case of ordinary bargains and conventions; and it cannot be denied here, admitting we have shown the States to be one party, unless both the parties have expressly agreed upon some tribunal intermediate, as an umpire, or judge, to decide irrevocably, this kind of differences between the parties to the constitution. On the other hand, I understand it to be argued, that the Supreme Court has been agreed on as such a tribunal. But, the Supreme Court of the United States would not be likely to be so agreed on, reasoning a priori, because its members are all appointed by, and answerable to, only one of the parties, and indeed go to form a portion of one of the parties, being mere agents of the General Government. The amendments of the constitution, reserving rights and powers to the States or people, would be nugatory—a mere mockery, if the suicidal grant was made to the Supreme Court, to the mere agents of one party, to decide finally and forever on the extent of all their own powers. The reasoning for this grant, therefore, seems to me argumentum ad absurdum, as clear as any axiom in Euclid. But on this head I am anxious not to be misapprehended, and am willing to resort to the words of the charter itself to see what the legitimate powers of that court purport to be, in deciding such controversies.

From the very fact of there being two parties in the Federal Government, it would seem a necessary inference that the agents of each party, on proper occasions, must be allowed and are required, by an official oath, to conform to the constitution, and to decide on the extent of its provisions, so far as is necessary for the expression of their own views, and for the performance of their own duties. This being, to my mind, the rationale of the case, I look on the express words of the constitution as conforming to it by limiting the grant of judicial jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, both by the constitution and by the acts of Congress, to specific enumerated objects. In the same way there are limited grants of judicial jurisdiction to State courts, under most of the State constitutions. When cases present themselves within these grants, the judges, whether of the States, or the United States, must decide, and enforce their decision with such means as are confided to them by the laws and the constitutions. But when questions arise, not confided to the Judiciary of the States or United States, the officers concerned in those questions must themselves decide them; and, in the end, must pursue such course as their views of the constitution dictate. In such instances they have the same authority to make the decision as the Supreme Court itself has in other instances.

Thus the Virginia Resolutions, page 18, say: "However true, therefore, it may be, that the Judicial Department is, in all questions submitted to it by the forms of the constitution, to decide in the last resort, this resort must necessarily be deemed the last in relation to the authorities of the other departments of the Government; not in relation to the rights of the parties to the constitutional compact, from which the judicial as well as the other departments hold their delegated trusts. On any other hypothesis, the delegation of judicial power would annul the authority delegating it; and the concurrence of this department with the others in usurped powers, might subvert forever, and beyond the possible reach of any rightful remedy, the very constitution which all were instituted to preserve.

Thus, Mr. Jefferson says:

"They contain the true principles of the revolution of 1800, for that was as real a revolution in the principles of our Government as that of 1776 was in its form; not effected, indeed, by the sword, as that, but by the rational and peaceable instrument of reform—the suffrage of the people. The nation declared its will by dismissing functionaries of one principle and electing those of another; and the two branches, the Executive and Legislative, submitted to their election. Over the Judiciary Department the constitution had deprived them of their control. That, therefore, has continued the reprobated system; and although new matter has been occasionally incorporated into the old, yet the leaven of the old mass seems to assimilate to itself the new; and after 20 years' confirmation of the Federal system by the voice of the nation, declared through the medium of elections, we find the Judiciary, on every occasion, still driving us into consolidation.

"In denying the right they usurp, of exclusively explaining the constitution, I go farther than you do, if I understand rightly your quotation from the Federalist, of an opinion that 'the Judiciary is the last resort in relation to the other departments of the Government, but not in relation to the rights of the parties to the compact under which the Judiciary is derived.' If this opinion be sound, then indeed is our constitution a complete felo de se. For, intending to establish three departments, co-ordinate and independent, that they might check and balance one another, it has given, according to this opinion, to one of them alone the right to prescribe rules for the government of the others, and to that one, too, which is unelected by, and independent of, the nation. For experience has already shown that the impeachment it has provided is not even a scarecrow; that such opinions as the one you combat, sent cautiously out, as you observe, also, by detachment, not belonging to the case often, but sought for out of it, as if to rally the public opinion beforehand to their views, and to indicate the line they are to walk in, have been so quietly passed over as never to have excited animadversion, even in a speech of any one of the body intrusted with impeachment. The constitution, on this hypothesis, is a mere thing of wax in the hands of the Judiciary, which they may twist and shape into any form they please. It should be remembered, as an axiom of eternal truth in politics, that whatever power in any Government is independent, is absolute also; in theory only, at first, while the spirit of the people is up, but in practice as fast as that relaxes. Independence can be trusted nowhere but with the people in mass. They are inherently independent of all but moral law. My construction of the constitution is very different from that you quote. It is, that each department is truly independent of the others, and has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the constitution in the cases submitted to its action; and especially where it is to act ultimately and without appeal."

In confirmation of this, almost every Eastern constitution authorizes the departments of Government, not Judicial, to call on the judges for aid and advice merely, in questions of difficulty, still leaving those departments to act finally on their own matured information, and their own responsibility. But all the difficulty does not arise here. Suppose the State agents, judicial or otherwise, decide wrong in the opinion of the people; or the agents of the General Government decide wrong in the opinion of the people, on subjects admitted to be within their jurisdiction; is there, first, no remedy for the people? Are not they supreme?

As I before remarked, the people, in their omnipotence, if the case excite them enough, can, and will, in such event, always apply a most sovereign remedy; sometimes reach the disease by changing the agents who have misbehaved; at other times, when unable, by the tenure of office, as in the case of the judges generally, to reach that class of agents by new elections, they can, by conventions, alter or abolish the whole system of Government, and the whole course of decisions under them; and improve and create anew whatever may have been objectionable. This is a doctrine neither revolutionary nor leading to anarchy, but rational and democratic, and lies at the foundation of all popular Governments. But, granting this, the argument still holds, that, though the people can effect a change, yet the States, one of the parties to the compact, cannot reach or correct what they may deem an erroneous decision by the agents of the other party on the powers given by the compact, and especially that they cannot reach or correct an erroneous decision made by the Supreme Court of the Union. Again, it may be answered, reasoning a priori, that, if this be true, it is deeply to be lamented, as the people seldom act unitedly or efficiently except through their State agents—those agents who come so frequently and so directly from among the people themselves. If this be true, it is quite certain that the Supreme Court might, if so disposed, proceed, case by case, from year to year, on one subject and another, in this and that section of the Union, to give constructions to the constitution, tending slowly, but inevitably, to a consolidation of the Government, and to the utter prostration of State rights: and yet the people, as a people, would not widely and at once become enough excited to interpose in their primary authority, and stay or correct such encroachments. If this be true, any Supreme Court entertaining political views hostile to those of a majority of the people, would be able, in time, by cautious approaches, not exciting general and deep alarm, to defeat the majority, to render the reservations to the States and people a mere brutum fulmen, turn the doctrine of State rights into a jest, and ride triumphantly over all probable and feasible opposition.

There is wanting in me no respect to the members of our Supreme Court which their great personal worth deserves: but I would inquire if, from the case of Marbury and Madison, in 1801, down to that of the Bank and McCulloch in 1821, there has not been evinced on that bench a manifest and sleepless opposition, in all cases of a political bearing, to the strict construction of the constitution adopted by the democracy of the Union, in the great revolution of 1801? I say nothing now against the honesty or legal correctness of their views in adopting such a construction. I speak only of the matter of fact, and of its political tendency; and I ask, if, while the people, through their democratic agents in the Legislatures of the State and General Governments, have been, in the main, adhering to one construction,—a strict and rigid construction—if their Judicial agents in the General Government have not been, with a constancy, and silence, like the approaches of death, adhering to a different construction? Thus sliding onward to consolidation; thus giving a diseased enlargement to the powers of the General Government, and throwing chains over State rights—chains never dreamed of at the formation of the General Government. What says Mr. Jefferson on this head? (4 Jefferson's Works, page 387.)

"But it is not from this branch of Government we have most to fear. Taxes and short elections will keep them right. The Judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners which is constantly working underground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. They are construing our constitution from a co-ordination of a general and special Government to a general and supreme one alone. This will lay all things at their feet, and they are too well versed in English law to forget the maxim, 'boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem.'"

No institution, in this free country, is above just criticism and fair discussion, in regard to its political views, and the political consequences of its proceedings. Hence, in the States, and everywhere, the field of inquiry and comment is, and should be, open to all; and a sacredness from this would render any institution a despotism. What, then, let me ask, what have been the illustrations of the bearing of the decisions of that court upon State rights, in particular cases? At one time, has not Georgia been prostrated, by a decision, in a case, feigned, or real, between Fletcher and Peck? At another, Pennsylvania humbled, in the case of Olmstead's executors? At another, Ohio and Maryland subdued, in the case of McCulloch and the Bank? At another, New York herself set at defiance, in the steamboat controversy? And last, if not least, New Hampshire vanquished in the case of Dartmouth College? These decisions may, or may not, have been legally right; that is not my present inquiry; but who is not struck with the difference between the progress and effect of these decisions, and what was witnessed in the earlier days of the Republic? When Massachusetts, in the height of her glory, was threatened to be brought to the bar of that court for trial, she, in the person of Hancock, set on foot a remonstrance, and a proposed amendment of the constitution, which her great influence carried throughout the Union—an amendment exempting a sovereign State there, in certain cases, from the humiliation of a trial and sentence. Even this amendment, so plausible on its face, has, since 1801, been almost wholly evaded in practice, by suing the agents of a State, instead of the State itself. So again, before 1801, when Virginia, in her might and chivalry, took the field against the alien and sedition laws and against the decision of the Supreme Court on their constitutionality, an alteration of the constitution, to be sure, did not follow, but an alteration in the administration and the laws did follow; and she effected the political revolution which suffered those laws to expire without a renewal, and will probably prevent their re-enactment, until democracy itself shall have become a forgotten tale. I shall enumerate no other cases, nor detain the Senate by a moment's inquiry into the correctness of any of these decisions: though it may be observed that my own State, on an attempt to obtain her political approbation of the decisions in the cases of Ohio and Maryland, and of the principles therein involved, postponed indefinitely the resolutions on that subject, by the following vote, in one branch of her Legislature:

June 24, 1821. The Senate voted, seven to five, to postpone indefinitely the following, among other resolutions:

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this legislature, the proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Ohio, in the before-mentioned report stated, do not violate either the letter or the spirit of the 11th article of the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, nor constitute any just cause of complaint."

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

The only time she ever expressed any opinion, as a State, hostile to my views concerning the powers of the General Government, and its Judiciary, was in rejecting the Virginia resolutions, at an era in her politics when, having just cast her votes for the elder Adams, she might naturally be expected to be hostile to the democratic principles of those resolutions.

It will thus be seen how the powers of the General Government have been gradually brought, through one of its departments, to bear on the States; and how the decisions of that department have gradually tended to the dangerous enlargement of those powers. This subject has been adverted to, not for the purpose of questioning the constitutional competency of that court so to decide, when it thinks best, but to ask whether no way exists for the States, when opposed to the political bearing of those constructions; when opposed to such a political operation of the constitution, to check or control the influence of such a course of decisions? And, if any way does not exist, whether the Government is not likely soon to end in consolidation? And whether our future Presidents and Vice Presidents, without reference to any of the signs of the times about a new alliance, are not, as more than once intimated in this discussion, from the West and East, to be lifted hereafter from that bench, to preside over the new destinies of a consolidated Government? My own answer to some of these inquiries, is, firstly, that, by the States, as States, the erroneous decision of the Legislative and Executive departments of the General Government can generally be corrected by changing, in the State Legislatures, and at the ballot boxes, the agents here who made those decisions. This has been the ordinary remedy in ordinary cases. Another class of decisions, and especially those by the Judiciary, when the judges are not removable by the people, or the States, or Congress, as those of the Supreme Court are not, can be corrected, sometimes by the States, as States, through public expressions of opinion in their Legislatures, acting by their intrinsic reasoning and force on the agents who made those decisions, and inducing them to revise and alter their doctrines in future. It would not be derogatory to any court to listen to any expressions of opinions and arguments such as those contained in the Virginia resolutions of 1798; in the resolutions of South Carolina on the tariff; or in the Executive message, resolutions, and report, of the Legislature of New Hampshire, in 1822, on the constructive powers claimed for the General Government. When all these modes fail, another and decisive resort, on the part of the States, is to amendments of the constitution, by the safe and large majority of three-fourths. The acknowledged power of the States, by their resolutions and concert, in this way, to effect any changes, limitations or corrections, shows clearly that in them the real sovereignty between the two Governments is placed by the constitution, and in them the final, paramount supremacy resides. They can alter this constitution; but we, here, cannot alter their constitutions. We, then, are the servants, and they the master. On the contrary, whatever others may hold, I do not hold that any certain redress, beyond this, on the part of any State, can be interposed against such decisions of the Supreme Court as are followed by legal process, unless that State resorts, successfully, to force against force, in conflict with the Federal agents. It is admitted by me, however, that a State may resolve, may express her convictions on the nullity or unconstitutionality of a law or decision of the General Government. These doings may work a change through public opinion, or lead to a co-operation of three-fourths of the sister States, to correct the errors by amendments of the constitution. But whenever the enforcement of the law or decision comes within the scope of the acknowledged jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and can be accomplished by legal process, I see no way in which that court can be controlled, except by moral and intellectual appeals to the hearts and heads of her judges, or by amendments to the constitution, or by the deplorable and deprecated remedy of physical force. This latter resort I do not understand any gentleman here to approve, until all other resorts fail; and even then, only in a case where the evil suffered is extreme and palpable, and, indeed, more intolerable and dangerous than the dissolution of the Government itself.

Such was the doctrine of Jefferson and Madison. (Virginia Resolutions, p. 18.)

"The resolution has accordingly guarded against any misapprehension of its object, by expressly requiring, for such an interposition, 'the case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous breach of the constitution, by the exercise of powers not granted by it.' It must be a case, not of a light and transient nature, but of a nature dangerous to the great purposes for which the constitution was established. It must be a case, moreover, not obscure or doubtful in its construction, but plain and palpable. Lastly, it must be a case not resulting from a partial consideration or hasty determination, but a case stamped with a final consideration and deliberate adherence."

Beyond these views I trust no member of this confederacy will ever feel either the necessity or inclination to advance, and thus put in jeopardy that Union which we all profess so highly to prize.

FRIDAY, February 26.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

MR. SMITH, of South Carolina, said: This discussion, sir, has involved the consideration of two great political questions; whether, if a State be borne down by the oppressive operation of a law of the United States, the proper appeal from that oppression is not to the Judiciary; or whether, in such a case, the State aggrieved has not a right to withdraw, and say to the rest of the Union, we no longer belong to you, because you have violated the compact with us; we have decided for ourselves that you have oppressed us; your laws are unconstitutional, and we will no longer continue a member of the Union.

On the first portion of this subject, if it could be heard before the Senate as a distinct proposition, and the Senate had the power to decide upon it, I would give it, as far as I should be able, the best consideration its importance would demand; but it is utterly out of the question for a speaker to investigate and descant upon a mere speculative political question, where no results are to be expected, as he would feel himself bound to do were the question a real one, from which some solid and permanent good was to flow, instead of one that should yield little more than an opportunity of making a speech to raise his own fame. But, as it has been the course, in this erratic flight of the Senate, that has drawn into its vortex any thing and every thing, civil, religious, and political, as the speaker may have thought fit to select, and this has been selected as one choice subject by those who have gone before me, I will offer a few unpremeditated remarks.

For the judges of the United States I entertain the highest respect, both in their judicial character as well as in their individual character: and am willing to attribute to them as much integrity, and as much talent, as falls to the share of any judges, in this or any other country. But it seems to me that their province is limited to decisions between citizen and citizen, and between the United States and citizens, the individual States, &c., and in all cases of meum et tuum their decisions are conclusive. But may not a distinction be taken, where a law is notoriously unconstitutional and oppressive upon the whole community of a State; where the ground of complaint would be, that Congress had enacted a law, not only against the letter, but likewise against the spirit and meaning of the constitution; which law was undermining all the private rights of individuals, as well as rights appertaining to them as the community of a State?

Then, sir, suppose the court of the United States always to consist of seven judges, as it now does; and suppose a question upon the constitutionality of a law of the United States that had vitally affected the people of a State in their private and municipal rights should come before these seven judges for their decision, and three of the seven should pronounce the law constitutional and three others of the seven should pronounce it unconstitutional. Here the opinions of six of the seven are completely neutralized, and the whole weight of the question, be it of what moment it may, must devolve upon a single judge. This single judge would hold the balance, and have it in his power to decide the fate of the Union by his single dictum. The entire operations of the law must cease, if he should say no: or its operations must go on if he should say ay; be the consequences what they may. The peace and happiness of the Union must be destroyed or preserved as he should be guided by prudence and honesty on the one hand, or by caprice and ambition on the other; because judges are not always exempt from these passions. Or let us suppose a law, affecting in a special manner the private or municipal rights of the people of a whole State, should be enacted by Congress, to compel vessels going from one port to another, in the same State, or to a port in a different State, to clear out at the port of departure, and the master should refuse to do so because the law was unconstitutional, as the constitution expressly forbids it: Should your judges ever be misled to declare such a law constitutional, and the collector of the revenue should be resisted, could he who made the resistance be convicted of an offence against the constitution of his country? If the opinions of the judges are to be considered the constitution, or if the judges are clothed with this tremendous power—a power that gives to a single man the control of the destiny of this Union—is it not time to inquire whether it be not fit to place it in some more responsible repository?

The other great question, whether a State has a right to secede from the Union, if Congress should pass an unconstitutional law that should prove oppressive, is a question of still greater moment.

Were I to be asked what opinion I entertained of the power of a State to dissolve its political connection with the Union, I would respond, go ask my constituents. This is not the time, and place, and circumstances, that will justify a discussion of that question between the United States and the State of South Carolina. If South Carolina is aggrieved by the tariff—and she most assuredly is to an extent of great oppression—and the remedy is only to be found in a separation from the Union, it belongs exclusively to the people of that State to meet in convention, examine the subject, weigh the consequences, and settle the mode of operation. That is the course, and the only course, by which this question can be determined, and not by any flight of fancy that may exist in my imagination, or that of any other member of Congress. I unfeignedly believe there is at this time in the Legislature of South Carolina, much patriotism, much devotion to the Union, and as much independence and firmness as could possibly be wanting to adopt any plan of operation that wisdom, patriotism, justice, interest, or love of the Union, may dictate, for the relief of their burthens. I do not withhold my opinion here from fear of responsibility. I shrink from no responsibility imposed upon me as a member of this Senate. If the wisdom of my Legislature, whose province it is to determine upon that measure, and act upon that great occasion, should think proper to call

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

a convention, and my country should honor me with a seat there, I will assume any responsibility which the wisdom of the occasion, or the interest of my country, may require at my hands.

Sir, I will go further; and should the cupidity or the madness of the majority in Congress push them on to impose one unconstitutional burthen after another, until it can be no longer borne, and no other alternative remains, I will then take upon myself the last responsibility of an oppressed people, and adopt the exclamation of the poet, dulce et decorum est pro patria mori; and if the exigencies of my country should ever demand it, I will be ready to shed my blood upon the altars of that country. I am attached to the Union; I wish to see it perpetuated; I wish it may endure through all time. But if the same causes exist in our Government which have overturned other Governments, what right have we to expect an exemption from the fatality of other nations? We need not go abroad, or into ancient history, for instances to warn us. If we only go back to 1774 and 1775, we shall see a much less cause producing that revolution which separated these United States from Great Britain, than now exists between the United States and the State of South Carolina. What was the exciting cause of that revolution? A three-penny tax on tea, which was then merely the beverage of the rich, and a small tax upon stamps. It was these small duties that set the whole United States in a flame: and that flame spread with the velocity of the winds, from one end of the United States to the other. Massachusetts, Virginia, and South Carolina, were united then in the same cause—the defence of their civil liberty; which was threatened by the small duty on tea. Memorials and remonstrances were resorted to, but for a short time, until a company in Boston, disguised in the habiliments of Indians, counselled, if not led, by the immortal Hancock, boarded the ships, and threw all the tea in the harbor overboard. May we not look for the same effects from the same causes, at all times, and in all places.

Whilst I regret that, under existing circumstances, this picture is not too highly colored, yet I believe there is a redeeming spirit at hand. The constitution itself, which has been made to bend to suit the interests of majorities, is undergoing a new version. Investigations of its true and plain common-sense construction are going on in more hands than one.

Among the distinguished writers engaged in this investigation is Dr. Cooper, who has been alluded to by gentlemen in this discussion; whose name is identified with every science; whose life has been devoted to the cause of civil liberty and human happiness. In his Political Economy, Consolidation, and other recent political pieces, he has torn the mask from the delusion of constructive powers and party intrigue.

A writer under the signature of "Brutus," in his "Crisis," has, with a master hand, given an exposition to the great agitated points of the constitution, on the subjects of the Tariff and Internal Improvement, that will remain a treasure to his country while talents shall be regarded.

The lectures of Mr. Dew, of Virginia, on the restrictive system, are more like a mathematical analysis than the lectures of a professor on political economy. His illustrations are so plain, and so strong, and so conclusive, that they are perfect demonstrations of the errors and absurdity of the American system.

None of these writers have ever been answered by the advocates of Internal Improvement and the Tariff System. To these may be added, a paper recently published, by order of the House of Representatives, which will be read with much interest. It is the report of the Committee on Commerce written, as we understand, by Mr. Cambreleng, the chairman of that committee. It gives a more expanded view, and furnishes more evidences, drawn from facts, of the great impolicy and ruinous effects of the tariff, than have appeared in any State paper heretofore published by the Government. The disastrous effects which it has already, and will continue to produce upon our foreign commerce, are so fully and clearly established, that it must command admiration, and will be extensively read.

The flood of light which those distinguished writers have shed upon this subject, to which may be added this report, cannot fail to enlighten the benighted minds of an honest, industrious community, and bring them to reflect, seriously, whether it be just to tax the many for the benefit of the few. The manufacturers themselves regret that this system has been introduced. And well they may: for it is now fully ascertained that at least one-half of the moneyed capital of the New England States has been sacrificed by this mania, and a large proportion of the proprietors of manufacturing establishments bankrupted. Fortunes, that have been accumulating for half a century, have been swept away in an instant.

There can be no probability that men of business, raised to active pursuits, and accustomed to employ their capital in some productive and advantageous manner, can remain devoted to a system that must produce their certain destruction. In addition to so many reasons that exist, why we may hope for an early dissolution of this oppressive system, another reason, as strong at least, if not stronger than any other, is the certainty that the public debt of the United States will shortly be extinguished. When that period shall arrive, there will not be even a pretext for the continuation of the tariff, except it be for the explicit and avowed purpose of protecting the manufacturers. And I beg leave to ask if there be even one man who can for a moment suppose that twelve millions of the free people of the United States will calmly submit to have the direction of the whole of their labor taken out of their own hands, and placed under the management of the General Government; not to secure a revenue for governmental purposes, but that the Government may, at its discretion, parcel out the profits of the labor of one portion of the Union to bestow on those of another portion of the Union? Sir, it is morally certain that they will submit to no such tyranny. Nor will it be necessary for the people to rise in their might to put it down, either by one portion seceding from the rest, or by the more direful alternative of civil war, that must drench the States with the blood of their own citizens. Public opinion must, and will correct this mighty evil, and in its own way, and leave the States still further to cultivate their Union, upon those pure principles that first brought them together. If I am mistaken, however, and these hopes should prove illusive, it will then be time for the States to determine what are their rights, and whether they have constitutional powers to secede from the Union.

MONDAY, March 1.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. Foot, in relation to future surveys and sales of the public lands.

Mr. GRUNDY said: I will now proceed to an examination of another subject, upon which a great diversity of opinion seems to prevail—I mean the powers of the State and Federal Governments. As to the true division or distribution of their powers, no difficulty exists so long as we speak in general terms; differences of opinion arise when we come to act on particular cases: at present, we have no case before the Senate, and are only discussing the subject for the purpose of ascertaining the true rule by which to test cases as they arise; and in the event Congress should transcend the limits or boundaries of its constitutional powers, to ascertain where we are to look for the ultimate corrective tribunal.

The States existed prior to this Government. Each of them possessed all the rights and powers which appertain to sovereign and independent nations. For all the purposes of self-government, no want of power, or the means of using it, was felt by any of these communities. Life, liberty, reputation, and property, all found an ample protection in the State Governments. If any Internal Improvement were necessary, within its limits, the sovereign power of the State, having entire and uncontrolled jurisdiction, could cause it to be undertaken and effected. For none of these purposes or objects was there a defect of competency in the State Governments. There were objects, however, of high importance, to which the States, separately, were not equal or adequate to provide. These are specified in the commendatory letter issued by the convention, and signed by General Washington, which accompanied the constitution, when presented to the old Congress for its consideration. The language is, "The friends of our country have long seen and desired, that the power of making war, peace, and treaties; that of levying money and regulating commerce, and the correspondent executive and judicial authorities, should be fully and effectually vested in the General Government of the Union." Here is an enumeration of the objects which made it necessary to establish this Government; and when we are called on to decide whether a subject be within our powers, we ought not to lose sight of the purposes for which the Government was created. When it is recollected that all the powers now possessed by the General and State Governments belonged originally to the latter, and that the former is constructed from grants of power yielded up by the State Governments, the fair and just conclusion would be, that no other power was conferred, except what was plainly and expressly given. But if doubt could exist, the 10th article in the amendments to the constitution settles this question. It declares that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The conclusion hence arises, that this Government is one of limited, delegated powers, and can only act on subjects expressly placed under its control by the constitution, and upon such other matters as may be necessarily and properly within the sphere of its action, to enable it to carry the enumerated and specified powers into execution, and without which, the powers granted would be inoperative. This I understand to be the good old republican doctrine, and by it I will endeavor to regulate my conduct.

In cases of disagreement between the Federal and State Governments, as to their respective powers, who is to decide? This is the question I propose briefly to examine. In cases of doubtful character, no question will probably arise, because no court, State or Federal, will declare a law unconstitutional, unless it is clearly and manifestly so. This is the rule of decision avowed by all the high judicial tribunals of the country; nor will any State act differently. I admit that the Supreme Court is the final arbiter in all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance of it. Still, the case put by Mr. Madison, in his report to the Virginia Assembly, in the year 1799, is not included. The alien and sedition laws, the subjects on which he was then acting, were believed and declared by him and the Virginia Assembly, to be a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of powers, not granted by the compact or constitution. In such a case as that, I ask the Senate, shall one party decide? It will be readily granted, that, in settling questions of right or power between different nations, one party ought not to be the exclusive judge; otherwise, so strong is the love of dominion and rule, it will include within its grasp all the power possessed by both. This is the very principle for which gentlemen contend, when the subject is stripped of a fallacy, which at first obstructs the mental vision of the inquirer after truth. Gentlemen seem to consider the Supreme Court of the United States as a separate, distinct tribunal, erected by all the parties concerned, and as dependent on one party as on the other. Not so; it is a portion or part of one of the parties, created by the legislative and executive branches of the General Government, and responsible alone to that Government. The Federal Judiciary, although the tenure of office be during good behavior, is greatly dependent on the other branches of the General Government. Burthens may be imposed upon them, and their labors so increased, as to expel them from the bench, from an inability to discharge all the duties required by law. I name this, because an effort is now making to compel the present judges to perform their official duties in six additional States—a thing wholly impracticable.

In every contest for power, there would exist in the Judiciary the same motives to lead it astray, as would exist in the other departments, with this difference—they would be stronger, because the judges hold their offices by a tenure of greater duration. If the position of gentlemen be well founded, then the State Governments have been guilty of the folly and weakness of creating a Government which can adjudge away all their sovereign rights and powers; a creature competent to the destruction of its creators; and all this, by the easiest operations imaginable. A case is presented to the court by the Attorney-General, an opinion is written on a few sheets of paper, and Mr. Peters (the reporter) is directed to put it in his book, and forthwith twenty-four sovereign and independent States are prostrated and destroyed. Sir, much as I love peace and quietness, before I witness this, I desire to hear more clamor about it than would arise from this silent, sapping, and undermining procedure. I am arguing upon the principle, without reference to the judges now sitting under this Senate chamber; towards each of them I entertain a high respect; and should any attempt be made affecting the independence of the Judiciary, I will go as far as he who goes farthest in its defence.

If those from whom I differ be right, the only security the States have, is the integrity of a majority of seven men; and as the constitution did not direct what number of judges should constitute the Supreme Court, one could have been placed there; and upon his will alone, according to the argument on the other side, would depend the fate of twenty-four sovereign States.

In all questions of meum et tuum, embraced within its constitutional jurisdiction, this court is the supreme tribunal, and incidentally, between individuals, it must decide upon all questions necessary to enable it to come to a result or final determination; and the decision will be binding upon the parties. This, however, by no means proves that the court can decide upon the sovereign rights of the States, so as to affect them. The gentlemen have been requested by my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. ROWAN,) to produce an instance in which sovereignty has submitted itself to any judicial tribunal. The very act of doing so implies dependence and inferiority; and that government which admits its adversary to decide in such a case, acknowledges that it is not sovereign and independent. Mr. Madison, who understood the constitution and structure of the Government as well as any man that ever lived, was of opinion that the Federal judiciary possessed no such power. Mr. Jefferson, the great teacher of republicanism, throughout his whole life contended against it; and, fortunately for the American people, their opinions are recorded in our national archives, and will be preserved for the benefit of those who are to succeed us. The necessary result is, that the power of deciding finally and conclusively does not exist in either Government, or any department of either. What, then, is to be done if Congress pass an act beyond the limits of its constitutional powers, and it is found to operate oppressively, say upon Virginia? I name this old, leading, champion State, for the purpose of illustrating my argument more clearly. Shall Virginia submit? No. She is oppressed—unconstitutionally oppressed. The General Government has declared in all its departments that the act is binding. The Legislature of Virginia is of a different opinion. Has she no right to say to the General Government we did not give up this power which you have exercised? May she not say it is an authority you have usurped? Such language has been held—it was done by Virginia and Kentucky, by their resolutions in 1798 and 1799; and it produced the desired effect. Those who had exercised unconstitutional powers were put down, and the administration of Mr. Jefferson succeeded. This was an appeal to the intelligence and patriotism of the nation, to correct the evil through the medium of the elective franchise. It prevailed, and will always prevail, unless an interest exist in the majority at variance with the rights and interests of the minority. When that is the case, it may happen that a sense of justice will be too weak to produce a repeal of the unconstitutional measure. What then? Shall Virginia throw herself out of the Union? No. One set of agents employed to act in the Federal Government have asserted their authority and jurisdiction over certain subjects, and they insist on their right to do so. Another, acting in the States, insist that the agents of the General Government have transcended their authority, engrafted on the constitution provisions not originally contained in it, and are exercising the reserved powers of the State. It becomes a mere dispute among agents; the employers, the masters, the real sovereigns, have not decided it. In this state of things, shall Virginia submit to be despoiled of her sovereignty? Sir, she will not, by tame submission, surrender her high political character and pre-eminence; rather than do this, her Madisons and Monroes would forget their years, and mingle again in the political strife; her Giles would lay aside the crutches of decrepitude; and the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) would again hear the keen, cutting voice of the Roanoke orator, dividing and separating, even unto the joints and marrow.

If I am to understand any Senator as saying that a State Legislature can nullify and make void an act of Congress, so far as to prevent its operation within its limits, I dissent from him. The Federal constitution was not received or adopted by the Legislatures of the States; the members are not elected for such high purposes. The ambition of a few aspiring men might mislead the legislature, when called on to act suddenly and unexpectedly. Let the injured and oppressed State, then, assume its highest political attitude—a convention in the State, for the purpose of deciding whether the great fundamental law, which unites and binds the States together, has been violated, by Congress having exercised powers reserved to the States, and not delegated to the General Government. If a false clamor has been raised, this measure will put it down. In every State there is a division among politicians, and the minority are only waiting for an opportunity to put the majority in the wrong. The people being called on to act in this solemn manner, will put the whole intelligence of the community into action. The aged, the wise, the experienced, well-tryed friends of the country will be called into the public service. Such men will not lightly pronounce an act of Congress unconstitutional and void; but should they upon full consideration so declare, how will the question then stand? If the State possesses the power to act as I have shown, the necessary consequence is, that the act of Congress must cease to operate in the State; and Congress must acquiesce, by abandoning the power, or obtain an express grant from the great source from which all its powers are drawn. The General Government would have no right to use force. It would be a glaring absurdity to suppose that the State had the right to judge of the constitutionality of an act of the General Government, and at the same time to say that Congress had the right to enforce a submission to the act. This would involve a palpable contradiction. This may be illustrated by reference to the powers of the Supreme Court in analogous cases. All admit that this high tribunal has the right, in a case properly before it, and within its jurisdiction, to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional; the effect of which is, to render the act inoperative, not only in one State, but in all. In this case, Congress is obliged to acquiesce and abandon the power, or obtain an express grant from the original source, after the manner already stated. No force can be applied to give effect to the act thus declared void by the Supreme Court, or to compel it to change its decision. But gentlemen, instead of meeting our arguments fairly, exclaim that such a power on the part of the State is inconsistent with the existence of the General Government, and is placing twenty-three States at the mercy of one, and that the Union, by such an act, would be dissolved. I cannot but think that all such objections arise from an imperfect view of our admirable system of Government. They originate in a supposition that Congress possesses an independent and uncontrollable power, which is unknown to our system. If the gentlemen will but advert to the fifth article of the constitution, they will find a redeeming power—a power above all others; which can mould the constitution, and define, anew, the relations between the State and the General Governments; I mean the constitutional number of States. This is not a mere dormant power. The mode in which it is to be called into action is expressly laid down, and, when properly invoked, will at all times prove adequate to save this glorious system of ours from disorder and anarchy. Whenever a conflict, such as I have described, arises between one of the States, acting in its sovereign capacity, and the General Government, it is to this high arbiter (a convention of the States) the parties must resort, and not to the Supreme Court, the creature of one of the parties. But who is to make the appeal? Surely the party claiming to exercise the power, and which alone possesses the means of making it. To require the oppressed State to do it, would be absurd. The constitution provides two modes of amendment: one, when two-thirds of both Houses of Congress shall propose amendments; the second, when two-thirds of the Legislatures of the States shall make application to Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments. In either case, three-fourths of the States are required to ratify; and the agency of Congress is necessary in both. On Congress, then, is the burthen of making the appeal, on the ground that it claims the exercise of the power, and because, alone, it is possessed of the means. It cannot be considered unreasonable that a State, which has declared, in the most solemn manner, its reserved rights to have been violated, should possess the power of compelling the General Government to make an appeal to the source from which all its powers are derived. It was called into existence by three-fourths of the States, and can exercise no power, without usurpation, which has not been granted. What can be more rational? What more consistent with the spirit of our system, than where there is a conflict between a sovereign State (a party to the compact) and the General Government, as to the powers which have been yielded to the latter, that it should be compelled to decide the question by an appeal to the source of all its powers? I do not hesitate to say that the power on the part of the States to compel such an appeal is indispensable to the existence of their sovereignty, and to the preservation of their reserved rights. Without it, the General Government, in its practical operation, would be an unlimited, consolidated Government, notwithstanding the limitations imposed by the provisions of the constitution. Its construction of the constitution would be the constitution. Those who know the force and influence of construction, how it can pervert the plainest import of words, when under the influence of self-interest, well understand the fearful changes it is capable of producing. If there be no check, an interested majority, using the powers of the General Government, which were given for the protection and benefit of all, as the instrument of aggrandizing themselves at the expense of the minority, may, by construction, gradually undermine and render obsolete the sacred provisions of this instrument. We already see fearful symptoms of encroachment, which no patriot can look at without dismay, and which, if persevered in, can only be arrested by an exercise of the power for which I contend. The Supreme Court is wholly inadequate. If three-fourths of the States shall not concur in admitting the contested power, or shall not pronounce that it already exists, Congress will be constrained to abandon the exercise of it, inasmuch as no new power can be granted without such concurrence. The decision of a less number ought not to be obligatory, where a State has solemnly pronounced that such a grant of authority was never made. But suppose three-fourths of the States decide the question against the complaining State, then acquiescence becomes a duty, and it must submit; or a state of things arises not provided for by the constitution, on the consequences of which I will not dwell. The doctrine for which I contend is not of recent origin. I am merely an humble disciple of an old school, recalling it to public view. Mr. Jefferson long since advanced the opinion I now advocate, and in his letter to Judge Johnson, of June, 1823, he remarks, in reference to the following expression, used by another distinguished citizen, that "there must be an ultimate arbiter somewhere," "True," (said Mr. Jefferson,) "there must; but does that prove it is in either party? The ultimate arbiter is the people of the Union, assembled by their deputies in convention, at the call of Congress, or of two-thirds of the States. Let them decide to which they mean to give an authority, claimed by two of their organs. And it has been the peculiar wisdom and felicity of our constitution to have provided this peaceable appeal, where that of other nations is at once to force."

Marine Service.

The following resolutions, submitted on the 27th of February, by Mr. BARNARD, were taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish to this House information on the following subjects:

"1st. Whether it is necessary to the armed equipment of a vessel of war that marines should compose a part of its military force; or whether marines may not usefully be dispensed with, and a portion of the seamen be instructed in the use of small arms, and perform all duties which can be required of marines, either in battle or in ordinary service.

"2d. Whether seamen are not now instructed and practised in the use of small arms; and, generally, any information which may elucidate the inquiry, whether marines can or cannot be beneficially dispensed with on board of our public vessels of war.

"3d. Whether the petty officers and seamen, who have been in service, but from age or slight disabilities are rendered unfit for the active duties of their calling, on shipboard, can be usefully and safely employed as guards at the navy stations, in lieu of the marines now assigned to that duty.

"And further, that the Secretary of the Navy obtain from the officers composing the Navy Board, and other naval officers of rank now at the seat of Government, their opinions, in writing, on the foregoing subject, to be transmitted with his report to the Senate."

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he was opposed to this mode of obtaining information. He recollected that the policy and propriety of obtaining opinions from Heads of Department was discussed when Congress sat in Philadelphia. Some gentlemen were in the habit of, at that time, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion on any favorite subject, relating to his Department, in order that they might be aided in accomplishing their object by the weight that gentleman's opinion bore in the legislative hall. It was then decided, that opinions of Heads of Department were unnecessary, as members themselves were as capable of forming as correct an opinion as they; and that they were improper, as tending to influence the discussion of the Legislature. Mr. S. said it was sufficient to require facts from the Departments and leave members to form their own opinions on those facts. For these reasons, he was opposed to the resolution.

Mr. BARNARD said, the remarks made by the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) in opposition to the resolution now under consideration, made it necessary for him briefly to state some of the views and reasons which influenced him in presenting it. It will be recollected (said Mr. B.) that, at the commencement of the present session, the President of the United States, in his Message to Congress, recommended that the marine corps should be transferred to, and merged in, the army; and whatever marines might be required for naval service should be obtained by draughts from the army, as it was stated that no previous training was necessary for this service. The Military Committee of the Senate, upon the reference of the several parts of the President's Message, considered this subject as coming in some measure before them: although of a mixed character, relating both to the army and navy, yet they conceived it entitled to their consideration. But it occurred to me, sir, that it was proper to settle a preliminary question before we could come to any satisfactory conclusion on the recommended transfer of the marine corps, and that was, whether either marines or soldiers were necessary as a part of the armed force on board of a vessel of war. If marines are indispensable on ship-board, then I am willing to admit that it will be better to retain the corps as it is, and cure any defect in its organization, if such should exist, by a re-organization, if necessary; for I can readily foresee difficulties that will arise in taking soldiers from the army to perform marine duty. I wish merely to mention one or two that have occurred to me. By the existing laws of Congress, punishment by stripes is expressly prohibited in the army of the United States. When a soldier, therefore, enlists in the service, it is under an implied agreement, if not express understanding, that this punishment shall not be inflicted on him for ordinary offences. If he is called on to perform marine duty, on board one of your vessels of war, is he to be subjected to the punishment usually inflicted on seamen, or is there to be two kinds of punishment, one for the marine, and the other for the sailor, on board of the same vessel? Every naval officer will tell you at once, that this distinction in punishments cannot exist. That, for the same offence, there must be the same kind of punishment, whether for marines or seamen.

There is another inconvenience (said Mr. B.) that has struck me will arise in taking soldiers. A company of soldiers consists of about fifty or sixty men, commanded by a captain and two lieutenants. If a draught is required for one of your smaller vessels, say a sloop of war, about half a company only will be required; for I believe the number of marines usually employed on board one of that class of vessels is between twenty and thirty only. If you then take this number, you divide the company, leaving the captain on shore with one of his subalterns, while the other is sent in command of the detachment to serve at sea. It must be apparent, I think, that such a state of things would operate injuriously to the army. But my design is not now to go into an examination of the inconveniences that would result, by making detachments from the army for marine duty at sea. It is not necessary to the consideration of the resolution before us. I have merely stated one or two as they struck me. My object is to obtain from those competent to give it, the information asked for in the resolution; that is, whether marines cannot be entirely dispensed with on ship-board, and a portion of seamen trained to the use of small arms, to perform any duty that can be required of soldiers.

The Senator from Maryland objects to the resolution, because, he says, it is asking the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, when we ought to ask for facts, and alleges that the Senate are just as competent to form opinions on this subject as the Secretary himself. But the resolution asks for information, and from whom? Why, sir, not from the Secretary alone, but from naval officers, whose long service and experience will enable them to give it. The resolution was purposely framed with a view to accomplish this object. But who can the Senate call upon for this purpose? Upon the officers themselves? No; but upon the Head of the Department, and, through him, upon the officers who are subject to his control. This is the only means that I am aware of by which we can officially obtain the information sought for.

I will acknowledge (said Mr. B.) that my impression has been, that marines are not indispensable for the sea-service in our public vessels. I may be in error. I do not pretend to any practical knowledge myself on the subject, and therefore it is that I want to be informed by those who alone can give satisfactory information. If, when it is obtained, in the report of the Secretary and the officers called on, it shall be found that marines cannot be dispensed with, it will show that I have been mistaken in my impression. I will, however, state a few of the reasons on which that impression has been founded; for I do not mean to go into an argument on the subject. It is well known that, in the British service, their seamen ever have been forcibly impressed, and compelled to serve on board their ships of war against their consent; and this, too, not for a few years only, but for life, or, at least, as long as they are fit for duty. It became necessary, therefore, to repress that spirit of mutiny which would unquestionably be found to exist in a crew thus violently torn from their friends and family, and forced into the service against their will. For this purpose marines, it is believed, were originally introduced on board of British ships, as much, if not more, to overawe and keep the seamen in subjection, than to assist in navigating or fighting the vessel. This duty, on the part of the marines, has produced a feeling on the part of the sailors towards them, if not of actual hate, certainly any thing but cordiality and good will. The dislike of the sailor for the marine is proverbial.

In our service (continued Mr. B.) marines cannot, it is presumed, be necessary to guard the seamen, and prevent mutiny. Seamen are voluntarily enlisted, and for a shorter period than marines themselves; they are not forced into the service, as in the British navy, but go into it of choice—it is their free act. Can it be possible, then, that they must be watched and guarded by soldiers to keep them to their duty? Such a belief is derogatory, it appears to me, to the character of our gallant tars. On one subject my mind is decided, that there should not be on board of the same vessel two jarring and distinct classes of men, who are in constant collision with each other, unless imperious necessity demands it. Those who are to act with effect, can best do so by a union of feelings, and a similarity of habits. Experience has taught this lesson. Sailors and marines cannot, or, at least, have not, heretofore, assimilated, either in feeling or habit.

Marine Service.

As the materials are then so discordant, can the service of the marines be dispensed with without injury to the service? Cannot seamen be trained to the use of small arms? I see no difficulty. Instead of marines, take the like number of young landmen from the country, any where, and they can load and fire with as much effect as the best-drilled marine. The Americans, generally, are accustomed from infancy to the use of fire-arms; very little training will therefore be required to make them expert gunmen. Besides, sir, I am informed that, by the present structure of our vessels of war, marines can render but little service on deck, and that musketry is used with most effect from the tops. If this is the case, is it not better to have seamen than marines? They will be ready to throw down the musket and spring to the yards and rigging at any moment, when required by the exigencies of the ship. This may sometimes be of great importance. Nor do I conceive the objection urged by the Senator from Maryland as sufficient, that seamen will not keep their arms in order. It is well known that, besides muskets, there are pistols, pikes, cutlasses, and other arms, on board of every armed ship: how are these kept in order? Not by marines. Muskets can be kept in good condition in the same way, by the armorer, or whatever name is given to the person in charge of the arms. The objection raised, too, that the pay of sailors is greater than marines, loses part of its weight, when it is recollected that the marines are not only paid, but clothed by the Government, while the sailor purchases his own clothing from his pay.

There is another consideration which I think ought to have influence in determining upon this subject, and therefore it is that I am desirous of the information. It cannot be unknown to the Senate, that there is often a scarcity of seamen, and difficulty is experienced in promptly manning our vessels of war for sea: any measure calculated to remove or lessen this inconvenience, without injury to the service, ought therefore to receive the favorable regard of this body. One of our larger vessels of war, destined for a three years' cruise in the Mediterranean, Pacific, or elsewhere, will carry with her about a hundred marines; they will continue to serve as marines; and as marines, and nothing but marines, they will return to this country. Let, however, the same number of landmen be sent instead of marines; let them be taught and exercised in the use of the musket, if necessary; but let them at the same time perform all the ordinary duties of sailors, and at the end of a three years' voyage they will return, not mere musket-men but expert and able seamen; you will thus obtain an annual increase of seamen for your naval service, and that of the very best materials too—a matter of some consequence, I conceive, not only to the interests of the navy, but of the country. I have been led to these observations, sir, because of the opposition to the inquiry proposed by me, and in justification of my views; whether wrong or right, I must leave for others to judge.

While I am up, I will say a few words with regard to the last branch of the inquiry: whether seamen cannot be employed in lieu of marines at our naval stations. The marine corps, as at present established, is both a naval and military body. When at sea, it is subject to the regulations made for the navy; when on land, it is subject to the rules and articles of war for the government of the army; so that its character depends on whether it performs duty on land or water. Now, sir, when on shore, at a naval depot, it is governed by army discipline; when on ship-board, by naval discipline. We know that our navy yards are intrusted to the charge of a naval officer of rank, generally, I believe, if not always, a post-captain; marines are detailed to perform garrison duty, in guarding and protecting the public works and property. But, sir, in consequence of marines being soldiers on land, they are not, as I understand, subject to the orders of the commandant of the station, and details for duty are therefore made by request, not by command of this officer. Two separate and independent commands, then, exist at the same place, with no common superior. This is inconsistent with my ideas of military subordination and regulation. But why may not seamen, whose age or infirmities, from long and faithful service, have rendered them unqualified for active duty on ship-board, serve as guards at these naval depots, instead of marines? They have been accustomed to strict discipline, and it is conceived would be equally vigilant in the discharge of any duty imposed on them; their tried fidelity at sea would furnish a guarantee for their faithful conduct on shore. I wish to know from naval officers if they can be trusted with this duty? If they can, sir, it will furnish an asylum for these hardy veterans of the ocean, much better suited to their tastes and wishes than any naval asylum. They will be rendering service to the Government for their support, and will find a resting-place in their more advanced years, after the dangers and vicissitudes of an active sea-life.

It is known that there are now at the seat of Government many distinguished and experienced officers of the navy. I have availed myself of the circumstance to make the call at this time. The information, when received, will be valuable; no possible injury can grow out of obtaining it; we shall be possessed of light which we do not now possess, to guide us in any measures that may be deemed necessary, with respect to the marine corps. I trust, therefore, the Senate will adopt the resolution.

Mr. B. concluded by saying he wished it to be understood that he had no unkind or unfriendly feeling to the corps in making this inquiry; very far from it. He was actuated by different motives. I have the pleasure, said he, to be acquainted with several of its officers, who have heretofore signalized themselves in the service of their country, and will do so again, whenever their country needs their services. But if they are necessary to the navy, let them be subject to naval control, whether at sea or on shore.

Mr. JOHNSTON suggested that the resolution was unnecessary, as the Committee on Naval Affairs had the same power to call on the Secretary of the Navy for this information, through their chairman, that the Senate had. If every committee were to pursue this course, and come to the Senate with resolutions to obtain information which could be as well obtained without any reference to the Senate, it would be constantly engaged in long debates, and the necessary business of the Senate would be obstructed; and a discussion is got up, which shows that gentlemen possess the very information required. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BARNARD) had convinced the Senate that he is already in possession of all the information required in his resolution.

After a few observations from Messrs. WOODBURY, and SMITH, of Maryland,

Mr. BARNARD observed that, when he offered this resolution, he did not apprehend that any circumstances would arise which could possibly lead to a discussion; and, therefore, the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana were not applicable to him. Farther, as the President of the United States had recommended the reorganization of the marine corps, it being of a mixed character, we may naturally presume that all the facts on which this paragraph was predicated were in his possession, and may now be obtained from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HAYNE suggested that, as the subject had relation to two committees—those on military and naval affairs, he thought it proper that the gentleman would designate the one to which he would refer the answer, when received. If left between two committees, it might fall through.

Mr. BARNARD said he had no hesitation in naming the committee to which he would refer the answer to his resolution. He was willing to refer it to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolution was then agreed to.

THURSDAY, March 4.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

Mr. JOHN M. CLAYTON, of Delaware, said: I come now, sir, to consider a subject which has been discussed in connection with this—the right of a State to regulate her conduct by the judgment of her own self-constituted tribunals, upon the validity of an act of Congress in opposition to the solemn decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States: and my remarks upon it will be chiefly in reply to gentlemen who have gone before me. I confess I do not discover why the power of deciding any, and every question, growing out of any circumstances in which a State may conceive her sovereignty impugned, is not translated to her own tribunals by the same train of argument which induces the conclusion that she may nullify an act of the Federal Legislature without the aid of the Federal Judiciary. We know—we are so taught by memorials on our files—that the doctrine is very current in some States of the West, that the public territory within their limits is their own; and we have been threatened that, when the population flowing westward has transferred the balance of power beyond the Alleghany, or when, as one in this debate has phrased it, "the sceptre has departed from the old thirteen forever," we shall find the rights of the new States asserted and maintained, if not by the force of numbers here, at least by the force of arms at home. In that case, too, it is said, that to us distance will be defeat. State sovereignty and State rights constitute the very war cry of a new party in this country. I would myself be among the last to infringe upon the constitutional powers of the States. But how far will the new doctrines on the subject carry us? Some who have engaged in this discussion have avowed the opinion that our claim to the public lands is inconsistent with the paramount rights of the Western States, and that, upon the fundamental principles of Government, the domain within their chartered limits is the property of these new grantees. Others, who stand among the boldest champions of the principle that a sovereign State may constitutionally and lawfully enforce her declarations against the validity of an act of Congress, and nullify it whenever by her judgment it is "deliberately, plainly, and palpably unconstitutional," repudiate the whole doctrine of State supremacy, and State title, when we touch these claims to the public lands. The rule works badly then. The two positions assumed by the same reasoner are repugnant to each other. You cannot claim by virtue of your State sovereignty to nullify an act of Congress, and yet deny to another State the right, by a similar operation, to tear out of your statute book the leaf containing the Virginia grant, as well as that which bears upon it the act of Congress declaring the uses of that grant. By the grant and the act, the estate ceded is "for the common benefit." The new sovereigns, within whose dominions the estate is situated, asserting their power to decide all questions which, in their judgment, touch their sovereignty, may nullify both, and make the land theirs; or, if they cannot, how can any other of these sovereigns nullify a tariff law, or an act for internal improvement, which the Federal Judiciary adjudges to be valid? The gentleman from Tennessee says that he will admit that the Supreme Court is the final arbiter in all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance of it. But I am not satisfied with this limitation. The words of the constitution are, "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." Then this general transfer of power is explained by the second section of the same article: "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects." All these words of the deed are in full force, except so far as it has been altered by the single amendatory article to prevent suits against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State. The instrument then contains no qualification of the judicial power restricting its exercise to cases arising out of laws made in pursuance of the constitution. The reservation is an inadvertent interpolation in the instrument, and the power granted extends to laws of the United States, whether constitutionally or unconstitutionally enacted. It will be seen, too, that the United States must "be a party to controversies" concerning a tariff law, as well as to those which affect the right to the public domain, or any other question touching State sovereignty; and that, if there be no authority in the instrument by which the judicial power can be extended to the former class of controversies, there is none to extend it to the latter class, or any case which a single State may consider as presenting an infraction of her own powers. The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. ROWAN,) and other Senators, have contended that a State cannot surrender any portion of her sovereignty, and we have been asked to produce an instance in which sovereignty has submitted itself to any judicial tribunal. Those who formed the constitution, in their recommendatory letter, signed by Washington, on the 17th of September, 1787, inform us that "it is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of these States to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all." The gentleman from Tennessee, in order to explain and construe the constitution, referred to the brief enumeration contained in this letter, of the specific objects which made it necessary to establish this Government. I refer to the same authority to overthrow the doctrine which regards all the rights of independent sovereignty in each of the States, and to prove that some of those rights were, in the view of the convention, ceded to provide for the general welfare. States are not self-existent; they are created by the people for their benefit. Those who have conferred State power can take it away; and for their own good they have transferred a portion of this mysterious principle of sovereignty, which troubles gentlemen so much, to another place. They have transferred a portion of the judicial power to the Supreme Court, which acts as an impartial umpire, and not as an adversary party deciding his own cause, as is erroneously supposed by some reasoners here. The gentleman from Tennessee says the Federal Judiciary is, when a question of State rights is before it, a portion or part of one of the parties, created by the Legislative and Executive branches of the General Government, responsible to that Government alone, and liable to the imposition of destructive burthens by that party. Even if all this were correct, it would be a sufficient answer to it, when discussing this question, to reply that the States had agreed that the arbiter should be thus created and thus responsible, having signed the arbitration bond deliberately, and with a full knowledge of the consequences. But when we look into the instrument, we find that the States, by their Representatives in the Senate, must first consent to the appointment of the arbiter, or he is not lawfully chosen. They can challenge for cause, and they can challenge peremptorily. By refusing to consent to appointments, they might in time vacate every seat on the whole tribunal. By the Legislative power of their immediate Representatives in the Senate, responsible to the States as their only masters, they can always prevent the imposition of oppressive burthens on their common arbiters. They alone can try these arbiters on impeachment for misbehavior, and without impeachment those arbiters cannot be removed from office. The Senator from Kentucky objects to the Federal Judiciary, that a majority in Congress may by law increase the number of judges, and thus oppress the minority when they please. It has been said, too, that large States, with a great representation in Congress, such as New York and Pennsylvania, combining with others, may, by their superior vote, so far increase the number on the bench as to oppress and destroy the sovereignty of the lesser States. If the objection has any weight, it is one which could be made to our whole system of republican Government. We are ruled by majorities; and if the majority of this nation should become radically corrupt, I admit that the Government will soon fall. But I have sufficient reliance on the virtue and good sense of the people, whether living in large or small States, to believe that no attempt will ever be deliberately made by a majority in either, to destroy the independence and legitimate powers of the other. And I feel no apprehensions on this subject, for other reasons. Let us inquire into the mode of operating. Supposing now, (to make out the gentleman's case,) that the large States wickedly conspire to ruin the small ones. New York, Kentucky, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina, being (as would be so probable!) united for this end, carry a bill through the other House to double the number of judges. Suppose, too, that they had by their votes elected a President who would second their views. When the bill comes before the Senate, if the small States understand your object, they, having an equal representation here, secured by the only provision in the constitution which numbers can never change, vote you down at once; and your combination (as other combinations may be) is consigned to —"that same ancient vault,

"Where all the kindred of the Capulets lie."

But suppose the Senators representing the small States here, not suspecting mischief, but relying on your integrity, suffer the bill to pass. Your President being in the plot, as we will, for the sake of argument, suppose, it becomes a law. What then? The bench is not yet filled. The modus operandi requires that he should nominate, and we should consent, to the appointment of the men who are to adjudge away our independence. We might be slow to suspect our old friends of dishonest purposes, but we can learn some things if you give us time. When you bring out your nominations, we cannot fail to understand your plan. You are caught at once, flagrante delicto, and we check you in the Senate, by rejecting all nominations which do not please us. We have two chances to put an effectual veto on your plot, and our veto is a very different affair from your State veto on an act of Congress. However thankful, therefore, we may be for the kindly apprehensions expressed for our welfare, we say that we are not yet alarmed. We cannot see, with the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, that the States have been guilty of either folly or weakness in creating such a tribunal as we conceive the Supreme Court of the United States to be—nor do we think with him, that, by the easiest operations imaginable, this creature is so competent to the destruction of its creators.

But whatever may have been the opinion of honorable gentlemen, the folly of the people of these States in creating such a tribunal, or however incompetent it may appear to decide these matters, the question still recurs, Is there any other forum established with co-extensive or with appellate powers? If so, what is it? There ought not to be a wrong without a remedy; and the interest and safety of all require the existence of some arbiter to decide controversies. We are warned, however, that if, by the constitution, there be not some express grant of power for this purpose, the States and the people still reserve it. On the other hand, if the grant to the Federal Judiciary be express, the States have not reserved it, and can create no other without forming a new constitution or violating this. Sir, I listened with deep interest to the development of what I thought was announced as a new discovery on this subject. I will consider that adverted to, and recommended, by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY.) After conceding to the Federal Judiciary the powers of a common umpire, to decide on the constitutionality of all Congressional enactments made in pursuance of the constitution, he informed us that there was another tribunal to which a State might resort, when oppressed by what she considered to be a plain, palpable, and dangerous violation of the constitution, without throwing herself out of the Union. He admitted that the Legislature of the State was not this tribunal. That might be misled. He beats the ground, then, which was occupied by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE,) but himself takes a new position, not less dangerous. For he informed us that a State convention might be called, and that might nullify the oppressive law; after which, he thought Congress must acquiesce by abandoning the power. The amount of this is, that one State is to govern all the rest, whenever she may choose to declare, by convention, that a law is unconstitutional. The end of this, we say, is war—civil war. We admit that a State convention may pronounce any law to be unconstitutional, as the Legislature of Virginia did in '98. But the mere declaration comes to nothing, unless it can be enforced. You may declare a law unconstitutional, and so can I. But what of that? It amounts only to this: we have full freedom of speech in this country, may advocate what opinions we please, and peaceably endeavor to impress them upon others. But the gentleman says this doctrine does not lead to war. If Congress will not submit to the State, he thinks there is still a complete political salvo in another tribunal, and that is a convention of the States, to be called under the provisions of the constitution. The State, then, must exert herself until Congress, two-thirds deeming it necessary, under the fifth article, shall propose amendments to the constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths of them, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the constitution. So far this does not contravene the doctrine which we advocate, and which the Senator from New Hampshire, if I rightly understood him, after much preface, and with some "slips of prolixity," finally settled down upon as a part of the true orthodox creed. The right to amend the constitution has never been denied. This was a part of the political platform upon which my honorable friend from Missouri (Mr. BARRON) invited you to come and stand with us. If the convention of the States should assemble and decide by a majority of three-fourths against the State, the gentleman from Tennessee says the State must submit. But if they decide otherwise, or do not decide at all, Congress must submit to the State. Without assenting to this last conclusion, which appears to be arbitrarily assumed, I will only inquire, if this be so, how is this tribunal to save us from civil war? The answer is, only by so amending the constitution, as to warp it to suit the declarations of the State convention. This is an excellent remedy for the complaint of the State, but rather difficult to procure. If this is the sovereign panacea which the honorable Senator from Tennessee has discovered for healing the diseases of the South, sir, I fancy she will agree with me in commending her physician for his ingenuity in finding out the ingredients of the bolus, but she will still think they are too hard to be obtained to render the prescription valuable to her. With less experience, I would recommend to a State groaning under the operation of a law which she deems unconstitutional, to apply first to the Federal Judiciary, where she will generally obtain relief, if her complaint be not hypochondria or imaginary ill. If she fail there, let her pour her complaints into the ears of her sisters, and use all constitutional means to procure a repeal of the obnoxious law. A bare majority of Congress will be sufficient to give her relief in this way. Do you object that Congress will probably persevere in their course, and refuse to repeal the law they have enacted? It may be so; and if so, their constituents, being a majority of the people, must concur with them, that the law is not only constitutional, but salutary, or they would, by the exercise of the elective franchise, remove such unworthy agents of their sovereign will. If they do concur with their Representatives, and uphold them in their refusal to repeal the law, no matter how often by any other power than the Federal Judiciary declared to be unconstitutional, in my humble judgment you will hardly persuade three-fourths of them to assemble for the purpose of altering their constitution, and depriving their own agents of the power of acting on the subject.

It comes at last, then, to this—that we have no other direct resource, in the cases we have been considering, to save us from the horrors of anarchy, than the Supreme Court of the United States. That tribunal has decided a hundred such cases, and many under the most menacing circumstances. Several States have occasionally made great opposition to it. Indeed, it would seem that in their turn most of the sisters of this great family have fretted for a time, sometimes threatening to break the connection and form others; but in the end, nearly all have been restored, by the dignified and impartial conduct of our common umpire, to perfect good humor. Should that umpire ever lose its high character for justice and impartiality, we have a corrective in the form of our Government; but if it is to be had only by a calm and temperate appeal to the judgment and feelings of the whole American people, it can never be obtained by such addresses and resolutions as those of Colleton or Abbeville. Reason receives not in place of argument violent denunciations or furious appeals to party and passion. During a period of four or five years past, the complaints of the South have, for this reason, met with a cold reception in almost every other section of the Union. They have been loud and deep; but they have been evidently regarded as the transient effusions of party feeling, coming, as they too often did, couched in language of bitter vituperation, with the now stale and despicable charges of "coalition, bargain, and corruption"—that vile and putrescent stuff which has at length, as the Senator from Massachusetts truly stated, alonged off and gone down into the kennel forever. The course pursued was exactly that which was best calculated to make the whole alleged grievances, if real, irremediable. Those who loved and admired the character of the Statesman of the West, indignant at the calumnies with which he, as they saw, was so unjustly assailed, often regarded the complaints which came with them as mere secondary considerations, brought in to aid a personal attack. On the other hand, many of those who affected to accredit these calumnies for political effect, in their hearts never sincerely believed any part of the story of Southern sufferings, thinking perhaps that they knew best what weight was to be attached to the political falsehoods which commonly accompanied them. However different their objects, they were really on the same chase; but to the Southern huntsman the game taken has been of no benefit. From a recent demonstration, we perceive that the Southern complaint is now not even deemed worthy of a hearing. Sir, when I witnessed the manly and candid manner in which the honorable Senator from South Carolina on my right (Mr. SMITH) spoke of the grievances of his constituents, when I saw him evidently soaring above mere party feeling, menacing none, denouncing none, and touching with all the delicacy which characterizes him, the subjects in difference between us, the reflection forced itself irresistibly on my mind, how different might have been the reception of these complaints, had they always come thus recommended. South Carolina, though erring in a controversy with her sisters, would by all have been believed to have been honestly wrong; and if, under such circumstances, she should ever throw herself out of the pale of the Union in consequence of such a misconception of the constitution as we have endeavored to prevent, I would rather see my own constituents stripped of the property acquired under the protection furnished by the Government to their honest industry, than compelled by any vote of mine here to drive the steel with which we should arm our citizens into the bosoms of that gallant people. And I will now say, without meaning to express any further opinion on this delicate subject, that, for myself, whenever pounds, shillings, and pence, alone, shall be arrayed against the infinite blessings of the Union, I shall unhesitatingly prefer the latter, for the simple reason that I can never learn how to "calculate its value."

Abolition of Duties, Taxes, &c.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. BENTON, proceeded to the further consideration of the bill, introduced by himself, for the abolition of sixteen millions of duties, &c., &c.

[When this subject was last under consideration, a question of order was raised by Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, whether, on account of a section of it, which proposed to raise the duty on certain articles, this bill was within the constitutional power of the Senate to originate it; which question the Vice President, not choosing to exercise his prerogative of deciding, had submitted to the decision of the Senate.]

Mr. BENTON declined saying any thing on this question, his only object being to have a decision one way or the other, that his bill might be advanced so as to take the usual course of bills thus introduced.

The yeas and nays having been required, and ordered to be taken, on the question of order—

Mr. WEBSTER suggested that it could hardly be expected that, if a question of this importance, in a constitutional view, was to be gravely decided upon a point of order, it could be so without some discussion. This discussion, he thought, might well be avoided, at present, by the gentleman's withdrawing his bill, or modifying it so as to take out the feature excepted to.

The VICE PRESIDENT said that the bill might be withdrawn by the gentleman who introduced it, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, but not otherwise.

Mr. BENTON then asked leave to withdraw the bill.

No objection being made, the bill was withdrawn by Mr. BENTON from the table of the Senate.

THURSDAY, March 11.

Heirs of Robert Fulton.

The bill to recompense the heirs of Robert Fulton, deceased, was read the third time.

The question being on the passage of this bill, which proposed the grant of a township of land to the heirs of Robert Fulton, in consideration of benefits rendered by him to the country, the yeas and nays thereon were required by Mr. FORSYTH, with the view that the decision, involving a question of much importance on constitutional grounds, should be a solemn one.

Whereupon arose a debate of much interest, and, in a constitutional view, of much importance. The gentlemen who engaged in the debate were, Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. BROWN, Mr. BARTON, Mr. TAZEWELL, Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. JOHNSTON of Louisiana, Mr. HAYNE, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. SANFORD, and Mr. NOBLE.

The question being finally taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, it was decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barton, Chambers, Dudley, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Robbins, Sanford, Willey—9.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Barnard, Bell, Benton, Brown, Burnet, Chase, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Iredell, Kane, King, McKinley, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith of S. C., Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—33.

So the bill was rejected.

FRIDAY, March 12.

Louisville and Portland Canal.

The bill to authorize a subscription of stock on the part of the United States, in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, was taken up, and, after considerable debate, in which the bill was advocated by Messrs. HENDRICKS, JOHNSTON, and ROWAN, and was opposed by Messrs. TAZEWELL and HAYNE, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Dudley, Foot, Grundy, Hendricks, Johnston, Kane, Livingston, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Silabee, Smith of Md., Willey—23.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Adams, Bell, Brown, Dickerson, Ellis, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Hayne, Holmes, Iredell, Knight, Smith of S. C., Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—18.

[The bill directed an additional subscription, on the part of the United States, to the stock of the company, for one thousand shares, at one hundred dollars each.]

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, March 15.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said: I now approach a graver subject—one on the true understanding

MARCH, 1890.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

[SENATE.]

of which the Union, and of course the happiness of our country, depends. The question presented is, that of the true sense of that constitution which it is made our first duty to preserve in its purity. Its true construction is put in doubt; not on a question of power between its several departments, but on the very basis upon which the whole rests; and which, if erroneously decided, must topple down the fabric raised with so much pain, framed with so much wisdom, established with so much persevering labor, and for more than forty years the shelter and protection of our liberties—the proud monument of the patriotism and talent of those who devised it, and which, we fondly hoped, would remain to after ages as a model for the imitation of every nation that wished to be free. Is that, sir, to be its destiny? The answer to that question may be influenced by this debate. How strong the motive, then, to conduct it calmly; when the mind is not heated by opposition, depressed by defeat, or elated with fancied victory, to discuss it with a sincere desire, not to obtain a paltry triumph in argument, to gain applause by tart reply, to carry away the victory by addressing the passions, or gain proselytes by specious fallacies, but, with a mind open to conviction, seriously to search after truth—earnestly, when found, to impress it on others. What we say on this subject will remain; it is not an every-day question; it will remain for good or for evil. As our views are correct or erroneous; as they tend to promote the lasting welfare, or accelerate the dissolution of our Union; so will our opinions be cited as those which placed the constitution on a firm basis, when it was shaken or deprecated, if they should have formed doctrines which led to its destruction.

With this temper, and these impressions of the importance of the subject, I have given it the most profound, the most anxious, and painful attention; and differing, as I have the misfortune to do, in a greater or less degree, from all the Senators who have preceded me, I feel an obligation to give my views of the subject. Could I have coincided in the opinions given by my friends, I should most certainly have been silent; from a conviction, that neither my authority nor my expositions could add any weight to the arguments they have delivered.

My learned and honorable friend, the Senator near me, from South Carolina, (Mr. HAYNE,) comes, in the eloquent arguments he has made, to the conclusion, that whenever, in the language of the Virginia resolutions, (which he adopts,) there is, in the opinion of any one State, "a palpable, deliberate, and dangerous violation of the constitution by a law of Congress," such State may, without ceasing to be a member of the Union, declare the law to be unconstitutional, and prevent its execution within the State; that this is a constitutional right, and that its exercise will produce a constitutional remedy, by obliging Congress either to repeal the law, or to obtain an explicit grant of the power which is denied by the State, by submitting an amendment to the several States, and that, by the decision of the requisite number, the State, as well as the Union, would be bound. It would be doing injustice, both to my friend and to his argument, if I did not add, that this resort to the nullifying power, as it has been termed, ought to be had only in the last resort, where the grievance was intolerable, and all other means of remonstrance and appeal to the other States had failed.

In this opinion I understand the honorable and learned chairman of the Judiciary Committee (Mr. ROWAN) substantially to agree, particularly in the constitutional right of preventing the execution of the obnoxious law.

The Senator from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) in his speech, which was listened to with so much attention and pleasure, very justly denies the right of declaring the nullity of a law, and preventing its execution, to the ordinary Legislature, but erroneously, in my opinion, gives it to a convention.

My friend from New Hampshire, (Mr. WOODBURY,) of whose luminous argument I cannot speak too highly, and to the greatest part of which I agree, does not coincide in the assertion of a constitutional right of preventing the execution of a law believed to be unconstitutional, but refers opposition to the unalienable right of resistance to oppression.

All these Senators consider the constitution as a compact between the States in their sovereign capacity; and one of them (Mr. ROWAN) has contended that sovereignty cannot be divided; from which it may be inferred that no part of the sovereign power has been transferred to the General Government.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in his very eloquent and justly admired address on this subject, considers the Federal constitution as entirely popular, and not created by compact, and, from this position, very naturally shows, that there can be no constitutional right of actual resistance to a law of that Government, but that intolerable and illegal acts may justify it on first principles.

However these opinions may differ, there is one consolatory reflection, that none of them justify a violent opposition given to an unconstitutional law, until an extreme case of suffering has occurred. Still less do any of them suppose the actual existence of such a case.

But the danger of establishing on the one hand a constitutional veto in each of the States, upon any act of the whole, to be exercised whenever, in the opinion of the Legislature of such State, the act they complain of is contrary to the constitution; and, on the other, the dangers which result to the State Governments by considering that of the Union as entirely popular, and denying the existence of any compact; seem, both of them, to be so great, as to justify, and indeed demand, an expression of my dissent from both.

The arguments on the one side, to show that the constitution is the result of a compact between the States, cannot, I think, be controverted; and those which go to show that it is founded on the consent of the people, and, in one sense of the word, a popular Government, are equally incontrovertible. Both of the positions, seemingly so contradictory, are true, and both of them are false—true, as respects one feature in the constitution; erroneous, if applied to the whole.

These States, during the short period of the contest with Great Britain, which preceded the Declaration of Independence, although colonies in name, were, in fact, independent States, and, even at that early period, their political existence partook of this mixed character.

By a popular or consolidated Government, I understand one that is founded on the consent, express or implied, of the people of the whole nation; and which operates in all its departments directly upon the people.

By a federative Government, as contradistinguished from the former, I mean one composed of several independent States, bound together for specific national purposes, and relying for the efficiency of its operations on its action upon the different States in their political capacity, not individually upon their citizens.

In the incipient state of our political existence, we find traces of both of these features. When the oppressive acts of the mother country had excited the spirit of resistance, we find the colonies sending delegates to a General Congress; and, without any formal federative contract, that Congress assumed, by general consent, and exercised powers which could strictly be classed only under the head of such as belong to a consolidated Government. In order to effect a non-importation of goods from Great Britain, instead of operating through the agency of the separate colonies, and recommending that they should use their influence or authority to effect the object, the Congress addressed their recommendation to the merchants of all the united colonies individually. It is true this was only in the shape of a recommendation, not an imperative order; but this makes no difference in the argument: it was still an action of the Government, addressed to individuals of the colonies, not through the medium of the colonial authority, as would have been the case under a strictly federative compact. This was on the 19th of September, 1774. On the 27th of the same month, they proceeded more directly, and resolved that there should be no goods imported after a certain day, and that those so imported should not be used or sold; and a few days after, a resolution of non-exportation was entered into; the negotiation of British bills was prohibited, and besides levying and equipping a naval and land force on the continental establishment, they erected a Post-Office Department, emitted money, and declared that persons refusing to receive the bills, on conviction, be deemed, published, and treated as enemies of the country. All these acts were, in a greater or less degree, direct operations of the general temporary Government, upon the citizens, and, in that degree, were proofs of its character as a mixture of popular with a federative Government. After all these acts, and many more of the same nature, came the Declaration of Independence, in which they jointly declare themselves independent States, but still, it would seem, as one nation. In the preamble they assert the right, as "one people," to take the station, not the stations, to which they are entitled. The whole instrument complains of illegal and oppressive acts against them jointly.

After this decisive act, for more than two years the States, thus declared free, remained connected by no other bond than their common love of liberty, and common danger, under the same authority of a general Congress, which continued to exercise all the powers of a mixed kind, which, if they had been formally conferred, would have constituted a Government which could not properly be called either purely a federation of States, retaining all their sovereignty, or a consolidated Government, to which it had been surrendered.

The Confederation was at length entered into. This was certainly a compact between the States; but, among a number of stipulations strictly federative, contained others which gave to the Congress powers which trench upon the State sovereignties; to declare war and make peace; enter into treaties binding on the whole; to establish courts of admiralty, with power to bind the citizens of the States, individually, in cases coming under that jurisdiction; to raise armies, equip fleets, coin money, emit bills of credit, and other similar powers. The defects of this bond of union are well known; among these the most prominent was the want of a power, acting directly on the citizens, to raise a revenue, independent of the agency of the States. And it is a most instructive fact, that the common danger, though at times extremely imminent, during the continuance of the war, could never produce any kind of attention to the requisitions of Congress; yet there was no want of patriotism or attachment to the cause. Each State then possessed, on the subject of the requisition, the practical power of giving a veto to the operations they disliked, by refusing its quota; and the power was abused, and will always be abused, whenever it is the interest of the State possessing it to exercise that right.

In the Federal constitution this combination of the two characteristics of Government is more apparent. It was framed by delegates appointed by the States; it was ratified by conventions of the people of each State, convened according to the laws of the respective States. It guarantees the existence of the States, which are necessary to its own; the States are represented in one branch by Senators, chosen by the Legislatures; and in the other, by Representatives taken from the people, but chosen by a rule which may be made and varied by the States, not by Congress—the qualification of electors being different in different States. They may make amendments to the constitution. In short, the Government had its inception with them; it depends on their political existence for its operation; and its duration cannot go beyond theirs. The States existed before the constitution; they parted only with such powers as are specified in that instrument; they continue still to exist, with all the powers they have not ceded; and the present Government would never, itself, have gone into operation, had not the States, in their political capacity, have consented. That consent is a compact of each one with the whole; not, as has been argued, (in order to throw a kind of ridicule on this convincing part of the argument of my friend from South Carolina,) with the Government which was made by such compact. It is difficult, therefore, it would appear, with all these characters of a federative nature, to deny to the present Government the description of one founded on compact, to which each State was a party; and a conclusive proof, if any more were wanted, would be in the fact, that the States adopted the constitution at different times, and many of them on conditions which were afterwards complied with by amendments. If it were strictly a popular Government, in the sense that is contended for, the moment a majority of the people of the United States had consented, it would have bound the rest; and yet, after all the others, except one, had adopted the constitution, the smallest still held out; and if Rhode Island had not consented to enter into the confederacy, she would, perhaps, at this time, have been unconnected with us.

But with all these proofs (and I think them incontrovertible) that the Government could not have been brought into being without a compact, yet I am far from admitting that, because this entered so largely into its origin, therefore there are no characteristics of another kind, which impress on it strongly the marks of a more intimate union and amalgamation of the interests of the citizens of the different States, which gives to them the general character of citizens of the united nation. This single fact will show, that the entire sovereignty of the States, individually, has not been retained: the relation of citizen and sovereign is reciprocal. To whatever power the citizen owes allegiance, that power is his sovereign. There cannot be a double, although there may be a subordinate fealty. The Government, also, for the most part, (except in the election of Senators, Representatives, and President, and some others,) acts in the exercise of its legitimate powers directly upon individuals, and not through the medium of State authorities. This is an essential character of a popular Government.

I place little reliance on the argument which has been mostly depended on, to show that this is a popular Government: I mean the preamble, which begins with the words, "We, the people." It proves nothing more than the fact, that the people of the several States had been consulted, and had given their consent to the instrument. To give these words any other construction, would be to make them an assertion directly contrary to the fact. We know, and it never has been imagined or asserted, that the people of the United States, collectively, as a whole people, gave their assent, or were consulted in that capacity; the people of each State were consulted, to know whether that State would form a part of the United States, under the articles of the constitution, and to that they gave their assent, simply as citizens of that State.

This Government, then, is neither such a federative one, founded on a compact, as leaves to all the parties their full sovereignty, nor such a consolidated popular Government, as deprives them of the whole of that sovereign power. It is a compact, by which the people of each State have consented to take from their own Legislatures some of the powers they had conferred upon them, and to transfer them, with other enumerated powers, to the Government of the United States, created by that compact; these powers, so conferred, are some of those exercised by the sovereign power of the country in which they reside. I do not mean here, the ultimate sovereign power residing under all Governments, democratic or despotic, in the people; a sovereignty which must always in theory exist, however its exercise may by foreign or domestic power be repressed; but I mean that power to regulate the affairs of a nation, which resides in its Government, whatever the form of that Government may be; and this may be, and generally is, distributed into several hands. As to all these attributes of sovereignty, which, by the federal compact, were transferred to the General Government, that Government is sovereign and supreme; the States have abandoned, and can never reclaim them. As to all other sovereign powers, the States retain them.

But the States have not only given certain powers to the General Government, but they have expressly given the right of enforcing obedience to the exercise of those powers. They have declared that "the constitution and the laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof shall be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." And they have also expressly consented, that the Judiciary of the United States shall have cognizance of all cases coming under those laws. Here the words of the compact provide for the means by which controversies coming under it are to be decided; but this must be taken with the understanding that they are controversies arising not only under the laws of the United States, (including the constitution and treaties,) but they must be between parties over whom the constitution has given jurisdiction to the courts. Every case, then, of this description, must be submitted to the Judiciary of the United States; and as, in all cases, the Constitution of the United States is paramount in authority to a law of the United States, and as both of them are so to a law of the State, the Supreme Court of the United States must, of necessity, when a contrariety between these authorities is alleged, in any case legally before it, determine that question, and its determination must be final; the parties must be bound; the States to which they belong must be bound; for they, in this compact, have agreed that their citizens shall be so. But it is asked, Suppose the law of Congress is palpably contrary to the constitution, and endangers the liberties of the country, must the State submit? If the question be, whether the State can constitutionally resist, there is but one answer. She has by the constitution consented that the Supreme Court shall finally decide whether this be constitutional or not. If the question be, of the right which all people have to resist ruinous oppression, the answer is as clear; and I should be the last man in the world to contravene the existence of that unalienable right. But that is not the question; it is of a constitutional right, whenever, in the opinion of the Legislature, (or as some think, of a convention of the people of any one State,) a law of Congress is palpably unconstitutional, such State has a right, under the constitution, not only to declare the act void, but to prevent its execution within the State, until Congress shall propose a declaratory amendment to the States, and their decision shall be obtained; and all this without quitting their place in the Union, without disturbing its peace, it is said; but, on the contrary, it is contended, for the purpose of preserving the general compact inviolate. Now, sir, independently of the argument drawn from the express consent of the people of the several States, that in all matters where the Supreme Court have jurisdiction between individuals, they should determine, and must determine, whether a law be unconstitutional; independently of this, and supposing no such powers given to the court, can it be supposed that so essential a feature of the Government, as a positive veto given to, or reserved by each State, upon the operations of the whole, would have been left, not only unprovided for by express words, but without even an ambiguous phrase—a single doubtful word, to hang the argument upon? It is derived solely from the rights attached to the sovereignty of the States, unimpaired by its accession to the Union, indivisible, according to the argument of my learned friend from Kentucky, and always alive and active, (not one of those which he expressively says will keep cold,) and ready to go into operation whenever it is attacked.

I have called it a positive veto on the operations of the whole Government. Is it not so in effect? That the right, when exercised by a single State, can only prevent the execution of the obnoxious law in the State alone which objects to it, does not take from the power the character I have given to it, is apparent. For, if the General Government were under an obligation to desist from executing the law in the opposing State, they must, of necessity, refrain from putting it in force in the others: if it were a tax, because they must be equal; if any other subject of legislation, imposing a burthen or restriction, they could not, in justice, force the others to bear what one was relieved from, nor would the other States submit to so unequal an imposition. The argument, then, supposes a feature in the constitution which certainly is not expressed in it, which, most assuredly, would have been expressed, if it had been intended: for it totally alters its character; puts the power of the Union at the will of any one of its members; and allows it, without risk, to throw off all the burthens of Government at its pleasure. Remember, sir, that I am speaking of a constitutional right, (for that is the one claimed;) a right under the constitution, not over it; a power that may be exercised without incurring any risk, or committing any offence—without forfeiting a place in the Union, or any right or privilege under it. The State has only to resolve, by its ordinary Legislature, or, according to others, in a convention of its citizens, that a law enacted by the General Government is palpably unconstitutional and dangerous, and that it shall cease to operate, and it must cease to operate; and, as an inevitable consequence, it may be resisted by force; as another consequence, if death ensues, it is murder in those who act under the General Government; justifiable homicide in those who resist. Now, sir, would not these serious consequences have presented themselves to the enlightened men who framed this constitution? and, if they did, would not some provision have been made to prevent any illegal exertion of power by the Executive, fraught with such danger? If they had supposed that this was a right reserved, would they not have declared the correlative obligation in the General Government to respect it? For, sir, it is superfluous to say that every right carries with it its correspondent obligation, and that there cannot be two conflicting rights. If, then, the States have a right to prevent the execution of a law, the General Government is under an obligation to refrain from enforcing it; yet, instead of declaring this obligation to respect this reserved right, not the slightest allusion is made to it. On the contrary, when a law is once passed, it is made the duty of the President to execute it. But, by the argument, the law has been passed as constitutional by both Houses of Congress; it has been approved as such by the President; and a judgment has been given by the Supreme Court, declaring it to be constitutional, and directing that, in the particular case before them, it shall be executed. The State against whose citizen the judgment is given declares it to be palpably and dangerously contrary to the constitution, and that it is null and void, and shall not be executed? What is to be done? The right of the State, says the gentleman, must be respected; but, unfortunately for the argument, the constitution does not say so; unfortunately, it says directly the contrary. The President is bound by his oath to cause every constitutional law to be executed. But he has approved this law, therefore he believes it to be constitutional; but both Houses have passed it, therefore they believed it so; but the judges have decreed that it shall be executed; therefore, they, too, have believed it to be constitutional. Must the President yield his own conviction, fortified as it is by these authorities, to the opinion of a majority—perhaps a small majority—in the Legislature of a single State? If he must, again I say, show me the written authority. I cannot find it. I cannot conceive it. I am not asking for the expression of the reserved right; I know that they are not enumerated. But I ask for the obligation to obey that right; I ask for the written instruction to the Executive to respect it; I ask for a provision, that nothing but the grossest inattention, or the most consummate folly, could have omitted, if the doctrine contended for be true.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

This might have been done by an article in these words: "Whenever, in the opinion of any one State, a law passed by the Congress shall be deemed unconstitutional and dangerous, such State may prevent its execution, and the President and the courts shall forbear to enforce the same; but Congress shall, in that case, if they persevere in thinking the law expedient, submit the question as an amendment to conventions of the States, in the manner prescribed by the constitution." Now, sir, the inquiry cannot be too often repeated, if such had been the intention of those who framed our form of Government, or of those who adopted it, and considered and amended it, would not some expression of this kind have been inserted? and if inserted, would it not have been recommended or adopted? and, if adopted, how long would it have continued in operation? how many votes would have been interposed? how many conventions would have been assembled? Not an embargo, not a restriction, not a declaration of war, not a measure for defence, not a tax or an impost, but would produce a stoppage in the wheels of the political machine; the most pressing operations of Government must be suspended until the amendments are proposed by Congress, until conventions are called in all the States, and they have made their decisions. It is unfortunately no answer to say that this power would not be abused; that the argument supposes it to accrue only in palpable cases. Let the constitutional right be acknowledged, let it be known that it may be exercised without risk, and local interest will always be strong enough to suggest constitutional scruples; nor will common interest, the incalculable interest of our Union, be a sufficient argument. When was the interest of union more apparent than during the latter years of the revolutionary war, and those which immediately succeeded the peace? Yet, when was the apathy of the States more apparent to the considerations of common good? When were local interests more consulted? When was it more difficult to procure the slender contributions which each State was bound to furnish to the common fund? It is a most important truth, that the existence of the General Government must depend on that feature which permits the exercise of all its legitimate powers directly upon the people, without the intervention of the States. Make that intervention necessary for the execution of those legitimate powers, or permit it to arrest them in cases which the States may deem illegal, and your Government is gone; it changes its character; it becomes, whatever other features you give to it, essentially an inefficient confederation, without union at home, without consideration abroad, and must soon fall a prey to domestic wars, in which foreign alliances will necessarily intervene to complete its ruin. No, sir; adopt this as a part of our constitution, and we need no prophet to predict its fall. The oldest of us may live long enough to weep over its ruins; to deplore the failure of the fairest experiment that was ever made, of securing public prosperity and private happiness, based on equal rights and fair representation; to die with the expiring liberties of our country, and transmit to our children, instead of the fair inheritance of freedom received from our fathers, a legacy of war, slavery, and contention.

But it is asked, will you deny to the States every portion of their former sovereignty? Will you call this, with the Senator from Massachusetts, a strictly popular Government? Will you deny them all right of intervention, and reduce them to the condition of mere corporations? Do you renounce the doctrines for which you contended in 1798, and consider the Supreme Court as the umpire provided in all cases to determine on the extent of State rights? God forbid that I should hold such doctrines. If my friends had stopped at the declaration that they adopted the resolutions of the Virginia Legislature, I should not, perhaps, have thought the difference between us of sufficient consequence to have troubled the Senate with my opinions. For the most part, I coincide in the sentiments of those resolutions; but my friends carried them out into their practical consequences farther than, I think, they warrant; farther, certainly, than I am willing to follow them.

As I understand them, they assert the right of a State, in the case of a law palpably unconstitutional and dangerous, to remonstrate against it, to call on the other States to co-operate in procuring its repeal, and, in doing this, they must, of necessity, call it unconstitutional, and, if so, in their opinion, null and void. Thus far I agree entirely with the language and substance of the resolutions. This, I suppose, is meant by the expression, interpose for arresting the progress of the evil. I see in those resolutions no assertion of the right contended for, as a constitutional and peaceable exercise of a veto, followed out by the doctrine that it is to continue until, on the application of Congress for an amendment, the States are to decide. If these are the true deductions from the Virginia resolutions, I cannot agree to them, much as I revere the authority of the great statesman whose production they are. I cannot assent to them; and it is because I revere him, and admire his talents, that I cannot believe he intended to go this length. I cannot believe it, also, for another reason. He thought, and he conclusively proved, the alien and sedition laws to be deliberate, unconstitutional, and dangerous acts; he declared them so in his resolutions. Yet, sir, he never proposed that their execution should be resisted; he never uttered or wrote a word that looked like this doctrine, now contended for, of a constitutional right to arrest the execution of the law until amendments could be proposed. The right he asserted, when he alludes to resistance, was one that all acknowledged, that of opposition to intolerable and unconstitutional oppression. Mr. Jefferson, in the Kentucky resolutions, has used a word of equivocal authority, as well as signification: he asserts the right of a State to "nullify" an unconstitutional act. If he means by this any thing more than is contained in the Virginia resolutions, he must apply it to the extreme case of resistance, on the right of which there can be no contrariety of opinion: for Mr. Jefferson does not, if I read him aright, avow, any more than Mr. Madison does, the right now contended for, of a State veto, with its consequences. This, it appears to me, is a more modern invention, and, as I think I have proved, utterly incompatible with the nature of our Government. Was it ever conceived, before the present day, to form a part of it? If it was, why is it not alluded to in any of the debates of the Federal convention which framed, or the State conventions which adopted it? Surely it is of sufficient importance to have attracted attention, either as an advantage or an objection; yet not a word is said about it. Nay, more; if we refer to that luminous exposition of the whole character of the General Government, and of its expected operation, "The Federalist," not a word can be found that favors this idea of a veto, now for the first time set up as a part of our constitution. The constitution, its advocates, its opposers, the great contemporary exposition of its character, the practice under it for forty years, all silent on so important, so fundamental a doctrine!

Is not this a fair, I might say a conclusive argument that it does not exist; that it is what I have indicated it to be, a modern invention! But this is not all: the case of a conflict of authority between the General and State authorities, under the new Government, was one that could not escape the foresight of the authors of "The Federalist." A series of chapters on this, and subjects connected with it, are found in that collection, written by Mr. Madison. Here would have been the place, certainly, to have developed the character and operation of this legal veto, if, in his opinion, it had existed. He could not have been silent on the subject. It is impossible that he could then have held the doctrines which are erroneously, in my opinion, said to be those of his Virginia resolutions. In the 44th number, in arguing the necessity of the article which makes the laws of the United States, made in pursuance of the constitution, paramount to the State constitutions, he says, if the State sovereignty had been left complete in this particular, among other absurd and dangerous consequences, "The world would have seen, for the first time, a system of Government founded on an inversion of the fundamental principles of all Government; it would have seen the authority of the whole society everywhere subordinate to the authority of the parts: it would have seen a monster in which the head was under the direction of the members." And, as more immediately applicable to the present subject, in the 46th number, he gives expressly what he supposes the only remedy for an "unwarrantable," by which he must mean unconstitutional measure. "On the other hand, (he says) should an unwarrantable measure of the Federal Government be unpopular in particular States, which would seldom fail to be the case, or even a warrantable measure be so, which may sometimes be the case, the means of opposition to it are powerful and at hand." Now, sir, if the new doctrine were the true one, if the veto were a constitutional measure, now we should hear of it! What more powerful! What more at hand? What more effectual! Why look for any other? Yet this constitutional right, so clearly deducible from the very terms of our national compact, never occurred to the very man whose doctrines, in 1798, are said erroneously, I again repeat, to embrace it. What are the remedies which he there points out? "The disquietude of the people, their repugnance, and, perhaps, refusal to co-operate with the officers of the Union, the frowns of the Executive magistracy of the State, the embarrassments created by legislative devices, which would often be added on such occasions, would oppose, in any State, difficulties not to be despised; would form, in a large State, very serious impediments; and where the sentiments of several adjoining States happened to be in unison, would present obstructions which the Federal Government would be hardly willing to encounter." These were the sentiments of Mr. Madison, in 1787; and such, I think, is the true construction of his language in 1798. For he goes on, in the same paper, to follow up the consequences of a perseverance of the Federal Government in unconstitutional measures, into the only result that all agree must, in extreme cases, happen—a resistance by force; and that he may not be misunderstood, makes it analogous to the case of the colonial resistance to Great Britain.

Although, in my opinion, in every case which can lawfully be brought within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, that tribunal must judge of the constitutionality of laws on which the question before them depends, and its decrees must be final, whether they affect State rights or not; and, as a necessary consequence, that no State has any right to impede or prevent the execution of such sentence; yet I am far from thinking that this court is created an umpire to judge between the General and State Governments. I do not see it recorded in the instrument, but I see it recorded that every right not given is retained. In an extreme case that has been put, of the United States declaring that a particular State should have but one Senator, or should be deprived of its representation, I see nothing to oblige the State to submit this case to the Supreme Court; on the contrary, I see, by the enumeration of the cases and persons which may be brought within their jurisdiction, that this is not included; in this the injured State would have a right at once to declare that it would no longer be bound by a compact which had been thus grossly violated.

It would be useless affectation to pretend ignorance of the discontent that prevails in an important section of the Union; its language is too loud, too decisive, too menacing, not to have been heard, and heard with the deepest concern. It has already been more than once alluded to, in this debate, in terms of severest censure. I shall not assume that tone, although I cannot but deprecate the light manner in which the greatest evil that can befall us is spoken of, as if it were an every-day occurrence. Arguments for and against the dissolution of the Union are canvassed in the public papers; form the topic of dinner speeches; are condensed into toasts; and treated, in every respect, as if it were "a knot of policy that might be unloosed familiar as a garter." Sir, it is a Gordian knot, that can be severed only by the sword. The band cannot be unloosed until it is wet with the blood of brothers. I cannot, therefore, conscientiously be silent; and, humbly as I think of my influence or powers of persuasion, I should feel myself guilty if they were not exerted in admonition to both parties in this eventful controversy. The tariff is the prominent grievance that excites the discontents in some of the Southern States, and particularly in South Carolina. It is denounced as unconstitutional, injurious to the whole country, ruinous to the South, and beneficial only to a particular interest in the North and East. My sentiments on this subject may be expressed in a very few words. A decided convert to the free trade system, I think it may be departed from in the few cases in which restrictions may be used, with a hope of producing a relaxation of similar restrictions by a foreign power. I therefore believe the present tariff unwise, unequal, and oppressive in its operations, but I cannot think it unconstitutional. And I consider one of its worst consequences to be, that, when it has been long persisted in, and considered as the settled policy of the nation, so much of the capital and population of the country may be employed in the manufactures protected by it, as to make it a matter of serious calculation whether a sudden and total abandonment of the policy may not produce greater evil to the whole nation than the benefit to be expected from throwing open the trade. With these opinions, on the subject of the Southern discontents, I enter largely into their feelings, and join them in lamenting a policy which operates so distressingly on their prosperity.

TUESDAY, March 28.

Mounted Infantry Bill.

Mr. BENTON moved that all the bills preceding bill No. 119 should be postponed, for the purpose of taking up and considering that bill. The Senate agreed to the motion, and that bill was then taken up, and read by the Secretary. It consisted of a single section, and proposed to vest the President with authority to mount and equip ten companies of the army of the United States, to be employed as the public service might require, and appropriated the sum of — dollars for the purchase and equipment of the horses. After it was read, Mr. B. proposed to add a second section, to appropriate the sum of — dollars for purchasing forage for the horses for the remainder of the present year; stating that his object was to keep the appropriations for the different branches of the service distinct and separate. The motion to add the second section was agreed to: and, after stating that he should move, at the proper time, to fill the blank in the first section with thirty-three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, and that in the second one with eighteen thousand seven hundred and fifty, he (Mr. B.) entered into a particular examination of the nature of the bill, and advocated its policy and utility. He first remarked upon the terms, or phraseology of the bill, which were to authorize—not to require—the President to cause the ten companies to be mounted; and which gave him a discretion over the number of companies to be mounted, not exceeding the limitation expressed in the bill. Such a discretion was properly vested in the President, who, being charged with the defence of the country, and responsible for the safety of the frontiers, should have some authority to use the species of force which the occasion required; and that the present President preferred mounted men for the kind of service—defence against Indians—which this bill contemplated, was a fact as well known by the events of his military career as by the communication of his sentiments on the particular subject of this bill. The Missouri Legislature, the officers of the army on the Western frontier, and all the citizens of the West, interested in the question; the President, the Secretary at War, and the Quartermaster General, Jesup, have united their voices in favor of the species of force which this bill contemplates; and the granting of it may justly be considered as one of the highest objects of Western hope and desire. One object of the measure is, to give defence and protection to the trading caravans between Missouri and Mexico—caravans which annually bring home large sums of gold and silver, and now experience continued losses, in lives and property, for want of the species of protection which this bill proposes to give. Another object, and a more extensive one, is to provide an adequate and appropriate defence for the Western frontier, and that in its whole extent, from the Sabine to the Falls of St. Anthony, and thence to Green Bay, at the upper end of Lake Michigan. This line of defence is largely upwards of a thousand miles in length, covering the frontiers of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, and the new territory upon the upper Mississippi. To those two objects a third one, also of great importance—the security of the fur trade, now a dangerous pursuit to our own citizens on our own soil—must be added. For all those objects—for the just and necessary defence of the frontiers, the fur-trade, and the Mexican trade—a mounted force is indispensable. The Indians who infest the frontiers, and attack the caravans and traders, are all mounted on fleet and durable horses, which live on grass, and are trained to war and hunting. They come, and go, like Arabs—the attack and the flight being instantaneous. Our soldiers are all on foot, and can oppose no appropriate movements to these sudden and flying assaults. They may repulse an attack, but they cannot pursue, cannot chastise, cannot reconnoitre; cannot venture to quit the column when marching, the camp, or the garrison, when stationary, without danger of being cut off, and that in sight of their companions, who, for want of horses, are unable to get to their relief. The reports of all the officers from the West, and of all the caravans, attest the truth of this distressing fact. The country where these troops are to act is open and champaign. It is a connection of interminable prairies, destitute of large forests, and covered with grass; it is the native theatre for horsemen, the prairies giving them a clear stage for action, and the grass furnishing subsistence for horses, and attracting and supporting game for the subsistence of men. This is the character of the country upon the whole frontier beyond the Mississippi, and indefinitely to the West. Everywhere—at every point—from the Sabine round to the Wisconsin, the open prairie country approaches the frontier, and lays open the settlements to the danger of inroads from mounted barbarians. Men on foot, pursuing a march on such boundless plains, seem to stand still; Indians, mounted on horseback, gallop round them with impunity. They approach the garrison; kill and scalp men in its view, and gallop off in triumph. A mounted force, on our part, is indispensable. It is the appropriate defence of the Western frontier. The ten companies provided for in the bill will give us that defence. They will make a corps of regular rangers, or land fencibles; such as all Governments have used, and such as we need more than any Government ever did. Every post, and every garrison, from the Gulf of Mexico to the lakes—from Louisiana to Canada—should have its proportion of this mounted corps. When necessary, the companies at different posts may be united, and form an expedition, either to meet and repulse expected incursions of the Indians, or to pursue and chastise marauders, or to visit hostile towns. The service to which the corps can be applied is general and indefinite; it can go wherever the public interest requires. The Western frontier now demands it; but the Southern or Northern frontier may receive its aid when necessary. The horses may form the basis for cavalry, of which the army is now destitute; the men may be learnt the use of the sword and pistol, of which our magazines now contain a useless supply. Some companies of flying artillery may be trained. It will elevate the character of the service, induce better men to enlist, and diminish desertions by giving active and attractive employment. The President may mount the whole corps at once, or less; he has a discretion; he may mount a part now, and the remainder as necessity may seem to require. He may do as he thinks best; but, in my opinion, the whole ten companies will be little enough to guard the extended frontier of the West, and to perform the variety of service for which they are intended. Every year American blood is spilt upon American soil. Every year American citizens are killed and robbed, pursuing a lawful commerce, upon the soil of their country. The road to Mexico is stained with their blood; savage Indians are loaded with their spoils; families are reduced to want. In the region of the fur trade, where the Indians are excited by the British, the destruction of lives and property is horrible. The report of Gen. Clark and Gov. Cass, made at the last session of Congress, estimates the loss of lives, in this trade, at upwards of four hundred; the loss of property at about five hundred thousand dollars. The destruction of lives and property is still going on, and will go on, until the troops of the Federal Government shall make an appearance beyond the Mississippi, calculated to impress respect and fear upon the savage mind. Horses alone will enable them to make that appearance. General Ashley, with his mounted men, traverses the continent in safety; goes to the Buenaventura, and Multnomah, and returns in safety. For want of horses our soldiers are pursued, surrounded, insulted, harassed, and assassinated. Read the report of Major Riley, and see what his detachment suffered for want of horses. The mounted force is indispensable; it is the appropriate, and the only appropriate, defence for the West; it is the true and adequate, and the only true and adequate, protection for the fur trade, the Mexican trade, and the whole line of the Western frontier. It is the security, and the only security, for the tranquillity of the frontiers, the preservation of lives, and the protection of two great branches of Western commerce. This being shown; the great fact of the necessity of this species of force being established; I feel confident that the consideration of the expense that may attend it, which is the next point to be examined, will present but little difficulty to the Senate. The mounted force being necessary, the cost of it, I feel persuaded, will not be an overruling consideration, although that cost should be large, when, in point of fact, it will be small, and, in comparison to its object, inconsiderable and insignificant. Five hundred horses will be wanted for ten companies of fifty men each; the price of these horses, and their maximum price, will be fifty dollars each. This will make twenty-five thousand dollars for the purchase of the horses. Their equipment in saddles, bridles, halters, &c., will not exceed seventeen or eighteen dollars each. Seven or eight thousand dollars will defray the expense of equipment; so that the sum proposed for filling the first blank, thirty-three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, will meet the first and greatest expense to be incurred. Subsistence is the next item in expense. The Quartermaster General (General Jesup) estimates this item at fifty dollars a year for each horse, which is nearly a dollar a week; but I must differ from him in this estimate, and do it without derogating from his high and established character for correctness, because, living in the country where the horses are to be employed, I have a local knowledge on this subject which he could not possess. I reduce the expense of forage to less than one half of his estimate. I make this reduction upon these data: First. The horses will live upon grass full one-half of the year; and that will reduce the Quartermaster General's estimate one-half. Secondly. The cost of keeping horses, among the farmers in Missouri, is about seventy-five cents a week, including care and attention, as well as food; consequently, soldiers can keep their own for less than a dollar a week, when forage alone is to be paid for; and of that forage, the hay will cost nothing, for the soldiers cut it in the prairies without expense, and haul it in with the garrison teams. Upon these data the annual subsistence of the horses will be nearer to twenty dollars than to fifty dollars each. I think ten thousand dollars will be enough for their annual forage; but I have proposed to fill the second blank with eighteen thousand, seven hundred and fifty dollars for the remainder of the present year, according to the estimate of the quartermaster, and leave it to time and experience to ascertain the true amount. This will make the total appropriation, for the present year, about fifty thousand dollars. For each subsequent year it will probably be about fifteen thousand dollars, say ten or twelve thousand dollars for forage, and the remainder to supply the waste of horses and equipments. This is nothing compared to the magnitude and variety of the objects which require the expenditure. It is nothing in comparison to the good to be accomplished. It is a grain of sand to a mountain, compared to the annual expenditures for Atlantic objects of defence; compared to the annual expenditures for fortifications for the defence of the seacoast; compared to the annual expenditures for navy yards, lighthouses, and ships of war, for the safety and accommodation of maritime commerce. But, small and inconsiderable as this expenditure for the mounted force appears, there is still another point of view under which it is to be looked at, and which reduces it still lower, and, in fact, annihilates it as an object of expense, and converts it into a piece of economy. It is this: That, for the want of these horses, large sums are now expended in chartering steamboats for moving troops in the Western country, and for volunteer mounted gun men. The infantry have to be transported; and for this purpose steamboats are chartered. They need horsemen, and for this purpose, mounted volunteers are accepted. Every Indian alarm on the frontiers renews the expense of these boats and volunteers; and the expense is heavy in proportion to the suddenness of the alarm, the magnitude of the apparent danger, and the distance to be traversed. The Illinois volunteers, which went to the Winnebago country three years ago, cost about forty thousand dollars. The Missouri volunteers for the last Summer, when the alarm broke out on the frontier of that State, are not yet paid, but their claims are considerable. On both occasions steamboats were chartered. The movement of Major Riley's detachment last Summer must also have involved some expenditure for transportation. I know these various items to be considerable, and that they have been incurred, and must be incurred, just so long as we remain without horses. The exact amount of what has been expended heretofore is unknown to me; the amount that may be expended hereafter, cannot be foreseen. It will depend upon the frequency and magnitude of the alarms on the frontiers—alarms which must arise upon every point of a line, of more than a thousand miles in length, covering the settlements of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Illinois, and the new territory upon the Upper Mississippi. The amount of these casual and unforeseen expenditures may be safely assumed to be equal to the expense of keeping up the ten companies proposed in the bill. I make this assumption advisedly, and would be willing to stake the passage of the bill upon the Quartermaster General's opinion of the fact, if the passage of such a bill, in the judgment of any statesman, ought to depend upon such a fact. In this point of view, and I fully believe it to be correct, the annual keeping up of the ten companies of mounted infantry will be no expense at all; there will be as much, or more, saved from steamboat transportation and mounted volunteers, as will balance the expense of these horses. At the same time the mounted horses will be infinitely more efficient, and incomparably more satisfactory to the West; so that the whole question of passing the bill reduces itself to the mere problem of good will to the Western country, without expense to the Federal treasury. Mr. B. concluded with expressing his thanks to the Senate for taking up the bill before its turn; stating the necessity for it to pass immediately, as the Santa Fe caravan would set out from Missouri in May; and declaring his readiness to answer any questions which might be put to him for the further information of any Senator.

Mounted Infantry Bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he saw no objection to the passage of this bill. It read, that the number of men to be mounted was not to exceed ten companies, and of course, the President, at his discretion, would not cause that number to be mounted, if a less number should be found sufficient. This was, indeed, but an experiment, and, if it proved successful, it might become necessary to carry it farther. He had examined into the subject, and become fully acquainted with it, and was, therefore, satisfied of the utility and importance of the measure proposed by the bill. The trade to Mexico was very great, and the hazards to which it was exposed were equally great. It demanded protection; and this bill would operate in the same manner and on the same principle as the protection given by the Government to our merchant ships on the high seas.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

FRIDAY, March 26.

Purchasers of the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. Foor, the bill for the relief of the purchasers of public lands was taken up; the question being on certain amendments to the amendments made by the House of Representatives, proposed by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McKINLEY said that although he thought that the amendments, proposed by the Committee of the Senate, rendered the bill somewhat better than it was, as it came from the House of Representatives, yet, as it had been delayed so long, he thought it would do more good to the people for whose relief it was intended, to pass it and reject the amendments, than farther to delay the bill. This was his wish, and he hoped the Committee on Public Lands would consent to it. After some farther remarks from Mr. McK. the two amendments were rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS said that, however much he regretted the necessity of retarding the progress of this bill, yet there was one amendment which he felt it his duty to propose. He regretted that the complexion of this bill had been so much changed since it passed the Senate. The whole bill had been stricken out, and the present substituted by way of amendment. The second section of the bill proposed to give a preference, in becoming the purchasers of relinquished lands, to those who had relinquished a pre-emption in favor of the persons in possession. But the conditions of this pre-emption totally destroyed the benefit intended to be conferred. It required the person purchasing under this section of the bill to pay the present minimum price, and in addition thereto the amount paid before relinquishment, subject to thirty-seven and a half per cent. on the last-mentioned sum, provided that the whole amount shall not in any case exceed three dollars and fifty cents per acre. Now, (said Mr. H.,) this is worse than the law as it now stands. As the law now is, the person in possession, it is true, must go into market and compete with others; but nobody will bid against him, and the result will be that the person in possession will get the lands he relinquished, at one dollar and twenty five cents per acre. This section, however valuable it might be to other portions of the Union, brought no relief to the people he had the honor to represent. The effect of this provision would be to keep the relinquished lands so much longer out of market, for nobody would take the pre-emption given where the lands had originally been purchased at the minimum price, and where they can, after the termination of the prescribed time, be had at the present minimum price. Mr. H. then moved to amend the second section of the bill, by inserting in the 27th line, at the close of the first proviso, the following words:

"And that the persons aforesaid, in all cases where the lands relinquished were originally purchased at the minimum price, shall have the right of pre-emption, as aforesaid, on payment of the present minimum price."

Mr. McKINLEY said that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana (Mr. HENDRICKS) had his entire approbation, if the whole bill could be made to conform to it. But if he would examine, he would find this amendment in opposition to the whole policy of the bill. Many attempts had been made in Congress to relieve those who had relinquished their lands, and applied the payments made thereon to other lands retained. Several bills had passed the Senate for that purpose, and the great difficulty had always been in reducing lands which had originally sold at two dollars an acre, under the credit system, to one dollar and twenty-five cents, the minimum price under the cash system. The subject had often been referred to the Commission of the General Land Office, and he had invariably refused his sanction to any bill which did not give the Treasury one dollar and twenty-five cents in addition to the first instalment. The present bill was submitted to him, which makes the minimum price three dollars and fifty cents; but does not relieve those who have purchased at two dollars an acre, from paying one dollar and twenty-five cents in addition to the first instalment. The relief intended by this bill for that class of purchasers is the deduction of thirty-seven and a half per cent. on the remaining instalments, and the additional advantage of taking scrip for the amount paid on all lands which did not cost more than two dollars and fifty cents per acre.

The relinquished lands are placed upon a better footing than those which had reverted, because the first instalment to be paid on those, was subjected to a discount of thirty-seven and a half per cent.; which, upon land costing but two dollars, would bring the whole amount to be paid to but one dollar fifty-six and a quarter cents. The bill was not devised by either House. It was framed to suit the views of the Land Office, and calculated for the benefit of the treasury. It would prove altogether useless to those who might derive benefit from it, if impediments were thrown in the way of its passage at this period of the session. He hoped, therefore, that gentlemen would withdraw all amendments, and suffer it to pass in the shape it had been returned from the House, rather than run the risk of losing whatever good would result from it. There were large classes of citizens who would derive benefit from the provisions of the bill as it now stood. The purchasers of public lands, who had not yet fulfilled their engagements, and those whose lands had reverted to the Government for non-payment, would receive benefit from it. He observed that, if the Senator from Indiana (Mr. H.) would examine the bill a little farther, he would find that the class of purchasers, which he wished to protect, would ultimately have to pay only one dollar and fifty-six and a quarter cents per acre, after deducting the discount provided for by the bill. He observed that it was not such a bill as he was desirous of having; but, he believed, from the discussion and the modification it had undergone in the other House, that it could not be got through that House again, if embarrassed with any farther amendments. It was true it did not suit all, but we had to take such a one as we could get; not such as we would desire.

Mr. KING said he very much regretted that his friend from Indiana had thought it necessary to offer this amendment. Our objects are the same, (said Mr. K.), we both wish to extend relief to those who have been compelled, from inability to pay, to relinquish a portion of their lands necessary to their settlement; we both wish to keep the actual cultivators of the soil from the grasp of the speculator; and, sir, I am confident, if the Senator from Indiana had examined this bill with his usual attention, he would agree with me that these objects are fully and fairly attained. What, I would ask, are the provisions of this bill? The first section gives to those whose lands have been forfeited for non-payment of the purchase money the right to purchase them at private sale for the minimum price of the Government, in addition to the amount already paid and forfeited; but in no case shall the sum to be paid exceed three dollars and fifty cents the acre; with this the Senator from Indiana is perfectly satisfied. I will say to the gentleman, that the principle of the first section of which he approves, is precisely the principle contained in the second, which he proposes to amend. No relinquished lands are to cost the purchaser more than three dollars and fifty cents the acre; this is the maximum. Take the case put by the Senator: lands which cost two dollars the acre, have been relinquished; the payment made was fifty cents; from this sum, thirty-seven and a half per cent. is to be deducted, and the remainder added to the minimum price of one dollar and twenty-five cents, which makes precisely one dollar fifty-six and a quarter cents the acre, the amount to be paid under this bill, for lands of this description. Is not my friend convinced, by this view of the provisions of this section of the bill, that he has labored under an error, when he supposed that the purchasers of two dollar lands would be compelled to pay more than the original cost? Is he not convinced that the section he proposes to amend is in strict conformity with the principle contained in the first section? And will he not, if convinced of the correctness of the view I have taken, consent to withdraw his amendment, which must, if persevered in, and with success, greatly delay the passage of this most important bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS replied that he understood the second condition of the first section of the bill more favorably to the purchasers of reverted lands than the Senator from Alabama. The case was one of sheer calculation. On the subject of reverted lands, to which the first section of the bill solely applied, the legal holder is permitted to obtain his final receipt and patent, by paying the residuary payments according to the present minimum, and on the principle of the land which expired on the 4th of July last. For instance, if there be three payments due, the purchaser gets his patent for a quarter section, on payment of one hundred and fifty dollars, where the land has originally been purchased at the minimum price. The second section applies to relinquished lands, and requires the pre-emption to pay on a quarter section the present minimum two hundred dollars, in addition to the amount paid before relinquishment, with a deduction of thirty-seven and a half per cent. on such original sum. It is manifest, then, that the purchaser of relinquished lands has much harder terms than the person paying out lands reverted. If, on the reverted quarter section, there have been two instalments paid, all that remains to be paid by the bill is one hundred dollars. If, on the relinquished quarter section there have been two instalments paid, the purchaser is required by the bill to pay the whole minimum price, two hundred dollars, and also to pay the two instalments paid before relinquishment, getting thirty-seven and a half per cent. discount on them, making in all three hundred dollars. The Senators from Alabama (said Mr. H.) admit, that in cases of relinquished lands on which there had been one payment, and where it had been originally purchased at minimum cost, it would, according to this bill, cost the purchaser one dollar and fifty six and a fourth cents per acre. Now this is exactly that of which I complain, and say it is unreasonable that these lands should cost more than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, because that is their price, if you say nothing about this in the bill; that is the present minimum. The bill will, as before said, have a tendency to keep these lands longer out of market, for nobody will give more than one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre for them. It will (said Mr. H.) be no advantage to the people I represent, unless giving a longer time for purchasers to prepare for the sales be an advantage.

Mr. McKINLEY said that, by referring to the second section of the bill, not a doubt would remain. He would read it, as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all purchasers, their heirs, or assignees, of such of the public lands of the United States as were sold on credit, and which lands have, by such persons, been relinquished under any of the laws passed for the relief of purchasers of public lands, and the amount paid thereon applied in payment of other lands retained by them, and which relinquished lands, or any part thereof, may now be in possession of such persons; or in case the certificate of purchase, and part payment of said lands, has been transferred by the persons now in the possession of said lands, or part thereof, or the persons under whom the present occupants may hold such possession, to some other person not in possession thereof, and the payment made thereon applied by such other person, or his assignee, in payment for land held in his own name: in either case, the persons so in possession shall have the right of pre-emption of the same lands, according to the legal subdivisions of sections, not exceeding the quantity of two quarter sections, [in contiguous tracts,] until the fourth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, upon their paying into the proper office the sum per acre therefor, which shall, at the time of payment, be the minimum price per acre of the United States public lands; and, in addition thereto, the same amount per acre heretofore paid thereon, and applied to other lands, subject to a deduction of thirty-seven and a half per centum on the last-mentioned sum: Provided, That the sum to be paid shall not, in any case, exceed three dollars and fifty cents per acre: Provided, also, That such persons only shall be entitled to the benefits of this section who shall apply for the same, and prove their possession to the satisfaction of the Register and Receiver of the district in which the land may lie, in the manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, within nine months from the passage of this act; for which such Register and Receiver shall each be entitled to receive from such applicants the sum of fifty cents, each: And provided further, That the provisions of this section shall not extend to any lands that have, in any manner, been disposed of by the United States."

He could not be mistaken, (Mr. McK. remarked,) because the second section provided against the difficulty apprehended by the gentleman; the cost, by any calculation, would only be one dollar and fifty-six cents per acre. Would the Senator from Indiana desire to place those who had relinquished their lands on a better footing than those who had retained them? Those who had retained their lands were certainly more meritorious than those who had relinquished, and obtained the benefit of their money in the purchase of other lands. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would see the propriety of passing the bill as it was, and abandon his amendment.

Mr. McLEAN said that, when the amendment was first proposed, he was clearly of opinion that it ought to pass. If the bill was intended to do any good to Illinois and Indiana, the amendment ought to be retained, otherwise it would only benefit the State of Alabama. With us (said Mr. McL.) land is never worth more than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, because there is much land in the market, and little demand for it. He was satisfied that the bill should pass without the amendment, as it would benefit Alabama, and do no injury to his State, except to postpone, for nine months, the purchase of relinquished lands; though the passage of the bill, with the amendment, would give to the citizens of Illinois an advance of nine months. The delay would occasion no great difficulty in his State, as one neighbor never purchased the land on which another is settled. The amendment would be a convenience to us, (said he;) for, as the bill stands, it will be of no earthly benefit to us.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. HENDRICKS was rejected.

The amendments of the House were then concurred in.

Office of the Attorney-General.

The bill "to re-organize the establishment of the Attorney-General, and erect it into an Executive Department," was taken up for a second reading.

Mr. ROWAN rose to explain the objects of the bill, which, he said, was of importance to the fiscal concerns of the country, which have occasionally been injured by reason of the incompetency of the United States District Attorneys. The Treasury would also be benefited by the enactment of the bill. It is provided that, after suit shall have been ordered in any case whatever, no Collector of a District, Clerk of a Circuit or District Court, United States District Attorney, or any other person than the Marshal of the United States, shall be authorized to receive the money from any such debtor or debtors, but in all cases payment shall be made to the Marshal of the District where the suit has taken place. The duties of the Agent of the Treasury are, by the bill, transferred to, and vested in, the Attorney-General. It has been also believed by the committee that a transfer of the Patent Office to the department of Law would be an improvement. It has been thought that all the duties connected with the Patent Office, which are now required by law to be performed by the Secretary of State, and all applications which are required to be submitted to him, ought to be performed by, and submitted to, the Attorney-General. The Secretary has now to undergo considerable inconvenience and trouble by those duties being imposed upon him, and it has been deemed proper to consign them all, by bill, to the Attorney-General. The bill also provides that the publication of the laws of the United States shall be done under the superintendence of the Attorney-General—a duty which is now assigned to the Secretary of State. The Clerk who is now charged with this duty in the State Department, is to be transferred to the Law Department. This measure has been suggested by the consideration that the Secretary of State may not be, as he is not required to be, a professional man. It is supposed that this duty can be better done by an individual who is still engaged in the profession of the law than by one who is not.

Mr. R. said he did not know whether the bill would be objected to by any gentleman. If agreed to, it would relieve the State Department from those duties which have suggested the project of establishing a Home Department, a measure urged by the former Executive. The Secretary of State will then be left to the conducting of the foreign relations of the country, while the business of the Patent Office, and the superintendence of the collection of debts due the Government, will be confined to the Head of this Department. The Attorney-General is to be the Head of the Law Department; he is required to superintend all suits in which the United States is a party; and his practice is confined to the Supreme Court—cases in inferior courts to be conducted by deputy. All the duties performed by, and all the powers and authority vested in, the Agent of the Treasury, are proposed to be transferred to the Attorney-General. We have been told (said Mr. R.) that the Government has sustained serious losses from the improper manner of collecting the revenue, and from the mode of prosecuting defaulters.

Mr. WEBSTER, in a sportive manner, warned

Mr. R. not to infringe on the secret session discussions.

Mr. ROWAN said he was not aware that he was guilty of any violation of the rules in what he said; and he then proceeded to state the evils resulting from the present mode of collecting the revenue, and of instituting suits against delinquents. These evils the bill was intended to remedy. The Attorney-General is now a member of the Cabinet; and this measure, if carried into effect, will not impose upon him more duties than what, as a member of the Cabinet, he is now required to discharge.

[The bill farther provided that an Assistant should be appointed by Congress to the Attorney-General, who was also to act as Chief Clerk in the Law Department, at a salary of three thousand dollars per annum, besides Assistant Clerks, Messengers, &c. The salary of the Attorney-General was to be placed on a level with that of the other Heads of Departments, namely, six thousand dollars per annum.]

Mr. WEBSTER said, this was a subject which certainly required consideration. He was opposed to the objects of the bill altogether, although he agreed that the evils complained of, which it proposed to remedy, existed. The business of the Departments had outgrown the provision made for their establishment; the business had outgrown what the organization of the Departments contemplated, especially that of the State Department; and so far as the bill proposed to remedy this evil, the objects of it were justifiable. But it proposes to transfer the duties of the Patent Office, with its clerks and officers to the Attorney-General—to the Law Department. Mr. W. objected to any measure which would give this anomalous, this ambiguous character to the Attorney-General, while he was at the same time shut out from practising in any other than the Supreme Court of the United States. You would thus (said Mr. W.) turn him into a half accountant, a half lawyer, a half clerk—in fine, a half of every thing, and not much of any thing. The true course will be, to have a Home Department, if you choose to call it by that name; a Department, he meant, for the management of the internal affairs of the country. This subject had hitherto undergone discussion, and was referred to a Select Committee, of which he, in company with the Senator from Louisiana, (Mr. JOHNSTON,) had the honor to be a member. We recommended the organization of a Home Department, leaving the Attorney-General as he is, a lawyer, to attend to the business of the Government in the Supreme Court. Mr. W. said he was also opposed to the provision of the bill transferring the duties and powers of the Agent of the Treasury to the Attorney-General. The subordinate collectors of moneys ought to be attached to the Treasury; whoever is concerned in collecting the revenue ought to be under the Treasury Department, the Agent of which is one of the most important and useful officers we have. It requires a professional man—an appropriate character to fill it. The Agent of the Treasury has a jumble of duties to perform; he has to superintend all the light-houses, &c., on the coast, and, in addition, is Agent for the Treasury in collecting the public debts. His (Mr. W.'s) object was to give force and efficiency to that office. He and a gentleman, formerly a member of the other House, who is now abroad, reported at one time a bill to establish an office to be called that of "Commissioner of Customs." Our object was to have appointed a competent man, who understood the laws, and could supervise the collection of the revenue—one who would be qualified to see that these laws received a uniform construction: for this was not, nor is it now, the case. Under the same law, different regulations had, to his own knowledge, been adopted in the custom-houses of New York and Boston. The Boston Collector gave it one interpretation; the New York Collector gave it another; and the Treasury gave it a different interpretation from both, or, he believed, no interpretation at all. To tell the truth, the honorable gentleman to whom he alluded and he (Mr. W.) gave up the project, for already, in that stage of it, we had numerous applicants for the office, none of whom were competent to fill it. Every one who had lost a place of any description, who had been removed from a land office, or any other office, all who wanted employment in general or particular, were candidates for the situation of Commissioner of Customs. But our object being to appoint a competent man, we had to abandon the measure. The Attorney-General had, in Mr. W.'s opinion, enough to do in the Supreme Court. He should be engaged in studying his books of law, instead of superintending the Clerks of either a Patent or Treasury office. He had not, he said, when he rose, any intention of occupying the Senate so long; his object was to ask the gentleman who reported the bill to consent to a postponement of the consideration of it, and appoint for it a particular day. It was necessary that some provision should be made to remedy the evils complained of, although he was opposed to the present bill. He would, when the subject was brought before the Senate again, take up the report accompanying the bill, to which he had adverted.

Friday next was then fixed upon for considering the bill.

FRIDAY, April 2.

Mr. Foot's Resolution—Nullification.

MR. JOSIAH S. JOHNSTON, of Louisiana said: The right of a State in this Union to annul an act of Congress (said Mr. J.) presents a grave question to our consideration. It is a question of the first impression, and deepest import; which ought not to be discussed under the excitement of party spirit, the influence of passion, or the peculiar circumstances in which any of us may find ourselves. It should be approached under a deep sense of the momentous consequences to the people, to the Union, and to the country it involves.

I shall speak on this question, not as a lawyer and a statesman—that has been done already, in an able and masterly manner—I shall speak of it as a man and a citizen, whose hopes and happiness are embarked with those of his constituents in this great experiment, "the world's last hope."

It is now said that the individual States have a veto on the laws, and, thereby, a power to suspend their operation, by which this Government is made to depend upon the will of each and every State. The right of States to annul the laws and suspend the operations of the Government is not derived from the constitution, but is a high and transcendental power, above the constitution and above all law; it is an abstraction from the idea of sovereign power, and a refinement on the theory of Government. The people of the States have not delegated this veto to the Legislatures; it is a judicial, and not a legislative power; if it pertains to the sovereign power of the State, it must be a reserved power to the people, to be exercised by them in their sovereign capacity. But, whether a State, or the people of a State, have the right to a negative on the laws, is a question to be determined, by whom? By the State? That is to be the judge in its own cause. Or, to be submitted to the majority of the people of all the States? or, to the Supreme Court? It is a "controversy in which the United States are a party."

Admitting the power of the State, and the right to decide for herself, then each and every State in the Union has a constitutional veto on the laws of the United States; then the General Government must, or perhaps each of the States must, have a similar power to suspend the laws of any other State, when it exercises any sovereign power that is inhibited to the States, or that comes in collision with the General Government; and this also, the Government and each State must decide for itself. What a scene of confusion!

Again: each State, then, and the smallest State, with the smallest majority in the State, may suspend the laws within her jurisdiction. Then the action of the Government must depend on the concurrent will of each and all the States. Then the laws made by a majority of the people, and of the States, may be controlled, and counteracted by a small, nay, the smallest minority. The Government, if it could be so called, would be absurd in theory, and impracticable in principle.

By the constitution, checks and balances were provided; majorities required; a veto conferred on the President; and a Supreme Court, to decide all questions under the constitution. All which were ridiculous precautions, if each State could exercise the veto, decide all questions for herself, and annul the expressed will of the majority. And what then becomes of the great political maxim, "that absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority—the vital principle in republics—from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and the immediate parent of despotism!"

If this veto is the legitimate right of a State, she ought not to be controlled, resisted, or coerced. She may therefore peaceably withdraw from the Union, and must virtually dissolve the Union, because the laws must cease to operate, (the tariff for example,) unless they operate throughout; and besides, could the Union continue, separated by an intervening State? This Union can then only exist as long as twenty-four States concur in opinion. If this principle is true, it ought to have been inserted in the constitution. But it was not. And if the principle is acknowledged, then this constitution was not only imperfect in its organization, but is a political monster, born incapable of living, and containing a principle of self-destruction.

The Union must dissolve peaceably, whenever the caprice, the passion, or the ambition, of a few aspiring men of a State may will it, or it must be maintained by force. It is either disunion or civil war; or, in the language of the times, disunion and blood.

But we are told no such consequences will ensue. That it is a safe remedy—a necessary check—a salutary restraint upon this uncontrolled majority—a new balance in the constitution, that will regulate all its notions. As soon as this new State power is acknowledged, there will be no more unconstitutional laws, no further encroachments on the rights of the States. "The injured and oppressed States will assume her highest political attitude." She exercises her negative preventive power, she declares the law void—"the necessary consequence," says the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Grundy,) "is, it must cease to operate in the State, and Congress must acquiesce, by abandoning the power, or obtain an express grant from the great source from which all power is drawn. The General Government would have no right to use force." "This will at all times prove adequate to save this glorious system of ours from disorder and anarchy." The parties claiming to exercise the power must call a convention of the States, and unless three-fourths of the States will consent to amend the constitution, and confer the power, it must cease to exercise it. Thus a law passed in the usual form, with majorities in both Houses, approved by the President, may be annulled, by the veto of any State, and every power taken from Congress, unless three-fourths of the States are now willing to grant it. Let us see how this will operate. Suppose the twenty-fifth section of the Judiciary act annulled, the jurisdiction of the court over all cases provided for by it must cease. Again, the tariff has been declared a palpable violation of the constitution; it must, therefore, cease to operate; then the Supreme Court must not take any cognizance of any case arising under it, and Congress must not employ force; it is therefore unnecessary to resist the laws, and there will be no rebellion or treason. But then there will be no revenue. Congress has a right to lay duties for revenue. How much of this tariff is for revenue? for so much it is constitutional, as well as duties on articles not made in the country, and therefore not for the protection of domestic industry. What must be done in such a dilemma?

Every power which has been at any time denied to Congress would have ceased. The Bank, after it had gone into operation, would have been compelled to shut its doors, and close the concern. All crimes not enumerated in the constitution would be stricken from the statute book; the embargo would have been declared inoperative; the 25th section of the Judiciary act would have been rendered void; the Cumberland road, and subscriptions to canals, grants of land, and all internal improvement, would have been suspended on the veto of a single State. The Judiciary law could not have been repealed, and Louisiana and Florida could not have been acquired.

Such is the vis inertia, that it is extremely difficult to get more than a bare majority for any measure. Some do not like its principle or its policy: some are indisposed to change: some do not like the time or the mode of proposing it. There are always reasons enough for opposing any proposition. Most great questions in deliberate bodies are carried by small majorities. The embargo—the war—the bank—the tariff, are striking instances. The Constitution of the United States was adopted in Virginia, 89 to 79. Her late constitution was passed by a majority of only 15. It cannot, therefore, be reasonably expected that three-fourths of the States will ever concur in granting any power to Congress that may be previously declared unconstitutional. The powers of the Government will be constantly frittered away, until it has no power to do good—no means to protect—no energy to act—no principle of union.

But is the theory true, that, when the majority has pronounced, and the presumptuous are all in favor of the law, and it is suspended at the instance of a single State, that Congress are to be presumed in error, and must obtain the sanction of three-fourths of the States? Is it not rather more compatible with the theory and principles of the Government, that the complaining party, the resisting State, should call the convention, and make the appeal, and assure herself that she is right? A majority can repeal the law, and save further trouble.

This negative is supposed to be necessary to the security of the States, and the protection of the minority; but its real operation will be to destroy the force and energy of the administration. "What may, at first sight, appear a remedy, is, in reality, a poison: to give the minority a negative upon the majority, which is always the case when more than a majority is requisite to a decision, is, in its tendency, to subject the sense of the greater number to that of the lesser. Congress, (under the confederation,) from the non-attendance of a few States, have been frequently in the situation of the Polish Diet, when a single veto has been sufficient to put a stop to all their movements. The sixtieth part of the Union has several times been able to oppose an entire bar to its operations. This is one of those refinements which, in practice, has, in effect, the reverse of what is expected from it in theory."—(Federalist.)

The wise men who framed the constitution knew, from the defects and infirmities of the confederation, what was necessary to remedy the errors and correct the evils of that system. They knew that it had been, in its operation upon States only, totally inadequate to the object of its institution; that this Government must look beyond the States, and operate directly through the agency of the people, and upon the people. They knew the necessity of a high court, to decide all questions arising under it; the want of a judiciary power crowned the defects of the confederation. "Laws are a dead letter, without courts to expound and define their true meaning and operation." "This is more necessary, when the frame of the Government is so compounded that the laws of the whole are in danger of being contravened by the laws of the parts."—(Federalist.)

They knew it was necessary to have a power to decide on all cases that contravened the authority of the Union, and to prevent the exercise of the inhibited powers by the States, and all other questions which it was foreseen might arise under the new Government. This presented a question of exceeding great difficulty; two plans were proposed, one to give power to the General Government to revise the laws of the States, and the other, the right to use force. Mr. Pinckney proposed, "to render these prohibitions effectual, the Legislature of the United States shall have power to revise the laws of the several States that may be supposed to infringe the powers exclusively delegated by this constitution to Congress, and to negative and annul such as do."

Mr. Randolph proposed—"The Legislature to negative all laws passed by the several States, contravening, in the opinion of the National Legislature, the articles of union, or any treaty, and to call forth the force of the Union against any member of the Union failing to fulfil its duty under the articles thereof."

Upon more mature consideration, however, it was determined to extend the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to all cases that could arise under the constitution, or the laws or treaties. It was essential to make the judiciary power co extensive with the legislative power.

The constitution, therefore, provided that the judicial power should extend—

1. To all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution.
2. To all cases under the laws of the United States.
3. To all cases under treaties made by them.
4. To all cases affecting ambassadors, ministers, and consuls.
5. To all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction.
6. Controversies wherein the United States are a party.
7. Controversies between two or more States.
8. Controversies between a State and citizens of another State.
9. Controversies between citizens of different States.
10. Controversies between citizens of the State claiming lands under grants of different States.
11. Controversies between a State or citizen, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects.

Here is power granted to try all imaginable cases that can be described; all cases in law and equity, admiralty, or maritime jurisdiction; all that arise under the laws and constitution, and treaties, and then it extends to all controversies in which the United States may be a party, and especially those that arise under the constitution and in execution of the laws. Cases, in general, must operate upon individuals and corporations, and not upon sovereign States. Thus, for example, under the tariff, if goods are introduced and not entered, they will be seized under the revenue laws—then it is a question in law arising under the laws of the United States: if they resist the seizure, it is opposition to the laws; the courts will proceed to judgment, and the President is authorized to call on the Executives of the States for the militia to execute the laws. If they refuse the militia, on the call of the President, then it is the Massachusetts case; if they oppose the laws by force, how will they escape the crime of treason, and how will that differ from the Western insurrection? And all these are controversies to which the United States are a party; if they enter the goods, and suit is instituted on the bond, the court will hear any defence, but they must decide, although the constitution, the power of the United States, or the sovereign power of the State, may be incidentally drawn in: when judgment is obtained, and execution issued, notwithstanding a sovereign State may be interested, by her agents, it must be executed as in the Pennsylvania case, to which I shall presently advert.

It was undoubtedly the intention of the convention to constitute a Supreme Court to decide all questions of law or sovereignty, and the words are as general and as ample as the language admits. But, in addition to this, it is the duty of the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and Congress have power to provide, and they have provided, that the President may call forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. Besides, the Congress have power to suspend the habeas corpus in cases of rebellion and invasion. This superintending power of the Government was understood perfectly by the framers of it. To secure the citizens of the respective States from being punishable as traitors to the United States, when acting expressly in obedience to the authority of their own State, it was proposed, in the convention, to add: "Provided that no act or acts done by one or more of the States against the United States, or by any citizen of any one of the United States, under the authority of one or more, shall be deemed treason, or punished as such; but, in case of war being levied by one or more of the States, against the United States, the conduct of each party towards the other and their adherents, respectively, shall be regulated by the laws of war and of nations"—which was not adopted; which sufficiently explains the views of the convention. But, after the adoption of the constitution, the State of North Carolina proposed as an amendment, that no State should be declared in rebellion but by the consent of two-thirds of the States present—which was also not adopted.

If this is the true interpretation of the meaning of the constitution, they will take upon themselves a heavy responsibility who undertake, upon a mere abstract theory of right, to resist or to interfere with the regular and legal operations and functions of the different branches of the Government, at the will and pleasure of the States. Having entered into civil society, and distributed the power into different hands, they contract the obligation of obedience; they are bound by the constitution which they have sworn to support.

This question is reduced to a narrow compass. The right to resist a usurpation, or a tyranny, is not denied; the right to use all the peaceful modes of redress, not doubted. It has been admitted that the Supreme Court may decide all cases between individuals. But it is said the States now claim the right to decide when the General Government exceed their authority, because that is a sovereign power. I have endeavored to show that the power to decide all questions under the constitution has been conferred on the Supreme Court; and, if so, the question is concluded, whatever may be the form of the Government.

If this is a pure and simple confederation of States, they are bound by the constitution, by all they have stipulated, and they are obliged by their duty and by their oath to submit to the court all matters of which they have jurisdiction; that is, every case arising under the constitution and laws, and every controversy to which the United States are a party; and they are, moreover, bound to show that, to decide on the unconstitutionality of a law is an exception, and not included in this grant; they are bound to show that, in such a union of States, for certain great objects, each State has a right to decide, definitely, for herself when the power is exceeded. The convention intended to provide for all cases that could occur; if they have failed to remedy the evil that was foreseen, they have made a Government which, instead of being a splendid fabric of human invention, is utterly impracticable, and which must exist only by the forbearance of the States.

This was the defect of the confederation; it had not the sanction of the people; it was ratified only by the State Legislatures; and, therefore, reasoning from these theories of Government, it was said each Legislature had a right to repeal the law, and thereby annul the confederation. It is said, in reply to this, in the Federalist:

"However gross a heresy it may be to maintain that a party to a compact has a right to revoke that compact, the doctrine itself has had respectable advocates. The possibility of a question of this nature proves the necessity of laying the foundations of the National Government deeper than in the mere sanction of delegated authority. But the fabric of American Empire ought to rest on the solid basis of the consent of the people. The streams of national power ought to flow immediately from the pure original fountain of all legitimate authority."

The right of a State to annul a law of Congress must moreover depend on their showing that this is a mere confederation of States; which has not been done, and cannot be said to be true, although it should not appear to be absolutely a Government of the people. It is by no means necessary to push the argument, as to the character of the Government, to its utmost limit; the ground has been taken, and maintained with great force of reasoning, that this Government is the agent of the supreme power, the people. It is sufficient for the argument that this is not a compact of States; it may be assumed that it is neither strictly a confederation nor a National Government: it is compounded of both—it is an anomaly in the political world—an experiment growing out of our peculiar circumstances—a compromise of principles and opinions—it is partly federal, partly national.

"The proposed constitution is, in strictness, neither national nor federal; it is a composition of both; in its foundation, it is federal, not national; in the sources from which the ordinary powers of the Government are drawn, it is partly federal, partly national; in the operation of these powers, it is national, not federal; in the mode of amendment, it is neither wholly federal nor wholly national."
—(Federalist.)

This was the great question solved by the convention: whether this Government should be a confederation, founded on an equality of States, or a Union, upon the principle of population. The large States contended for a representation of the people, the small States for equality of States. The parties were nearly balanced, and upon this ground the great struggle was conducted. A majority of the people could not consent to be governed by a minority in the great concerns of this Government; while the small States thought their safety consisted in maintaining their equal share of the power. A majority of the convention was in favor of the popular principle; the House of Representatives was formed upon a representation of the people; the States were equally divided in the formation of the Senate, which led to a compromise, by which that branch was formed on the principle of equality of States, and the election of President was rendered, in the first instance, popular, but upon a compound principle, growing out of the compromise. The confederation was abandoned, as too defective to remedy; the federative principle was retained, so far as to protect the rights of the small States, while it preserved those of the people of the large States, by the division and organization of the Legislative department, by which no law or treaty can be made without the concurrence of a majority of the people and of the States. The rights of both were farther protected by the veto of the Executive. The States are a part of the machinery of the Government, and constitute one great whole, and "a more perfect Union," under the style of "We the people of the United States." This Government, thus constituted for certain purposes, acts for the people collectively, and directly upon the people of the Union, without any reference to the States. It does not act by States, or upon the States. It levies taxes, imposts, and duties, upon the people; it administers justice in the States, upon individuals; it commands the militia, &c. Now, having entered into this Government, by whatever name it may be known, so checked and balanced, with so many guards and precautions, what is the principle upon which it is founded? Certainly, that a majority of the people and of the States should pass all laws, and that these should be the supreme laws of the land, and that every question of power under the constitution and laws should be decided by the Supreme Court.

This, I think, has been shown by the substitution of the Supreme Court in the place of the other modes recommended, to give Congress the control of the State laws: by giving, in express terms, jurisdiction of all controversies in which the United States are a party; by the cotemporaneous construction of the constitution in the Judiciary Act; by declaring the laws supreme; by giving the President power to call out the militia, and making it his duty to execute the laws. The court has uniformly exercised jurisdiction, which has been approved, on an open appeal to the States. The President has carried the judgments, by force, into effect. The State tribunals have acknowledged the authority, and such is now the opinion of three-fourths of the people and of the States of this Union.

It was believed, by those who framed the constitution, that the laws would be supreme, and would be enforced by the National Judiciary. Mr. Monroe, in his Message, in December, 1824, says, the Supreme Court "decides, in the last resort, on all great questions which arise under our constitution, involving those between the United States, individually, between the States and the United States." Chief Justice Spence, 19 Johnson 164, says, "I consider that court as paramount, when deciding on an article of the constitution, and an act of Congress passed under its express injunction."

In the case of Cohens vs. Virginia, "It (the counsel) maintains that, admitting the constitution and laws to have been violated by the judgment, it is not in the power of the Government to apply a corrective. They maintain that the nation does not possess a department capable of restraining, peaceably, and by authority of law, any attempts which may be made, by a part, against the legitimate powers of the whole; and that the Government is reduced to the alternative of submitting to such attempts, or of resisting them by force; they maintain that the Constitution of the United States has provided no tribunal for the final construction of itself, or of the laws or treaties of the nation, but that this power may be exercised, in the last resort, by the courts of every State in the Union." The court, however, decided in favor of the power of the court.

It has been objected by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) that a bare majority of the Supreme Court may decide the most important questions of State rights. The answer is, that no provision was made in the constitution; none was thought necessary. It is in the power of Congress at all times to change it, and to require a large majority. This has been tried, and always resisted.

It is objected, that, when the court is composed of seven, there may be three on each side, and one may decide; but this is favorable to the States: for if they affirm the constitutionality of a law, they only sanction what has been previously declared by all the other branches of the Government. If a majority of one member decides against the law, his opinion countervails the weight of all the majority by which the law was passed; so that, when the constitutionality of a law is doubted, a single member, when there is a disagreement, may decide against the power of the Government. If more than a majority are required to declare a State law unconstitutional, by parity of reason, more than a majority must be required to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional.

Having examined the question upon principle, let us see if there is any precedent or authority for it. I believe there are but two gentlemen who have avowed the opinion. The gentleman from New Hampshire marched boldly up to the very boundary of the question and stopped short; he refused to vouch for the nullifying power, by which I infer it is not, in his opinion, the true democratic doctrine.

There is no precedent except the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions; they are merely declaratory that the States are parties to the compact, and that, in case of a palpable, dangerous, and deliberate violation of the constitution, the State has a right to interpose. But how? By annulling the law? No; but by declaring the act of Congress unconstitutional, and referring the question to the other States. It is a protest on the part of the State, and an appeal from Congress to the State authorities, who are also parties. The last Virginia resolution is in these words, after expressing the most sincere affection for their brethren of the other States: "The General Assembly doth solemnly appeal to the like dispositions of the other States, in confidence that they will confer with this Commonwealth in declaring, as it does hereby declare, that the acts aforesaid are unconstitutional, and that the necessary and proper measures will be taken by each, for co-operating with this State, in maintaining, unimpaired, the authorities, rights, and liberties, reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people;" and for this purpose they were transmitted to the several States.

In the debate, Mr. Mercer said: "The State believed that some of its rights had been invaded by the late acts of the General Government, and proposed a remedy, whereby to obtain a repeal of them. The plan contained in the resolutions appeared the most advisable; force was not thought of by any one." "Nothing seemed more likely to produce a temper in Congress for a repeal, than a declaration similar to the one before the committee, made by a majority of States, or by several of them." "We do not wish," (said Mr. M.), "to be the arm of the people's discontent, but to use their voice." "They (the States) can readily communicate with each other in the different States, and unite their common forces for the protection of their common liberty." Mr. Barbour said: "The gentleman from Prince George had remarked, that these resolutions invited the people to insurrection and to arms; but, if he could conceive that the consequences foretold, would grow out of the measure, he would become its bitterest enemy;" "but it would appear by reference to the leading feature in the resolutions, which was their being addressed, not to the people, but to the sister States, praying, in a pacific way, their co-operation in arresting the tendency and effect of unconstitutional laws."

General Lee said: "If the law was unconstitutional, he admitted the right of interposition; nay, it was their duty; every good citizen was bound to uphold them in fair and friendly exertions to correct an injury so serious and pernicious."

But the object of these resolutions is more clearly and explicitly set forth by Mr. John Taylor, who introduced the resolutions. In his reply to the apprehensions of civil commotion, to which the resolutions were said to have a tendency, he said: "Are the republicans possessed of fleets and armies? if not, to what could they appeal for defence and support? To nothing but public opinion; if that should be against them, they must yield. They had uttered what they conceived to be truth, in firm, yet decent, language; and they had pursued a system which was only an appeal to public opinion."

He maintained that the fifth article of the constitution had provided a remedy against encroachments, by Congress on the States, and upon the rights of each other. By the article, "two-thirds of Congress may call upon the States for an explanation of any such controversy as the present, by way of amendment to the constitution, and thus correct an erroneous construction of its own acts, by a minority of the States, while two-thirds of the States are also allowed to compel Congress to call a convention, in case so many should think an amendment necessary for the purpose of checking the unconstitutional acts of that body." He said, "the will of the people and the will of the States were made the constitutional referee in the case under consideration. The State was pursuing the only possible and ordinary mode of ascertaining the opinion of two-thirds of the States, by declaring its own, and asking theirs. He hoped these reprobated laws would be sacrificed to quiet the apprehensions even of a single State, without the necessity of a convention, or a mandate from three-fourths of the States. He said, "firmness and moderation could only produce a desirable coincidence between the States." "Timidity would be as dishonorable as the violent measures, which gentlemen on the other side recommended in cases of constitutional infractions, would be immoral and unconstitutional."

Thus it appears that there is nothing in these resolutions that looks to the right of the State of Virginia herself to annul an act of Congress; on the contrary, it is the very reverse. It is a declaration, that the law, in their opinion, violates the constitution; that the State has a right, as a party to the compact, to interpose, by referring it to the consideration of the other parties to the compact: the language is too plain, and too explicit, to require comment.

Two very important amendments were introduced, which evinced still farther that it was not their intention to annul the laws, or to claim the right to interpose in that way. The first was: they declared, in the first of the resolutions, that the alien and sedition laws were unconstitutional, and not law, but utterly null and void, and of no force or effect. These nullifying expressions were stricken out, upon the motion of Mr. Taylor himself. They were, no doubt, originally inserted merely to express the opinion that the necessary effect of their being unconstitutional was that they were not law, and null and void; but it is evident it was not in the contemplation of the Legislature or of the author of them, that the Legislature, who was merely submitting the subject by way of appeal to the other States, could make the laws void by their declaration. Mr. Taylor said the plan proposed might eventuate in a convention. He did not admit or contemplate that a convention might be called; he only said that, if Congress, upon being addressed to have the laws repealed, should persist, they might, by a concurrence of three-fourths of the States, be compelled to call a convention. The second amendment was in the third clause: "The compact in which the States alone are parties." The word alone, stricken out on the motion of Mr. Giles. It had been said that the people only were the parties to the compact, and the resolution declared that States alone were parties. Mr. Giles said, "the General Government was partly of each kind;" and, therefore, moved to strike out alone.

The opinion of Mr. Jefferson, which has been quoted in this debate, relative to calling a convention, the proper arbiter in questions of sovereignty, correspond with those of the Legislature. In his letter to W. C. Nicholas, in September, 1799, then about to proceed to Kentucky, directing what was necessary to avoid the inference of acquiescence, and to procure a concert in the general plan of action, he recommended resolutions, first, answering the committee of Congress and the States that replied: second, making protestation against the precedent and principle, and reserving the right of making this palpable violation of the Federal compact the ground of doing in future whatever we might now rightfully do, should repetitions of these and other violations of the compact render it expedient: third, expressing, in affectionate and conciliatory language, our warm attachment to the Union with our sister States, and to the instrument and principles by which we are united." He says, "Mr Madison does not concur in the reservation proposed above, and from this I recede readily, not only in deference to his judgment, but because, as we should never think of separation, but for repeated and enormous violation, so these, when they occur, will be cause enough of themselves."

I hold in my hand a letter from George Nicholas, of Kentucky, in November, 1798. He was a conspicuous member of the Virginia convention—an able lawyer and statesman—a distinguished republican, and a leading and influential man, in the day of the Kentucky resolutions. I read from this letter to show the views then entertained of the remedy against unconstitutional laws. "If you had been better acquainted with the citizens of Kentucky, you would have known that there was no just cause to apprehend an improper opposition to the laws from them. The laws we complain of may be divided into two classes, those which we admit to be constitutional, but consider as impolitic, and those which we believe to be unconstitutional, and therefore, do not trouble ourselves to inquire as to their policy, because we consider them as absolute nullities. The first class of laws having received the sanction of a majority of the Representatives of the people of the States, we consider as binding on us, however we differ in opinion from those who passed them as to their policy; and although we will exercise our undoubted right of remonstrating against such laws, and demanding their repeal as far as our numbers will justify us in making such a demand, we will obey them with promptitude, and to the extreme of our abilities, so long as they continue in force. As to the second class of the unconstitutional laws, although we consider them as dead letters, and, therefore, that we might legally use force in opposition to any attempts to execute them; yet, we contemplate no means of opposition, even to those unconstitutional acts, but an appeal to the real laws of our country. As long as our excellent constitution shall be considered as sacred, by any department of our Government, the liberties of our country are safe, and every attempt to violate them may be defeated by means of law, without force or tumult of any kind." He quotes the following to Hamilton: "The complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential in a limited constitution: by a limited constitution I understand one which contains specific exceptions to the legislative authority, such, for instance, as that it shall pass no bill of attainder, no ex post facto law, and like; limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice no other way than through the medium of the courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the constitution void. Without this, all reservations of particular rights or privileges amount to nothing." "It is more rational to suppose that the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the Legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority. The interpretation of the law is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges as, a fundamental law. It therefore belongs to them to ascertain its meaning, as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be any irreconcilable variance between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents. As long, therefore, as the Federal courts retain their honesty and independence, our constitution and our liberties are safe;" "but resistance ought not to be appealed to, except in cases of extreme danger and necessity: let all good men unite their efforts to prevent the United States from being brought to that crisis."

On the 14th November, 1799, four days after this letter, the Kentucky Legislature entered its solemn protest against the laws which had been declared unconstitutional. The States of Maryland and Ohio had questions about the Bank of the United States, which were submitted to the Supreme Court. The constitutionality of the embargo, which involved an immense amount, was settled by the Supreme Court. In fine, every question that has arisen in forty years, under the constitution, has been satisfactorily settled; and they have established many great and difficult principles, which have now become the settled rule of construction and the law of the land; and they will go on in the execution of this high duty, until they are stopped by the want of power in the Executive to execute the judgments of the court, the power of a State to annul the laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

But, happily for us, this question of the power of the court, and the necessity and expediency of establishing another tribunal to decide on cases involving the sovereign power of the two Governments, has been formally submitted to the States, in a strong case, by a large State, and under the most imposing forms; and was as solemnly rejected. The State of Pennsylvania, in 1809, complained of an infringement of her State rights, by an unconstitutional exercise of power in the United States courts: that no provision had been made in the constitution for determining disputes between the General and State Governments, by an impartial tribunal, when such cases occur. The Legislature

Resolved, That from the construction which the United States courts give to their powers, the harmony of the States, if they resist encroachments on their rights, will be frequently interrupted; and if, to prevent this evil, they should, on all occasions, yield to stretches of power, the reserved rights of the States will depend on the arbitrary power of the courts."

"To prevent the balance between the General and State Governments from being destroyed, and the harmony of the States from being interrupted, Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their influence to procure an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, that an impartial tribunal may be established to determine disputes between the General and State Governments."

These resolutions were submitted to all the States. I hold in my hand the answers of nine States, refusing the proposition, to wit: Virginia, North Carolina, Maryland, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, New Jersey, Vermont, and New Hampshire, without one affirmative State.

MONDAY, April 5.

Donations to Deaf and Dumb Institutions.

On motion of Mr. MARKS, the bill making an appropriation of a township of land for the support of the New York Institution for the education of the Deaf and Dumb, was taken up for consideration.

The question being on the amendment heretofore proposed by Mr. MARKS, to embrace within the provisions of the bill the institutions in the States of Pennsylvania and North Carolina,

Mr. BURNET suggested the propriety of including the State of Ohio, which had petitioned for a similar appropriation to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum of that State.

Mr. MARKS accepted the proposition as a part of his amendment.

Mr. DICKERSON expressed a hope that his State (New Jersey) would be added to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BURNET said he would not offer any objections to this proposition. He remarked, that, to avoid the trouble of introducing separate bills in relation to each particular State, it would be well to embrace all which had institutions of this nature, already chartered, and now in full operation.

Mr. KING inquired of Mr. DICKERSON, whether a Deaf and Dumb Institution had been chartered by the Legislature of New Jersey, as this bill was intended for institutions already incorporated. If we make an appropriation for one State, why not, he asked, extend the provisions of the bill to all the States where these institutions are incorporated?

Mr. DICKERSON replied in the affirmative.

Mr. MARKS stated, that, in Pennsylvania, the institution was incorporated by the Legislature many years ago, and possesses an annuity of eight thousand dollars. There were seventy-five pupils now maintained and educated in it, some of whom were from New Jersey and Maryland. By the last census it appeared there were five hundred of this unfortunate class of persons for whom this institution was designed, in the State of Pennsylvania alone.

Mr. KING said he would move to recommit the bill, with instructions to embrace in its provisions all the States which are now omitted. He could not see why Congress should be called upon to legislate, session after session, for individual States. If it be the intention to continue such appropriations, why confine them to particular States? He moved to recommit the bill, to include all the States which now are in, and which may hereafter be admitted into, the Union.

Mr. SANFORD said the bill would be lost for this session, if now recommitted, as proposed by the gentleman from Alabama, and he hoped, although he was favorable to its objects, that he (Mr. KING) would not press his motion. If the bill be reported agreeably to the instructions, it may come before us too late to be acted upon. He therefore hoped the gentleman would consent to let it pass as it is.

Mr. BARTON moved to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a substitute embracing all the States not already provided for by such grants.

Mr. KING said the amendment offered by Mr.

BARTON perfectly answered the objects he had in view, and he would therefore withdraw his motion.

Mr. BARNARD agreed to the propriety of the proposition of Mr. BARTON, but thought the better course to pursue would be, to give these donations of lands to the States which have already incorporated institutions of this character, and to defer providing for other States until they shall have also chartered institutions. Although he was favorable to the objects of the amendment, yet, as its only tendency now would be to embarrass the bill, he hoped it would be rejected.

Mr. MCKINLEY said that, so far from the amendment embarrassing the bill, it would relieve it from all embarrassment, as the disposition of it would tend to establish one of two principles in relation to the bill itself; that is, whether the principles of it should be adopted as a general principle, or rejected altogether. This ought to be done; and if it is right to appropriate thus for one State, it is right for all; and if it is not right for all, it is not right for one. It would be incorrect to legislate in favor of any one State, as it is certain that in all the States there are some deaf and dumb people in proportion to the population of each. Let the principle be tested, he said: he would vote for the amendment, as it would have that effect.

Mr. LIVINGSTON considered it his duty to express his sentiments on this bill. By it, it is intended to make an appropriation of the public lands for the support of institutions of private charity in individual States. That was the object of the bill, and nothing else; and looking to that constitution which all are so anxious to preserve, I would ask (said Mr. L.) from what part of the constitution this authority is derived, which the bill proposes to exercise. These are public lands, to be sure; but our obligations in the disposition of them, are the same as in the appropriation of the funds of the country. The constitution says we shall dispose of the public funds for the general welfare. Of this, there are two constructions: one is, that these appropriations shall be made under certain expressed powers in the constitution which (Mr. L. said) was his construction; and the other was the liberal doctrine—that Congress has the power to appropriate for purposes not inimical to the constitution. The public lands are intended for the benefit of all—for the common benefit. Where, he asked, was the difference between the objects for which the public lands and the public funds were intended? The common benefit and the general welfare appeared to him to be synonymous. What, then, are the objects of this bill? One gentleman proposes to give a township of the public lands to one State—next it is proposed to include three other States; and lastly, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. KING) proposes to extend the provisions of the bill to all the States of the Union, and to those which may in future be admitted into it. Where, he asked, was the authority for this, but in those general words in the constitution, “the common benefit?” We cannot (said Mr. L.) make this appropriation under such a power; and if we can do it, my ideas of the constitution have been hitherto grossly erroneous. My idea is, that such subjects ought to be left to the care of the States themselves; that the public lands are intrusted to us to be disposed, not for the purpose of relieving poverty and distress, but for general, and not for particular purposes. In one State, suppose there are a certain number of destitute people, and in another State a certain number of deaf and dumb; are we to provide for each of these classes? And if for only one class, I would be glad to know what part of the constitution points out the distinction. If this bill is to be adopted, then shall we become the superintendents of the domestic concerns of the States. I would be glad to know (continued Mr. L.) why we should make an appropriation for the support of a deaf and dumb institution in New Jersey, and not of a marine hospital in any seaport town in the United States.

Mr. L. stated the course he had always pursued in reference to the disposition of the public lands, although it was possible he may have had, in some instances, unknown to himself, varied from it. With respect to the new States, he considered it was a duty Congress had to perform which it was obliged to perform by the terms of the donations of these public lands—to appropriate what was necessary to carry on the operations of these States. Next he considered it necessary to give them public lands for the maintenance of their public institutions, because we possess those lands, and have consequently stopped the sources whence they would draw taxes to enable them to support these institutions. Therefore (Mr. L. said) he always gave his vote in favor of appropriations for any reasonable purpose, when required by the States in which the lands lie. He also would vote, and had voted, for any measure which, in his judgment, would have the effect of improving the value of the public lands. The more facilities were afforded for the improvement of these lands, by canals, roads, &c., the more he thought the public treasure would be increased. Mr. L. concluded by saying he could not, in his conscience, vote for the bill, or for any of the modifications proposed, however laudable and just he admitted the objects of them to be.

Mr. MARKS said that this bill introduced no new principle. There were many precedents for it. He instanced the appropriation, made in 1818, for the support of the Connecticut Asylum for the deaf and dumb, and that made in 1826 to a similar institution in Kentucky. That was the time, he said, to have raised an opposition to the principle, and not now. He instanced also the appropriation of ten thousand dollars to the sufferers of Alexandria by the fire which some years ago took place there.

Pay of Pursers in the Navy.

[SENATE.]

There was no difference, he thought, between appropriating the proceeds of the public lands directly and the lands themselves, as in the case is proposed. That appropriation of the public money was made unanimously. He viewed this case as the gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. BARROX), that we should adopt this bill on the same principle that we make appropriations of public lands for the support of schools in the new States. We have (said Mr. M.) passed a bill appropriating three hundred thousand dollars for the benefit of Alabama, to aid her in making internal improvements, on the ground that it is also for the benefit of the United States. Would any one venture to say that the object of this bill is not more national and more for the common benefit than improvements in Alabama? He said he would vote for the bill, as it established no new principle.

Mr. HAYNE said, whenever he heard the constitution mentioned on the floor, he knew at once what its fate would be—that it would be voted down. He remembered that a venerable Senator from North Carolina formerly said that the constitution was dead and buried. He pronounced its funeral discourse, and it would be now as impossible for human talent to revive it, as it is for man to raise the dead. The gentleman from Louisiana need not expect to succeed. He (Mr. H.) did not rise to discuss the question, but to remark what will be the natural consequences of this decision. He was glad that the gentleman from Alabama moved to carry out the principle of the bill to its legitimate consequences. He proposed, if an appropriation is to be made to one State, that it be extended to all. That was just, fair, and honorable. He would be glad the provisions of the bill had been extended farther, so as to embrace every charity in the country, and to give each a township. This is the true question—the length, depth, and breadth of the principle. What difference should be made between a community and a State? It is said, nothing can be more elevated in a national point of view than to extend the blessings of education; but why not also make appropriations for lunatic asylums? why not provide for the aged and poor? He did not allude, of course, to the army and navy, (that was a different question,) but to the aged and destitute of the United States. Could any thing be more god-like than to relieve them? Why not include, also, almshouses, and go on through all the circles of public and private calamities?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MARKS) said we had given donations to people who suffered by fire in Alexandria, and asked, should any difference be made in appropriations of land and money. And are we thus (asked Mr. H.) to provide for persons who have suffered from the elements by land or sea—for all who have met with misfortune—are all to be provided for? What will this end in? The United States will then have jurisdiction of all charities in the country, and next be called upon to make appropriations for them. He said he did not mean to go into the constitutional question, but to state the principle which we must act upon hereafter, if this bill is passed. Precedents have been quoted to support the bill, which in turn will become precedent for another exercise of a greater power. He wished to explain the responsibility which gentlemen would have to act under in supporting the bill, and on the third reading of it he would call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. Foor asked a division of the amendment. He wished to separate the appropriations for institutions already chartered from those intended for future institutions.

The question on the several amendments was put, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. McKINLEY moved an amendment going to make it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to select from among the lands subject to entry at private sale the township of land granted to any State within which such lands may lie; which was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON then moved to add to the bill "and the institutions hereafter incorporated shall sell said townships within five years after their incorporation;" which was also agreed to.

Mr. NOBLE, with a view to afford the Senate further time for reflection on the amendments, moved that they should be printed, and, with the bill, laid on the table; which was agreed to—ayes 25.

WEDNESDAY, April 7.

Pay of Pursers in the Navy.

The bill "regulating the duties and providing for the compensation of pursers in the navy" being taken up for a second reading,

Mr. HAYNE, in explanation of the bill, stated the practice, which now prevails, of furnishing supplies to the officers and crews of the public armed vessels of the United States. The present mode of making the usual supplies is, said he, from the stores of the pursers, who distribute and make the necessary purchases on their own account. This practice tends to profuseness, as the purser is induced to pass off as much as he possibly can, no matter at how high a price he may lay his stores up. There were many other abuses, which, taken altogether, render a change necessary, and it is to remedy these evils in the system that the bill is recommended. It is proposed that the supplies usually furnished by pursers, shall be in future laid in by Government, under the direction of the Navy Department, and shall be committed to the care of the purser of the ship, who is to furnish them to the officers and crew, according to the accustomed mode of requisition, and at an advance of ten per cent. upon the prime cost of such supplies. Pursers are required to account and are held responsible for all supplies confided to their care; and they are also bound to give such security as will be satisfactory to the Secretary of the Navy for the faithful performance of their duties. The bill proposes to change the compensation of pursers to a fixed annual salary, which is to be graduated according to the rank of the vessel in the line. A distinction is also proposed to be made between their pay while at sea, or on land service. Those regulations have been made on just and moderate principles. The Secretary of the Navy is authorized to make such other regulations as he may consider necessary to give full effect to the provisions of the bill. These views which he had expressed, Mr. H. said, were concurred in by the Commissioners of the Navy, and it was believed, if acted upon, would promote the comfort of the crews of our armed vessels; would prevent abuses, and save money to the country.

Mr. HOLMES inquired why the supplies should not be distributed to the officers and crews at the invoice prices of them, since it was proposed by the bill to give a per annum compensation to the pursers, and why ten per cent. was fixed upon as an advance upon them?

Mr. HAYNE replied, that the committee experienced some difficulty in settling this matter, as suggested by the gentleman from Maine. He considered the per centum fixed upon as just and necessary: for, suppose (said Mr. H.) the United States ought not to make any thing in furnishing the supplies, was it not known that many articles of sea stores were perishable? The committee doubted whether ten per cent. would be sufficient to meet contingent losses. Some thought that fifteen or twenty per cent. would be little enough.

Mr. FOOT remarked, that the compensation to pursers, as specified in the fourth section of the bill, was different. It is proposed to give a purser on board of a ship of the line at the rate of two thousand five hundred dollars a year; on board of a frigate, two thousand dollars; on board of a sloop of war, one thousand six hundred dollars; and on board of any other vessel, one thousand three hundred dollars. Mr. F. said he knew no reason why a purser of a ship of the line who has the best accommodations, who undergoes no more risk than, and is liable only to the same penalty as, the purser of a frigate, should have a larger compensation; nor, on the same principle, could he see why the purser of a sloop of war should have a smaller compensation than the purser of a frigate.

In small vessels, in vessels less than half the size, and less than half the crew of the ship of the line, the penalty and risk were the same. If the object is to pay for services, they are all entitled to the same sum.

Mr. HAYNE said that the compensation was intended to be graduated on the responsibility and trust of the pursers. Is it not manifest that, in a large ship, the trouble and responsibility will be double that of a small vessel? It was this consideration which suggested the discrimination in their salaries. Whenever pursers are on shore in the discharge of their duty at a navy yard or station, the bill provides that they shall receive the same pay as pursers on board a frigate; and, while absent on leave, or waiting orders, or absent on furlough, they shall receive the same allowances made to lieutenants under the same circumstances. These were the views of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and were recommended by the Navy Commissioners as judicious regulations.

Mr. FOOT observed, in reference to that part of the fourth section which provides that each purser shall receive the same pay as when on board of his ship, while settling his accounts at the seat of Government, that, as the expenses were equal, the compensation ought to be the same.

Mr. HAYNE said it was intended to suppose the continuance of the cruise, at the end of the cruise; to consider the purser, with respect to his compensation, still on a cruise, as his labor and responsibility were the same. If the first principle (graduating the pay of pursers) was a correct one, then this followed as a legitimate consequence.

Mr. HOLMES said he was not satisfied with these reasons. If the purser of a large ship was longer settling his accounts than the purser of a small vessel, then there ought to be no discrimination.

Mr. HAYNE, in reply, referred the gentleman to the proviso in the fourth section of the bill, which limits the time of remaining at the seat of Government to one month.

Mr. DICKERSON said the bill proposed to allow pursers absent on leave, waiting orders, or on a furlough, the same pay and allowances made to lieutenants under the same circumstances. He wished to know what lieutenants did receive.

Mr. HAYNE replied that they received half pay.

Mr. DICKERSON said that abuses in this respect prevailed. He considered the allowance proposed to be given to pursers while in the navy yard, was too great. He submitted that such compensation to pursers, while not on actual service, was too great.

Mr. HAYNE said, motives of economy suggested this provision. The moment they come on shore they are attached to the navy yard, and, while absent on furlough, they are to receive the same as lieutenants, who receive but five hundred dollars while absent, &c. It was indispensable to allow them something while not at sea, in order to keep up their connection with the navy. This (said Mr. H.) is doing nothing more than we ought to do. The abuses referred to by Mr. D. would be corrected under the bill, as the Secretary of the Navy was thus empowered.

Mr. DICKERSON did not believe it was necessary to pay them so much for the purpose of keeping up their connection with the navy. They will willingly remain in the ranks without it, and he thought it was improper to pay them while off duty. That a whole corps should be paid at all times when out of service he could not agree, and would therefore vote against the provision.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend that part of the bill fixing the compensation for pursers, while settling their accounts at the seat of Government, so that each purser should, in that case, have the pay of a purser of a sloop of war. Here there was no difference in the responsibility of any, and he thought the compensation of all should be the same.

Mr. HAYNE said he would not object to this amendment. The argument was strong that the compensation of all should be as their troubles are, the same. The rate of a sloop of war was a fair medium between a ship and a schooner.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT said there was great inequality, if not injustice, in graduating the pay of pursers as proposed in the fourth section of the bill. If a purser of a frigate is to have two thousand dollars, why should so wide a distinction be made between the purser of a ship of the line, who is to receive two thousand five hundred dollars, and of a sloop of war, who is to receive only one thousand six hundred dollars? I presume, (said Mr. F.,) a purser on board of a sloop of war, on the West India station, would have great reason to complain; for although there is more responsibility as to the issuing of the supplies, yet on the bond there is the same responsibility.

Pursers ought not to be reduced in rank; but there may be pursers who have been long in the service in small vessels, and he therefore thought so great a distinction as this ought not to be kept up.

Mr. F. moved to amend the bill, so that, instead of giving, as it now proposes, one thousand six hundred dollars to the purser of a sloop of war, "and one thousand three hundred dollars to the purser of any other vessel," it should read, and "to the purser on board of a sloop of war" or "of any other vessel, one thousand five hundred dollars per annum."

Mr. HAYNE opposed this amendment. The committee had fixed upon the graduation of the pay proposed in the bill as recommended by the Navy Commissioners. He considered the rates were reasonable, and showed they were proportioned as nearly as could be to the trouble and responsibility incurred by the respective officers.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. FOOT moved to amend the same section so as to reduce the salary of a purser of a ship of the line from two thousand five hundred dollars to two thousand dollars, being the salary proposed for a purser of a frigate.

Mr. HAYNE opposed this amendment. He said there could be no better reason for reducing the salary of a purser of a ship of the line to that of the purser of a frigate, than there is for reducing the latter to that of a sloop of war. He dwelt again on the necessity of giving an excess of compensation equivalent to the greater degree of trouble and responsibility attached to the office of purser of a large vessel. The greater number of the crew of large vessels he adduced as an additional reason why regard should be had to the consequent labor that must be undergone.

Mr. FOOT considered that the pay of pursers ought not to be greater than that of the commanding officers of the navy.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said there was no principle whatever in the amendment. Take the case of collectors in New York and Baltimore; in the former place the collector has double the responsibility, and double the salary.

After a few observations from Mr. FOOT in reply,

The question on the amendment was decided in the negative.

Mr. DICKERSON said he was opposed to the difference of compensation proposed in the bill when pursers are at sea and on shore. The bill proposes to give them, when discharging their duties at the navy yard, the same pay as pursers of frigates. He considered this too much; the difference of the service did not justify such a compensation. He moved to reduce the sum to the pay of pursers of sloops of war.

Mr. WOODBURY, admitting the responsibility to be less in such cases, did not object to the reduction, on the part of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICKERSON moved to strike out the words "and while absent on leave, or waiting orders, or absent on furlough, they (pursers) shall receive the same pay and allowances made to lieutenants under the same circumstances." He thought that paying them while not in service, was too much like pensioning. He moved the amendment to try the sense of the Senate on it, although he was aware of the necessity of keeping them connected with the navy.

Mr. SHESBEE expressed a hope that the amendment would not prevail, unless it was the intention of gentlemen to drive them out of the service at once. They ought (said Mr. S.) to be kept in connection with the navy, and if you agree to this proposition, the consequences will be, they must quit the service. He trusted the Senate would not adopt it: for, if we do, we may as well say to them at once, "go—leave the service." He did not consider their proposed pay as more than reasonable and just.

Mr. DICKERSON said he would withdraw his amendment, though he did not think it required so large a sum to keep the pursers in the service.

Mr. HAYNE said, if it had been agreed to, the only effect of it would be to double the expense of the Government in this respect: for they would all, of necessity, be attached to some navy yard or station, instead of being allowed leave of absence, as heretofore. The whole bill has been suggested by considerations of reform in the department of the Government.

Mr. Foor said he might have misapprehended the bill, but he was of opinion that it was neither calculated to reform nor to decrease our expenses. The first section of the bill proposes that all articles be provided by Government, under the direction of the Navy Department. Now, any one who is at all acquainted with our foreign stations knows that it is often necessary to make purchases at foreign ports. Each ship must then have an agent, or a new department must be created—a purchasing department, Mr. F. supposed.

Mr. WOODBURY said the second section of the bill provides that, where there is no navy agent to make the necessary purchases, the purser shall be permitted to purchase any articles for the use of the crew, and then only in an emergency, and on the authority of the commanding officer; for which purchase vouchers will be required. Mr. W. stated that particular instances had occurred where their emoluments had been supposed to reach, in a year, eight or ten thousand dollars, and that a reduction would excite less general competition for the office.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, April 8.

Pay of Purser in the Navy.

The bill "regulating the duties and providing for the compensation of pursers in the navy," was taken up, and read the third time; and the question being on its passage,

Mr. Foor said that sufficient information had not been imparted to induce him to agree to the passage of this bill. He had examined into the amount of compensation now given to pursers, and he found that this bill proposed an entire change in relation to it. The number of pursers in the service, according to the blue book, is forty-three, and their compensation, at six hundred and sixty dollars per annum, the present allowance, amounts to twenty-eight thousand three hundred and eighty dollars. By this bill the compensation of the purser of a ship of the line is fixed at two thousand five hundred dollars a year, while the captain has but one thousand nine hundred and thirty dollars; and the purser of a frigate is to have two thousand dollars, which also exceeds the pay of a captain, unless he is commanding a squadron. The purser on board of a sloop of war is to have one thousand six hundred dollars, and of any other vessel one thousand three hundred dollars, both of which salaries exceed that of a master commandant, who, under the present regulations, receives but one thousand one hundred dollars. Their pay is proposed to be made greater, also, than that of a lieutenant, who only receives nine hundred and fifty dollars per annum. They are to receive, too, while not in service, the same pay as a lieutenant. Mr. F. said he could not see what possible public advantage could be derived from this alteration. The whole number of ships (he said) was twenty-five; and allowing a purser to each, the increase of expenditure, according to a calculation he made, would be thirty-three thousand three hundred dollars; the expense, according to the present system, being twenty-eight thousand three hundred and eighty, and according to the proposed plan sixty-one thousand six hundred and eighty dollars. The bill proposes an increase of pay more than one hundred per cent. of what it now is, while the officers who perform services at sea, with the exception of the captain of a squadron, receive not more than the purser of a second-rate vessel.

Mr. HAYNE said if there was any thing certain in the world, it was, that the operation of this bill would be to reduce the compensation of pursers one-half. The object of the committee was to reduce their compensation, and there was no doubt whatever but that the bill would produce that effect. Notwithstanding this, it was very true that the change would produce an additional charge on the Treasury. Mr. H. said he would explain the subject, by stating the operation of the existing and the proposed rule, and then gentlemen could decide which was the better. It has been felt as an evil, of which every one connected with the navy has complained, that the crew have been invariably divested of their entire pay by the pursers, who are authorized to lay up stores of goods, and who derive the greater part of their compensation by the sales of these goods to the sailors at advanced prices.

The United States, as has been observed, allow a compensation to the pursers; but this is not their only compensation; it is the smallest part of it. They are permitted (said Mr. H.) to carry out stores, and sell them at a profit to the ship's company; and although attempts have been made to regulate these profits, they have, on some articles, it is known, amounted to sixty per cent. Under this system, what must be the effect? And he would appeal to all who were connected with the navy, to those who know what effects such causes would produce on the human character. He repeated, that the purser was permitted to lay up the stores, and, to enable him to do so, money was advanced to him by the United States. By the regulations, he is authorized to sell them at a percentage; thus (Mr. H. said) making it his interest to purchase the goods at a high price, and to dispose of as much as possible. He is not dependent on his salary, but on the profits to be derived from the sale of the stores to the sailors, who are induced to purchase so much, and at so high a price, that, at the winding up of their accounts, their pay is exhausted by the purser. The operation of the law (said Mr. H.) was cruel and unjust towards these men, who were the most liable of any to be imposed upon. By the existing regulations, the purser is induced to screw from the sailor his last farthing. It was impossible (he said) to avoid frauds, under the present system. The purser had the opportunity and the means to lay up the stores at one price, and charge them at another. Mr. H. said he was not authorized to say that such a practice was general, but one case of this character had been reported by the Navy Department. It appeared on the trial of a purser, at a late court martial, that he had bought goods at one dollar and fifty cents, and sold the same at three dollars and fifty cents. The frauds of the purser were detected, he was found guilty, and cashiered. Abuses had been so interwoven in this system, that they must be practised while it continues. Mr. H. said he understood the profits of a purser, in this way, for a single year, were ten thousand dollars; and this was not improbable, for they were not required to render an account of their sales. That such abuses did prevail, no gentleman would deny. By the bill, the goods are to be purchased by the Government, under the direction of the Navy Department, and furnished to the sailors at an advance of ten per cent. instead of allowing the purser to draw from the crew ten thousand dollars beyond his pay, as in the instance he had alluded to. Why, he asked, appoint pursers at a salary of seven or eight hundred dollars, and pay them the balance out of the pockets of the poor hard-working sailors, who, of all others, required to be defended from imposition? It was an act of common justice, and it was due to our sailors, to their comfort and happiness, to protect them. Mr. H. then recapitulated his arguments of yesterday, and, in conclusion, read an extract from the report of the Navy Commissioners, in recommendation of the measure proposed.

Pay of Purser in the Navy.

Mr. Foor said there was no doubt that the emoluments of pursers would, in many instances, be reduced one-half, nor was there any more doubt that their pay, when unemployed, would be increased. He admitted the evil existed, but he considered the bill not calculated to remove it. The saving proposed by allowing the purser ten per cent., reminded him of the saving made some time ago by the Navy agent in extra postages. He was, however, in favor of the first section of the bill, but he objected to that part of the bill increasing the pay of pursers to that of the highest navy officers. As the provisions of the bill would not, in his opinion, correct the evil, and as it would cause an additional expense of thirty odd thousand dollars, if adopted, with an additional commission of ten per cent. to be allowed by the United States, he felt it his duty to oppose it.

Mr. BELL opposed the bill on the ground that neither the talents nor experience required to perform the duties of purser, or the responsibility attached to the office, justified so high a salary as the bill contemplated. Many revenue officers handle and are intrusted with more money and property than any purser, and yet have not a salary of more than one thousand dollars a year. Any person qualified to fill the office of clerk, if a man of probity, was competent to discharge the duties of purser. The situation was much sought after, as the services required were not difficult; and, if the salary was even less, we would find many anxious to accept of it, sufficiently qualified. We hear (said Mr. B.) much talk about reform and retrenchment. He would be glad, he said, to see some of it practised.

Mr. DICKERSON said he believed reform was necessary with respect to pursers; but he did not think this was the best way to effect it, by increasing their salaries. The abuses were enormous, and, to remedy them, he would suggest, to give to the pursers the salaries they have, and inflict a penalty on them for whatever abuse in office they may be guilty of. Let them sell out the goods at a fair price, and, if they behave dishonestly, discharge or cashier them, but do not raise their salaries. What reason, he asked, was there for raising them to the grade of lieutenants, when not on service? Is it because they have heretofore made too much, and we do not like to reduce them at once? Is it through a desire to save, not the United States, but these officers? If a proper accountability were enforced, the power of the Department would reach them; and he believed their present compensation was amply sufficient without increasing it. Applications for this office were numerous, and it was generally thought that the office of purser is the direct road to fortune. Although believing it to be the intention of the committee to produce a reform of these abuses, yet considering the bill ineffectual for that object, he would vote against its passage; and, as he wished to record his name, he asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TAZEWELL said he would vote for the bill, because it was recommended by the Navy Commissioners, although he had himself but little confidence in the success of the experiment. He had proposed to alter the rations, and to assimilate them to those of the French or British navy, which, if done, would render this officer, if at all necessary, merely a commissary, and would make the seamen more secure, and frauds less frequent; but others, more conversant with the matter than he was, recommended this bill, and he was willing to make the experiment. This was not a new plan. Complaints like the present had been formerly made in relation to the issuing of tobacco—a very important article in the consumption of sailors. The pursers had been in the habit of purchasing tobacco at high prices, charging accordingly, and made enormous profits. The Government, to remedy the evil, purchased the tobacco for each ship, and, in most cases, the tobacco, in a few months, became damaged, was condemned, and the purser had to purchase more. Such will be the case here, he feared; and lay up stores how and when you will, they will become damaged, and be condemned, and somebody must buy others in their stead, and that somebody will be the purser. But, as navy officers of experience have recommended this measure, he would vote for it, although he had no confidence in it, and but little in his own plan. His proposition was to alter the component parts of the ration, so as to allow the sailors to select what luxuries they thought proper, in lieu of the unnecessarily large quantities they now receive.

Mr. HOLMES said he was disposed to try the experiment. All saw and admitted the evil. He would vote for the bill.

Mr. BENTON opposed the plan proposed, as not calculated to effect its object, although, he was sure, suggested by the best motives. He said, a similar experiment was tried to remedy the abuses and impositions practised towards the Indians by the agents appointed to deliver them their goods, on the part of the United States. That experiment cost the country three hundred thousand dollars, and, notwithstanding, this had lasted for upwards of thirty years. He recommended the practice adopted in the army. The soldiers, he said, were as subject to imposition as sailors. There they have sutlers, and the soldiers may purchase from them, or not, as they please. In reply to the objection which might be urged against this, that sailors being at sea had no choice left, but were obliged to purchase from the pursers, Mr. B. said that the average time which our vessels were absent from a port, was not more than three months—a space of time for which they could, while in port, easily provide themselves in all necessities.

Mr. HAYNE replied that, under the existing system, all admitted that evils prevailed, and that a remedy was required. When an inquiry is made as to the proper remedy—and he submitted that every gentleman wanted light on the subject—ought we not, he asked, to make application for information to those who are acquainted with the whole system, with the nature and extent of the evils, and who are competent to recommend measures to correct those evils? He thanked gentlemen for giving the Naval Committee credit for good intentions, however they have failed in carrying them into effect; but he had to inform gentlemen that at every step the Naval Committee took, they felt the want of that practical knowledge of the matter which was necessary for their progress, and had to apply for information to those experienced naval officers, the Commissioners of the Navy. It was in conformity with their suggestions and recommendations the provisions of the bill were framed, with the exception of some slight variation. The measures recommended by the gentleman from New Jersey have been resorted to, and have failed; and he would submit whether, on such subjects as this, gentlemen ought not to distrust their judgments. As to the remedy of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TAKEWELL,) to alter the rations, he did not think it inconsistent with this bill, and if he (Mr. T.) wished to offer it, there was a bill before the committee to which it could be appended. He would suggest that the President should be authorized to alter the rations from time to time, and that they should not be fixed by laws as they now are. He would not say that the rations of our navy should be the same as that of the British or French. In the British navy, the sailors are forced to drink several quarts of beer a day, to make them red-faced; and if the gentleman would look into the rations of the French navy, he did not think that he (Mr. T.) would consent to put our sailors on such and so small an allowance.

Mr. H. again stated the benefits which would result to the sailors, and to the United States, from the adoption of this bill, and then proceeded to notice the objections of Mr. BENTON; who had remarked that the experiment proposed had been tried with the Indians, and had failed. There was a wide difference, (said Mr. H.) there was no analogy whatever between the two cases. In this bill guards are proposed which will effectually prevent any abuses. The supplies are to be laid up on requisition, on the order of the Navy Department, and will be subject to inspection. An invoice of them is to be given to the commander of the ship and to the purser, who is to give a receipt for them, when confided to his care. He is then held responsible for all, and has to keep regular accounts with the officers and crew. It is thus impossible that the stores will not be laid in well, and that any frauds or imposition can take place. The situation of sailors and soldiers was, he said, quite different. The soldier may purchase from the sutler or not, as he pleases, as he has another vender to resort to; but the sailor has no such chance—there is no competition at sea—the purser has all in his power. When on shore he may act as the soldier. This bill may not (said Mr. H.) succeed; but as those most skilled in such matters advise that it will remedy an existing evil, the committee thought it their duty to lay it before the Senate.

Mr. FOOR said that the bill would cause an increase not only of the expense of pursers, but an increase of expenses, exclusive of that, to the United States. If sugar is laid up here at twelve and half cents a pound, and the vessel sails for the West Indies, there sugar of the same quality can be had for two and a half cents a pound. Slops, as they are called, can be purchased in the Mediterranean much cheaper than here; yet by each of these the United States will be a loser. He suggested to fix the premium at ten per cent. on issues, and to let the compensation of pursers stand as it now is.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that he understood the chairman of the committee (Mr. HAYNE) to state that the money was advanced by Government in long voyages. Suppose, then, that a vessel goes to the Pacific for three years, and that Government advances thirty thousand dollars, the interest on that sum would be equal to the purser's pay. In reply to what had been said by Mr. BENTON, Mr. S. said he was correct in stating that the general time of a voyage at sea was three months, but not so in stating that all a sailor had to do when he arrived in port, was to go ashore and buy what he wanted. The sailor has not money: he takes none to sea with him, and if he did, (said Mr. S.), he would throw it overboard, likely. But suppose Jack asks the purser for ten dollars; whether to go on shore for a frolic or buy a coat; the purser refuses him. Jack then says, I want a pair of boots. A sailor (said Mr. S.) never wants boots; but this case had, to his knowledge, occurred. Jack, of course, gets the boots; he is charged fifteen dollars for them; he goes on shore and sells them for two dollars, all which he spends. This (said Mr. S.) is in reply to the remedy suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, and this would be the result of it. He said he would vote for the bill.

The question was then put on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, 84 to 10.

The Indians.

The Senate resumed the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the Mississippi.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN moved to add to the bill the following:

"Sec. 9. That, until the said tribes or nations shall choose to remove, as by this act is contemplated, they shall be protected in their present possessions, and in the enjoyment of all their rights of territory and government, as heretofore exercised and enjoyed, from all interruptions and encroachments."

"Sec. 10. That, before any removal shall take place of any of the said tribes or nations, and before any exchange or exchanges of land be made as aforesaid, that the rights of any such tribes or nations, in the premises, shall be stipulated for, secured, and guaranteed, by treaty or treaties, as heretofore made."

Mr. McKINLEY then renewed the amendment which he heretofore offered to the 4th section, in the following words:

"And upon the payment of such valuation, the improvements so valued and paid for shall pass to the United States; and possession shall not afterwards be permitted to any of the same tribe."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN addressed the Senate about two hours, in continuation of his speech heretofore commenced, when he gave way for an adjournment.

FRIDAY, April 9.

Removal of the Indians.

The bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi, was resumed in Committee of the Whole, with the amendment offered by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said: I proceed to the discussion of those principles which, in my humble judgment, fully and clearly sustain the claims of the Indians to all their political and civil rights, as by them asserted. And here, I insist that, by immemorial possession, as the original tenants of the soil, they hold a title beyond and superior to the British crown and her colonies and to all adverse pretensions of our confederation and subsequent Union. God, in his providence, planted these tribes on this Western continent, so far as we know, before Great Britain herself had a political existence. I believe, sir, it is not now seriously denied that the Indians are men, endowed with kindred faculties and powers with ourselves; that they have a place in human sympathy, and are justly entitled to a share in the common bounties of a benignant Providence. And, with this conceded, I ask in what code of the law of nations, or by what process of abstract deduction, their rights have been extinguished?

Where is the decree or ordinance that has stripped these early and first lords of the soil? Sir, no record of such measure can be found. And I might triumphantly rest the hopes of these feeble fragments of once great nations upon this impregnable foundation. However mere human policy, or the law of power, or the tyrant's plea of expediency, may have found it convenient at any or in all times to recede from the unchangeable principles of eternal justice, no argument can shake the political maxim, that, where the Indian always has been, he enjoys an absolute right still to be, in the free exercise of his own modes of thought, government, and conduct.

In the light of natural law, can a reason for a distinction exist in the mode of enjoying that which is my own? If I use it for hunting, may another take it because he needs it for agriculture? I am aware that some writers have, by a system of artificial reasoning, endeavored to justify, or rather excuse the encroachments made upon Indian territory; and they denominate these abstractions the law of nations, and in this ready way the question is despatched. Sir, as we trace the sources of this law, we find its authority to depend either upon the conventions or common consent of nations. And when, permit me to inquire, were the Indian tribes ever consulted on the establishment of such a law? Who ever represented them or their interests in any Congress of nations, to confer upon the public rules of intercourse, and the proper foundations of dominion and property? The plain matter of fact is, that all these partial doctrines have resulted from the selfish plans and pursuits of more enlightened nations; and it is not matter for any great wonder, that they should so largely partake of a mercenary and exclusive spirit toward the claims of the Indians.

It is, however, admitted, sir, that, when the increase of population and the wants of mankind demand the cultivation of the earth, a duty is thereby devolved upon the proprietors of large and uncultivated regions, of devoting them to such useful purposes. But such appropriations are to be obtained by fair contract, and for reasonable compensation. It is, in such a case, the duty of the proprietor to sell; we may properly address his reason to induce him; but we cannot rightfully compel the cession of his lands, or take them by violence, if his consent be withheld. It is with great satisfaction that I am enabled, upon the best authority, to affirm, that this duty has been largely and generously met and fulfilled on the part of the aboriginal proprietors of this continent. Several years ago, official reports to Congress stated the amount of Indian grants to the United States to exceed two hundred and fourteen millions of acres. Yes, sir, we have acquired, and now own, more land as the fruits of their bounty than we shall dispose of at the present rate to actual settlers in two hundred years. For, very recently, it has been ascertained, on this floor, that our public sales average not more than about one million of acres annually. It greatly aggravates the wrong that is now meditated against these tribes, to survey the rich and ample districts of their territories, that either force or persuasion have incorporated into our public domains. As the tide of our population has rolled on, we have added purchase to purchase. The confiding Indian listened to our professions of friendship: we called him brother, and he believed us. Millions after millions he has yielded to our importunity, until we have acquired more than can be cultivated in centuries—and yet we crave more. We have crowded the tribes upon a few miserable acres on our Southern frontier: it is all that is left to them of their once boundless forests: and still, like the horse-leech, our insatiated cupidity cries, give! give!

Before I proceed to deduce collateral confirmations of this original title, from all our political intercourse and conventions with the Indian tribes, I beg leave to pause a moment, and view the case as it lies beyond the treaties made with them: and aside also from all conflicting claims between the confederation, and the colonies, and the Congress of the States. Our ancestors found these people, far removed from the commotions of Europe, exercising all the rights, and enjoying the privileges, of free and independent sovereigns of this new world. They were not a wild and lawless horde of banditti, but lived under the restraints of government, patriarchal in its character, and energetic in its influence. They had chiefs, head men, and councils. The white men, the authors of all their wrongs, approached them as friends—they extended the olive branch; and, being then a feeble colony and at the mercy of the native tenants of the soil, by presents and professions, propitiated their good will. The Indian yielded a slow, but substantial confidence; granted to the colonists an abiding place; and suffered them to grow up to man's estate beside him. He never raised the claim of elder title: as the white man's wants increased, he opened the hand of his bounty wider and wider. By and by, conditions are changed. His people melt away; his lands are constantly coveted; millions after millions are ceded. The Indian bears it all meekly; he complains, indeed, as well he may; but suffers on; and now he finds that this neighbor, whom his kindness had nourished, has spread an adverse title over the last remains of his patrimony, barely adequate to his wants, and turns upon him, and says, "away! we cannot endure you so near us! These forests and rivers, these groves of your fathers, these fire-sides and hunting grounds, are ours by the right of power, and the force of numbers." Sir, let every treaty be blotted from our records, and in the judgment of natural and unchangeable truth and justice, I ask, who is the injured, and who is the aggressor? Let conscience answer, and I fear not the result. Sir, let those who please, denounce the public feeling on this subject as the morbid excitement of a false humanity; but I return with the inquiry, whether I have not presented the case truly, with no feature of it overcharged or distorted? And, in view of it, who can help feeling, sir? Do the obligations of justice change with the color of the skin? Is it one of the prerogatives of the white man, that he may disregard the dictates of moral principles, when an Indian shall be concerned? No, sir. In that severe and impartial scrutiny which futurity will cast over this subject, the righteous reward will be, that those very causes which are now pleaded for the relaxed enforcement of the rules of equity, urged upon us not only a rigid execution of the highest justice, to the very letter, but claimed at our hands a generous and magnanimous policy.

Standing here, then, on this unshaken basis, how is it possible that even a shadow of claim to soil, or jurisdiction, can be derived, by forming a collateral issue between the State of Georgia and the General Government? Her complaint is made against the United States, for encroachments on her sovereignty. Sir, the Cherokees are no parties to this issue; they have no part in this controversy. They hold by better title than either Georgia or the Union. They have nothing to do with State sovereignty, or United States sovereignty. They are above and beyond both. True, sir, they have made treaties with both, but not to acquire title or jurisdiction; these they had before—ages before the evil hour to them, when their white brothers fled to them for an asylum. They treated to secure protection and guarantee for subsisting powers and privileges; and so far as those conventions raise obligations, they are willing to meet, and always have met, and faithfully performed them; and now expect from a great people, the like fidelity to plighted covenants.

I have thus endeavored to bring this question up to the control of first principles, I forget all that we have promised, and all that Georgia has repeatedly conceded, and, by her conduct, confirmed. Sir, in this abstract presentation of the case, stripped of every collateral circumstance—and these only the more firmly established the Indian claims—thus regarded, if the contending parties were to exchange positions; place the white man where the Indian stands; load him with all these wrongs, and what path would his outraged feelings strike out for his career? Twenty shillings tax, I think it was, imposed upon the immortal Hampden, roused into activity the slumbering fires of liberty in the old world, from which she dates a glorious epoch, whose healthful influence still cherishes the spirit of freedom. A few pence of duty on tea, that invaded no fireside, excited no fears, disturbed no substantial interest whatever, awakened in the American colonies a spirit of firm resistance; and how was the tea tax met, sir? Just as it should be. There was lurking beneath this trifling imposition of duty, a covert assumption of authority, that led directly to oppressive exactions. "No taxation without representation" became our motto. We would neither pay the tax nor drink the tea. Our fathers buckled on their armor, and, from the water's edge, repelled the encroachments of a misguided cabinet. We successfully and triumphantly contended for the very rights and privileges that our Indian neighbors now implore us to protect and to preserve to them. Sir, this thought invests the subject under debate with most singular and momentous interest. We, whom God has exalted to the very summit of prosperity—whose brief career forms the brightest page in history; the wonder and praise of the world; freedom's hope, and her consolation; we, about to turn traitors to our principles and our fame—about to become the oppressors of the feeble, and to cast away our birthright! Sir, I hope for better feelings.

It is a subject full of grateful satisfaction, that, in our public intercourse with the Indians, ever since the first colonies of white men found an abode on these Western shores, we have distinctly recognized their title; treated with them as owners, and in all our acquisitions of territory, applied ourselves to these ancient proprietors, by purchase and cession alone, to obtain the right of soil. Sir, (said Mr. F.,) I challenge the record of any other or different pretension. When, or where, did any assembly or convention meet which proclaimed, or even suggested to these tribes, that the right of discovery contained a superior efficacy over all prior titles?

And our recognition was not confined to the soil merely. We regarded them as nations—far behind us indeed in civilization, but still we respected their forms of government—we conformed our conduct to their notions of civil policy. We were aware of the potency of any edict that sprang from the deliberations of the council fire; and when we desired lands, or peace, or alliances, to this source of power and energy, to this great lever of Indian government we addressed our proposals—to this alone did we look; and from this did we expect aid or relief.

I now proceed, very briefly, to trace our public history in these important connections. As early as 1763, a proclamation was issued by the King of Great Britain to his American colonies and dependencies, which, in clear and decided terms, and in the spirit of honorable regard for Indian privileges, declared the opinions of the crown and the duties of its subjects. The preamble to that part of this document which concerns Indian affairs, is couched in terms that cannot be misunderstood. I give a little extract: "And whereas it is just and reasonable and essential to our interests and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories, as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them or any of them as their hunting grounds," therefore, the Governors of colonies are prohibited, upon any pretence whatever, from granting any warrants of survey, or passing any patents for lands, "upon any lands whatever, which, not having been ceded or purchased, were reserved to the said Indians;" and, by another injunction in the same proclamation, "all persons whatever, who have either wilfully or inadvertently seated themselves upon any lands, which, not having been ceded to, or purchased by the crown, were reserved to the Indians as aforesaid, are strictly enjoined and required to remove themselves from such settlements."

This royal ordinance is an unqualified admission of every principle that is now urged in favor of the liberties and rights of these tribes. It refers to them as nations that had put themselves under the protection of the crown; and adverting to the fact that their lands had not been ceded or purchased, it freely and justly runs out the inevitable conclusion, that they are reserved to these nations as their property; and forbids all surveys and patents, and warns off all intruders and trespassers. Sir, this contains the epitome of Indian history and title. No king, colony, State, or territory, ever made, or attempted to make, a grant or title to the Indians, but universally and perpetually derived their titles from them. This one fact, that stands forth broadly on the page of Indian history, which neither kings nor colonies—neither lords proprietors, nor diplomatic agents, have, on any single occasion, disputed, is alone sufficient to demolish the whole system of political pretensions, conjured up in modern times, to drive the poor Indian from the last refuge of his hopes.

The next important era in the order of time relates to the dispute of the colonies with Great Britain. The attention of the Congress on the eve of that conflict was called to the situation of these tribes, and their dispositions on that interesting subject. Then, sir, we approached them as independent nations, with the acknowledged power to form alliances with or against us. For, in June, 1775, our Congress resolved, "That the Committee for Indian Affairs do prepare proper talks to the several tribes of Indians, for engaging the continuance of their friendship to us, and neutrality in our present unhappy dispute with Great Britain." Again, on the 12th July, 1775, a report of the committee was agreed to, with the following clause at its head: "That the securing and preserving the friendship of the Indian nations, appears to be a subject of the utmost moment to these colonies." And, sir, the journals of that eventful period of our history are full of resolutions, all of which indicate the same opinions of those illustrious statesmen, respecting the unquestioned sovereignty of the Indians. I forbear further details. After the Revolution, and in the eighth year of our independence, in the month of September, A. D. 1783, the Congress again took up the subject of Indian affairs, and resolved to hold a convention with the Indians residing in the Middle and Northern States, who had taken up arms against us, for the purposes of receiving them into the favor and protection of the United States, and of establishing boundary lines of property, for separating and dividing the settlements of the citizens from the Indian villages and hunting grounds, and thereby extinguishing, as far as possible, all occasion for future animosities, disquiet, and contention." If, at any point of our existence as a people, a disposition to encroach upon the Indians, and to break down their separate and sovereign character, could have been looked for, or at all excused, this was the time; when we had just come out of a long, severe, and bloody conflict, often persecuted by our foes with unnatural barbarity, and to aggravate which, these very tribes had devoted their savage and ferocious customs. And yet, sir, what do we find? Instead of the claims of conquest, the rights of war, now so convenient to set up, the American Congress, greatly just, accord to these very Indians the character of foreign nations, and invite them to take shelter under our favor and protection; not only this, but adopt measures to ascertain and establish boundary lines of property between our citizens and their villages and hunting grounds.

Under the confederation of the old Thirteen States, and shortly before the adoption of the constitution, on the 20th of November, 1785, a treaty was made with the Cherokee nation, at Hopewell. This treaty, according to its title, was concluded between "Commissioners Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, of the one part, and the Headmen and Warriors of all the Cherokees, of the other." It gives "peace to all the Cherokees," and receives them into the favor and protection of the United States. And, by the first article, the Cherokees agree to restore all the prisoners, citizens of the United States, or subjects of their allies, to their entire liberty. Here, again, we discover the same magnanimous policy of renouncing any pretended rights of a conqueror in our negotiations with the allies of our enemy. We invite them to peace; we engage to become their protectors, and in the stipulation for the liberation of prisoners, we trace again the broad line of distinction between the citizens of the United States and the Cherokee people.

Who, after this, sir, can retain a single doubt as to the unquestioned political sovereignty of these tribes? It is very true, that they were not absolutely independent. As they had become comparatively feeble, and as they were, in the mass, an uncivilized race, they chose to depend upon us for protection; but this did not destroy or affect their sovereignty. The rule of public law is clearly stated by Vattel—"one community may be bound to another by a very unequal alliance, and still be a sovereign State. Though a weak State, in order to provide for its safety, should place itself under the protection of a more powerful one, yet, if it reserves to itself the right of governing its own body, it ought to be considered as an independent State." If the right of self-government is retained, the State preserves its political existence; and, permit me to ask, when did the Southern Indians relinquish this right? Sir, they have always exercised it, and were never disturbed in the enjoyment of it, until the late legislation of Georgia and the States of Alabama and Mississippi.

The treaty next proceeds to establish territorial domains, and to forbid all intrusions upon the Cherokee country, by any of our citizens, on the pains of outlawry. It provides, that, if any citizen of the United States shall remain on the lands of the Indians for six months "after the ratification of the treaty, such person shall forfeit the protection of the United States, and the Indians may punish him, or not, as they please." What stronger attribute of sovereignty could have been conceded to this tribe, than to have accorded to them the power of punishing our citizens according to their own laws and modes; and, sir, what more satisfactory proof can be furnished to the Senate, of the sincere and inflexible purpose of our Government to maintain the rights of the Indian nations, than the annexation of such sanctions as the forfeiture of national protection, and the infliction of any punishment within the range of savage discretion? It is to be recollected that this treaty was made at a time when all admit the Cherokees to have been, with very rare exceptions, in the rudest state of Pagan darkness.

It is really a subject of wonder, (said Mr. F.) that after these repeated and solemn recognitions of right of soil, territory, and jurisdiction, in these aboriginal nations, it should be gravely asserted that they are mere occupants at our will; and, what is absolutely marvellous, that they are a part of the Georgia population—a district of her territory, and amenable to her laws, whenever she chooses to extend them.

Removal of the Indians.

[SENATE.]

After the treaty of Hopewell was concluded and ratified, and in the year 1787, the States of North Carolina and Georgia transmitted their protest to Congress, in which they complained of the course of transactions adopted with respect to the Indians, and asserted a right in the States to treat with these tribes, and to obtain grants of their lands. The Congress referred the whole matter to a committee of five, who made an elaborate report that disclosed the principles upon which the intercourse of the confederacy with these people was founded. It is material to a correct understanding of this branch of the subject, that we should advert to a limitation, subsisting at that time, upon the powers of the old Congress. The limitation is contained in the following clause of the articles of confederation: "Congress shall have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians not members of any other States; provided that the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated."

Upon this clause and its proviso, the committee proceed to report: "In framing this clause, the parties to the federal compact must have had some definite objects in view; the objects that come into view principally in forming treaties, or managing affairs with the Indians, had been long understood, and pretty well ascertained in this country. The committee conceive that it has been long the opinion of the country, supported by justice and humanity, that the Indians have just claims to all lands occupied by, and not fairly purchased from them. The laws of the State can have no effect upon a tribe of Indians or their lands within a State, so long as that tribe is independent and not a member of the State. It cannot be supposed that the State has the powers mentioned," (those of making war and peace, purchasing lands from them and fixing boundaries,) "without absurdity in theory and practice. For the Indian tribes are justly considered the common friends or enemies of the United States, and no particular State can have an exclusive interest in the management of affairs with any of the tribes, except in uncommon cases." The Senate perceive the estimate that was formed of these State pretensions. The committee argue, with conclusive energy, that, to yield such powers to particular States, would not only be absurd in theory, but would in fact destroy the whole system of Indian relations—that this divided, alternate cognizance of the matter, by the States and by the Congress, could never be enforced, and would result in discordant and fruitless regulations. The grounds assumed in this able report are unanswerable. The committee regarded the subject as national, concerning the whole United States, of whom the Indians were the common friends or foes.

That such a concern was too general and public in all its bearings, to be subjected to the legislation and management of any particular State. The Congress, therefore, assume the entire jurisdiction and control of it. And after this report, we hear no more of State protests. They yielded their claims to a much safer depository of this interesting trust. Sir, I take leave to say, that the sound, sensible principles of this report have lost nothing of their authority by time, and that every year of our history has confirmed their wisdom, and illustrated the justice and humanity of the Congress of '87.

The convention that formed and adopted the constitution, in their deliberations upon the security of Indian rights, wisely determined to place our relations with the tribes under the absolute superintendence of the General Government, which they were about to establish. The proviso under the old compact, that had, in ambiguous terms, reserved to particular States an undefined management of Indian affairs, was altogether discarded, and the simple unqualified control of this important branch of public policy, was delegated to Congress in the following clause of the constitution: "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." An incidental argument, in favor of my views, cannot fail to strike the mind on the face of this clause. The plea that is now, for the first time, urged against the Indians, rests upon the allegation, that the tribes are not distinct nations—that they compose a portion of the people of the States; and yet, in the great national charter, this work of as much collected wisdom, virtue, and patriotism, as ever adorned the annals, or shed light upon the government of any age or country, the Indian tribes are associated with foreign nations and the several States, as one of the three distinct departments of the human family, with which the General Government was to regulate commerce. Strange company, truly, in which to find those it now seems convenient to denominate a few poor miserable savages, that were always the peculiar subjects of State sovereignty, mere tenants at will of the soil, and with whom it is "idle" to speak of negotiating treaties.

There was another subject, closely connected with this, that engaged the anxious deliberations of the great statesmen who composed the memorable convention—and this was the treaty power. To found this well, was a concern worthy of their first and best thoughts. The good faith of a nation was not to be pledged but on grave and great occasions; for, when plighted, it brought the nation itself into obligations, too sacred to be argued away by the suggestions of policy or convenience, profit or loss. They, therefore, subjected the exercise of this high function to two great departments of the Government—the President and Senate of the United States. They required formalities to attend the exercise of the power that were intended and calculated to guard the trust from rash and inconsiderate administration. But these requisites complied with, and a treaty made and concluded, no retreat from its claims was provided or desired by the convention. No, sir. To shut up every avenue of escape—to compel us to be faithful—"treaties" are declared, by the charter of our Government, "to be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." How could the inviolate character of a treaty be more effectually preserved? Let convulsions agitate the commonwealth—let the strifes of party shake the pillars of the political edifice—around the nation's faith barriers are raised, that may smile at the storm. And, sir, if these guards fail, if these defences can be assailed and broken down, then may we indeed despair. Truth and honor have no citadel on earth—their sanctions are despised and forgotten, and the law of the strongest prevails.

I fear that I shall oppress the patience of the Senate by these tedious details; but the subject is deeply interesting, and each successive year of our political history brings me fresh and strong proofs of the sacred estimation always accorded to Indian rights. Sir, in the very next year that followed the formation of the constitution, on the 1st day of September, 1788, the encroachment of the whites upon the Indian territory, as guaranteed to them by the treaty of Hopewell, made with the Cherokees, as we have already stated, in 1785, caused a proclamation to be issued by Congress, of the date first mentioned, affirming in all things the treaty of Hopewell, and distinctly announcing (I give the literal clause) "the firm determination of Congress to protect the said Cherokees in their rights, according to the true intent and meaning of the said treaty." And they further resolve, "that the Secretary of War be directed to have a sufficient number of troops in the service of the United States in readiness, to march from the Ohio to the protection of the Cherokees, whenever Congress shall direct the same."

The next important event, in connection with the Cherokees, is the treaty of Holston, made with them on the 2d July, 1791. This was the first treaty negotiated with the Cherokees after the constitution. And it is only necessary to consider the import of its preamble, to become satisfied of the constancy of our policy, in adhering to the first principles of our Indian negotiations. Sir, let it be remembered that this was a crisis when the true spirit of the constitution would be best understood; most of those who framed it came into the councils of the country in 1788. Let it be well pondered, that this treaty of Holston was the public compact in which General Washington, as a preparative solemnity, asked the advice of the Senate, and concerning which, he inquired of that venerable body whether, in the treaty to be made, the United States should solemnly guaranty the new boundary, to be ascertained and fixed between them and the Cherokees.

The preamble to this treaty I will now recite:

"The parties being desirous of establishing permanent peace and friendship between the United States and the said Cherokee nation, and the citizens and members thereof, and to remove the causes of war, by ascertaining their limits, and making other necessary, just, and friendly arrangements: the President of the United States, by William Blount, Governor of the Territory of the United States of America, south of the river Ohio, and superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Southern District, who is vested with full powers for these purposes, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States; and the Cherokee nation, by the undersigned chiefs and warriors, representing the said nation, have agreed to the following articles," &c.

The first article stipulates that there shall be "perpetual peace and friendship" between the parties; a subsequent article provides, that the boundary between the United States and Cherokees "shall be ascertained and marked plainly, by three persons appointed by the United States, and three Cherokees on the part of their nation."

In pursuance of the advice of the Senate, by the seventh article of this treaty, "The United States solemnly guarantee to the Cherokee nation all their lands not hereby ceded."

And after several material clauses, the concluding article suspends the effect and obligation of the treaty upon its ratification "by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States."

Now, sir, it is a most striking part of this history, that every possible incident, of form, deliberation, advisement, and power, attended this compact. The Senate was consulted when our plenipotentiary was commissioned; full powers were then given to our commissioner; the articles were agreed upon; the treaty referred to the Executive and Senate for their ratification, and, with all its provisions, by them solemnly confirmed.

It requires a fulness of self-respect and self-confidence, the lot of a rare few, after time has added its sanctions to this high pledge of national honor, to attempt to convict the illustrious men of that Senate of gross ignorance of constitutional power; to charge against them that they strangely mistook the charter under which they acted; and violated almost the proprieties of language, as some gentlemen contend, by dignifying with the name and formalities of a treaty "mere bargains to get Indian lands." Sir, who so well understood the nature and extent of the powers granted in the constitution, as the statesmen who aided by their personal counsels to establish it?

Every administration of this Government, from President Washington's, have, with like solemnities and stipulations, held treaties with the Cherokees; treaties, too, by almost all of which we obtained further acquisitions of their territory. Yes, sir, whenever we approached them in the language of friendship and kindness, we touched the chord that won their confidence; and now, when they have nothing left with which to satisfy our cravings, we propose to annul every treaty—to gainsay our word—and, by violence and perfidy, drive the Indian from his home. In a subsequent treaty between the United States and the Cherokee nation, concluded on the 8th July, 1817, express reference is made to past negotiations between the parties, on the subject of removal to the west of the Mississippi; the same question that now agitates the country, and engages our deliberations. And this convention is deserving of particular notice, inasmuch as we shall learn from it, not only what sentiments were then entertained by our Government towards the Cherokees, but also, in what light the different dispositions of the Indians to emigrate to the West, and to remain on their adjacent patrimony, were considered. This treaty recites that application had been made to the United States, at a previous period, by a deputation of the Cherokees, (on the 9th January, 1809,) by which they apprised the Government of the wish of a part of their nation to remove west of the Mississippi, and of the residue to abide in their old habitations. That the President of the United States, after maturely considering the subject, answered the petitions as follows: "The United States, my children, are the friends of both parties, and, as far as can be reasonably asked, they are willing to satisfy the wishes of both. Those that remain may be assured of our patronage, our aid, and our good neighborhood. To those who remove, every aid shall be administered, and when established at their new settlements, we shall consider them as our children, and always hold them firmly by the hand." The convention then establishes new boundaries and pledges our faith to respect and defend the Indian territories. Some matters, by universal consent, are taken as granted, without any explicit recognition. Under the influence of this rule of common fairness, how can we ever dispute the sovereign right of the Cherokees to remain east of the Mississippi, when it was in relation to that very location that we promised our patronage, aid, and good neighborhood? Sir, is this high-handed encroachment of Georgia to be the commentary upon the national pledge here given, and the obvious import of these terms? How were these people to remain, if not as they then existed, and as we then acknowledged them to be, a distinct and separate community, governed by their own peculiar laws and customs? We can never deny these principles, while fair dealing retains any hold of our conduct. Further, sir, it appears from this treaty, that the Indians who preferred to remain east of the river, expressed "to the President an anxious desire to engage in the pursuits of agriculture and civilized life in the country they then occupied," and we engaged to encourage those laudable purposes. Indeed, such pursuits had been recommended to the tribes, and patronized by the United States, for many years before this convention. Mr. Jefferson, in his message to Congress as early as 1805, and when on the subject of our Indian relations, with his usual enlarged views of public policy, observes: "The aboriginal inhabitants of these countries, I have regarded with the commiseration their history inspires. Endowed with the faculties and the rights of men, breathing an ardent love of liberty and independence, and occupying a country which left them no desire but to be undisturbed, the stream of overflowing population from other regions directed itself on these shores. Without power to divert, or habits to contend against it, they have been overwhelmed by the current, or driven before it. Now, reduced within limits too narrow for the hunter state, humanity enjoins us to teach them agriculture and the domestic arts; to encourage them to that industry which alone can enable them to maintain their place in existence; and to prepare them in time for that society which, to bodily comforts, adds the improvement of the mind and morals. We have, therefore, liberally furnished them with the implements of husbandry and household use; we have placed among them instructors in the arts of first necessity; and they are covered with the ægis of the law against aggressors from among ourselves." These, sir, are sentiments worthy of an illustrious statesman. None can fail to perceive the spirit of justice and humanity which Mr. Jefferson cherished towards our Indian allies. He was, through his whole life, the firm, unshrinking advocate of their rights, a patron of all their plans for moral improvement and elevation.

It will not be necessary (said Mr. F.) to pursue the details of our treaty negotiations further. I beg leave to state, before I leave them, however, that with all the southwestern tribes of Indians we have similar treaties; not only the Cherokees, but the Creeks, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, in the neighborhood of Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, hold our faith, repeatedly pledged to them, that we would respect their boundaries, repel aggressions, and protect and nourish them as our neighbors and friends; and to all these public and sacred compacts Georgia was a constant party. They were required, by an article never omitted, to be submitted to the Senate of the United States for their advice and consent. They were so submitted; and Georgia, by her able Representatives in the Senate, united in the ratification of these same treaties, without, in any single instance, raising an exception, or interposing a constitutional difficulty or scruple.

I have complained of the legislation of Georgia. I will now refer the Senate to the law of that State, passed on the 19th December, 1829, that the complaint may be justified. The title of the law would suffice for such purpose without looking further into its sections. After stating its object of adding the territory in the occupancy of the Cherokee nation of Indians to the adjacent counties of Georgia, another distinct office of this oppressive edict of arbitrary power is avowed to be, "to annul all laws and ordinances made by the Cherokee nation of Indians." And, sir, the act does annul them effectually. For the seventh section enacts, "that after the first day of June next, all laws, ordinances, orders, and regulations of any kind whatever, made, passed, or enacted by the Cherokee Indians, either in general council, or in any other way whatever, or by any authority whatever, of said tribe, be, and the same are hereby, declared to be null and void and of no effect, as if the same had never existed." Sir, here we find a whole people outlawed—laws, customs, rules, Government, all, by one short clause, abrogated and declared to be void as if they never had been. History furnishes no example of such high-handed usurpation—the dismemberment and partition of Poland was a deed of humane legislation compared with this. The succeeding clauses are no less offensive; they provide that "if any person shall prevent by threats, menaces, or other means, or endeavor to prevent any Indian of said nation from emigrating, or enrolling as an emigrant, he shall be liable to indictment and confinement in the common jail, or at hard labor in the penitentiary, not exceeding four years, at the discretion of the court; and if any person shall deter, or offer to deter, any Indian, head man, chief, or warrior of said nation, from selling or ceding to the United States, for the use of Georgia, the whole or any part of said territory, or prevent, or offer to prevent, any such persons from meeting in council or treaty any commissioner or commissioners on the part of the United States, for any purpose whatever, he shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and liable, on conviction, to confinement at hard labor in the penitentiary, for not less than four, nor longer than six years, at the discretion of the court." It is a crime in Georgia for a man to prevent the sale of his country, a crime to warn a chief or head man that the agents of the United States are instructed "to move upon him in the line of his prejudices," that they are coming to bribe him to meet in treaty with the commissioner. By the way, sir, it seems these treaties are very lawful, when made for the use of Georgia.

It is not surprising that our agents advertised the War Department, that if the General Government refused to interfere, and the Indians were left to the law of the States, they would soon exchange their lands and remove. To compel, by harsh and cruel penalties, such exchange, is the broad purpose of this act of Georgia, and nothing is wanting to fill up the picture of this disgraceful system, but to permit the bill before us to pass without amendment or proviso. Then it will all seem fair on our statute books. It legislates for none but those who may choose to remove, while we know that grinding, heart-breaking exactions are set in operation elsewhere, to drive them to such a choice. By the modification I have submitted, I beg for the Indian the poor privilege of the exercise of his own will. But the law of Georgia is not yet satisfied. The last section declares, "that no Indian, or descendant of any Indian, residing within the Creek or Cherokee nation of Indians, shall be deemed a competent witness in any court of this State, to which a white person may be a party, except such white person resides within the said nation." It did not suffice to rob these people of the last vestige of their own political rights and liberties; the work was not complete until they were shut out of the protection of Georgia laws. For, sir, after the first day of June next, a gang of lawless white men may break into the Cherokee country, plunder their habitations, murder the mother with the children, and all in the sight of the wretched husband and father, and no law of Georgia will reach the atrocity. It is vain to tell us, sir, that murder may be traced by circumstantial probabilities. The charge against this State is, you have, by force and violence, stripped these people of the protection of their Government, and now refuse to cast over them the shield of your own. The outrage of the deed is, that you leave the poor Indian helpless and defenceless, and in this cruel way hope to banish him from his home. Sir, if this law be enforced, I do religiously believe that it will awaken tones of feeling that will go up to God, and call down the thunders of his wrath.

The end, however, is to justify the means. "The removal of the Indian tribes to the west of the Mississippi is demanded by the dictates of humanity." This is a word of conciliating import. But it often makes its way to the heart under very doubtful titles, and its present claims deserve to be rigidly questioned. Who urges this plea? They who covet the Indian lands—who wish to rid themselves of a neighbor that they despise, and whose State pride is enlisted in rounding off their territories. But another matter is worthy of a serious thought. Is there such a clause in our covenants with the Indian, that when we shall deem it best for him, on the whole, we may break our engagements, and leave him to his persecutors? Notwithstanding our adversaries are not entitled to the use of such humane suggestions, yet we do not shrink from an investigation of this pretence. It will be found as void of support in fact as the other assumptions are of principle.

SATURDAY, April 10.

Confirmation of certain Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. ELLIS, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill for confirming certain claims to lands in the district of

APRIL, 1830.]

Confirmation of certain Land Claims.

[SENATE.]

Jackson Court House, in the State of Mississippi; and, after a brief explanation, Mr. ELLIS moved to amend the bill, by striking out "the minimum price," and inserting "fifty cents per acre."

Mr. Foor said he thought it would hardly consist with the plighted faith of the Government to adopt the amendment. The United States had given their pledge that no land should be sold at a price less than that fixed by law; and as the minimum price was now fixed at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, these lands ought not to be given for a lower sum, unless the law was changed so as to operate equally on all purchasers.

Mr. ELLIS replied, that it was not his intention to embarrass the bill at this late period of the session, and he would therefore withdraw his amendment.

Mr. FOESYTH said, if he understood the subject rightly, the bill provided for confirming the claim of one individual to twelve hundred and fifty acres only, when that individual claimed one hundred thousand acres under a Spanish grant. If this person had a just title to the whole one hundred thousand acres, he ought to have it. He believed that the passage of the law would be either an injury to the individual, or to the United States, for if his title was not good for the whole amount claimed by him, it was defective as to the number of acres proposed to be confirmed to him.

Mr. ELLIS said the title of Lewis Baudray to one hundred thousand acres of land was unquestionable; and was derived from a Spanish grant made as far back as the year 1790. It was well known to the Senate, that Congress had invariably refused to sanction confirmations to large grants. There were the grants to Maison Rouge, Baron Bastrop, &c., which Congress refused to sanction, solely on the ground that they were for such large tracts. He had no doubt that, under the treaty, all the claimants were entitled to the lands they held under Spanish grants, because the treaty expressly stipulates that their rights shall be guaranteed to them. With respect to the proviso objected to by the gentleman from Georgia, he was in favor of it, inasmuch as it gave to Lewis Baudray a complete title to twelve hundred and fifty acres; and if he chose to accept that in lieu of the large grant he claimed under it, was his own consideration.

Mr. FOESYTH said there was something in the matter he did not distinctly understand, and the difficulty was increased by the report. In the list of claims was that of Lewis Baudray, confirmed to his wife Margaret Morales, in 1808, with testimony of inhabitation and cultivation, but there was no order for the survey to take place.

Mr. BARTON said that the usual course pursued to obtain grants of land under the Spanish authorities, had been first to obtain a warrant of survey, so that there might be no dispute of title; this was not always done, nor was it absolutely necessary. The settlement of a tract of land, and proof of inhabitation and cultivation for three years, was sufficient to perfect the title. This individual, if he had not complied with the letter of the law, had, at all events, made the settlement: for the fact of inhabitation from 1808 to 1828, was distinctly proved. Thousands of such cases had occurred in Missouri, and indeed in all the country which was obtained under the Louisiana purchase, and Congress had passed laws to confirm such grants: for it frequently happened that no survey had been made; but the occupation and cultivation was deemed sufficient, and the United States surveyor laid off the tracts. He was satisfied that, in this case, there had been an original concession, as it was called, or warrant of survey, which may have been lost; and it was also highly probable that the Spanish officers had exceeded their powers; but by limiting the confirmation to the number of acres provided for in the bill, justice would be done both to the United States and to the individual.

Mr. BIBB offered the following proviso, as an amendment: "But shall be in satisfaction and extinguishment of the claim or demands of said claimants, respectively, to any other or greater quantity of land, as against the United States; and all persons or person claiming, or to claim, under the United States."

Mr. ELLIS regretted that the Senator from Kentucky had offered this amendment. If he would reflect, he would see that it was in contravention of the treaty of France, by which Louisiana was acquired. The treaty provided, that every person inhabiting the ceded territory, should be protected in the enjoyment of his life, religion, and property. These rights were considered as property, and, consequently, the adoption of the amendment would be a violation of the rights secured by the treaty.

Mr. BIBB said it was important to enforce the principle, that those who did not present their claims, and support them by proper testimony, should forfeit them. Congress had appointed commissioners to examine into the validity of all Spanish grants, and those who did not present before them their testimony to establish their titles, could not now have very strong claims on the United States. It was not safe to the Government to leave such important subjects still undecided.

After a few remarks from Messrs. BARTON, ADAMS, and KANE, in opposition, and Mr. BIBB, in support of the amendment, the question was taken, and it was rejected.

Mr. Foor said, if he was not very much mistaken, this bill would introduce an entirely new principle in our land legislation. He hoped that the faith of treaties might be rigidly adhered to, and their provisions strictly enforced, in every instance. If he rightly understood the provisions of the bill, it not only secures the Spanish claimants in all their rights, but it even goes farther, it secures to them rights which they had never yet satisfactorily established. He was desirous of obtaining further information, before he could vote for the bill. He said that there was no case, within his recollection, in which the United States Government had passed laws to make up the deficiency of Spanish titles. It was, therefore, he believed, an entirely new principle in legislation; and he was not, with the present lights, prepared to support it.

The question was then taken, and the bill ordered to be engrossed and read a third time—ayes 21.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE, the bill creating the office of Surgeon General of the Navy was taken up.

Mr. HAYNE said that, previous to taking the question on the passage of this bill, he wished to avail himself of the advantages suggested by his friend from Virginia, (Mr. TAZEWELL,) when this bill was under discussion on a former day; and, in accordance to the views of that gentleman, introduced a clause for the regulation of the navy ration. He knew of no better mode of increasing the comforts, adding to the enjoyments, and promoting the health, of our seamen, than by the amendment he was about to introduce. It was, he said, very desirable that the crews of our public vessels should be supplied with as many of those articles of comfort, to which they have been accustomed, as the interests of the navy and the country would permit. The experience of England and France, to which he had alluded on a former day, afforded some light on this subject, and their naval regulations, with respect to the ration, were now before him. He did not design to follow either; but he wished to introduce an amendment which would enable the President to try, at such times and places as he might deem most suitable to the comforts of the sailor and the interests of the country, how far sugar, coffee, cocoa, wine, and raisins, might be substituted for the beef, pork, and whiskey, with which our crews are at present supplied. In no instance, however, would the ration exceed twenty-five cents, as provided for by the present law. The British ration amounted to about twenty-two cents.

In introducing this amendment, his object was to make an experiment, and to see how far our efforts may tend to introduce a system of temperance in the navy—temperance, such as entire abstinence from spirituous liquors, being among the schemes of the day. He was not disposed to think that such a scheme would suit the navy at present. Indeed, he thought, if it were enforced, that it would be impossible to get crews. But a gradual change might be effected, both in the appetite, the manners, and morals, of our sailors, by judicious regulations; and, if part of their grog was exchanged for tea and coffee, &c., he was of opinion that it would have a happy effect on the health, the morals, and the constitution, of our tars.

Mr. HOLMES wished to know if it was intended that the sailor should receive money in part for his grog. If so, the evil complained of by Mr. HAYNE would not be prevented; because, so soon as the sailor got his money, he would go off and purchase grog. This was the evil Mr. H. would like to see prevented.

Mr. HAYNE replied, that the object and effect of the amendment would be to enable the Executive to allow, as circumstances require it, the sailor to draw only part of the grog at present allotted to him, and to supply him with sugar, wine, coffee, &c., for the remainder.

Mr. SPRAGUE wished to have the amendment so modified as to embrace the midshipmen; because it is well known that the use of spirituous liquors among this class of our naval officers has already produced alarming and painful consequences. A boy goes on board one of our public vessels, and, in a few years, he, by a most improper use of ardent spirits, becomes a most incorrigible drinker; and is soon incapable of serving either himself or his country.

Mr. HAYNE said he had no objection to the modification proposed by Mr. SPRAGUE, and would accept it; though he thought the gentleman was misinformed as to the facts or evils which he alluded to. Mr. H. did not think that intemperance prevailed among our midshipmen. They, for the most part, drank wine, which was not furnished them by the Government, as the gentleman from Maine (Mr. SPRAGUE) appeared to think, but was laid in by one of their own mess, previous to embarkation for a cruise. They, the midshipmen, drew pay for the ration, and supplied themselves with whatever luxuries or necessaries they might think proper; so that, if the modification proposed by Mr. S. was adopted, it would not have the effect intended.

Mr. HAYNE's amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. DICKERSON said he thought the passage of the law would be establishing an unnecessary office. He thought it would be better to leave the purchase of medicines to the surgeons who go out in our ships of war, who would thus, as it was important they should, always supply themselves with fresh drugs. If, as argued by the gentleman from South Carolina, it was important for the surgeons at sea to make reports, though he did not see the importance of it, it might be done as heretofore; there was no necessity for creating an office merely to receive reports. He had heard retrenchment and economy much talked of, and he should like to see it put into practice. He was opposed to the creation of unnecessary offices; he had recorded his vote in opposition to retaining a major-general in the army, and, as he wished to be understood, he should ask for the yeas and nays, that he might record his vote against this bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he had not much respect for that word "retrenchment." Reform was desirable and necessary; that reform which lops off useless expenditures, corrects abuses, gives a judicious direction to the public money, and secures a faithful and effectual performance of the public business; and it was evident to his mind, from the effects of a similar arrangement in the medical department of the army, that such would be the consequence of this bill, if carried into a law. Mr. S. went on to show that, from the losses sustained from medicine, after the termination of a cruise, that the actual saving to the Government, which the provisions of this bill would ensure, would amount to twenty thousand dollars per annum, at the very lowest calculation.

Attorney-General's Department.

Mr. HAYNE, in continuation, argued that, by the passage of the bill, great expense in the medical department of the navy would be saved, and the health and comfort of the seamen would be promoted. He showed, from a report from the War Department, part of which he read, that, by the adoption of the system in the army, order and regularity had taken place of confusion, and an annual saving was made of near forty thousand dollars. The bill did not proceed entirely from the Naval Committee, but was the result of a thorough examination of the subject, and of a fair and perfect understanding with the Navy Department.

Mr. HOLMES observed, that he did not object to the bill in consequence of the additional expense that might be incurred (if, indeed, there should be any additional expense) on so important a subject as the health and comfort of our seamen, if he thought the proposed plan would effect the object it contemplated. He had long thought that the method of putting up medicines, both for our navy and merchant service, was extremely defective, and that some improved system ought to be adopted. He recollected having introduced a bill, at one period, to correct this evil in the merchant service, by requiring a strict examination of the medicine chests of all vessels sailing from our ports; but the bill, he believed, never was acted on. But he thought it extremely doubtful whether one officer (a Surgeon General) could perform the duties contemplated in the bill, or rather, he doubted whether he could correct the evils complained of, and provided against in the latter clause of the bill. He thought the general proposition a good one; but he would inquire if the Surgeon General could carry it into operation? He asked if this officer could be present at Key West and Boston, Pensacola and New York, Portsmouth and Norfolk, Baltimore and New Orleans, or any other port from which our public vessels were about to sail, in order to purchase, superintend, and inspect, the medicines for the cruise? and also to be present at the different ports at which these vessels may arrive on their return, in order to examine and decide what medicines are, and what are not, fit for future use? It was evident, Mr. H. said, that there must be some one, on whose judgment they could rely, present at the different ports, to carry the object of the bill into effect. It seemed, therefore, that, though the design was good, there would be insuperable difficulties in the execution.

After a few observations from Mr. DICKERSON,

Mr. HAYNE said he would offer a few words in explanation, as to the difficulties and objections urged by the gentlemen from Maine and New Jersey. The medicines, like all other naval stores, will be furnished on requisitions from the proper department, in the same manner as he supposed the samples would be sent on to the Surgeon General for examination, and by his orders were furnished in the army. They would be put up and secured under the immediate inspection of the proper inspecting officer. The gentleman from New Jersey has said, that those medicines which remain, after the return of a vessel from a cruise, are entirely "worthless; and, consequently, it was unnecessary to provide for their preservation afterwards." Such might be the case; but if it were, it was to be attributed to the evils complained of, and for which the bill provided a remedy. It was well ascertained, by men of science, that, if medicines were properly put up, if they were secured from the action of light and air, that they would be as good at the end of one, two, or three years, as they are on the first day.

The question was then taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote: yeas 36, nays 6.

MONDAY, April 12.

The Senate was engaged this day for more than six hours on Executive business.

TUESDAY, April 18.

Attorney-General's Department.

On motion of Mr. ROWAN, the Senate took up the bill to organize the Attorney-General's Department, and to erect it into an Executive office.

Mr. BARTON deemed the bill a very inadequate remedy for any existing evils in the law department of the Government, or in the manner of collecting the revenue. He thought the measure proposed inexpedient. He thought that, where an evil did exist, a proper remedy ought to be applied; and believing that the Government of the United States was old enough, a Home Department, to take charge of the internal concerns of the country, ought to be established. His opinion was, that the period was not very remote, if it had not now arrived, when it would be necessary to confine the Secretary of State to the appropriate duties of his office, and transfer the internal concerns of the country to another department. As to the Attorney-General, he ought to conduct a subordinate branch of the Home Department, and not be the head of it, as proposed by the bill, which made him half a law officer, and half a head of a Department, with a large increase of salary for various duties which he cannot perform. If this bill passed, and the Attorney-General was metamorphosed into the head of a bureau, an assistant must be appointed, who, like all other deputies, would have to perform most of the duties.

Mr. ROWAN moved to fill the blanks in the bill so as to give to the clerk to be appointed a salary of fourteen hundred dollars per annum, and to the messenger and assistant messenger, the salaries of seven hundred dollars and three hundred and fifty dollars; which motions were carried.

Mr. FORSYTH moved, as an amendment, a proviso, that "the Attorney-General shall not, during his continuance in office, engage in any private practice in the courts of the United States, or of the States." It appeared to Mr. F. that the duties prescribed to the Attorney-General by the bill would require his undivided attention, and render it impossible for him to attend the courts, unless to conduct cases in which the United States were concerned.

Mr. ROWAN said, that the objections urged, and the remedy proposed, by the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. FORSYTH,) had occurred to the committee who reported the bill, but the evils did not appear to them in the same light that they had appeared to strike the mind of the gentleman from Georgia. Indeed, he thought the amendment rather a matter of supererogation. If it should be found that, after the performance of all the duties prescribed in the bill, together with the duties already imposed on him, the Attorney-General had still leisure, he was of the opinion that, by employing such leisure in the practice of the higher courts of law, his intellect would be strengthened, his mind improved, and his legal acquirements increased, so as to enable him to render more efficient and distinguished service to the Government. If the duties of the office should engross the whole time of the Attorney-General, then the amendment would be entirely unnecessary. It appeared, therefore, that the amendment was either unnecessary or injudicious. As he had said before, it would be unnecessary, if the duties prescribed in the bill should engross his whole time, because it would then be impossible for him to attend to private practice; and, if he should have leisure, after performing his public duties, it would be injudicious, nay, injurious to the United States, to prevent him from that intellectual exercise which would prepare him for the more effectual performance of his public duties.

Mr. FORSYTH observed that he admitted the correctness of the observation of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. ROWAN,) that the exercise of the faculties not only sharpens, but invigorates the human faculties; and the only difference between the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. R.) and himself, was this: Mr. R. appears to apprehend, that, after a faithful and thorough performance of all the duties imposed by the bill, in addition to those already assigned him, the Attorney-General will have sufficient leisure to attend to private practice. Mr. F. thought differently. The duties of the office would be great and various. Independent of the present duties of the office, he would have others from the Land, the Treasury, and the Patent Office—he would be subject to the orders of the President of the United States, and would be liable to be called on to go to any part of the United States, to represent the nation in the courts of justice. If such were to be the outline of his duties, (and it appeared to him that the bill pointed to that course,) there would not be much time left to devote to private practice, if the public business received proper attention. But even if it should not engross all his time, and he should engage in the service of private individuals, he cannot foresee what time the public service will demand his attention; and if he should endeavor to secure the emoluments of private practice, it will often be at the expense of his official duties, and consequently, injurious to the interests of the United States. He thought that nothing ought to be left to the discretion of the Attorney-General. The salary was sufficient to secure the highest grade of professional talent, and he presumed it was thought so by the committee who reported the bill. It was as great as the compensation allowed to any of the heads of Department, or any of the high officers of Government, and these were all prohibited from the practice of law in all the inferior courts of the United States; and he thought they ought also to be prohibited from practice in all courts. He said he had no particular anxiety about either the bill or the amendment; but if the one was carried into operation, he thought the other should succeed.

Mr. HOLMES thought that his motion to recommit was sufficiently distinct, and understood by every gentleman. He thought that some of the duties, if not all, proposed by the bill to be imposed on the Attorney-General, should be done by another Department. It did not become him to direct the committee; he did not think it proper for him to do so; they ought on all such matters to have a proper latitude given them. To say that if his resolution prevailed the bill could not be perfected this session, was no argument with him; neither of the Executive Departments were perfected at once: all of them were gradually established as experience and expedience showed and prescribed. He was opposed to this bill, because he was opposed to the creation of an unnecessary office. Where an office was really necessary, he never would be found to vote against its establishment.

Attorney-General's Department.

[SENATE.]

Mr. McKINLEY said he was not very solicitous about the bill; nevertheless, he considered that a change was necessary in the organization of the Law Department of the Government; and if gentlemen would devise a better one than the present, he would yield it his support. He believed that in no country was the Law Department in so wretched a condition as in the United States. Some of our most important legal affairs are intrusted to an officer who, he believed, was no lawyer; and whose compensation was not sufficient to command a high grade of intellectual endowment. Mr. McK. said he knew a circumstance which illustrated this position. It related to the celebrated Yazoo claim. The amount was large, and the District Attorney of the United States was directed by the Comptroller to make the best defence he could for the Government; but not one tittle of testimony was furnished him for that purpose. This, and such evils as this, would be corrected by the provisions of the bill. It will then become the duty of the Attorney-General to direct the District Attornies, and to furnish them with the best testimony that can be procured to substantiate the claims of the Government, or to defend it from the imposition of creditors. If this course were pursued, and a rigid responsibility introduced, those abuses that have crept in would be corrected; and he believed that a saving from half to a million of dollars annually, to the Government, would be the result. He thought it would not be so difficult to induce gentlemen of the first legal and intellectual powers to accept the office, as the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WEBSTER) seemed to think. If, however, a better remedy for the evil were devised, he would have no objections to give it his support.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN felt friendly to the bill, but was opposed to those sections which imposed on the Attorney-General the task of superintending the concerns of the Patent Office, and the publication of the laws. It was highly important, however, that some officer should be appointed to attend to the collection of the revenue, and to direct the various suits which it might become necessary for the United States to bring. The Senator from Missouri admitted there were evils in the present system, and he hoped he would agree to apply the remedy to a part of them, if the whole could not be reached. It had been stated some days ago, by a Senator on this floor, (Mr. WEBSTER,) that a bill had been in progress, and considerably matured, in the other House, to appoint an officer to manage the important business of the collection of the revenue; but that the friends of the bill had abandoned it in despair, because of the numberless applications from incompetent persons for the office to be created. Now, said Mr. F., that will always be the case, unless you establish an office with a high salary, and requiring the talents of an eminent jurist. It was not necessary that the law officer to be appointed should personally attend to petty collections; but let him be the head of the system—let it go abroad that such an officer has the charge of the business, and all those inferior agents who have been complained of will feel his power, and properly attend to the duties.

Being in favor of the system, though with some slight objections to the present bill, he should vote for the motion of the Senator from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) to re-commit it, that it might be again presented in a more favorable shape.

Mr. SANFORD advocated the bill.

Mr. HOLMES observed, that the salary of the Attorney-General was now fixed at three thousand five hundred dollars per annum; and the reason why it was not so large as the salaries of other heads of Departments was, that, by being permitted to pursue his other avocations, which were acknowledged to be profitable, he more than made up to himself the amount of compensation received by the others who were confined to their offices. If this bill intended to establish a Home Department, let it be called so, and made so, instead of legislating for the benefit of a particular individual, and giving him the high salary of a head of a department, and permitting him to devote his time to the practice of his lucrative profession. This was legislating for the people—economy and retrenchment with a vengeance. Mr. H. had intended to offer a resolution to re-commit the bill, with instructions to report one to establish a Home Department; but for us in the minority, said he, there is little chance of our successfully maintaining any proposition we make.

Mr. JOHNSON thought the time had arrived when an attempt at least should be made to organize a department such as that contemplated by the bill. There were duties, he said, appended to the Treasury, State, and War Departments, which did not properly belong to them; and which ought to be transferred to a separate and distinct department. He approved of the bill as far as it goes. There ought, he thought, to be a head through the agency of which the claims, &c., of our Government against individuals, should be prosecuted, and debts due the Government collected. He said that, at the present time, the debts due the United States amounted to near four millions of dollars; and that the greater part of this sum was in suit, and the agency of which was reposed in the hands of an officer, who, though a good and meritorious one, was no lawyer, and had consequently to depend, in the prosecution of his duty, on the legal advice of the Attorney-General. He thought, therefore, that there was not that strict responsibility in the present system, which the magnitude of the office demanded; and which he believed the provisions of the bill would meet. But there were others, and anomalous duties, imposed on the Attorney-General by the bill, to which Mr. J. objected. Our Indiana, our Patent Office, and public lands, required another department. The Navy had its appropriate duties; but he could not see what relation Indian affairs had to the War Department, the Patent Office to the State Department, or the public lands with the Treasury, to which they are at present attached. The duties of these offices were of sufficient importance to demand a separate department independent of the law office, provided for in the bill. He did not know whether the term Home Department would be an appropriate name for the office to which these duties should be arranged; but the subject had been so long before the public, and had been so ably and so minutely discussed, that he presumed all were acquainted with the meaning it conveyed, and the duties to be assigned it.

Mr. WEBSTER doubted the existence of the evils the bill was proposed to remedy. He should like much to see in detail, the losses and crosses that had been so much complained of. It was easy to say, that the Government had sustained losses under the present system; it might be true, or there might be an error as to facts. Every great creditor, like the Government of the United States, necessarily had bad debts; but this usual consequence of large dealings, was no evidence of the badness of the system. His opinion was, the system wanted enlargement, not change. He did not believe any good would result from the metamorphosis of the Attorney-General into the head of a bureau; nor did he believe it possible for any one individual to attend to the duties of both departments. One word as to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Georgia. His (Mr. F.'s) opinion was, that, if the bill created an executive officer—a head of a department, with a salary equivalent to that of the heads of the present Executive Departments—he should confine himself strictly to the duties of his office, and be debarred from engaging in any law practice in which the United States was not concerned. Now, said Mr. W., that is as reasonable as for a gentleman to tell his physician, that he should not feel the pulse of any other human being. He, (Mr. W.,) if the bill passed, would go farther than the gentleman from Georgia; he would say to such an officer, you shall not only not engage in any private practice, but you shall not be trusted with the management of any law business of the Government. Make this proviso, said Mr. W., and the bill would be a sensible one; the officer would be, what he ought to be, an agent of the Treasury; leaving the Attorney-General to manage the law concerns of the Government, and, by continual practice, to keep himself bright in his profession.

Mr. W. then argued on the inconsistency of combining the Law Department with a branch of the Treasury Department; of confining the highest law officer of the Government to the desk of a bureau, examining accounts, and superintending clerks, instead of sending him into the courts; and contended that the bill imposed duties on the Attorney-General impossible for him to perform consistently with the duties rightly belonging to him.

Mr. KING then moved to lay the bill on the table. A bill, he said, was under discussion, some days past, reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, providing for the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi; and as there was no probability that a final decision could be made at present on the bill before the Senate, he wished the one he had mentioned taken up and disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

THURSDAY, April 15.

Removal of the Indians.

The Senate resumed the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians.

In reply to Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. FORSTH said:

I regret, sir, that the amendment to the bill, proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, is not more definite and precise. His explanation of its purpose is not more satisfactory, than the amendment itself, and it is only by looking to his speech that we are relieved from embarrassment. His amendment and explanation leave us to conjecture whether he intends that the United States shall interfere with the Indians in the old States north of the Roanoke or not. His speech was plain enough. The Indians in New York, New England, Virginia, &c., &c., are to be left to the tender mercies of those States, while the arm of the General Government is to be extended to protect the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and especially the Cherokees, from the anticipated oppressions of Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia. We thank the gentleman for his amiable discrimination in our favor. He, no doubt, hopes that his zeal and industry in the Indian cause will be crowned with success; that he will be able to persuade the Senate, and his friends in the House of Representatives, to interfere, and compel the President to take new views of the relative power of the State and General Governments, and that under these new views the physical force of the country will be used, if necessary, to arrest the progress of Georgia. The expectation the gentleman has expressed, that Georgia will yield, in the event of this desirable change in the Executive course, is entirely vain. The gentleman must not indulge it; with a full and fair examination of what is right and proper, Georgia has taken her course and will pursue it. The alternative to which the Senator looks, of coercion, must be the result. While I entertain no fears that the gentleman's hopes will be realized, I consider it a matter of conscience, before entering upon the discussion of the general subject of the bill, to relieve the Senator from any apprehension that it may become necessary to cut white throats in Georgia to preserve inviolate the national faith, and to perform our treaty engagements to the Indians. It is true, the gentleman displays no morbid sensibility at the idea of shedding the blood of white men in this crusade in favor of Indian rights.

[Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN explained: he did not say he felt no morbid sensibility at the idea of shedding blood in defence of the Indians.]

Mr. FORBETH continued: I would not misapprehend the gentleman for the world, and no inducement could tempt me to misrepresent him; but I cannot be mistaken in the impression made by his remarks. The gentleman eulogized Mr. Jefferson for his letter to General Knox, of the 10th of August, 1791. He dwelt with peculiar emphasis on the spirit of that letter, and said Mr. Jefferson had no morbid sensibility at the idea of shedding blood in defence of the Indians against the whites. He wished ardently that the present Executive had spoken with the firmness and in the spirit of that letter to Georgia; he believed Georgia would have yielded, and would now yield to such language from the Executive; if she did not, the responsibility of the blood shed would be upon her head. Now, sir, although we dread no responsibility, I have so much kindness for the Senator as to wish to satisfy him, that there is no occasion for an assault upon us, notwithstanding he displayed so little sympathy for the whites—a circumstance not wonderful, however—having exhausted all his sympathy upon the red men, none for the whites could be reasonably looked for from him. I propose, then, sir, for his relief, to show that, considering this as a treaty question, arising under a fair exercise of the treaty-making power with a foreign Government, entirely unconnected with any disputes about the relative power of the State Government, and the Government of the United States, that Georgia stands perfectly justified, upon his own principles, in the steps she has chosen to take with regard to those Cherokees who reside within her territorial limits. The gentleman asserts that the Creeks and Cherokees are acknowledged to be independent nations, by treaties made, first with Georgia, and lastly with the United States; that the independence of those tribes is guaranteed by the United States; that treaties with the United States are the supreme laws of the land, and must be executed, although in collision with State constitutions and State laws. The independence of the tribes rests on this argument—that the formation of a treaty is, between the parties, an acknowledgment of mutual independence. I will not stop to show the numerous exceptions to this rule; insisting, however, that the gentleman shall admit, what I presume nobody will deny, that the two parties to a treaty, independent when it was made, may, by the terms of that instrument, change their characters, and assume those of sovereign and dependent. The gentleman has thought proper to refer to the Creeks; why, I cannot tell; they, at least, have now no business with Georgia. We are rid of them, and I hope the gentleman has no desire to bring them back upon us to aid the Cherokees. But, as he has referred to them, I will ask his attention to the first article of the treaty of Galphinton, concluded on the 12th November, 1785, parts of which he has himself quoted:

“Article 1. The said Indians, for themselves, and all the tribes or towns within their respective nations, within the limits of the State of Georgia, have been, and now are, members of the same, since the day and date of the constitution of the said State of Georgia.”

Is not this article broad enough to sustain the claim of the State to the sovereignty over the Creeks? If they were members of the State, as they acknowledged themselves to have been, from the adoption of the constitution of Georgia, what became of their separate and independent character as a nation or tribe? So much for the Creeks. I will not, in tenderness to the lately defunct administration, say more on this chapter of our Indian history. How stands it with the Cherokees? Their situation differed from that of the Creeks in this: all the Creeks who were within the United States occupied land within the territorial limits of Georgia; the Cherokees occupied a territory in North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, the greater number being in North Carolina. The treaty of De Wett's Corner, formed May 16, 1777, with South Carolina and Georgia, by the Cherokees, settles the question with the Cherokees. The first article of this treaty is in these words:

“Art. 1. The Cherokee Nation acknowledged that the troops, during the last summer, repeatedly defeated their forces, victoriously penetrated through their lower towns, middle settlements and valleys; and quietly and unopposed, built, held, and continue to occupy, the fort at Esenneca, thereby did effect and maintain the conquest of all the Cherokee lands eastward of the Unicaye mountain; and to and for their people, did acquire, possess, and yet continue to hold, in and over the said lands, all and singular, the rights incidental to conquest; and the Cherokee nation, in consequence thereof, do cede the said lands to the said people, the people of South Carolina.”

You see, sir, the Cherokees admit that South Carolina had, by conquest, acquired a right to all the land in the valleys below the Unicaye mountains. These mountains lie in Tennessee, beyond the territorial claims of South Carolina and Georgia. South Carolina conquered the country from their red neighbors; the right of conquest is admitted: the benefit of that conquest was, according to the well-known rights of Georgia and South Carolina, with both of whom the treaty was formed, to be enjoyed respectively by those States. But this is not all: no subsequent change in the political condition of the United States can be used as a pretext for denying to Georgia the claim to sovereignty over the Cherokees within her limits. We stand impreguably fortified upon treaties to which the United States are parties. Every professional man who remembers his Blackstone, knows that legislation is the highest act of sovereignty. Now, sir, by the ninth article of the treaty of Hopewell, of the 28th November, 1785, a treaty which begins with these words: "The United States give peace to all the Cherokees, and receive them into their favor and protection;" strange words to be used to an unconquered and independent nation, the Cherokees surrender to Congress the power of legislating for them at discretion. I pray the gentleman to hear it.

"For the benefit and comfort of the Indians, and for the prevention of injuries or oppressions on the part of the citizens or Indians, the United States in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right of regulating trade with the Indians, and managing all their affairs in such manner as they think proper."

This treaty, with all its burthens and benefits, fell to the new Government under the constitution, when it was established, and the power of legislating at discretion, to prevent injuries or oppressions on the part of the citizens or Indians, was one of the benefits secured by it. So much for the independence of the Cherokee nation. It may be asked, however, what has this treaty to do with the question between Georgia and the Cherokee Government? It does not follow that, because the United States have sovereignty over the Cherokees, that the State has it. The compact made by the United States with Georgia, in 1802, furnishes the satisfactory answer to this inquiry. The United States, having acquired, by the ninth article of the treaty of Hopewell, the power of legislation over the Cherokees, had the goodness to transfer it to the State. Let us see, sir, what this compact is. By the first article, Georgia ceded to the United States all her right, claim, title, &c., to the jurisdiction and soil of the lands lying west of the Cattahoochie, as far as Mississippi, &c., on specified conditions. By the second article, the United States accept the cession on the conditions expressed, and they "cede to the State of Georgia, whatever claim, right, or title, they may have to the jurisdiction and soil of any lands, lying within the United States, and out of the proper boundaries of any other State, and situated south of the southern boundaries of the States of Tennessee, North Carolina, and South Carolina, and east of the boundary line herein above described, as the eastern boundary of the territory ceded by Georgia to the United States." The Senator from New Jersey may be assured, that the Cherokees, over whom the Georgia laws are to operate, live upon the territory described in the second article of the compact of 1802, south of Tennessee, North Carolina, and South Carolina, and east of the Cattahoochie. Gentlemen may amuse themselves with finding fault with this transfer by the United States of a power granted to them, and intended to be used by the United States only. They may prove it, if they choose, an act of injustice to the Cherokees—a violation of faith. We will not take the trouble to interfere with such questions. The United States obtained, by treaty, the power to legislate over the Cherokees, and transferred it to Georgia. The justice and propriety of this transfer must be settled by the United States and the Cherokees. In this settlement Georgia has her burthen to bear, as one of the members of the Union; but no more than her fair proportion. If any pecuniary sacrifices are required to do justice to the injured, let them be made: if a sacrifice of blood is demanded as a propitiation for this sin, to avert the judgment of Heaven, let the victim be selected. Justice demands that it be furnished by the whole country, and not by Georgia; and if the honorable Senator from New Jersey will fix upon one between the Delaware and the Hudson, he will escape all imputations of being actuated by any motive but the love of justice—pure justice. For us it is enough to have shown, that what we claim is in our bond, and until the gentleman can rail off the seal, our claim must be allowed, though it should extend to the penalty of a pound of flesh. Yes, sir, we claim, and we will have the penalty of the bond—the pound of flesh, not in the Shylock spirit to destroy; we will take it upon the conditions prescribed by the learned doctor in the court of Venice, the gentle Portia—"Not one drop of blood shall be shed;" we will take our "just pound," neither "more nor less, by one poor scruple;" the balance in which our rights are weighed shall stand precisely even; neither scale shall descend below the other "the ninth part of a hair." Respect for the Senator from New Jersey will not permit me to charge him with any premeditated obliquity of vision; but certainly, when it is recollected that all the treaties I have presented to the Senate were examined and quoted by him, it is strange by what fatality it was, that his eye did not for a moment rest upon either of the pregnant provisions to which I have endeavored to direct his attention. There they stand, conclusive refutations of all his arguments founded upon other provisions of the same or subsequent instruments, unless he is able to prove that they have been formally altered by the parties to them.

Sir, said Mr. F., having shown, if not to the satisfaction of the Senator from New Jersey, I trust to that of the Senate, that upon the principles assumed by the adversaries of the bill, Georgia stands justified in her course; I shall proceed to submit a few observations on the subject of the disposition which ought to be made of the Indians within the United States. The preliminary inquiry was not merely with a view to relieve the mind of the Senator from New Jersey from painful apprehensions, but to show to the Senate that our opinions on the great subject of the aborigines were not formed to suit our interests, nor at all influenced by them; that there was no motive operating upon our minds to tempt us into erroneous judgments. The condition of the remnants of the once formidable tribes of Indians is known to be deplorable: all admit that there is something due to the remaining individuals of the race; all desire to grant more than is justly due for their preservation and civilization. Recently great efforts have been made to excite the public mind into a state of unreasonable and jealous apprehension in their behalf. The evidences of these efforts are before us in petitions that have been pouring in from different parts of the country. The clergy, the laity, the lawyers, and the ladies, have been dragged into the service and united to press upon us. But these efforts have been unavailing: the people are too well informed to be deluded; they have too much confidence in the justice and wisdom of the administration to be misled by persons who have united, at this eleventh hour, in opposition to a project which has been steadily kept in view by three administrations. To show what has been attempted, I pray the Senate to attend to an extract of a letter received from a most respectable and intelligent gentleman in one of the New England States. [Here Mr. F. read the extract which follows:]

"An attempt is making in the Eastern States to create a great deal of sympathy for this people; and the attempt is making, so far as I can discover, by what is termed the 'Christian party in politics.' Petitions to Congress have been got up, printed and circulated through the New England States for signatures, without any post mark to indicate their starting point; they have been forwarded to every town; addressed to 'Congregational clergymen of — or either of his deacons,' with instructions to have them filled with as many signatures as can be obtained, and then forwarded to Congress with as little delay as possible. These petitions supplicate Congress to protect the Indians in the occupancy and enjoyment of the lands where they reside, and the civil regulations they may adopt for their own government. Many of these petitions probably have reached Congress before this time."

Considering the means employed, it is surprising, not that we have petitions before us, but that we have so few, and to the Southern section of the Union it is a consolation to know that these efforts to prejudice the question of their rights should have, in many instances, produced a fair investigation of them, and the expressions of popular opinion in their behalf, the more precious since they were spontaneous, the offspring of honest conviction, and not of political arrangement. That many respectable persons have been deceived, is not disputed. They have been the unresisting instruments of the artful and designing, and ministered to political malignity, while they believed themselves laboring in the cause of justice and humanity.

Two evidences of such delusions are before me. A circular printed for the signature of the ladies, and forwarded to me with a note, "read with a view to eternity," as if I were in danger of eternal punishment if I did not abandon the defence of the position taken by Georgia, on which I have already perilled my reputation as a politician, and stand responsible as an accountable being. The other, sir, is, to judge by its contents, the work of an amiable Revolutionary soldier, (Alpheus Camden, of Long Island, he signs himself) who expresses the deepest conviction of the propriety of his opinions, and urges me, as I dread the horrors of an Indian and a servile war, to retrace my own steps, and correct the opinions of the State. These delusions will pass away; this venerable man, like all others who have been misled, will soon know that they misunderstood both our principles and our purposes, and have formed on this subject crude judgments without the knowledge of the facts necessary to a correct decision; and without due reflection upon the past or the future.

Funeral Honors to Gen. Smyth.

After the sitting was opened:—

A message having been received from the House of Representatives, by their clerk, announcing the demise of the honorable ALEXANDER SMYTH, one of the Representatives in Congress from the State of Virginia:—

Mr. TYLER, of Virginia, rose and addressed the Senate as follows:

The death of ALEXANDER SMYTH, just announced to us, leaves a considerable void in society. For the long period of probably forty years, he has been engaged in public life. His services in the Virginia Legislature will long be remembered, while his career in the House of Representatives will best attest his character. Possessing fine talents, with a mind logical and precise, his manners were retiring and unobtrusive. If he did not possess the suaviter in modo, he undeniably possessed the fortiter in re. His speeches, delivered in the various stations which he has filled, will survive as the best monument of his virtue, industry, and his intellectual firmness and strength. With high claims to public preferment, he preferred to rest for his support upon the people of the district in the service of which he has died, and that people have over and over again awarded to him the highest meed of their approbation, and know best how to estimate his services. As a mark of respect to his memory, I move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate will attend the funeral of the honorable ALEXANDER SMYTH, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia, this day, at twelve o'clock; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, they will go into mourning, and wear crape round the left arm for thirty days.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; and then,

On motion of Mr. TAZEWELL, of Virginia, the Senate adjourned.

Massachusetts' Claim.

The bill to authorize the payment of the claim of the State of Massachusetts, for militia services during the late war, having been taken up—

Mr. BENTON, as Chairman of the Military Committee, by which the bill had been reported, rose to explain it. He said the claim was founded on militia services rendered during the late war, and had been thirteen years before the Federal Government for payment. It had been in a continued state of examination, either by Executive officers or by Committees of Congress during all that time; and the results of these examinations had been uniformly the same, namely, that a part of the claims rest on the same principles on which claims from other States rested which have been paid, and of course ought to be paid also. The brief history of these examinations and results, is this: these claims were first presented at the War Office in 1817, and filed for examination. In 1822, the delegations in Congress from Massachusetts and Maine presented a memorial to the President, asking an examination and settlement of them. In 1823, the third auditor of the Treasury was directed to audit them, and to proceed on the same principles which had governed the settlement of like claims from other States. In 1824, the President, (Mr. MONROE,) having carefully examined the proceedings of the auditor, brought the claims before Congress in a special message, and recommended that provision should be made for their payment, to the extent that like claims had been paid from other States. This message went to the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, which reported favorably; but as their report did not ripen into a law, the subject was referred again to the same committee in 1826, and a favorable report again made. That payment of the claims, to a certain extent, ought to be made, seemed then to be agreed on all hands; but the accounts were numerous, complex, and depending upon variety of testimony, as well as on different principles. A body so numerous as the House of Representatives, found it difficult to examine particulars and liquidate a long account; and they did what every public body ought to do under the like circumstances: they referred it to the accounting officers to make the examination, and report the amount which ought to be paid. The reference was to the War Department, and the third auditor was charged with the business. He occupied himself about it for nearly eighteen months, a period of time which I mention particularly, to show the degree of care which a most careful officer bestowed upon the examination, and reported in favor of about one-half of the amount of these claims. The entire claim was for eight hundred and forty-three thousand six hundred and one dollars and thirty-four cents; the report is for four hundred and thirty thousand seven hundred and forty-eight dollars and twenty-six cents. To the amount thus allowed, the bill now before the Senate is limited. It proposes to pay what the third auditor has found to be due under the reference made to him. I consider this bill in the light of an appropriation, to meet a liquidated demand. The third auditor is the officer of the Government; he has adjusted the account under the instructions of the House of Representatives; and the payment, unless his settlement can be impeached, would seem to follow as a matter of course. I have seen no reason to impeach his settlement. The committee to whom it was referred saw none. References to the opinions of a committee may not be strictly regular; but, in this case, it may be allowable, and I can say that our opinion was unanimous in reporting this bill. Prejudices have prevailed against these claims. I have felt these prejudices. I have seen the time when I never expected to vote for their payment. These prejudices continued until it became my duty to examine them; and that examination has resulted with me, as with all others who made it, in the conviction that a large part of them ought to be paid.

Mr. SILSBEE said, that after the satisfactory explanation of this case, which had been given by the Senator from Missouri, who presides over the committee which had just investigated it, he should be much more brief in his remarks upon it than he might otherwise have been. But as the bill was introduced by me, (said Mr. S.,) in the discharge of what I conceived to be my duty to the State which I have the honor in part to represent in this body, it may be expected of me, in pursuance of that duty, to say a few words in its support.

This Massachusetts' claim (said Mr. S.) is a claim not only of one, but of two sovereign States of the Union—Massachusetts and Maine; for military expenditures by the people of those States, (then forming but one State,) for the defence of the State against a foreign and common enemy. This claim has been over thirteen years under the scrutiny of the different branches of this Government. In February, 1817, it was presented for payment to the Executive branch of the Government; and at the succeeding session of Congress of 1817-'18, it was presented to the consideration of the House of Representatives, and it has been before that branch of the Legislature, or the Executive branch of the Government, or travelling by the side of Presidential messages, or Congressional resolutions, from one to the other, from that time to this, receiving favorable reports from each, and from all, but no payment yet from either. Under these circumstances, and aware of the just complaints of the Government and people of Massachusetts of such delay, I considered it to be my duty, after consultation with the other Representatives of that State in Congress, to present this claim, for the first time, to the consideration of the Senate, where, it was hoped, a prompt and just decision would be obtained upon it.

Massachusetts' Claim.

This claim has been presented and urged for payment, as a fair and just one, not only by the administration of Massachusetts under which it originated, but by every succeeding administration of that State, from that time to the present moment; in the course of which time we have had four different Chief Magistrates in Massachusetts, all of whom were perfectly acquainted with the whole history of this claim; and two of them (the late Governor Eustis and the present Governor Lincoln) ardent supporters of the late war and of the measures of the General Government connected with it. We have also had, in the course of this time, sixteen different Legislatures in Massachusetts, coming annually from the people, and possessing their views upon the subject; and every one of these Legislatures have, I believe, united with the different Executives of the State in support of this claim.

Although ready and willing, sir, to go into a full investigation of this claim, I shall avoid trespassing so far upon the time of the Senate as would be requisite for that purpose, unless it becomes necessary, for the present, at least, to a few remarks in relation to it. Although the enemy was on our coast, capturing our shipping and other property, and occasionally committing depredations upon some of our most exposed towns, in the course of the years 1812 and 1813, yet it was not until 1814, and after the peace in Europe, that we became seriously apprehensive of invasion. And the expenditures embraced by this claim, with the exception of two or three thousand dollars, accrued after April, 1814, and the bill now under consideration embraces only such parts of the claim as, after the most rigid and prolonged scrutiny, by every branch of the Government, have been found to come within the rules and principles which have been observed in the settlement of similar claims of other States—not what has been asked by the creditor, but what the debtor admits to be due. Sir, but for these expenditures, the State of Massachusetts must, and would have been invaded, and much of its property captured or destroyed; for, as is shown by one of your own officers then in command there, there were not a sufficient number of United States troops within the State of Massachusetts, if they had all been drawn to one point, to man the guns of one of its fortifications; and, sir, here let me add, that by a portion of these expenditures, the property of the United States was prevented falling into the hands of the enemy. Yes, sir, your navy yards at Charlestown and Portsmouth, and the public ships, then lying at them, were defended, and successfully defended, by the militia of Massachusetts, as can be shown by the correspondence of your own officers. [Here Mr. SILSBEE read extracts of letters from General Dearborn, from Commodore Bainbridge, from the Adjutant General of Massachusetts, and from the then Secretary of the Navy.]

Sir, (continued Mr. S.,) during the whole Summer of 1814, the whole seacoast of Massachusetts was kept in a constant state of alarm, so much so, that but little else was thought of by any one but the defence of his person, his property, and his country: the enemy was not only on our coast, but often in our harbors; invasion and the destruction of property were daily and nightly apprehended, during the whole season; to prevent which, guards were established on the whole extent of the coast; many of the militia constantly on duty, not only the militia of the seaboard, but that of the interior, were often marched to the coast and kept on duty, for the protection of the public, as well as private property, which was there located, and the whole militia of the State under orders to march at the shortest notice. A large portion of these services were rendered on sudden and pressing occasions, to meet "invasion or well-founded apprehensions of invasion," and are such as come clearly within the class of claims which has been allowed and paid to other States. Sir, no one who has examined the documents appertaining to this claim, can, I think, have failed to be convinced, that during the summer of 1814, the State of Massachusetts was in constant and imminent danger of invasion, and without any other means of defence than its own militia, acting, some under United States officers, some under their own officers, and all acting in concert and upon plans of operation, mutually agreed upon by the officers of the United States, (both military and naval,) and the officers of the State. By this union of council and operation, the State was protected from invasion by the people of the State, at their own expense, and at less expense than it could otherwise have been done, for which they ask such remuneration, and only such, as has been made for the like services, rendered by their fellow-citizens of other States; they expect no less, they ask no more; but, sir, they have been asking for this a long time.

[Mr. SILSBEE here gave a statement of the proceedings upon this claim, by the executive and legislative branches of the General Government, from its first presentation in February, 1817, to the present time, and read extracts from the reports of the different committees of the House of Representatives, to which it had been referred in 1818, in 1824, and in 1826; also from the special messages of the late President Monroe, of 1823, 1824, and 1825, and from the resolution of the House of Representatives of December, 1826, under the authority of which the report of the Third Auditor was made, upon which the bill before the Senate was founded.]

which have been furnished by the Government of the United States, in relation to this claim, that the late President Monroe, (than whom no one knew more of its history, and who had no reason to entertain predilections for it,) in three special messages to Congress, recommended its settlement and payment, according to the rules by which similar claims of other States had been adjusted and paid. And every Committee of Congress to whom it has been referred, (and it has now been under the consideration of four different committees,) have been led to the same conclusion, and have reported that it ought to be paid to that extent. The amount specified in the bill now under consideration, is that which has been found to be due, by an investigation of the most scrutinizing officer of this Government, under a resolution of the House of Representatives, founded upon the recommendations and reports just mentioned. And it is now before the Senate with these high testimonials in its support. Such testimonials, emanating from such sources of information in relation to this claim, seem to be sufficient to show that it needs only to be examined, to be approved by all, of which, if any doubt remained, that doubt must be considered as entirely removed by the frank and honorable avowal of the chairman of the committee; that the examination which he has been called to make of it, has removed the unfavorable impressions which he had previously entertained towards it, so far, at least, as to satisfy him of the justice of passing this bill. Deeming it needless at present to trouble the Senate with a more detailed representation of this claim, I shall forbear doing so, unless it should hereafter become necessary. I shall, however, willingly meet any questions that may be proposed, and afford any and every information I possess in relation to it, which may be asked.

Mr. HOLMES made also a few remarks in explanation and support of the claim; after which

The question was put, and the bill ordered to a third reading without a division.

Removal of the Indians.

The consideration of the bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi, was resumed.

Mr. ADAMS said he was sure that all must feel embarrassment in addressing, for the first time, the Senate of the United States; and, especially, on a subject of so much importance as that now under consideration. But mine (said he) is greatly increased from never before having been a member of a legislative assembly. But I feel great encouragement, from a knowledge that this circumstance will increase towards me the generous indulgence and courtesy for which this body is so distinguished; and I feel that it will be owing to that indulgence that I will be able to lay before the Senate the few imperfect observations which occur to me on the subject before us.

The question, which is submitted to us by the bill itself, as reported to the Senate by the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, is this: whether Congress will authorize the President of the United States to exchange territory belonging to the United States west of the river Mississippi, and not within the limits of any State or organized Territory, with any tribe of Indians, or the individuals of such tribe, now residing within the limits of any State or Territory, and with whom the United States have any existing treaties, who may voluntarily choose to make such exchange for the lands which such tribe of Indians, or the individuals of such tribe, at present occupy; to compensate individuals of those tribes for improvements made upon the lands they now occupy; to pay the expenses of their removal and settlement in the country west of the Mississippi, and provide them necessary subsistence for one year thereafter.

The authority contemplated by the bill is, to make the exchange of territory with those Indians, and with those only who are willing to make it. The friends of this measure do not wish to vest power in the President of the United States to assign a district of country west of the Mississippi, and, by strong arm, to drive these unfortunate people from their present abode, and compel them to take up their residence in the country assigned to them. On the contrary, it is their wish that this exchange should be left to the free and voluntary choice of the Indians themselves.

Is there any thing alarming in this proposition? any thing to cause that fear and trembling for the fate of the unfortunate Indian, which have been manifested in the opposition to this bill? Is there any thing to call forth those animated denunciations against those who disregard and violate the faith of treaties? As if those who support this measure were ready to prostrate at the foot of their own sordid interest the honor of the nation, and inflict a stain upon her escutcheon that all the waters of the Mississippi could not wash out. I confess, for my own part, I can see nothing in the provisions of the bill before us unbecoming the character of a great, just, and magnanimous nation. And, indeed, if I had heard only so much of the eloquent speeches of those who oppose the passage of the bill as enjoined upon us the strictest good faith in the observance of treaties, I would have concluded that they were the warmest advocates of the proposed measure.

As early as the year 1802, the United States entered into a compact with the State of Georgia, which compact was ratified in the most solemn manner, being approved by the Congress of the United States and by the Legislature of the State of Georgia. By this agreement, the United States obtained from the State of Georgia a cession of territory, sufficient, in extent, to form two large States, and in part consideration for such an immense acquisition of territory, agreed, on their part, in the most solemn manner, to extinguish, for the use of Georgia, the Indian title to all the lands situated within the limits of that State, "as soon as the same could be done peaceably and upon reasonable terms." Although this is not, in the technical sense of the term, a treaty entered into by the United States with the State of Georgia, yet it is an agreement upon a full and valuable consideration; and good faith on the part of the United States requires its fulfillment, according to its true spirit and intent. The bill under consideration proposes a mode by which this agreement may be performed; by which the Indian title to all the lands within the boundaries of that State may be extinguished, peaceably, and upon reasonable terms. Peaceably, because it is only to operate upon those Indians who are willing to remove. And upon reasonable terms, because they are to receive other lands in exchange for those which they give up; just compensation for improvements made by them; the expense of their removal and settlement paid, and subsistence for one year furnished them. Would it not, therefore, have been reasonable to suppose, that those who have said so much about the high and sacred obligation of treaties, and how essentially the great name of every nation depends upon their strict observance, would be amongst the warmest and warmest supporters of the bill under consideration? And certainly it was matter of astonishment to me to find that all their mighty efforts had another aim. And, as an excuse for that, we are told, that although this bill appears harmless on the face of it; that although all its exterior seems well ordered, and no objection can be urged against it in the abstract, yet there are facts and circumstances so connected with it as to make it in the highest degree objectionable, and to justify the unsparing animadversions which have been bestowed upon it.

The following portion of the Message of the President of the United States to the present Congress, has been read, and urged as one of the causes of alarm.

[Here Mr. A. read several paragraphs from the Message to which he had alluded.]

The principle insisted on in this part of the Message, denying to the Indian tribes within the limits of the States the rights of separate government; recommending to them to remove beyond the Mississippi, and declaring to them, distinctly, that, if they remain within the limits of the States, they must submit to the laws of the States within whose limits they reside, is contrary to the provisions of the treaties made by the United States with several of those tribes, and now existing in full force—particularly with the Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees; that the acts of the Legislatures of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, extending the laws of those several States over the Indians residing within their respective limits, are also in violation of those treaties; that they are calculated to compel the emigration of those tribes; and, to counteract and defeat the operation of the opinion expressed by the President of the United States, and this improper legislation, as it is called, of those States, an amendment has been offered. The amendment is in these words: "Provided, always, that, until the said tribes or nations shall choose to remove, as by this act is contemplated, they shall be protected in their present possessions, and in the enjoyment of all their rights of territory and government, as heretofore exercised and enjoyed, from all interruption and encroachments."

This is, perhaps, the first attempt, by an act of Congress, to operate directly on the legislation of the States, which has been made since the institution of this Government, and it is to be hoped, it will be the last. The avowed intention is, to interpose the power of the Federal Government to prevent the action of the laws of the States in question, within their own acknowledged boundaries, and to exempt from the influence of those laws a portion of the population. It has sometimes happened to States that acts of their Legislatures have been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, and, consequently, inoperative and void in the particular case in question. The Supreme Court, however, act on a single statute at a time; but, in the mode proposed by the amendment in question, Congress may sweep off whole codes in a moment by a single clause. It is plain, then, if the bill pass with this amendment, that the laws of the States and of the Federal Government must come into collision. The bill speaks of tribes residing within any State or Territory, and with whom the United States have existing treaties. Treaties exist between the United States and Indians residing within the States of New York, Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, and the Legislatures of all these States have extended all, or a part of their laws over those Indian tribes respectively. The collision which will arise between the laws of the Federal Government and of the States will extend to four of the States of the Union. And if the federal law be constitutional, the President of the United States will be bound by his oath of office to see that it shall be faithfully executed. And gentlemen have told us that, if milder means will not answer the purpose, the strong arm of the Government must be employed; by which I understand that a military force must be arrayed against the contumacious States, to bring them into subjection, and to compel them to acknowledge the right of the Indian tribes to live under their own usages, government, and law.

Let us see what will be the practical operation of this Indian protective system. According to the usages and laws of the nations of Indians residing within the State of New York, witchcraft is declared to be a crime, and capital punishment is to be inflicted upon those who are found guilty. But, by the laws of the State of New York, extended over those tribes, the infliction of such punishment by any one of the tribe, for such supposed offence, is declared to be murder, and the offender is liable to be convicted, and to suffer the penalty of the law in such cases. Here is a conflict of laws, and under the proviso in question, the Indian tribe, upon complaint made to the Executive of the United States, to see that they should be protected in the enjoyment of their own government, usages, and laws, and upon the refusal of the State of New York to yield to the persuasion of the President of the United States, and to surrender all claim to govern the people within her limits—the strong arm of this Government—its military force must be interposed to protect the Indian tribes, and to see that they enjoy the usage of punishing their own witches in their own way.

By a law of the Cherokee republic, a plurality of wives is authorized: but, by the laws of Georgia and Alabama, this is regarded as a crime, and those who are guilty are liable to severe punishment. But, by the guarantee contemplated in this proviso, if the laws of Georgia or Alabama were to interpose between the privileged Cherokee, and the enjoyment of his fifty wives, all that would be necessary to ensure that enjoyment, would be to call on the Executive Department of this Government, point to the guarantee, claim its execution, and, if nothing else will do, the claims of Georgia and Alabama must be silenced by the military force of the nation.

By a usage of the Choctaws, homicide is punishable with death in all cases, with a single exception, which exception is when one man kills another in a ball play. But, by the laws of Mississippi, it is excusable when done in self-defence, and to save the life of the person attacked. But if the laws of that State were to interfere to prevent the life of an innocent man from falling a sacrifice to this absurd and barbarous usage, the laws of the Union would be violated, and the State must submit to chastisement for an act of humanity.

But the argument on the other side shows this proviso to be unnecessary. For, it is insisted that, by virtue of treaties now existing, the separate existence as nations, of the several Indian tribes within the limits of those States, is acknowledged, and that, in their character of nations, the United States have promised them protection; and that, by virtue of the obligation of treaties, this protection ought to be extended to them. If such treaties exist, and they are the supreme law of the land, then no additional supremacy can be conferred by the proviso, and no additional obligation can be imposed on the Executive Department of the Government, to do that which is already enjoined by treaties. The argument, therefore, shows all farther legislation to be unnecessary.

The Cherokee tribe of Indians having erected an independent Government within the limits of the States of Georgia and Alabama, and those two States claiming the rights of exclusive sovereignty within their respective limits, extended their laws over those Indians. Under these circumstances, an appeal was made to the Executive of the United States by those Indians, claiming to be protected in the enjoyment of the Government which they had established for themselves. The question was then submitted for the decision of the President of the United States, and, under the oath which he had taken to support the constitution, he determined that no such Government could be erected without the consent of the States within which it was formed. The question is, therefore, decided as to them. If it was unconstitutional, under the state of things which then existed, it would continue to be unconstitutional under the proposed amendment; and it would never do for Congress to reconsider a question of constitutional law, decided by either of the other distinct and independent departments of the Government, upon a question properly submitted to such departments, and reverse that decision. If they can do so in regard to the Executive, why not in regard to the Judiciary? For both the Executive and Judiciary derive the power of decision from the same source, not because it is expressly said in the constitution, that the Judiciary or the Executive shall disregard a law not made in conformity to that instrument, but because each is required to take an oath to support the constitution as the paramount law; and when any statute or any treaty is made or passed contrary to its provisions, each of those departments before which the question may arise, is bound to declare it a nullity. The Executive has, then, upon the matter fairly submitted to it, decided the constitutional question, as to the Government erected by the tribe of Cherokees, and no law which we can pass can possibly change the principle of that decision. It rests upon the authority of the constitution itself.

But it seems that, for the sake of doing justice to Indian rights, all things are to be resolved into their original elements, and we are called upon to decide the subject before us according to the principles of abstract justice.

The vast country which now forms the United States, with the exception of Louisiana, was, at one time, subject to the jurisdiction and sovereign dominion of Great Britain. She claimed it by right of discovery and conquest, and, added to this, the superior claims of an agricultural over a savage and barbarous people. This title has always heretofore been considered sufficient by the jurist and the statesman, and no inquiry beyond it has been thought necessary, or even tolerable; and it has been left to the sympathies—the mistaken sympathies, as I must call them—of the present day, to call up this title of the savage from its sleep of ages, and urge it on this floor and elsewhere, as prior and paramount to that of civilized nations.

If gentlemen are really in earnest in the opinions which they have expressed; if the remonstrants who have loaded your table with their petitions, are really in earnest; if the pamphleteers who have inundated the country with abuse upon the present administration, and poured out the phials of their unsparing wrath upon Georgia, are really in earnest; if they really believe that civilized man has lawlessly usurped the territory and dominion of the barbarian, then let them show their sincerity and consistency by asking for this much-injured and almost exterminated race, that ample measure of justice which the magnanimity of their professions purport; let them not only ask, but do justice; call them back from the deep wilderness to which they have been driven; restore to them this fair and happy land, from which they have been cruelly expelled; give them up your fields, houses, cities, temples of justice, and halls of legislation. All I have to ask is, that those whose sense of justice is with them a principle so prevailing, shall begin this retrograde to barbarism at home; that they shall first surrender that which more immediately concerns themselves, and over which they would seem to have a more direct control, and then call upon us to follow an example so worthy. But I think it is not difficult to foresee that this work of restoration would not proceed far before the pretended philanthropist would quarrel with his own rule of abstract justice, and content himself with permitting things to remain as they are.

THURSDAY, April 22.

On motion of Mr. HAYNE, the bill providing for the further regulation of the Patent Office was taken up for consideration, together with an amendment proposing to admit foreigners to the privilege of patenting inventions in this country, and increase the fees both to foreigners and on our citizens.

Mr. H. explained its object, and the circumstances which induced them to adopt the amendment. It appeared that a number of petitions from foreigners had been regularly before the Committee on the Judiciary, for special laws to enable them to exercise their inventions in this country; and were productive of great expense to the nation, as well as to the individual applicant. In consequence of this inconvenience both to the patentee and the country, the committee had come to the conclusion to admit the subjects or citizens of all other States, Empires, and Kingdoms to take out patents in this country, subject to the laws of their respective countries, by paying two hundred dollars into our Treasury, instead of seventy-five dollars, the amount of the sum claimed by the provisions of this bill from our own citizens.

Mr. DICKERSON said he had doubts about the propriety of adopting the amendment proposed to the bill, or even the first section of the bill itself. He was of opinion that the sum required by the present law for the privilege of taking out a patent was quite sufficient. He believed it was now placed at thirty dollars; and, if he was called upon for an opinion on this subject, he would reduce instead of increasing the fees. He thought it was the duty of Congress, as it was the interest of the country, to promote, and not to discourage, the inventive genius of those who devote their talents, ingenuity, and time, in prosecuting discoveries in the useful arts, for the benefit of the country. It was well known (said Mr. D.) that many of those who applied for patents had exhausted all their little means in perfecting their discoveries and rendering them serviceable to the country; and if difficulties were thrown in the way of taking out patents, their inventions could not be tested, and their utility lost both to the inventor and the country. He was opposed to that feature in the amendment which proposed to raise the fees on foreign patentees to two hundred dollars; because if it be admitted that the patents are of importance to the country, as he believed all would admit, then he thought that all should be placed on the same footing.

Mr. HAYNE said, at an early period of the session, a communication was received by the committee from the Secretary of State, covering a report from the Superintendent of the Patent Office, recommending what ought to be done for the better regulation of the institution; and stating, among other things, that great inconvenience had resulted from the low sum for which patents can be obtained, in consequence of which the office was crowded with a number of useless inventions, of no earthly use to the patentees or the public. The committee, after the examination of the subject, with such lights as were presented to them, thought it would be better by raising the price of patents, to restrict the issuing of them in such numbers, rather than throw open the doors so widely as hitherto, for the admission into the office of useless lumber, by which the business of the office was increased, and the community at large, in a great many instances, imposed on. In raising the price of a patent from thirty dollars to seventy dollars, the committee were of opinion that no useful invention would be prevented from being known; though he thought there could be no doubt that the increase of price would have a salutary effect in preventing applications from ignorant or unworthy persons. With regard to that branch of the amendment which permitted the issuing of patents to foreigners, in certain cases, he would observe that the committee had been subjected to much trouble for several years past, in consequence of applications from that class of persons who could not obtain patents under the existing laws. He thought it much better to establish a general principle by law, for granting patents to foreigners, than to legislate, as heretofore, for each individual case, after subjecting the committee to the labors of an investigation and report. To the gentleman from New Jersey, he would reply that there could be no difficulty in the way of the superintendent's ascertaining the laws of other countries in relation to patents, so as to grant them to citizens of countries which did not exclude ours from like privileges; the usages of foreign countries under their patent laws were not necessary. A difference ought to be made between our own citizens and foreigners; and the committee, in establishing the difference, had turned their eyes towards England and France, and had ascertained that the fees paid in those countries were higher than any proposed to be fixed by the bill.

Mr. HOLMES observed, that it seemed to him, the two additional clerks called for in the bill, for the performance of the supposed increased duties of the Patent Office, were rather unnecessary, when viewed in connection with the other amendments proposed by the committee on the Judiciary. By these amendments, it was proposed to increase the fees for obtaining patents; and the reasons assigned for this increase of fees, were to exclude the immense number of useless inventions which were daily presented at the Patent Office. It appeared to him (Mr. H.) that, if the reasoning of the committee were correct, a diminution of clerical duties in the office must follow as an inevitable consequence. He thought we got along very well under our present law, and was inclined to believe that the amendments would, instead of removing evils, be productive of many. The increasing of fee, he did not believe, would sift out the useful from the useless inventions. They depended upon experiment, and the valuable are as liable to be excluded as the worthless. He would mention the invention of the cotton gin, the nail-casting machine, and propelling boats by steam, any one of which was of more advantage to the nation than would counterbalance all the evils intended to be removed by the amendments; yet all might have been lost to the country under these amendments. With respect to the clause relating to foreigners, he thought it in some measure a proper one. The committee had to encounter a great deal of labor in presenting their petitions, examining their claims, and their bills, and vast expense was incurred by the country; but (as we understood him) the fees exacted from them were too high. He thought that, instead of two hundred dollars, the fee might safely be reduced to one hundred dollars.

Mr. McKINLEY said, that great unanimity had prevailed in the committee with regard to the amount of the fees to be charged for patents. On that subject there had been no difficulty. The great difficulty had been so to frame the law as to prevent the issuing of patents for useless inventions. It had been at length settled that the increasing of the fees would have the effect of lessening the number of patents. The committee had had another object in view; and this was to increase the responsibility of the officers charged with the management of the business; for it had been found that many patents had issued where the fees had not been accounted for; and it was to provide against this that the first section had been framed. Mr. McK. thought there was no danger of any useful inventions being excluded from the public notice in consequence of the increase of fees to seventy dollars; that sum was too small to prevent any one from taking out a patent for any invention of sufficient importance to promise him any remuneration for his skill and labor. With regard to the proposed charge of two hundred dollars for a patent to a foreigner, he thought with the gentleman from South Carolina, that some distinction ought to be made between citizens and strangers, and that settling some definite principle on which they might be admitted to the privileges of our Patent Office, would be preferable to leaving their cases to separate legislation.

Mr. ROWAN thought the honorable gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. DICKERSON) had not given the subject that reflection to which its importance entitled it. He was of opinion that seventy-five dollars, the sum to which the fees were proposed to be increased, would not prevent the inventors of what are really useful from obtaining a patent; because they will always be able to purchase a patent if the invention be valuable. But the people of this country had been frequently imposed on by their Eastern brethren, who travel over the country with their patented notions, which they sell to the honest and unsuspecting farmers. When they had not money, the patentees would dispose of their notions for notes or obligations; but, before the note or obligation becomes due, the imposition is found out—payment is refused—suit is entered, and the industrious farmer is dragged at a great expense and inconvenience from his business to the Federal court. He had seen many such cases himself. He mentioned a patent for distilling by steam, and another for a "bulkhead," that were old and utterly useless, though they were sold, and the purchaser brought a great distance to the Federal court to defend himself against the imposition. He did not suppose that the great discoverers of the cotton gin, the steamboat, &c., could have been lost from the fee being raised to seventy-five dollars. But when the fee is only twenty or thirty dollars, every trifling notion is patented, to the injury of the people, and the patentee not frequently. He did not think that our countrymen required much legal encouragement to stimulate the spirit of improvement. Let any one go into the Patent Office, and he will find that the spirit is not very sluggish. It was prudent, to be sure, not to damp it by imposing an enormous tax. As it related to the tax on foreign patentees, the committee were influenced in placing it at two hundred dollars from having understood that that fee was smaller than what is required by the laws of foreign nations. In reply to the idea advanced by the Senator from Maine (Mr. HOLMES) that the increase of fees would decrease the duty of the office, and consequently so far remove the necessity for clerks, Mr. R. reminded the gentleman from Maine, that if his reasoning were correct, still the duties of the office have more than doubled, and hence the necessity for the additional clerks provided for by the bill. He had understood that the revenue derived from the office would support these clerks, and still leave a surplus to go into the Treasury. Unless as a general measure, Mr. R. had no particular concern for this office; but as it was necessary and important to the country, he thought that the arrangement and provisions of the bill would have a salutary tendency.

Mr. DICKERSON observed, it was true, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, that he was not much acquainted with the subject. He did not before know that a bill of that nature had been before the Senate. His opinion still was, and he thought that a little reflection would bring the gentleman from Kentucky to the same conclusion, that there was no necessity of increasing the fees for patents. Any increase of fees could only be made for one or two objects—for purposes of revenue, or for the sake of diminishing the number of patents. Now, although he was perfectly willing to increase the number of clerks in the Patent Office, he never wished to see any revenue derived from it; and as to the idea of diminishing the issue of patents, he could not see how the increasing of the fees could possibly have that effect. Those who gave their time to the invention and improvement of machinery, could, either through the instrumentality of friends, or on the credit of a useful invention, raise money enough to pay for the patent; and those whose inventions were not useful, would be most apt, through want of skill, to set a high value on them; and procure, by some means or other, the price of a patent. But the gentleman from Kentucky talked of the number of Eastern notions, by means of which the people of his State had been defrauded. Now Mr. D. would only observe, that notions were not peculiar to the people of the East—they were to be found everywhere—as well in the North, South, and West, as in the East; and those who did not like Eastern notions, might turn the tables on them. Mr. D. would have no objection to any reasonable plan for diminishing the number of patents issuing from the Patent Office, for he believed as much folly was collected there as ever was collected together in any one place in the world; but he did not believe that any increase of fees would remedy the evil; it would only have the effect of laying a tax on genius, without producing any good. With regard to that part of the bill which charges two hundred dollars for the patent to foreigners, he was opposed to it, and moved to strike out "two hundred," and insert fifty dollars.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he thought the provision respecting foreigners a very fair one—it was one of perfect reciprocity. He would suggest one idea to the chairman of the committee that presented the amendment relating to the admission of foreigners to the benefits of the patent law—it is this: when patents are granted under the existing laws, the patentees have the exclusive right to dispose of their rights, and, when they are sold, it is in our own country; but the privilege to foreigners, by the provisions of the bill, are such, that if they do not choose to sell in this country, we are deprived of the advantage of using them for fourteen years, while their own country may be enjoying the use of them. All know the jealousy that exists in other countries in relation to this subject, and the fear that we should become acquainted with the principles of their inventions.

Mr. HAYNE observed, that, as far as the committee had been able to ascertain, the regulations, or nearly similar, which prevailed here in relation to patent laws, prevailed in Europe. There was no possibility of regulating, by law, the sale of patented inventions; but he believed if any foreigner took out a patent and refused to sell, he would incur a forfeiture. A provision might be inserted in the bill, that the foreign patentee must sell; but he must also be allowed to fix his price. That difficulty was inseparable from the subject. It appeared to him, (Mr. H.,) that the only security to be had, was in that strong sense of interest which would induce every man to sell out his invention speedily, for the purpose of realizing the expected profit.

Mr. CHAMBERS, in reply to the observations of the gentleman from Georgia, said, that if the citizen or subject of a foreign power were to obtain a patent in this country for an invention, in order to restrict its use to his own country, an American citizen might use it, subject to an action for damages in a court of law; and if a foreigner were to come here to obtain a patent for the purpose of prohibiting for using it, he was of opinion that a court of justice would not award much damages for a violation of the law, when, in the country in which the patent was used, such violation did not interfere with its sale. Mr. C. was of opinion that every dollar derived from the revenue of the Patent Office should be expended for the encouragement of the useful arts; or, in other words, that there should not be a dollar drawn from the proceeds of the office, after paying its expenses, to go into the United States Treasury. He was, therefore, opposed to the increase of patent fee, proposed by the bill. With respect to the provision for admitting foreigners to the benefits of the patent law, he approved of it. He believed that, according to the present mode of passing special bills for that purpose, the cost to the Government, in every instance, exceeded two hundred dollars, and the trouble and expense to the individual were also great and perplexing. He mentioned one case, where a gentleman had been a whole year waiting on Congress, to obtain a patent right for a useful and important invention. Yet, from the multiplicity of business before them, the bill could not be acted on; and the applicant, after having subjected himself to great expense and loss of time, was obliged to abandon his object until another session.

Mr. ROWAN observed, that, if the gentleman from New Jersey had bestowed any examination on the subject, he would, with his usual reflection, have seen the difficulties attendant upon permitting individuals to monopolize the sale of articles belonging to the common concerns of life, under the pretence of taking out a patent for them. His constituents were so simple as to believe that when any thing emanated from Washington, and having the sanction of high official authority, it established an undoubted right to the article specified. They, moreover, had such a horror of being dragged before the Federal courts, that they were too apt to give up, and suffer themselves to be defrauded, either by paying the whole, or by a compromise. Did not the gentleman see the evils resulting from individuals claiming the exclusive right to articles formed from the dictates of common sense, and of common and daily use? There was nothing that the Eastern patent venders had not taken out patents for—from washing-machines to millinery; (he did not mean the fig-leaf, but improvements in the mode of cutting female dresses;) the baking of bread, (he apprehended bread was used before the old people left the garden;) nothing had escaped them. With respect to the gentleman's arguments that the increase of fees would not diminish the number of patents, it might apply to marriages, though not to patents: for he believed those who married were not tempted into matrimony by the lowness of the fees, nor would those inclined to celibacy be kept out of it solely by any high fees that might be imposed. Let us, said Mr. R., offer sufficient encouragement to the obtaining of patents—but let us not believe that no impositions are practised, and, in consequence, refrain from imposing such restraints as will, in some degree, have the effect of preventing them.

Mr. NOBLE said, as to the marriage fees alluded to by the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. ROWAN,) he thought they did not suit his purpose. He was astonished that there was not another clause introduced in the bill, making provision for taking out patents for reform. These were to have been the days of regeneration, but he believed they were the days of degeneration. This Secretary of State of ours wants four thousand five hundred dollars for the Patent Office—two more clerks under his patronage. Would he go in person to the Patent Office? No, sir; he would not, though I believe him small enough to go into one of the rat-traps there. He said he would vote against the bill and amendment; instead of increasing the tax to seventy-five dollars, he would prefer reducing the present tax at least one-half. As regards the foreigners, he would act on that if it were important; but as to the four thousand five hundred dollars which were to be given for these changes, he had no idea of it.

Mr. HAYNE had only one word to say. He would have been much better satisfied if the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. DICKERSON) had not made his motion, particularly as that gentleman had expressed himself as opposed to the admission of foreigners to the privileges of the patent law. If he were opposed to them, he ought not to facilitate the means of embracing it, which is the inevitable tendency of his amendment. He (Mr. H.) had great confidence in the inventive genius of his countrymen, and was inclined to think that we would gain more than we would lose by the provisions of the bill. The four thousand five hundred dollars which the gentleman from Indiana wished to withhold, Mr. H. said, would be necessary to keep the office in order, preserve the models, records, &c.

Mr. DICKERSON said, that gentlemen were mistaken as to his motives. He was not opposed to granting patents to foreigners, but he was opposed to granting them as a matter of right. He wished the present practice to continue, and then such restrictions could be imposed on the issuing of a patent to a foreigner as the nature of the case required.

Mr. FORSYTH was not satisfied to adopt the amendment proposed to the bill, and wished farther time for reflection on it; he therefore moved to lay it on the table till to-morrow; which was agreed to.

Removal of the Indians to the West.

The bill to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi, was resumed in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITE concluded his remarks in reply to the arguments of gentlemen in opposition to the bill; and

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN made some observations in explanation of some parts of his former remarks, which he thought had been misapprehended by Mr. WHITE.

The question on Mr. F.'s amendment was divided, and first taken on adding to the bill the following proviso:

Provided always, That until the said tribes or nations shall choose to remove, as by this act is contemplated, they shall be protected in their present possessions, and in the enjoyment of all their rights of territory and government, as heretofore exercised and enjoyed, from all interruptions and encroachments.

April, 1830.]

Removal of the Indians to the West.

[SENATE.]

The proviso was rejected.

The question was then taken on the other proviso, which is as follows:

And provided also, That, before any removal shall take place of any of the said tribes or nations, and before any exchange or exchanges of land be made as aforesaid, the rights of any such tribes or nations in the premises, shall be stipulated for, secured, and guaranteed, by treaty or treaties, as heretofore made.

This was also rejected.

Before taking the question on the above provision,

Mr. BARTON rose and said, he voted for this amendment in Committee of the Whole, and should do so again, upon its own intrinsic merits, for it was intrinsically right or wrong, without regard to either the present administration or to the particular question in the South, in which Georgia felt a peculiar interest; yet both of these latter questions had been introduced into the debate upon this amendment.

Some of the friends of the administration, said Mr. B., object to the amendment on the ground of its being unusual, and amounting to a reflection upon the present administration. So far from that being my object, the amendment was offered by a supporter of the administration, not as a reflection on the President, but upon the discovery of an actual case of such bribery of Indian chiefs, during the last summer, to sell the lands of their tribe, and after a rejection of the stipulation for the bribe in this Senate, with a view to prohibit, by law, the use of such means in future. We do not accuse the President of having countenanced the bribery; and it would be a feather in the cap of this administration, to introduce the elevated and honorable principle of the amendment into our contracts or treaties with the miserable remnants of the once powerful owners of the country, by declaring, by a law, to govern all our public agents, President and Commissioners, that neither force, nor fraud, nor direct, secret bribery, shall be resorted to in acquiring the lands of those helpless people, whose guardians we affect to be.

I hope the mere circumstance of the last administration having taken the high ground of rejecting, with disdain, an offer to use bribes in such negotiations, will not be sufficient reason to reject the amendment. This sin cannot be visited upon any particular administration. We must be responsible as a nation for its existence; but let us not recede from the ground taken by the last administration, which emphatically repudiated the practice. And as to the exciting Georgia question, it has no proper connection with this bill or amendment. This bill is to extinguish Indian title north of the Ohio, in Indiana, and does not touch the Georgia question at all; and presents a fair opportunity of putting down, by law, without prejudice to Georgia, a practice that has been improperly revived under the present administration, and we presume without the sanction of the President. Disguise this question as you may, it is substantially whether we will sanction by our votes the use of secret bribes to obtain cessions of Indian lands. And I am sorry the Senator from Alabama has abandoned the amendment that would have done so much honor to the administration of which he is a supporter. This is a Government of law, and the national honor is concerned to prohibit, by law, all our agents, whether they be Presidents or subordinates, from continuing so unfair and dishonorable a practice, which we admit has crept into our negotiations. Secret bribes to chiefs, without the knowledge or consent of the poor tribes, whose guardians we affect to be, to sell us the lands of the tribe, sully the honor of the nation, and render the contract void, if the Indians had power to assert their rights.

Mr. SPRAGUE then moved to add a proviso in the following words:

Provided always, That until the said tribes or nations shall choose to remove, as is by this act contemplated, they shall be protected in their present possessions, and in the enjoyment of all their rights of territory and government, as promised or guaranteed to them by treaties with the United States, according to the true intent and meaning of such treaties.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN next offered the following proviso:

Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to authorize the departure from, or non-observance of, any treaty, compact, agreement, or stipulation heretofore entered into, and now subsisting, between the United States and the Cherokee Indians.

This amendment was rejected.

On motion of Mr. McKINLEY, the fourth section was amended, by adding thereto the words following:

And upon the payment of such valuation, the improvements so valued and paid for shall pass to the United States; and possession shall not afterwards be permitted to any of the same tribe.

A verbal amendment in the fourth section, proposed by Mr. SPRAGUE, having been agreed to,

Mr. SANFORD moved to add the following section:

And be it further enacted, That where the lands in any State are held by Indians, and such lands belong to the State, subject to the claim of the Indians, or the State or its guaranties are entitled to purchase the Indian title, the President of the United States may give and assign to any such Indians any suitable district or portions of the lands described in the first section of this act, when any such Indians shall choose to remove to, and reside on, the western lands, so as to be assigned to them.

Mr. WOODBURY moved to add thereto the following:

Provided, That no part of the expense of extinguishing the titles, or paying for the improvements of the lands on the removal, or of the first year's residence of the Indians, referred to in this section, shall be borne by the United States.

This was accepted by Mr. SANFORD, as a modification of his motion; and the amendment was then rejected.

On motion by Mr. FORSYTH, the second section was amended, by adding thereto the following:

When the land claimed and occupied by the Indians is owned by the United States, or the United States are bound to the State within which it lies, to extinguish the Indian claim thereto.

On motion of Mr. WHITE, the blank in the eighth section was filled with five hundred thousand dollars, and the bill reported to the Senate with the amendments; which, having been concurred in,

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN moved further to amend the bill, by adding the following proviso; which was rejected:

Provided, That before any exchange or removal shall take place, the President of the United States shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint, three suitable persons, and by them cause the country to which it is proposed to remove the Indians to be fully explored, and a report made to the President, and by him to Congress, of the extent of good and arable lands that can be obtained, and of the proportion of woodland in such country, and of its adaptation to the objects of this bill, and to the wants and habits of the Indian nations.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Barnard, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Hendricks, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Noble, Rowan, Sanford, Smith of South Carolina, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—28.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Holmes, Knight, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Sprague, Webster, Willey—19.

The Senate then adjourned.

MONDAY, April 26.

Impeachment of Judge Peck.

Messrs. BUCHANAN and STORES, members of the House of Representatives, with a message from that House, were announced; and, having taken the seats assigned them,

The PRESIDENT informed them that the Senate was ready to receive any communication they might have to make.

Mr. BUCHANAN then rose and said: We are commanded, in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, to impeach James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of Missouri, of high misdemeanors in office; and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same; and we do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said James H. Peck, to answer to said impeachment.

Messrs. BUCHANAN and STORES having retired, Mr. TAZEWELL rose and said, that in looking over similar cases, for the purpose of ascertaining what would be the proper course of proceeding, he discovered that messages, similar in most particulars to the one just received, had been presented to the Senate in three cases. The first was the case of John Blount, one of the members of this body; the next was that of John Pickering, Judge of the District Court of New Hampshire; and the third was that of Judge Chase. Upon each of these cases there seemed to have been some anxious consideration, in order to adopt the course most proper to be pursued. Mr. T. would state in what the proceedings in these cases differed. The case of Mr. Blount being the first of the kind that had ever occurred, presented so anomalous a practice that it never could be referred to as a precedent. The other two were consistent with the general principles of law and justice. From these it seems that it had been settled, that, when the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they were about to present articles of impeachment, a Select Committee was appointed to take the subject into consideration, and report what measures were proper to be taken. He would read, for the information of the Senate, the cases as they occurred.

"In the Senate of the United States, March 3d, 1808.

"A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Messrs Nicholson and Randolph, two of the members of said House, in the words following:

"Mr. President, we are commanded in the name of the House of Representatives, and of all the people of the United States, to impeach John Pickering, Judge of the District Court of the district of New Hampshire, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and to acquaint the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same.

"We are further commanded to demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said John Pickering, to answer to the said impeachment.

"On motion,

"Ordered, That the message received this day from the House of Representatives, respecting the impeachment of John Pickering, Judge of a District Court, be referred to Messrs. Tracy, Clinton, and Nicholas, to consider and report thereon."

In the case of Judge Chase, the articles of impeachment were presented at the bar of the Senate by Messrs. Randolph, Rodney, Nicholson, Earley, Nelson, and Geo. W. Campbell, managers on the part of the House of Representatives. [Mr. TAZEWEILL here read the proceedings, from which it appeared that the Senate had previously decided what forms should be observed in receiving the articles of impeachment, and that the managers, on appearing at the bar of the Senate, were prepared with and presented the articles.]

The case of Blount was not exactly similar to either of the cases he had cited. This was in the year 1797. [Mr. T. then read the proceedings of that case.] The idea, said Mr. T., of calling upon an individual to enter into a recognizance to appear at no named time, at no given place, and to answer to charges the Lord knew what, (for no articles of impeachment had been made out,) was so manifestly contrary to justice, that the Senate itself seemed to have abandoned it, for the accused did not appear, and no further proceedings were had, until the next session of Congress. Under all the circumstances, Mr. T. took it for granted that Blount's case would not be considered as a fit precedent, but that the proceedings in the cases of Pickering and Chase would be resorted to; and he therefore moved that the message of the House of Representatives be referred to a Select Committee, to consist of three Senators, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. TAZEWEILL's motion having been carried,

Mr. BENTON asked to be excused from voting on the subject; and the question being taken, Mr. B. was excused.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for a committee; and, on counting the ballots, it appeared that Messrs. TAZEWEILL, BELL, and WEBSTER were chosen.

TUESDAY, April 27.

Judge Peck.

Mr. TAZEWEILL, from the Select Committee appointed on the subject, made the following report, which was concurred in by the Senate:

Whereas the House of Representatives on the 26th of the present month, by two of their members, Messrs. BUCHANAN, and STORRS of New York, at the bar of the Senate, impeached James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, of high misdemeanors in office, and acquainted the Senate that the House of Representatives will, in due time, exhibit particular articles of impeachment against him, and make good the same; and likewise demanded, that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said James H. Peck, to answer the said impeachment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senate will take proper order thereon, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

And the committee further recommended to the Senate, that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to notify the House of Representatives of the foregoing resolution.

THURSDAY, April 29.

Pension Laws.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, the bill from the House of Representatives "declaratory of the several acts to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the revolutionary war," was resumed, with the amendment of the Pension Committee.

Mr. FOOT explained at large the object of the bill as it has been proposed to be amended by the committee.

Mr. HAYNE said, this was a bill similar in its character to that which was brought forward during the last session of Congress, and which was then known by the significant appellation of the Mammoth Pension bill. Under the specious pretext of paying a debt of national gratitude to the soldiers of the revolution, it was calculated to empty the Treasury, by squandering away the public treasure among a class of persons, many of whom, said Mr. H., I do verily believe, never served in the revolution at all, and others only for such short periods as hardly to entitle them to praise. I will yield, sir, to no gentleman here, in a deep and abiding sense of gratitude for revolutionary services. Brought up among revolutionary men, I imbibed in my infancy, and have cherished through life, a profound reverence and affection for the whole race—feelings which will descend with me to the grave.

But, sir, when the attempt is made to thrust into the company of the war-worn veterans of the revolution, a "mighty host," many of whom, probably, never even saw an enemy; when a door is to be opened wide enough to admit mere sunshine and holiday soldiers, the hangers-on of the camp, men of straw, substitutes, who never enlisted until after the preliminaries of peace were signed; when, after having omitted to pay the debt of gratitude really due to the honest veterans who toiled through all the hardships and dangers of the great contest, you now propose to give the rewards earned by their blood, with so profuse a hand as to enable all who ever approached the camp to share them; I must be permitted to say, that neither my sense of justice, nor my devotion to revolutionary men, will suffer me to lend my aid to the consummation of the injustice. Sir, I know that deep as have been the wounds inflicted by the chilling neglect experienced by many of these gallant officers of the army who fought your battles throughout the war of the revolution; keenly as they have felt the injustice which delayed, until a recent period, to satisfy their just demands, founded upon contract, none of these things, nor all combined, have inflicted so deep a wound upon their feelings, as the admission, to all the honors and rewards of the revolution, of persons who shared few of the hardships, and none of the perils, of the war. He who toiled through the heat of the day, has found the evening feast spread out for those whom he knew not in the camp, or on the field of battle, and whom he never saw till he found them at the festive board provided by the gratitude of the country.

Sir, I am informed, from the highest authority, that, when the pension bill of 1818 was before Congress, providing for the "nine months' men," a gallant veteran of the revolution, then a member of the other House, was so indignant at its provisions, that he declared he considered the soldiers who had served throughout the war as dishonored by a law recognizing, as equals, the class of persons who would come in under that bill; and such, I have reason to believe, was the general sense of all such men throughout the country.

It has been my pride and pleasure, on all proper occasions, to manifest my gratitude for the heroes of the revolution, not merely by professions, but by the most unequivocal acts. Here and elsewhere, my efforts have not been wanting to manifest the sentiments by which I am animated. But, in refusing to support such a bill as this, I am conscious I am only doing that of which the veterans of the revolution themselves, if they were here present, would cordially approve. In doing justice to the country, I am also doing justice to them.

In the further examination of this subject, I propose, said Mr. H., to take a brief review of the pension system in this country, and to point out the new, extravagant, and alarming provisions which it is proposed, by this act, to introduce into that system.

The people of the United States, even before the revolution, had imbibed a deep-rooted and settled opposition to the system of pensions.

In the country from which they had emigrated, they found it operating as a system of favoritism, by which those in authority made provision, at the public expense, for their friends and followers. In Great Britain, pensions have long been used as the ready means of providing for the "favored few," at the expense of the many. This system affords the most convenient means of appropriating the industry and capital of the laboring classes, for the support of those drones in society, the "fruges nati consumere," who occupy so large a space in all refined, civilized, and Christian countries. Our ancestors had seen, and severely felt, the effects of such a system, which necessarily converts the great mass of the people into the "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the privileged orders of society. When our revolution commenced, therefore, a deep, settled, and salutary prejudice against pensions almost universally prevailed. On the recommendation of General Washington, however, Congress had found it necessary to provide that the officers of the regular army who should continue to serve to the end of the war, should be entitled "to half pay for life." So strong, however, was the prejudice against pensions, that the officers entitled "to half pay for life," found it necessary so far to yield to public opinion as to accept of a "commutation," in lieu thereof, of five years' full pay, a debt which was not finally discharged, according to the true spirit of the contract, until about two years ago.

In 1806, provision was made by law for pensions to all persons disabled in the military service of the United States during the revolution; and, in 1808, the United States assumed the payment of all the pensions granted by the States for disabilities incurred in the revolution. And, from that time to 1818, the principle was settled, that all persons disabled in the course of military service should be provided for at the public expense, and the United States took upon themselves the payment of pensions to such persons, "whether they served in the land or sea service of the forces of the United States, or any particular State, in the regular corps, or the militia, or as volunteers." Here, then, was the American pension system established on a fast and sure foundation. The principle assumed was not merely gratitude for services rendered; for that principle must have embraced civil as well as military pensions, and is broad enough to admit all the abuses that have grown up under the pension system even of Great Britain. Our principle was, that pensions should be granted for disabilities incurred in military service—a measure deemed necessary to hold out those inducements to gallantry and deeds of daring which have been found necessary in all other countries, and which we have, perhaps, no right to suppose can be safely dispensed with in ours.

Here, then, we find, that, up to the year 1818, the principle of our pension system was disability, a wise and safe principle, limited in its extent, and almost incapable of abuse.

In 1818, however, the Representatives of the people, in Congress assembled, seem to have been seized with a sudden fit of gratitude for revolutionary services; an act was accordingly passed, which provided for pensioning all who served in the army of the revolution "for the term of nine months, or longer, at any period of the war," and "who, by reason of reduced circumstances, shall stand in need of assistance from their country for support." [See act of 18th March, 1818.] Here, it will be seen that the principle which limits pensions to disabilities incurred in the service is abandoned, and length of service and poverty are made the conditions on which pensions are hereafter to depend. The history of that bill, as I have heard it from the lips of those who were actors in the political scenes of that day, is not a little curious. All agreed that the operation of the bill was to be confined to those who had, during the revolution, given up their private pursuits, and devoted themselves exclusively to military service. No one imagined, for a moment, that any person who had rendered casual services merely; men who had only shared, in common with all the other citizens of the country, the dangers and sacrifices of the times, were to be the objects of public bounty. The original proposition, therefore, was to confine the provisions of the bill to those who had served in the regular army, either during the war, or for a term of three years, and who stood in need of assistance from their country for support. But, sir, in the progress of that bill it was discovered that, in a certain quarter of the Union, a number of soldiers had been enlisted for a term of only nine months, and, to cover their case, "three years" was stricken out, and "nine months" inserted. Sir, no one foresaw the consequences of that measure. It was supposed that even this provision would include only a few hundred men. The whole charge upon the Treasury was estimated at one hundred and sixty thousand dollars. And, seduced by this expectation, and by the popular cry of "Justice to the old soldiers," Congress were persuaded to pass a bill which they were assured could not make any very considerable addition to the pension list, which would be lessened from year to year, and would soon cease to exist. And what, sir, was the result? What a lesson does it read to legislators! How forcibly does it admonish us to weigh well the provisions of this bill, before we undertake to enlarge or extend the pension law of 1818. I have applied to the Pension Office for information on this subject, and hold in my hand the official report of the officer at the head of that department. In giving the result, I shall not aim at minute accuracy.

The number of applicants for pensions, under the act of 1818, considerably exceeded thirty thousand! a number greater than that of General Washington's army, at any period of the war; exceeding the whole number of soldiers that could be supposed to be alive in 1818. Notwithstanding the "rigid rules" laid down by the Department of War, it was found impossible to exclude the applicants. Upwards of eighteen thousand were admitted and placed on the pension roll, one-third of whom, at least, (as it afterwards appeared,) had no claim to be there. The claims of upwards of twelve thousand of the applicants were found, even at the first examination, to be entirely groundless, and were accordingly rejected. The money required to pay the pensions was found to be, not one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, as had been estimated, but between two and three millions. The very first year, Congress had to appropriate for pensions, under the act of 1818, one million eight hundred and forty-seven thousand nine hundred dollars; and the next year, two millions seven hundred and sixty-six thousand four hundred and forty dollars, which, with the appropriations for invalid pensions, made the whole amount appropriated in that year for pensions, three millions one hundred and eight thousand three hundred and three dollars. And no one can tell to what extent these appropriations would have been carried, if Congress had not interposed to correct the evil. The whole country had become alarmed. No one doubted that an immense number of persons were receiving pensions, who had no claim to them whatever. Men who had never served at all, or for very short periods; men who had given away their property to their children, or conveyed it in trust for their own benefit; in short, every one who was old enough to have served in the revolution, found little difficulty (notwithstanding the rigid rules of the War Department, of which we now hear so much complaint) in getting themselves placed upon the pension list.

To rescue the country from this enormous evil, the act of 1st May, 1820, was passed, which, without changing the terms and conditions on which pensions were to be granted, (still requiring service "for a term of nine months," and "indigent circumstances,") yet provided guards against frauds, by requiring every applicant to submit "a schedule of his property," and to take the necessary "oaths," &c. Sir, under the provisions of this act, intended only to prevent frauds, upwards of six thousand persons were stricken from the pension roll. Two thousand three hundred and eighty-nine never even presented a schedule, or made an application under this act; and the Treasury was thus relieved from a charge of a million of dollars per annum.

Now, sir, with the experience afforded by this case, one would really suppose that the very last thing that any statesman would propose would be still further to enlarge and extend the provisions of the act of 1818, again to unlock the Treasury, which was wisely closed by the act of 1820, and subject it to a charge similar in character, and probably much greater in amount, than was imposed by that law, and to open a wide door to all the evils, aye, and much greater evils than were experienced by the country under the operation of that act.

I will put it to the chairman of the committee who reported this bill: Is he satisfied of the wisdom and justice of the act of 1818? The gentleman says, "it ought never to have been passed." Well, sir, while the gentleman acknowledges that that act was impolitic and unjust, and "ought never to have been passed," how can he advocate this bill, which enlarges and extends every objectionable feature of the former law?

Sir, if we have already taken a rash and unadvised step in this business, it is better for us to go back, or at least to stop where we are; but assuredly we ought not to advance and press forward in error, regardless of consequences.

I come now to the examination of the character of the proposed measure. We have before us two bills: the first has already passed the House of Representatives; the second is proposed as an amendment, by the Committee of Pensions of the Senate. They both purport to be acts merely declaratory of the acts of

Pension Laws.

1818 and 1820, and they are supported on the avowed ground that they are not intended to change the pension system, but merely to correct some misconstructions of those acts on the part of the officers of the War Department.

If, sir, I shall be able to show that there have been no such "misconstructions," and that there exists no necessity whatever for any "declaratory act," will I not have a right to expect that gentlemen who now support this bill will at once abandon it? I know, sir, the expectation would be vain; for the truth cannot be disguised, that it is the real object of this bill greatly to enlarge and extend the pension system, by the introduction of new, and, as I believe, most alarming provisions. This is no declaratory act. The acts of 1818 and 1820 provide that pensions shall be granted to persons who served in the regular army of the revolution, on two conditions: 1st. That they should have served for a "term of nine months or longer, at any period of the war;" 2d. That, by reason of reduced circumstances, "they shall be in need of assistance from their country for support." Now, sir, what are the "misconstructions" which make a declaratory act now necessary?

It is alleged,

First. That "the term of nine months' service" has been required by the Secretary of War to be a "continuous service;" and it is proposed to provide that an applicant for a pension "shall be deemed to have served for the term of nine months, if he shall have served nine months under one or several enlistments, whether continuous or not."

And it is alleged,

Secondly. That, in examining the "circumstances" of applicants for pensions, no fixed amount of property has been considered as conclusive of "indigent circumstances," but the character, habits, place of residence, family, &c., &c., have all been taken into account; and it is now proposed by the bill from the House of Representatives, to provide that a man "shall be deemed and taken to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country, if the whole amount of his property, exclusive of household furniture, &c., shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars, all debts from him justly due and owing being first deducted." By way of guarding against frauds, it is added, "that the applicant shall not be required to show what his circumstances or condition in life were, or what property he was possessed of at any time prior to the passage of this act;" the plain interpretation of which is, that, if any man, before this act receives the sanction of the President, shall give away his estate to his children, he shall, notwithstanding, have his pension.

Now, in what respect has the act of 1818 been "misconstrued?" How far are the bills before us "declaratory?" It is alleged that service for a "term of nine months" does not imply nine months continuously. But I apprehend they can only relate to continuous service under one enlistment. A term is a technical phrase, and, when applied to judicial or military service, always relates to an unbroken period of time. The term of a court, we all know, has this signification; and, in military language, the "term of service" relates to the period of a soldier's continuous service under one enlistment. That it was so used in the law, is obvious. The truth is, this provision was inserted for the avowed purpose of covering a certain class of troops, known to have served under an enlistment for nine months. And the words, "a term of nine months, at any period during the war," can admit of no other construction. If it had been intended to embrace mere casual service, under various engagements, amounting in the whole to nine months, the expression would have been, "who served for nine months during the war," or (as proposed in this bill) "whether continuous or not."

So far, therefore, as this bill relates to "the term of service," it is not "declaratory" of the old law, but substitutes a new, and, as I think, a dangerous rule, for that prescribed by the former law, as construed and uniformly acted upon by the Department of War.

Let us next inquire into the probable effect of the proposed provision. Who are the persons now excluded from the benefits of the existing law? They are those who, during the whole course of a war of seven years, (a bloody and arduous contest, brought to the door of every man,) served in all only nine months, and that, too, at various periods.

Now, let it be recollected that the law relates only to enlisted soldiers of the regular army; let it also be remembered that enlistments, until after the preliminaries of peace were signed, were for fixed periods, of greater or less duration: some (as in the case of the Maryland line) enlisted "during the war," others for a "term of three years," and almost all of the rest for "the term of nine months." If I am not greatly misinformed, it was after the fighting had ceased—after the capture of Cornwallis (which took place in October, '81)—after the preliminaries of peace were signed, (in November, '82,) that enlistments were entered into for "nine months or less." The gentleman says, there were some enlistments made at an earlier period for eight months, and that many of these men continued in service under a new engagement, after the expiration of their first term. I wish the gentleman had favored us with a statement of the number of such enlistments; I am assured they were not numerous, and that a provision so framed as to cover such cases would operate but on a few individuals. But if the object is merely to provide a remedy for those cases of special hardship, let provision be made for persons who enlisted for eight months, and entered into "new engagements at the expiration of their term." Provide, if you please, "for persons who were taken prisoners, or who were confined in prison ships," (cases on which gentlemen so strongly rely,) if they are not already provided for under the act of 1818. No one will complain of provisions intended to apply to special cases of peculiar hardship. But, instead of making such provisions, attempts are made for breaking down all the barriers against fraud. These bills propose to throw open the door of the Treasury, so as to permit all who choose to do so, to enter, and help themselves at pleasure.

Pension Laws.

Sir, I deny the policy or justice of the act of 1818. It departs entirely from every sound principle applicable to pensions, and has provided for that large class of persons whose services were in no respect more valuable than those of the great body of the people. Who were the "nine months' men," admitted under the act of 1818? They were chiefly those who entered the service after the capture of Cornwallis. A large proportion of them served only between the date of the provisional article of peace, in November, 1782, and the adoption of the definitive articles, in September, 1783.

From what I can learn, a large majority of those who were admitted to pensions under the act of 1818, never saw any service, except during the two years which elapsed between the capture of Cornwallis and the establishment of peace. I have been unable to obtain any detailed information on this point. But I am told that the average ages of these eighteen thousand pensioners, at the date of their application, proved that they could only have served towards the close of the war. Of this vast number, but little more than three thousand claimed to have served through the war; so that it is unquestionable, that the bounty of the Government, under the act of 1818, has been chiefly extended to those who never abandoned their private pursuits, who did not devote themselves exclusively to military service, and who, therefore, were not embraced within any sound and safe principle applicable to pensions in a republican Government.

But if such was the true character, and such the operation of that act, what will be the effect of this bill? While the law required "a term of service of nine months or longer," although persons might be admitted who had rendered no efficient service, yet you had some security against abuse, by requiring specific proof of a continuous service under one enlistment, with the power, in most cases, of referring to the original muster rolls, and thereby detecting all attempts at imposition. Now, however, that the most casual service, and for the shortest periods, is to be taken into the account, who can fail to perceive how much the chances of imposition will be multiplied? Resort must be had to oral testimony. And what more uncertain than the memory of man, as to the duration of another's service half a century ago? Who is there that ever served a month in the army, or who was even a follower of the camp, that will not be able to adduce certificates to show that he served for just so long a time as he may choose to lay claim to.

But, sir, there is a stronger objection to this measure even, than its liability to abuse. It is, that it rests on no sound principle applicable to military pensions. If there be any principle recognized and fully established in this country, it is, that pensions must be confined to those who were separated, by the nature of their service, from the great mass of the community, and who devoted themselves exclusively to military duties. It is a palpable absurdity to talk of giving pensions to all the people. Those who, in the course of the revolution, performed, only in common with the rest of their countrymen, the military service required of every citizen, stand upon an equal footing. He alone, who, in the strictest sense, put off the citizen and became a soldier, and who, in abandoning the pursuits, relinquished also the habits of private life, can have any just claim to be provided for at the public expense. I speak not now of physical disabilities incurred in the public service, this class of cases having been amply provided for under the acts of 1806 and 1808. But, with regard to claims depending entirely upon length of service, if we once depart from the rule I have laid down, and declare that mere casual service for short periods, and at long intervals, shall entitle a man to a pension, you cannot stop short of pensioning all who rendered any service whatever in the course of the revolution. All the State troops will be embraced within this principle; and this bill, accordingly, proposes to provide for them. The militia will come next; for what true-hearted whig was there in all America who did not, in the course of the seven years' war, render, from time to time, services equal in the whole to the period of "nine months?" I think I may very confidently assert, that there was not, in the State of South Carolina, one genuine patriot of '76 capable of bearing arms, who did not, in the course of the revolution, spend more than nine months in the camp; and I should be glad to be informed on what principle they can be excluded, if these nine months' men are to be embraced? But I shall be told that the militia will all in due season be provided for, a proposition to that effect having already been submitted in the other House. It comes, then, to this, that all are to be pensioned who rendered military service of any description during the war. But were not services equally valuable rendered by men in civil stations? All these must of course be included; and it will finally come to this, that pensions must be provided for every one who lived at the period of the revolution; you cannot stop short of that, if the principle embraced in the bill is to be sanctioned. So much for "the term of service."

The next provision of the bill relates to "the circumstances in life" of the persons to be pensioned. The rule on this subject prescribed by the acts of '18 and '20, and hitherto considered as the very foundation of the pension system, was, that the pensioners should be "in such indigent circumstances as to stand in need of assistance from their country for support." I should have supposed that no one could for a moment doubt the policy, the propriety, nay, the absolute necessity, of this rule. No country which has ever passed through a bloody revolution, could possibly undertake to distribute rewards for every service. In bestowing military pensions, they are constrained to act on the principle of merely providing for those who, being unable to support themselves, are necessarily thrown upon public or private charity. Military pensions constitute an honorable provision for old soldiers of broken fortunes. But what is the proposition now before us? Why, sir, the pension system is no longer to be confined to persons in reduced circumstances. The bill from the other House expressly declares, that every man shall be "deemed and taken" to be in indigent circumstances, and unable to support himself, who shall not be worth more than one thousand dollars clear of debt. Now, can any thing be more absurd than such a provision? A man may be in possession of an estate worth half a million of dollars; he may have a clear income from such an estate (or from professional pursuits) of twenty or thirty thousand dollars a year; and yet, if his debts exceed the estimated value of his estate, the law declares he shall be "deemed and taken to be unable to support himself." Sir, I give all due praise to the committee of the Senate for their judicious recommendation that this monstrous provision should be stricken out; but I must be permitted to add, that I should have been better pleased if they had reformed the section altogether. I perceive they have retained the provision which fixes one thousand dollars as an arbitrary standard to determine a man's circumstances in life. Nothing, it seems to me, can be conceived more unequal or unjust than to measure men's circumstances in life by such a rule. Of two men possessed of the same amount of property, one may be in easy circumstances, while the other will be poor indeed. A man enjoying a green old age on a farm in the western country, with an industrious family around him, would be as independent as any man alive; while the inhabitant of one of our Atlantic cities, with an equal amount of property invested in land or in stock, would not be able to procure his daily bread. One man may be entirely disabled, from age or infirmity, from earning his subsistence, or he may have a helpless family depending upon him for support; another may be in the enjoyment of a large professional income, or he may be surrounded by dutiful children in affluent circumstances. Will any one pretend that these men would stand in equal need of "assistance from their country for support?" I confess I am unable to discover a single argument in favor of the arbitrary rule laid down by the committee, unless, indeed, it be desirable to increase the number of pensioners: that it will produce that effect, no one can doubt. The truth is, that, in looking into the circumstances of pensioners, the officers who have been successively at the head of the War Department, have found it absolutely necessary (to keep the pension system within any thing like reasonable bounds) to resort to rigid rules. Under the administration of Mr. Calhoun, but one person was admitted whose fortune exceeded three hundred and fifty dollars, and the great majority fell below two hundred and fifty dollars; and yet the Treasury was nearly emptied by the multitude which poured in under the act of 1818. Under Mr. Barbour, none were admitted whose fortune exceeded three hundred dollars. General Porter, a short time before he went out of office, undertook to admit persons whose fortune did not exceed nine hundred and sixty dollars. The consequence was, the addition of several hundred names to the pension list within a few months; the appropriations failed; and one of the very first acts of General Jackson's administration was to rescind the order made by General Porter, and to bring back the system to the old standard.

But, sir, there are higher considerations connected with this question than any I have yet urged. I consider this bill as a branch of a great system, calculated and intended to create and perpetuate a permanent charge upon the Treasury, with a view to delay the payment of the public debt, and to postpone, indefinitely, the claims of the people for a reduction of taxes, when the debt shall be finally extinguished. It is an important link in the chain by which the American system party hope to bind the people, now and forever, to the payment of the enormous duties deemed necessary for the protection of domestic manufactures. It is obvious to every one, that a great crisis in the affairs of this country is at hand. The national debt, which now creates a charge upon the Treasury of twelve millions of dollars per annum, is melting away, under the operation of our "sinking fund;" which, if not diverted from its course, will, in less than four years, totally extinguish it. One-half, therefore, of the whole amount of the revenue now collected through the custom-house will no longer be wanted for national purposes; and the great question will be presented to the American people, whether they will submit to be taxed to the amount of twelve millions a year, merely for the purpose of enabling the manufacturers to fill their pockets at the expense of all other classes in the community, or for the still more preposterous purpose of paying back the taxes so collected to the people from whom they were taken.

The manufacturers know full well that such a question, whenever presented to the justice and good sense of the people, can receive but one answer. The duties will be reduced; and any party that sets itself in opposition to such a measure, will be swept away by the breath of popular indignation, like chaff before the wind. Seeing and believing this, all those who have an interest in the promotion of the restrictive system—all who derive a profit from the present unjust and unequal distribution of the public revenue, have been for the last two years anxiously looking about them, and are constantly contriving schemes for scattering abroad the public funds with a profuse hand. They are striving, above all things, to create heavy permanent charges upon the Treasury, as an apology for high duties. The point aimed at is, to create demands upon the Treasury, equal, at least, to the whole amount now annually absorbed by the public debt. The great effort will be, to accomplish this fully in the course of the ensuing four years; so that, when the debt shall be paid, the whole twenty-four millions of dollars now collected under our present unjust, unequal, and oppressive impost laws, may still be found necessary to meet the demands upon the Treasury created by law.

It is impossible, sir, it seems to me, for any man to look around him, and see what is going on in both Houses of Congress, without perceiving that this is a fixed and settled policy, to which the attention of the party to which I have alluded, is constantly and steadily directed. We witness the astonishing spectacle, in a free, popular Government, of constant and persevering efforts to increase the public expenditures; to spend money merely for the sake of having it expended; and we find the representatives of the people devising and contriving innumerable schemes to rivet upon them a system of taxation, which, both in its character and amount, is almost without a parallel in history. All the popular topics of the day are eagerly seized upon, and pressed into the service. Under the pretext of promoting the internal improvement of the country, gigantic schemes are brought forward, and the aid of the Government obtained for them to enormous amounts. The execution of all the plans of internal improvement proposed even during the present session of Congress, would absorb the whole amount now annually applied to the public debt. But the advocates of this system are unwilling to rely on one class of measures only. We have schemes for colonization, education, distribution of surplus revenue, and many others, all admirably calculated to promote the great end—the absorption of the public revenue. But, sir, of all the measures devised for this purpose, this grand pension system, got up last year, and revived during the present session, is by far the most specious, the most ingeniously contrived, and the best calculated for the accomplishment of the object. Here gentlemen are supplied with a fine topic for declamation. "Gratitude for revolutionary services!" "the claims of the poor soldiers!"—these are the popular topics which it is imagined will carry away the feelings of the people, and reconcile them to a measure which must unquestionably establish a permanent charge upon the Treasury to an enormous amount, and thereby furnish a plausible excuse for keeping up the system of high duties.

To prove that such is the true character of this bill, I will appeal to its liberal and most extraordinary provisions; its entire departure from all sound principles applicable to pensions; and, above all, to the time when, and the circumstances under which, it has been brought forward. These are, to my mind, entirely conclusive. When I show that the pensioners who will be embraced within the provisions of this bill, have no stronger claims to pensions than all the citizens of the country who rendered service in the Revolution, the answer is at hand. It is intended, in due season, to extend the system to them also. When I urge the experience of the country under the act of 1818, as conclusive, to show the unjust operation of the system, and the enormous charge created by it on the public treasury, I am told that though that act "ought never to have passed," yet this bill is necessary to carry out and extend its principles. But there is one fact which speaks volumes on this subject. How comes it, that this spirit of gratitude for Revolutionary services should have slumbered for fifty years? How has it happened that it has never been discovered until now, that the men who are to be embraced within the provisions of this bill are entitled to the bounty of their country? Why is it, that, without a single petition praying for such an addition to the pension system as this bill proposes, we should be seized with such a sudden and inveterate fit of gratitude to the old soldiers, that we seemed determined to seize them by force, and, taking no denial, to insist on their receiving our bounty, whether they will or no? Sir, the reason is obvious. The period for the final extinction of the public debt is at hand. Colonization has not yet been sanctioned; internal improvement advances too slowly; the distribution of the revenue meets but small favor; the existence of a surplus must, by some means or other, be prevented; and this must be accomplished without any reduction of duties. The friends of the system have therefore gone forth upon the highways, and "all are bidden to the feast."

There is another great object collateral to this, and having, I do verily believe, an important bearing on this measure. Sir, it is not to be denied that this country is divided into two great parts, the paying and the receiving States, or, as they have been sometimes called, "the Plantation States" and "the Tariff States;" the former paying by far the greater portion of the duties which supply the Treasury, and the latter receiving nearly the whole amount expended by the Federal Government. The present system operates so as to lay the taxes chiefly on one portion of the country, and to expend them on another; and while, therefore, it is the interest of the former to diminish the expenditures, and to lessen the taxes, it is manifestly the policy of the latter to increase both.

I do not know that a more striking illustration of the unequal action of this Government can be adduced, than is furnished by the operation of the pension system. Sir, no one can doubt that the sacrifices and services, during the Revolution, of the Southern were in no respect inferior to those of the Northern States. In proportion to the extent of her population, South Carolina fought as hard and as long as any State in the Union, and suffered, perhaps, more. But when pensions came to be distributed, how did the account stand? I have before me official statements showing the whole number of invalid and Revolutionary pensioners of every State of the Union, and also the whole amount of money appropriated for the payment of these pensioners from the beginning of the Government to this time. These statements exhibit the following results :

Whole amount of appropriations for pensions under act of 1818, - - -	$14,174,274 50
All other pensioners, from the beginning of the Government, -	6,861,396 08

$20,535,670 58

Making in all, upwards of twenty millions of dollars.

The whole number of names now on the pension roll of invalid pensioners, is, - - -	3,794
Revolutionary pensioners, - - -	12,201

15,995

Say, in round numbers, sixteen thousand. Of these, about twelve thousand reside in the ten States north of Maryland, and four thousand in the fourteen Southern and Western States. The number of pensioners in Connecticut exceeds those in Virginia—and Rhode Island nearly equals South Carolina and Georgia. Assuming these data as the basis of our calculations, it would appear that, of the twenty millions paid to pensioners, about fifteen millions have gone North, and only five millions have been expended in the South and West, and that three millions out of every four hereafter to be applied to pensions, will be expended north of the Potomac. Sir, although we know that the Revolutionary services of the North did not surpass those of the South, we never complained of this inequality in the expenditure, so long as the pension system was confined to the proper objects of national bounty. But when it degenerates into a mere scheme for the distribution of the public money, we have a right to complain of the gross inequality of the system. I will not say that it is the object of this bill to make a distribution of the public revenue among the people on unjust and unequal principles, but I will say that this will unquestionably be its effect.

I know, sir, that these are unpleasant topics of discussion; but the truth must be told; and, whether acceptable or not, it is my duty, standing here as one of the representatives of a portion of the country oppressed and afflicted by unequal contributions and unequal expenditures, to expose the true character of the system, and to strive against it to the uttermost. Sir, I would, if I could, rouse the whole country to a due sense of its enormity. I would invoke gentlemen to put down that gross inequality in the benefits and burthens of this Government, which, if not corrected, will, in the end, impair the attachment of the people in the Union itself. I allude to this subject now, not for the purpose of spreading discontent, but to strike at the root of evil, by pointing out its enormity, and calling upon honorable gentlemen, as they love their country, to apply the remedy.

If the revenues of the United States were collected by direct taxation, or even by assessment upon the States, we should have some security against extravagant expenditures. If every portion of the country contributed its equal share to the national Treasury, we should not hear of so many propositions to squander millions upon local objects; we should not find gentlemen disposed to vote away the money of their constituents with as much indifference as if it could be created by a mere act of volition, and was not the fruit of the labor of their hands. It is the fact (well known and understood, at least in one quarter of the country) that the Southern States pay by far the greater portion of the taxes, while they receive hardly any part of the expenditures, which leads to that lavish distribution of the public treasure, which, we are told, has now become "the established policy of this country." The parents of the American System are unequal taxation and unequal appropriations; to them it owes its being; and without their sustaining influence it would be destined, after dragging out a brief and precarious existence, to "perish miserably."

I am sensible that this is not the appropriate occasion to enter at large into this deeply interesting question. I must reserve that task for another and more suitable opportunity. I must be permitted, however, to say, that I believe it to be susceptible of the clearest proof, that the plantation or anti-tariff States, containing, in round numbers, four millions of inhabitants, (only one-third of the whole population of the United States,) contribute, directly or indirectly, about two-thirds of the revenue, while the tariff States (containing eight millions of inhabitants) pay about one-third of the taxes. Sir, this opinion is founded chiefly upon the fact, that the Southern States furnish two-thirds of the whole amount of the domestic exports of the United States, thereby furnishing the articles of exchange for two-thirds of all the importations from foreign countries. Nearly the whole revenue of the country, equal, in round numbers, to twenty-four millions of dollars per annum, is levied in duties on these foreign goods. Now, if we consume the goods received in exchange for our cotton, rice, and tobacco, no one would deny that we must pay two-thirds of the taxes; and if we do not consume them, then, I would ask, how does it happen that our Northern brethren are enabled to consume the fruits of our labor and capital? Two-thirds of these foreign goods of right belong to us; and if we get, as is alleged, but one-third, and our Northern brethren obtain the remainder, surely we must be entitled to some remuneration. "Well, (say gentlemen,) we pay you for these goods in Northern manufactures." True, sir; and it is the very burthen of our complaints, that we are compelled to receive, in return for our cotton, rice, and tobacco, shipped to Europe, either foreign goods, burthened with duties of from forty to a hundred per cent., or domestic manufactures protected by these duties, and charged with a price sufficient to indemnify the Northern manufacturers for all the duties paid on the articles of their consumption. However true, therefore, it may be in general, that "the consumer pays the duty," it is only true when a man is considered simply in his character as a consumer; but when he acts in the double capacity of consumer and manufacturer, under a system of laws which, at the same time that it taxes him on his consumption, enables him to re-charge the amount of the tax in the price of his manufactures, (which his customers are compelled to buy at the enhanced cost,) it is obvious that he may relieve himself entirely from the tax, by throwing it upon others. If, under a law which taxes a man one dollar, he receives two, it is clear that, instead of being burthened with a tax, he would receive a bounty. Under the actual operation of the American System, I do not think there would be any material difference between a tax upon exports or upon imports. I believe they would both fall substantially upon the producers of the articles exported, these being the only medium of exchange for our imports. That the tariff States, as such, under the operation of the tariff laws, are fully indemnified for the duties paid by them on foreign goods, is conclusively proved by the fact that they zealously support the "American System," and are perpetually crying out for more taxes. But how are the Northern States to relieve themselves from the operation of this system? There are no persons to whom they can transfer the amount of duties imposed upon them. They have no protection in foreign markets for their cotton, and are compelled to receive either the taxed or the protected article at the enhanced price secured to them by the tariff laws. The system, therefore, operates exclusively to the disadvantage of the exporting States, while the manufacturing States are indemnified for their burthens, by reaping all the benefits of the system.

Impeachment of Judge Peck.

[SENATE.]

MONDAY, May 3.

Judge Peck.

A message having been received from the House of Representatives notifying that they had appointed Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, Mr. STORRS, of New York, Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, Mr. SPENCER, of New York, and Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, managers to conduct the impeachment of James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri.

On motion by Mr. TAZEVELL, it was

Resolved, That, at twelve o'clock to-morrow, the Senate will resolve itself into a Court of Impeachment, at which time the following oath or affirmation shall be administered by the Secretary to the President of the Senate, and by him to each member of the Senate, viz:

"I solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that, in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, I will do impartial justice, according to law."

Which Court of Impeachment being thus formed, will, at the time aforesaid, receive the managers appointed by the House of Representatives, to exhibit articles of impeachment, in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, against James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, pursuant to notice given to the Senate this day by the House of Representatives, that they had appointed managers for the purposes aforesaid; and that the Secretary of the Senate lay this resolution before the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That after the Managers of the Impeachment shall be introduced to the bar of the Senate, and shall have signified that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against James H. Peck, the President of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words: "All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the grand inquest of the nation is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri." After which, the articles shall be exhibited, and the President of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

TUESDAY, May 4.

The Impeachment.

On motion by Mr. TAZEVELL, the Senate resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment, for the trial of James H. Peck, District Judge of Missouri; and the oath prescribed having been administered to the Vice President, and by him to the forty-five Senators following, viz:

Messrs. Adams, Barnard, Barton, Bell, Bibb, Brown, Burnet, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hayne,

Hendricks, Holmes, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Knight, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of S. C., Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Webster, White, Willey, Woodbury—

The managers appointed by the House of Representatives then appeared at the bar of the Senate; and, having been conducted and seated within the bar, and the usual proclamation to keep silence having been made by the Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, their chairman, rose, and read the following article of impeachment, which had been agreed to by the House of Representatives, against James H. Peck, District Judge of the United States for the District of Missouri:

Article exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States, in the name of themselves, and of all the people of the United States, against James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE.

That the said James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, at a term of the said court, holden at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the fourth Monday in December, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, did, under and by virtue of the power and authority vested in the said court, by the act of the Congress of the United States, entitled "An act enabling the claimants of lands within the limits of the State of Missouri and Territory of Arkansas to institute proceedings to try the validity of their claims," approved on the twenty-sixth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-four, render a final decree of the said court in favor of the United States, and against the validity of the claim of the petitioners, in a certain matter or cause depending in the said court, under the said act, and before that time prosecuted in the said court, before the said Judge, by Julie Soulard, widow of Antoine Soulard, and James G. Soulard, Henry G. Soulard, Eliza Soulard, and Benjamin A. Soulard, children and heirs at law of the said Antoine Soulard, petitioners against the United States, praying for the confirmation of their claim, under the said act, to certain lands situated in the said State of Missouri; and the said court did, thereafter, on the thirtieth day of December, in the said year, adjourn to sit again on the third Monday in April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six.

And the said petitioners did, and at the December term of the said court, holden by and before the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, in due form of law, under the said act, appeal against the United States from the judgment and decree so made and entered in the said matter, to the Supreme Court of the United States; of which appeal, so made and taken in the said District Court, the said James H. Peck, Judge of the said court, had then and there full notice. And the said James H. Peck, after the said matter or cause had so been duly appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and on or about the thirtieth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, did cause to be published, in a certain public newspaper, printed at the city of St. Louis, called "The Missouri Republican," a certain communication, prepared by the said James H. Peck, purporting to be the opinion of the said James H. Peck, as Judge of the said court, in the matter or cause aforesaid, and purporting to set forth the reasons of the said James H. Peck, as such Judge, for the said decree; and that Luke Edward Lawless, a citizen of the United States, and an attorney and counsellor at law in the said District Court, and who had been of counsel for the petitioners in the said court, in the matter aforesaid, did, thereafter, and on or about the eighth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, cause to be published in a certain other newspaper, printed at the city of St. Louis, called "The Missouri Advocate and St. Louis Enquirer," a certain article signed "A Citizen," and purporting to contain an exposition of certain errors of doctrine and fact alleged to be contained in the opinion of the said James H. Peck, as before that time so published, which publication by the said Luke Edward Lawless was to the effect following, viz.:

"To the Editor:

"SIR:—I have read, with the attention which the subject deserves, the opinion of Judge Peck on the claim of the widow and heirs of Antoine Soulard, published in the Republican of the thirtieth ultimo. I observe that, although the Judge has thought proper to decide against the claim, he leaves the grounds of his decree open for further discussion.

"Availing myself, therefore, of this permission, and considering the opinion so published to be a fair subject of examination to every citizen who feels himself interested in, or aggrieved by, its operation, I beg leave to point the attention of the public to some of the principal errors which I think I have discovered in it. In doing so, I shall confine myself to little more than an enumeration of those errors, without entering into any demonstration or developed reasoning on the subject. This would require more space than a newspaper allows, and, besides, is not, as regards most of the points, absolutely necessary.

"Judge Peck, in this opinion, seems to me to have erred in the following assumptions, as well of fact as of doctrine:

"1. That, by the ordinance of 1754, a sub-delegate was prohibited from making a grant in consideration of services rendered or to be rendered.

"2d. That a sub-delegate in Louisiana was not a sub-delegate, as contemplated by the said ordinance.

"3d. That O'Reilly's regulations, made in February, 1770, can be considered as demonstrative of the extent of the granting power of either the governor general or the sub-delegates, under the royal order of August, 1790.

"4th. That the royal order of August, 1770, (as recited or referred to in the preamble to the regulations of Morales, of July, 1799,) related exclusively to the governor general.

"5th. That the word 'mercedes,' in the ordinance of 1754, which, in the Spanish language, means 'gifts,' can be narrowed, by any thing in that ordinance, or in any other law, to the idea of a grant to an Indian, or a reward to an informer, and much less to a mere sale for money.

MAY, 1830.]

Impeachment of Judge Peck.

[SENATE.]

"6th. That O'Reilly's regulations were in their terms applicable, or ever were in fact applied to, or published in, Upper Louisiana.

"7th. That the regulations of O'Reilly have any bearing on the grant to Antoine Souldard, or that such a grant was contemplated by them.

"8th. That the limitation to a square league, of grants to new settlers in Opelousas, Attakapas, and Natchitoches, (in 8th article of O'Reilly's regulations,) prohibits a larger grant in Upper Louisiana.

"9th. That the regulations of the governor general, Gayoso, dated 9th September, 1797, entitled 'Instructions to be observed for the admission of new settlers,' prohibit, in future, a grant for services, or have the effect of annulling that to Antoine Souldard, which was made in 1796, and not located or surveyed until February, 1804.

"10th. That the complete titles made by Gayoso are not to be referred to as affording the construction made by Gayoso himself, of his own regulations.

"11th. That, although the regulations of Morales were not promulgated as law in Upper Louisiana, the grantees in the principal case was bound by them, inasmuch as he had notice, or must be presumed, 'from the official station which he held,' to have had notice, of their terms.

"12th. That the regulations of Morales 'exclude all belief that any law existed under which a confirmation of the title in question could have been claimed.'

"13th. That the complete titles (produced to the court) made by the governor general or the intendant general, though based on incomplete titles, not conformable to the regulations of O'Reilly, Gayoso, or Morales, afford no inference in favor of the power of the lieutenant governor, from whom these incomplete titles emanated, and must be considered as anomalous exercises of power in favor of individual grantees.

"14th. That the language of Morales himself, in the complete titles issued by him, on concessions made by the lieutenant governor of Upper Louisiana, anterior to the date of his regulations, ought not to be referred to as furnishing the construction which he, Morales, put on his own regulations.

"15th. That the uniform practice of the sub-delegates, or lieutenant governor of Upper Louisiana, from the first establishment of that province to the 10th March, 1804, is to be disregarded as proof of law, usage, or custom, therein.

"16th. That the historical fact, that nineteen-twentieths of the titles to lands in Upper Louisiana were not only incomplete, but not conformable to the regulations of O'Reilly, Gayoso, or Morales, at the date of the cession to the United States, affords no inference in favor of the general legality of those titles.

"17th. That the fact, that incomplete concessions, whether floating or located, were, previous to the cession, treated and considered by the Government and population of Louisiana as property, salable, transferable, and the subject of inheritance and distribution ab intestato, furnishes no inference in favor of those titles, or to their claim to the protection of the treaty of cession, or of the law of nations.

"18th. That the laws of Congress heretofore passed in favor of incomplete titles, furnish no argument or protecting principle in favor of those titles of a precisely similar character, which remain unconfirmed.

"In addition to the above, a number of other errors, consequential on those indicated, might be stated. The Judge's doctrine as to the forfeiture which he contends is inflicted by Morales's regulations, seems to me to be peculiarly pregnant with grievous consequences. I shall, however, not tire the reader with any further enumeration, and shall detain him only to observe, by way of conclusion, that the Judge's recollection of the argument of the counsel for the petitioner, as delivered at the bar, differs materially from what I can remember, who also heard it. In justice to the counsel, I beg to observe, that all that I have now submitted to the public, has been suggested by that argument as spoken, and by the printed report of it, which is even now before me. A CITIZEN."

And the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, unmindful of the solemn duties of his station, and that he held the same, by the constitution of the United States, during good behavior only, with intention wrongfully and unjustly to oppress, imprison, and otherwise injure the said Luke Edward Lawless, under color of law, did, thereafter, at a term of the said District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, begun and held at the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, on the third Monday in April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, arbitrarily, oppressively, and unjustly, and under the further color and pretence that the said Luke Edward Lawless was answerable to the said court for the said publication signed "A Citizen," as for a contempt thereof, institute, in the said court, before him, the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, certain proceedings against the said Luke Edward Lawless, in a summary way, by attachment issued for that purpose by the order of the said James H. Peck, as such Judge, against the person of the said Luke Edward Lawless, touching the said pretended contempt, under and by virtue of which said attachment the said Luke Edward Lawless was, on the twenty-first day of April, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-six, arrested, imprisoned, and brought into the said court, before the said Judge, in the custody of the Marshal of the said State; and the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, did, afterwards, on the same day, under the color and pretences aforesaid, and with the intent aforesaid, in the said court, then and there, unjustly, oppressively, and arbitrarily, order and adjudge that the said Luke Edward Lawless, for the cause aforesaid, should be committed to prison for the period of twenty-four hours, and that he should be suspended from practising as an attorney or counsellor at law in the said District Court for the period of eighteen calendar months from that day, and did then and there further cause the said unjust and oppressive sentence to be carried into execution; and the said Luke Edward Lawless was, under color of the said sentence, and by the order of the said James H. Peck, Judge as aforesaid, thereupon suspended from practising as such attorney or counsellor in the said court for the period aforesaid, and immediately committed to the common prison in the said city of St. Louis, to the great disparagement of public justice, the abuse of judicial authority, and to the subversion of the liberties of the people of the United States.

And the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any further articles, or other accusations or impeachment, against the said James H. Peck, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the article herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same, and every part thereof, and to all and every other articles, accusation, or impeachment, which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said James H. Peck may be put to answer the misdemeanors herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments, may be thereupon had and given, as may be agreeable to law and justice.

The VICE PRESIDENT informed the managers that the Senate would take proper order thereon, of which the House of Representatives should have due notice; and they then withdrew.

On motion by Mr. TAZEWELL, it was

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to issue a summons, in the usual form, to James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, to answer a certain article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives on this day; that the said summons be returnable here on Tuesday next the eleventh instant, and be served by the Sergeant-at-Arms, or some person to be deputed by him, at least three days before the return day thereof; and that the Secretary communicate this resolution to the House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. TAZEWELL,

The court then adjourned to Tuesday next at 12 o'clock.

FRIDAY, May 7.

Officers, &c., of the Revolution—Virginia Line.

The bill for the relief of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia State line in the war of the Revolution was taken up; when

Mr. TYLER said, that he felt it to be his duty briefly to explain to the Senate the grounds on which he rested his support to this bill. He would premise this explanation by stating that Virginia asked nothing of the liberality or the bounty of this Government. He should make no appeal to its gratitude in favor of those whose descendants were interested in the passage of the measure now before the Senate. If they had no claim either in justice or equity; if, in plainer words, they were not entitled to obtain, provided this Government was suable, a decree or judgment in a court of law or equity, for that which is now demanded for them, he desired that the bill might be rejected. The General Assembly of the State, one of whose representatives he was on that floor, had adopted certain resolves upon this subject, not in the character of a supplicant for Congressional bounty, but from a desire to fulfil her engagements solemnly entered into with men who had evinced their fidelity to her and the cause of American independence, by long and faithful service. That State would scorn to be a suppliant to a Government which has no power to bestow charity, or to exercise a spirit of munificence. He had premised thus much, not only in justice to his State, but to himself.

He then entered into an exposition of the grounds on which the bill rested. The State of Virginia, by sundry legislative resolves, commencing at an early period of the Revolutionary war, had held out inducements to her citizens to enter into the military service. Amongst the most prominent of which was, the promise of land bounties to her officers and soldiers, as well upon the State as continental establishment. She was then the mistress of an extensive region; and if she had continued to retain her sovereignty over it, no murmur of complaint would ever have been uttered against her by those who fought not her battles only, but those of the confederacy. She drew no discrimination between her State and continental troops. None in truth existed. The only difference between them was, a mere difference as to the Government by whom they were to be paid. The service of the State troops was as trying and as perilous as that of the continentals. The same fields were embued with their blood; and when victory perched on the banner of the one, it alighted also on those of the other. In fulfilment of her plighted faith, a resolution was adopted by her legislature, on the 19th of December, 1778, appropriating all the lands lying between Green River, the Cumberland mountain, the North Carolina line, the Tennessee and Ohio Rivers, exclusively to the purpose of satisfying the claims to military bounty; and, in 1781, she added the lands lying south of Tennessee River, and between the Ohio and North Carolina line and the Mississippi. He recited these facts to show distinctly to the Senate that she had ever considered the claims of both her lines as inseparable and undistinguishable—a fact which it was necessary to bear faithfully in mind.

In 1781 she adopted the policy of ceding to the United States her extensive territory northwest of the river Ohio, which had been conquered exclusively by her own arms; and, on the second day of January, passed a resolution authorizing her delegates in Congress to make the cession on certain conditions. Here (Mr. T. said) the difficulty appertaining to this subject had commenced—a difficulty which had heretofore prevented her from doing full and ample justice to her gallant sons. By the resolution authorizing the cession, (he would call it the power of attorney under which her agents acted,) her reservation of lands appertained as well to the benefit of her State as continental troops. This was the only authority with which she ever invested any one, in relation to the lands ceded.

Here Mr. T. read from a copy of the original resolution the following words: "That in case the quantity of good lands on the southeast side of the Ohio, upon the waters of the Cumberland River, and between the Green River and the Tennessee River, which have been reserved by law for the Virginia troops upon continental establishment, and upon her own State establishment, should (for the reasons therein stated) prove insufficient for their legal bounties, the deficiency shall be made up to the said troops in good land, to be laid off between the rivers Scioto and the Little Miami, on the north side of the river Ohio," &c., &c. No one will doubt that her agents were bound by their positive letters of instructions; and that if the deed varied in any essential particular from the terms of the authority by which, and by which alone, it was executed, waiving the question whether the deed might not be entirely avoided thereby, a court of equity would correct such variation, and supply all defects. This was the fact in regard to this transaction. The deed assigned recited the whole of the conditions expressed in the resolution, totidem verbis, but omitted all mention of the State troops. How could this have arisen? The Legislature of Virginia gave no authority to any one, other than that which he had just mentioned. She had never contemplated a measure of justice for her continentals, which she did not, at the same time, deal out to her State troops. There was but one mode of accounting for it. There must have been an omission, either in the copy recited, or in the recital of the copy. No other rational explanation could be given. He had, in fact, if his memory did not most egregiously deceive him, seen a certificate to that effect, from Mr. Monroe, who assisted in executing the deed. He had not been able, recently, to lay his hand on that document, nor did he esteem it material. The narrative into which he had entered served fully to establish it. In fact, the journals of Congress, of 1783, showed how the mistake had originated. A committee was appointed to consider of the terms of cession, and to report thereon; and they undertook, in their report, to set forth, in the very words of each, the various conditions on which Virginia had proposed to make the cession. The fifth condition was that appertaining to this subject; and in the recital of that, the error was committed which ran into the deed afterwards. That committee had the resolution of the General Assembly before them; and it is not to be credited, for a moment, that they intentionally recited falsely its terms. It is much more creditable and just towards that committee to ascribe the omission to a mere oversight. If he was right in this, it followed that the State troops had a full right to enter upon the reserved lands northwest of the river Ohio, in order to locate their warrants. The lands reserved in Kentucky had proved insufficient, from two causes. First, in running the division line between Kentucky and Tennessee, the territory of Tennessee had encroached considerably on those reserved lands; and, secondly, a portion of that tract of country was inhabited by the Chickasaw tribe of Indians, up to 1819, when a treaty was negotiated with them; whereupon, Kentucky claimed exclusive jurisdiction over the country, and forbade the location of the military warrants. In the mean time, the State troops were not, and have not, at any time, been permitted to avail themselves of the reservation on the northwest of the river Ohio, and now the permission to do so would come too late.

The continental troops have taken up all the undisputed land, of any value, contained in that reservation; and, by reason of a mistake in running the first boundary line, the United States have sold a large portion of what properly fell within that reservation. Thus it is that many of the State troops have never been satisfied in their just demands. Not by any fault on the part of Virginia, but from accidental circumstances, over which she had no control. There remains now within the reserved territory no lands which would remunerate the labor and expense of location. The Government itself has sold a large portion of them; and, so far as a deficiency is produced from that cause, no one can doubt but that the United States are bound to make it good. But if the reservation, the interposition of this Government apart, had proved deficient, this Government ought to make it good. It paid down no valuable consideration for that extensive domain. It received it as a gratuity. If the reservation had exceeded the demands of the officers and soldiers, all the surplus would have belonged to this Government. Surely the rule should work both ways. If you would take the surplus, if any, you ought to supply the deficiencies, if any.

But these claims rested upon another ground, which he considered equally strong. The contract with the soldier created on his behalf a lien on all the unlocated lands held by Virginia at the time of entering into that contract. The whole northwestern territory was subject to his claim. Virginia could not make void that lien. This Government, therefore, must have been subject to it, since it was prior, in point of time, to the deed of cession. In a court of justice, in a case between individuals, he apprehended that but one judgment could be pronounced in this matter; and he trusted that the Senate would not hesitate in fulfilling the demands of justice. No deep concern need be felt as to the amount of these unsatisfied warrants. He was in possession of a document which enabled him to arrive with something like accuracy at the quantity of land. It was a statement of the Register of the Land Office, from which the warrants had issued, furnished in 1822. There issued to the State troops, prior to the year 1792, warrants, amounting in all to one million one hundred and forty thousand five hundred and eighty-three and two-thirds acres; and between 1792 and 1828, others amounting to thirty-seven thousand four hundred and nine and one-third acres; making in all one million one hundred and seventy-seven thousand nine hundred and ninety-three acres. Of these, one million thirty-one thousand one hundred and thirty-four and two-thirds acres were located; leaving of unsatisfied warrants, one hundred and forty-six thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight and one-third acres. Some small addition has, no doubt, been made since; but when it is seen that, in thirty years, warrants covering but thirty-seven thousand four hundred and nine and one-third acres have been issued, it may justly be inferred that those which have been issued since are of inconsiderable amount. When it is recollected that the Congress, but two years ago, appropriated one million of acres in aid of the Ohio Canal, and is engaged almost daily in making extensive grants to other objects, he could not persuade himself that it would hesitate to pass this bill, in fulfilment of such a purpose as that which it proposed to accomplish.

Mr. KNIGHT said he rose to obtain information on the subject under consideration, and to ask the Senator from Virginia whether a reservation was made in the deed of cession in favor of the State troops, and whether they were placed on a footing with the Virginia continental troops, in regard to the land or location of the military warrants. He understood no reservation was made in the deed of cession in favor of the State troops. Then why should be given to the State troops of Virginia more than is given to other State troops? Other States had troops who were also found valiantly contending by the side of the continental troops, and who have applied here for aid, in the form of pensions, out of the common fund, and they have been refused. They have been told to go to the States for compensation; that they were State troops, and, therefore, the State must pay them.

Sir, it was stated that a reservation of lands was made for the troops of Virginia, west of the Ohio, between the Miami and Scioto, and that the United States had interposed, and sold a part of the land reserved. It is conceived that the United States could not sell these lands to the prejudice of these claims. If Virginia made the reservation, she will hold them notwithstanding these sales. The Virginia State troops have no right, either in justice or equity, to more than the troops of other States; and if the gentleman would consent to amend the bill, so as to include all the State troops, he would vote for it; but to give these lands to the Virginia troops alone, would be doing more than the Senate had been willing to do for others. Why should be given to the State troops of Virginia that which is held from others?

Sir, it is said that it was intended to have included the reservation for the State troops as well as those on the continental line. Was it so done by the deed of cession? It is not pretended. No, sir, it was not. Did no other States make cessions to this Government but Virginia? Sir, the United States ceded what they had; they ceded revenue, Virginia ceded lands. The revenue, it is believed, will amount to as much as these lands; and if the revenue be given back, compensation will not be asked for the State troops. We then should be able to reward them ourselves; but to give to Virginia troops alone, is doing more than is required, in my opinion. I have not looked at the deed of cession, nor the conditions on which the cession was made; but I have understood that the continental troops only were provided for by that instrument.

Mr. KANE moved to amend the bill, in the seventh line, by inserting, between the words "any" and "unappropriated" the word "unsettled." (The effect of the amendment was intended to restrict the locations of Virginia land warrants to public lands unappropriated and unsettled; which amendment was agreed to.)

Messrs. NOBLE and HENDRICKS opposed the location of these land warrants in Indiana; not because of any hostility to the principles of the bill—those they did not question—but they objected to their location in Indiana, in consequence of the difficulties which grew out of a former similar bill, for the relief of the "Canadian volunteers." They feared that similar dissatisfaction and confusion would arise under the provisions of the present bill; and would, therefore, move that it be amended by striking out "Indiana."

Mr. KANE then said, that so far from its being an objection to him that any of these locations should be made in his own State, he was decidedly in favor of them. He believed that, in expressing his own sentiments, he did those of his constituents, whose interests would be promoted by emigration to the State.

Mr. BENTON said that the persons who were interested in these claims lived in different States, some of them in Missouri; and he had letters requesting him to get leave to locate in that State. He had no objection to it. He would be willing that the whole quantity should be located in Missouri. It would increase the settlement and cultivation of the State, and augment the number of tax-payers. These were desirable things in a new State. Even a non-resident proprietor was a more profitable landholder to the State than the Federal Government; for such proprietors paid taxes, which the Federal Government did not.

He should make no motion to amend the bill by enlarging the sphere for the location of the warrants; he left it to the Senators from Virginia, who had charge of the bill, to conduct it as they pleased. He would vote for it in any shape, either confined to the territory which Virginia formerly ceded to the Federal Government, or extended to the whole body of the public lands. Upon the United States he conceived the obligation to be the same, to yield land for the satisfaction of the warrants, whether it was requested in one place or in another. To the holders of the warrants, who were now the children and grandchildren of the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, and who were dispersed through many States, it would be more convenient to have leave to locate in other States besides those mentioned in the bill. Doubtless we shall have applications next winter, if the bill passes as drawn, for leave to locate elsewhere, and I shall be for granting it. The only reason that the Senators from Virginia have given for confining the locations to the land which Virginia formerly owned, is the difference between strict right and equity; they contend for a strict right to locate on the old Northwestern Territory; and, on this there seems to be reason; but it is the same to the Federal Government to pay out of any portion of her lands.

Messrs. TAZEWELL and BURNET severally opposed the motion of Mr. HENDRICKS; which, on the question being taken, was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed by the following vote:

Adams, Barnard, Barton, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Burnet, Chase, Clayton, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy, Hayne, Holmes, Iredell, Johnston, Kane, King, Livingston, McKinley, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Rowan, Sanford, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of South Carolina, Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, Webster, White, Wiley, Woodbury—39.

TUESDAY, May 11.

Tea, Coffee, and Salt.

The bill "to reduce the duties on coffee, tea, and cocoa," was, on motion by Mr. SILSBEK, considered in Committee of the Whole, with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Finance; and the first amendment being in part agreed to,

On the question to agree to the second amendment, as following:

Section 1, line eight, after the word "more," insert, And from and after the thirty-first day of December, 1880, the duty on salt shall be ten cents for every fifty-six pounds and no more—it was rejected, 20 to 26.

[The following remarks of Mr. BENTON in connection with this bill, are all that have been preserved.]

Mr. BENTON commenced his speech, by saying that he was no advocate for unprofitable debate, and had no ambition to add his name to the catalogue of barren orators; but that there were cases in which speaking did good; cases in which moderate abilities produced great results; and he believed the question of repealing the salt tax to be one of those cases. It had certainly been so in England. There the salt tax had been overthrown by the labors of plain men, under circumstances much more unfavorable to their undertaking than exist here. The English salt tax had continued one hundred and fifty years. It was cherished by the ministry to whom it yielded a million and a half sterling of revenue; it was defended by the domestic salt makers, to whom it gave a monopoly of the home market; it was consecrated by time, having subsisted for five generations; it was fortified by the habits of the people, who were born, and had grown gray, under it; and it was sanctioned by the necessities of the State, which required every resource of rigorous taxation. Yet it was overthrown; and the overthrow was effected by two debates, conducted, not by the orators whose renown has filled the world—not by Sheridan, Burke, Pitt, and Fox—but by plain, business men—Mr. Calcraft, Mr. Curwen, and Mr. Egerton. These patriotic members of the British Parliament commenced the war upon the British salt tax in 1817, and finished it in 1822. They commenced with the omens and auspices all against them, and ended with complete success. They abolished the salt tax in toto. They swept it all off, bravely rejecting all compromises when they had got their adversaries half vanquished, and carrying their appeals home to the people, until they had roused a spirit before which the ministry quailed, the monopolizers trembled, the Parliament gave way, and the tax fell. This example is encouraging; it is full of consolation and of hope; it shows what zeal and perseverance can do in a good cause; it shows that the cause of truth and justice is triumphant when its advocates are bold and faithful. It leads to the conviction that the American salt tax will fall as the British tax did, as soon as the people shall see that its continuance is a burden to them, without adequate advantage to the Government, and that its repeal is in their own hands.

The enormous amount of the tax was the first point to which Mr. B. would direct his attention. He said it was near three hundred per cent. upon Liverpool blown, and four hundred per cent. upon alum salt; but as the Liverpool was a very inferior salt, and not much used in the West, he would confine his observations to the salt of Portugal and the West Indies, called by the general name of alum. The import price of this salt was from eight to nine cents a bushel of fifty-six pounds each, and the duty upon that bushel was twenty cents. Here was a tax of upwards of two hundred per cent. Then the merchant had his profit upon the duty as well as the cost of the article; and when it went through the hands of several merchants before it got to the consumer, each had his profit upon it; and whenever this profit amounted to fifty per cent. upon the duty, it was upwards of one hundred per cent. upon the salt. Then, the tariff laws have deprived the consumer of thirty-four pounds in the bushel, by substituting weight for measure, and that weight a false one. The true weight of a measured bushel of alum salt is eighty-four pounds; but the British tariff laws, for the sake of multiplying the bushels, and increasing the products of the tax, substituted weight for measure; and our tariff laws copied after them, and adopted their standard of fifty-six pounds to the bushel.

[Here General SMITH, of Maryland, rose, and said that he had led the Senator from Missouri into an error, in telling him, some time back, that the weight of alum salt was eighty-four pounds. Subsequent reflection had shown him that it was below eighty.]

Mr. B. resumed his speech. He said, the Senator from Maryland was not so far wrong in his first information as he supposed; that he (Mr. B.) was informed from other sources that Turk's Island salt weighed above eighty pounds; and he had a report before him of a Committee of the British House of Commons, made in 1817, by Mr. Calcraft, the chairman of the committee, in which the weight of the best Bay of Biscay salt is stated at eighty-four pounds. But let us assume the weight at eighty pounds; and at this weight it is incontestable that the tariff laws have been the means of defrauding the consumer of thirty pounds in the bushel. For these laws reduce the bushel to fifty-six pounds; and the retail merchant, and salt manufacturer, improving upon this hint, have made a further reduction of six pounds, and reduced the bushel to fifty. This is a loss of three parts in eight—very nearly one-half—and making the salt cost nearly one hundred per cent. more. Putting all this together—the duty, the merchant's profit upon that duty, and the loss in the bushel—and the duty on alum salt is shown to be near four hundred per cent.; in other words, the tax is four times the value of the article, and makes it cost the consumer four times as much as it would cost him without the tax. This is a cruel oppression upon the people; one which they ought not to bear without necessity, and which there is no necessity, as shall be fully shown, for bearing any longer.

Mr. B. entered into statistical details, to show the aggregate amount of this tax, which he stated to be enormous, and contrary to every principle of taxation, even if taxes were so necessary to justify the taxing of salt. He stated the importation of foreign salt, in 1829, at six millions of bushels, round numbers; the value of seven hundred and fifteen thousand dollars, and the tax at twenty cents a bushel, one million two hundred thousand dollars; the merchant's profit upon that duty at fifty per cent. is six hundred thousand dollars; and the secret or hidden tax, in the shape of false weight for true measure, at the rate of thirty pounds in the bushel, was four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Here, then, is taxation to the amount of about two millions and a quarter of dollars, upon an article costing seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and that article one of prime necessity and universal use, ranking, next after bread, in the catalogue of articles for human subsistence.

The distribution of this enormous tax upon the different sections of the Union, was the next object of Mr. B.'s inquiry; and, for this purpose, he viewed the Union under three great divisions—the northeast, the south, and the west. To the northeast, and especially to some parts of it, he considered the salt tax to be no burden, but rather a benefit and money-making business. The fishing allowances and bounties produced this effect. In consideration of the salt duty, the curers and exporters of fish are allowed money out of the Treasury, to the amount, as it was intended, of the salt duty paid by them; but it has been proved to be twice as much. The annual allowance is about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the aggregate drawn from the Treasury since the first imposition of the salt duty in 1789, is shown by the Treasury returns to be five millions of dollars. Much of this is drawn by undue means, as is shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of the present session, page eight of the annual report on the finances. The Northeast makes much salt at home, and chiefly by solar evaporation, which fits it for curing fish and provisions. Much of it is proved, by the returns of the salt makers, to be used in the fisheries, while the fisheries are drawing money from the Treasury under the laws which intended to indemnify them for the duty paid on foreign salt. To this section of the Union, then, the salt tax is not felt as a burden.

Let us proceed to the South. In this section there are but few salt works, and no bounties or allowances, as there are no fisheries. The consumers are thrown almost entirely upon the foreign supply, and chiefly use the Liverpool blown. The import price of this is about fifteen cents a bushel; the weight and strength are less than that of alum salt; and the tax falls heavily and directly upon the people, to the whole amount of their consumption. It is a heavy burthen upon the South.

The West is the last section to be viewed, and it will be found to be the true seat of the most oppressive operations of the salt tax. The domestic supply is high in price, deficient in quantity, and altogether unfit for one of the greatest purposes for which salt is there wanted—curing provisions for exportation. A foreign supply is indispensable, and alum salt is the kind used. The import price of this kind, from the West Indies, is nine cents a bushel; from Portugal, eight cents a bushel. At these prices, the West could be supplied with this salt at New Orleans, if the duty was abolished; but, in consequence of the duty, it costs thirty-seven and a half cents per bushel there, being four times the import price of the article, and seventy-five cents per bushel at Louisville and other central parts of the valley of the Mississippi. This enormous price, resolved into its component parts, is thus made up: 1. Eight or nine cents a bushel for the salt. 2. Twenty cents for duty. 3. Eight or ten cents for merchant's profit at New Orleans. 4. Sixteen or seventeen cents for freight to Louisville. 5. Fifteen or twenty cents for the second merchant's profit who counts his per centum on his whole outlay. In all, about seventy-five cents for a bushel of fifty pounds, which, if there was no duty, and the tariff regulations of weight for measure abolished, would be bought in New Orleans by the measured bushel of eighty pounds weight, for eight or nine cents, and would be brought up the river, by steamboats, at the rate of thirty-three and a third cents per hundred weight. It thus appears that the salt tax falls heaviest upon the West. It is an error to suppose that the South is the greatest sufferer. The West wants it for every purpose the South does, and two great purposes besides—curing provision for export, and salting stock. The West uses alum salt, and on this the duty is heaviest, because the price is lower, and the weight greater. Twenty cents on salt, which costs eight or nine cents a bushel, is a much heavier duty than on that which costs fifteen cents; and then the deception in the substitution of weight for measure is much greater in alum salt, which weighs so much more than the Liverpool blown. Like the South, the West receives no bounties or allowances on account of the salt duties. This may be fair in the South, where the imported salt is not re-exported upon fish or provisions; but it is unfair in the West, where the exportation of beef, pork, bacon, cheese, and butter, is prodigious, and the foreign salt re-exported upon the whole of it.

Mr. B. then argued, with great warmth, that the provision curers and exporters were entitled to the same bounties and allowances with the exporters of fish. The claims of each rested upon the same principle, and upon the principle of all drawbacks—that of a reimbursement of the duty which was paid on the imported salt when re-exported on fish and provisions. The same principle covers the beef and pork of the farmer, which covers the fish of the fisherman; and such was the law in the beginning. The first act of Congress, in the year 1789, which imposed a duty upon salt, allowed a bounty, in lieu of a drawback, on beef and pork exported, as well as fish. The bounty was the same in each case; it was five cents a quintal on dried fish, five cents a barrel on pickled fish, and five on beef and pork. As the duty on salt was increased, the bounties and allowances were increased also. Fish and salted beef and pork fared alike for the first twenty years. They fared alike till the revival of the salt tax at the commencement of the late war. Then they parted company; bounties and allowances were continued to the fisheries, and dropped on beef and pork; and this has been the case ever since. The exporters of fish are now drawing at the rate of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, as a reimbursement for their salt tax; while exporters of provisions draw nothing. The aggregate of the fishing bounties and allowances, actually drawn from the Treasury, exceeds five millions of dollars; while the exporters of provisions, who get nothing, would have been entitled to draw a greater sum; for the export in salted provisions exceeds the value of exported fish.

Mr. B. could not quit this part of his subject, without endeavoring to fix the attention of the Senate upon the provision trade of the West. He took this trade in its largest sense, as including the export trade of beef, pork, bacon, cheese, and butter, to foreign countries, especially the West Indies; the domestic trade to the Lower Mississippi and the Southern States; the neighborhood trade, as supplying the towns in the upper States, the miners in Missouri and the Upper Mississippi, the army and the navy; and the various professions, which, being otherwise employed, did not raise their own provisions. The amount of this trade, in this comprehensive view, was prodigious, and annually increasing, and involving in its current almost the entire population of the West, either as the growers and makers of the provisions, the curers, exporters, or consumers. The amount could scarcely be ascertained. What was exported from New Orleans was shown to be great; but it was only a fraction of the whole trade. He declared it to be entitled to the favorable consideration of Congress, and that the repeal of the salt duty was the greatest favor; if an act of justice ought to come under the name of favor, which could be rendered it, as the salt was necessary in growing the hogs and cattle, as well as in preparing the beef and pork for market. A reduction in the price of salt, next to a reduction in the price of land, was the greatest blessing which the Federal Government could now confer upon the West. Mr. B. referred to the example of England, who favored her provision curers, and permitted them to import alum salt free of duty, for the encouragement of the provision trade, even when her own salt manufacturers were producing an abundant and superfluous supply of common salt. He showed that she did more; that she extended the same relief and encouragement to the Irish; and he read from the British statute book an act of the British Parliament, passed in 1807, entitled "An act to encourage the export of salted beef and pork from Ireland," which allowed a bounty of ten pence sterling on every hundred weight of beef and pork so exported, in consideration of the duty paid on the salt which was used in the curing of it. He stated, that, at a later period, the duty had been entirely repealed, and the Irish, in common with other British subjects, allowed a free trade with all the world, in salt; and then demanded, in the most emphatic manner, if the people of the West could not obtain from the American Congress the justice which the oppressed Irish had procured from a British Parliament, composed of hereditary nobles, and filled with representatives of rotten boroughs, and slavish retainers of the King's ministers. Having shown the enormous amount of the tax, its unequal operation in different sections of the Union, and the superior claims of the West for its abolition, Mr. B. proceeded to examine the reasons for keeping it up. These grew out of the "American system;" for the duty was no longer wanted for revenue. The plea of revenue was cut off by our own conduct. We had voted, two years ago, to reduce the duties one-half on wines, and were now voting to reduce them to a fraction on coffee, tea, and chocolate. This is proof decisive that the revenue can dispense with a part of the taxes. The objection to the repeal of the salt duty, stands upon the "American system;" and thus this system is presented to the people by its own warm friends and zealous champions, as reducing the moderate duties on Champagne wine and imperial tea, which the rich and luxurious alone use, and leaving the enormous and unequal duties upon salt, without which the farmer cannot raise his stock or cure his provisions; without which the laboring man cannot eat his dinner, nor the beggar boil his greens! Thus this system is presented as favoring the rich and luxurious, oppressing the poor and laborious! But let us examine into it, and see with what justice, and with what conformity to its own declared principles, the "American system" has taken the salt tax under its shelter and protection. The principles of that system, as I understand them, and practise upon them, are to tax, through the custom-house, the foreign rivals of our own essential productions, when, by that taxation, an adequate supply of the same article, as good and as cheap, can be made at home. These were the principles of the system (Mr. B. said) when he was initiated, and, if they had changed since, he had not changed with them; and he apprehended a promulgation of the change would produce a schism amongst its followers. Taking these to be the principles of the system, let the salt tax be brought to its test. In the first place, the domestic manufacture had enjoyed all possible protection. The duty was near three hundred per cent. on Liverpool salt, and four hundred upon alum salt; and to this must be added, so far as relates to all the interior manufactories, the protection arising from transportation, frequently equal to two or three hundred per cent. more. This great and excessive protection has been enjoyed, without interruption, for the last eighteen years, and partially for twenty years longer. This surely is time enough for the trial of a manufacture which requires but little skill or experience to carry it on. Now for the results. Have the domestic manufactories produced an adequate supply for the country? They have not; nor half enough. The production of the last year, (1892,) as shown in the returns of the Secretary of the Treasury, is about five millions of bushels; the importation of foreign salt, for the same period, as shown by the custom-house returns, is five millions nine hundred and forty-five thousand five hundred and forty-seven bushels. This shows the consumption to be eleven millions of bushels, of which five are domestic. Here the failure in the essential particular of an adequate supply is more than one-half. In the next place, how is it in point of price? Is the domestic article furnished as cheap as the foreign? Far from it, as already shown, and still further, as can be shown. The price of the domestic along the coast of the Atlantic States, varies, at the works, from thirty-seven and a half to fifty cents; in the interior, the usual prices, at the works, are from thirty-three and a third cents to one dollar for the bushel of fifty pounds, which can nearly be put into a half bushel measure. The prices of the foreign salt, at the import cities, as shown in the custom-house returns for 1892, are, for the Liverpool blown, about fifteen cents for the bushel of fifty-six pounds; for Turk's Island and other West India salt, about nine cents; for St. Ubes and other Portugal salt, about eight cents; for Spanish salt, Bay of Biscay and Gibraltar, about seven cents; from the Island of Malta, six cents. Leaving out the Liverpool salt, which is made by boiling, and, therefore, contains slack and bittern, a septic ingredient, which promotes putrefaction, and renders that salt unfit for curing provisions, and which is not used in the West, and the average price of the strong, pure, alum salt, made by solar evaporation, in hot climates, is about eight cents to the bushel. Here, then, is another lamentable failure. Instead of being sold as cheap as the foreign, the domestic salt is from four to twelve times the price of alum salt. The last inquiry is as to the quality of the domestic article. Is it as good as the foreign? This is the most essential application of the test; and here again the failure is decisive. The domestic salt will not cure provisions for exportations, (the little excepted which is made in the Northeast, by solar evaporation,) nor for consumption in the South, nor for long keeping at the army posts, nor for voyages with the navy. For all these purposes it is worthless and useless, and the provisions which are put up in it are lost, or have to be repacked, at a great expense, in alum salt. This fact is well known throughout the West, where too many citizens have paid the penalty of trusting to domestic salt, to be duped or injured by it any longer. In proof of this, Mr. B. read a statement from a citizen of Indiana, Mr. J. G. Read, whose respectability he vouched for, alleging that he had sustained a loss of near three hundred and fifty dollars upon a cargo of three hundred barrels of pork, at New Orleans, in the year 1827, in consequence of putting it up in domestic salt. The pork began to spoil as soon as it arrived in the warm climate of the South. To save it, Mr. Read had to incur the expense of repacking in alum salt—a process, which cost him one dollar and twelve and a half cents on each barrel, besides twelve and a half cents for replacing each hoop that got broke in the operation, and the expense of the drays hauling the pork to and from the place of repacking. Mr. B. said that this was the case with one and all

[SENATE.]

They must repack, in alum salt, at New Orleans, at the same expense that Mr. Read did, or procure that kind of salt beforehand, burdened as it was with duty, and diminished in the bushel by the tariff laws. Surely the West cannot present this picture of imposition to the Congress, and ask in vain for the relief which the Irish, proverbial for oppression, received from the British Parliament. And here he submitted to the Senate, that the American system, without a gross departure from its original principles, could not cover this duty any longer. It has had the full benefit of that system in high duties, imposed, for a long time, on foreign salt; it had not produced an adequate supply for the country, nor half a supply; nor at as cheap a rate, by three hundred or one thousand per cent.; and what it did supply, so far from being equal in quantity, could not even be used as a substitute for the great and important business of the provision trade. The amount of so much of that trade as went to foreign countries, Mr. B. showed to be sixty-six thousand barrels of beef, fifty-four thousand barrels of pork, two millions of pounds of bacon, two millions of pounds of butter, and one million of pounds of cheese; and he considered the supply for the army and navy, and for consumption in the South, to exceed the quantity exported.

Mr. B. examined another ground of claim for the continuance of the duties, founded on the amount of capital which the manufacturers had embarked in the business. They had returned this capital at upwards of three millions of dollars; but when you come to analyze the particulars of this imposing sum, two millions of it are found to be taken up with wooden vats, and their scantling roofs, which are in a state of daily deterioration, and must rot in a few years, whether used or not. Such items could not be counted as capital, unless when new, or nearly so; and it is not to be presumed that any new works have been erected since the problem of paying the public debt has been discussed and solved; and a great reduction of taxes looked to as a consequence of that event. Another portion of the capital was in kettles, also a perishable item, to which the same remark extends as to the wood in vats. A third large item in the estimate of capital is a great number of wells and furnaces, left to stand idle on purpose, in order to make less salt, and demand higher prices for it. Deducting all these items, or so much of each as ought to be deducted, and it would probably turn out that the boasted capital in these works did not exceed the amount of one year's tax upon the people to keep them up. That tax has been shown to be, for 1829, one million two hundred thousand dollars of direct duty; merchant's profit upon that sum, at the rate of fifty per cent.; making six hundred thousand dollars; and four hundred and fifty thousand dollars more for the loss of thirty pounds in every bushel: in all, two millions and a quarter of dollars. The real capital, in all human probability, does not reach that sum. The capital to be affected by the repeal of the duty cannot be the half of it; for all the interior works—all those in Upper Pennsylvania, in Western Virginia, in Ohio, in Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, are beyond the reach of foreign salt, except at an advance of from two to three hundred per cent. upon its cost. They are protected without a tariff, by locality, by distance, and by the expense of transporting foreign salt into the fair and legitimate sphere of their supply and consumption. Doubtless it would be better for the consumers to buy all the works, and stop them, than to go on paying the present enormous duty, and its accumulated burdens, to keep them up. But this alternative cannot be necessary. The people cannot be driven to this resort. After reducing the duties on tea, coffee, wines, and chocolate, the duty upon salt must fall. The American system cannot keep it up. It cannot continue to tax the first necessary of life, after untaxing its luxuries. The duty was repealed in toto, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson. The probable extinction of the public debt enabled the Government at that time to dispense with certain taxes, and salt took precedence then of tea, coffee, chocolate, and wine. It cannot be necessary here to dilate upon the uses of salt. But, in repealing that duty in England, it was thought worthy of notice that salt was necessary to the health, growth, and fattening of hogs, cattle, sheep, and horses; that it was a preservative of hay and clover, and restored moulded and flooded hay to its good and wholesome state, and made even straw and chaff available as food for cattle. The domestic salt makers need not speak of protection against alum salt. No quantity of duty will keep it out. The people must have it for the provision trade; and the duty upon that kind of salt is a grievous burthen upon them, without being of the least advantage to the salt makers.

Mr. B. said it was an argument in favor of keeping up these duties, that in time of war we should have to depend upon the home supply. He said we had no war at present, nor any prospect of one, and that it was neither wise nor beneficial to anticipate, and inflict upon ourselves beforehand, the calamities of that state. "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof." When the war comes, we will see about the price of salt; in the mean while, the cheaper we get it now, the higher we shall be able to pay for it then. But he did not admit the argument. The making of salt was a plain and easy business. It required no skill or experience. If a part of the works stop when the price becomes low, they will start again the day it rises. If the whole were stopped now, they would all be in full operation in the first few months of war. Besides many works were stopped now. On the Kenhawa, twenty-four furnaces, capable of making four hundred thousand bushels per annum, are returned by the owners as idle. On the Holston only one well is worked making five hundred bushels a day, when ten thousand could be made. At many other places a part of the works are stopped, and for the purpose of making a less quantity and getting a higher price. If the owners thus stop their works for their private advantage they must not complain if the interest of the people should require more of them to stop.

Mr. B. said there was no argument which could be used here in favor of continuing this duty which was not used, and used in vain, in England; and many were used there, of much real force, which cannot be used here. The American system, by name, was not impressed into the service of the tax there, but its doctrines were; and he read a part of the report of the committee on salt duties, in 1817, to prove it. It was the statement of the agent of the British salt manufacturers, Mr. William Horne, who was sworn and examined as a witness. He said: "I will commence by referring to the evidence I gave upon the subject of rock salt, in order to establish the presumption of the national importance of the salt trade, arising from the large extent of British capital employed in the trade, and the considerable number of persons dependent upon it for support. I, at the same time, stated that the salt trade was in a very depressed state, and that it continued to fall off. I think it cannot be doubted that the salt trade, in common with all staple British manufactures, is entitled to the protection of Government; and the British manufacturers of salt consider that, in common with other manufactures of this country, they are entitled to such protection, in particular from a competition at home with foreign manufacturers; and, in consequence, they hope to see a prohibitory duty on foreign salt."

Such was the petition of the British manufacturers. They urged the amount of their capital, the depressed state of their business, the number of persons dependent upon it for support, the duty of the Government to protect it, the necessity for a prohibitory duty on foreign salt, and the fact that they were making more than the country could consume. The ministry backed them with a call for the continuance of the revenue, one million five hundred thousand pounds sterling, derived from the salt tax; and with a threat to lay that amount upon something else, if it was taken off of salt. All would not do. Mr. Calcraft, and his friends, appealed to the rights and interests of the people, as overruling considerations in questions of taxation. They denounced the tax itself, as little less than impiety, and an attack upon the goodness and wisdom of God, who had filled the bowels of the earth, and the waves of the sea, with salt for the use and blessing of man, and to whom it was denied, its use clogged and fettered, by odious and abominable taxes. They demanded the whole repeal; and when the ministry and the manufacturers, overpowered by the voice of the people, offered to give up three-fourths of the tax, they bravely resisted the proposition, stood out for total repeal, and carried it.

Mr. B. could not doubt a like result here, and he looked forward, with infinite satisfaction, to the era of a free trade in salt. The first effect of such a trade would be, to reduce the price of alum salt, at the import cities, to eight or nine cents a bushel. The second effect would be, a return to the measured bushel, by getting rid of the tariff regulation, which substituted weight for measure, and reduced eighty-four pounds to fifty. The third effect would be, to establish a great trade, carried on by barter, between the inhabitants of the United States and the people of the countries which produce alum salt, to the infinite advantage and comfort of both parties. He examined the operation of this barter at New Orleans. He said, this pure and superior salt, made entirely by solar evaporation, came from countries which were deficient in the articles of food, in which the West abounded. It came from the West Indies, from the coasts of Spain and Portugal, and from places in the Mediterranean; all of which are at this time consumers of American provisions, and take from us beef, pork, bacon, rice, corn, corn meal, flour, potatoes, &c. Their salt costs them almost nothing. It is made on the sea beach by the power of the sun, with little care and aid from man. It is brought to the United States as ballast, costing nothing for the transportation across the sea. The duty alone prevents it from coming to the United States in the most unbounded quantity. Remove the duty, and the trade would be prodigious. A bushel of corn is worth more than a sack of salt to the half-starved people to whom the sea and the sun give as much of this salt as they will rake up and pack away. The levee at New Orleans would be covered—the warehouses would be crammed with salt; the barter trade would become extensive and universal; a bushel of corn, or of potatoes, a few pounds of butter, or a few pounds of beef or pork, would purchase a sack of salt; the steamboats would bring it up for a trifle; and all the upper States of the Great Valley, where salt is so scarce, so dear, and so indispensable for rearing stock and curing provisions, in addition to all its obvious uses, would be cheaply and abundantly supplied with that article. Mr. B. concluded with saying, that, next to the reduction of the price of public lands, and the free use of the earth for labor and cultivation, he considered the abolition of the salt tax, and a free trade in foreign salt, as the greatest blessing which the Federal Government could now bestow upon the people of the West.

The remaining amendments reported by the committee being agreed to, the bill was further amended; and, the amendments being concurred in, were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time, as amended.

Impeachment of James H. Peck.

At 12 o'clock the Senate resolved itself into a High Court of Impeachment.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. CHAMBERS, who were absent on the organization of the court, being present, the VICE PRESIDENT administered the usual oath to them.

The Sergeant-at-Arms was then directed to make proclamation in the usual form, to keep silence; after which,

The Sergeant-at-Arms returned the writ of summons, with his proceedings thereon; that is, he had served the same on James H. Peck, on Thursday last, in the city of Baltimore, and had left with him a copy thereof; to the truth of which he was sworn by the Secretary.

Proclamation was then made that James H. Peck appear and answer the article of impeachment, and he accordingly appeared, attended by Mr. Wirt, as his counsel; and being seated within the bar,

The VICE PRESIDENT informed Judge Peck that the court was ready to receive his answer.

JUDGE PECK rose, and addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I appear, in obedience to a summons from this honorable Court, to answer an article of impeachment exhibited against me by the honorable the House of Representatives; and I have a motion to make, which I request may be done by my counsel.

The VICE PRESIDENT having signified the willingness of the Court to receive the motion,

Mr. WIRT rose, and, having read reasons therefor, submitted the following motion in behalf of Judge Peck:

1. That a reasonable time may be allowed me to prepare my answer and plea; and, for this purpose, I ask until the 25th day of the present month.

2. That, after my answer and plea shall be filed, process for witnesses may be awarded to me, and a reasonable time may be allowed to collect my witnesses and proofs from the State of Missouri.

Mr. WEBSTER then submitted the following order:

Ordered, That James H. Peck file his answer and plea with the Secretary of the Senate, to the article of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, on or before the second Monday of the next session of Congress.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the foregoing order to the House of Representatives, and to James H. Peck.

Mr. BIBB moved to amend the order, by striking out the "second Monday of the next session of Congress," and inserting the 25th day of the present month, which was agreed to; and the order was then made as amended.

On motion by Mr. CHAMBERS, the Court adjourned to meet on Tuesday, the 25th instant, at 12 o'clock.

Maysville and Lexington (Kentucky) Turnpike Road.

[On the 18th, 14th, and 15th of May, there was much business done in Senate, and a number of bills were passed. Among other bills under consideration was that authorizing a subscription of stock in the Maysville, Washington, Paris, and Lexington Turnpike road. The publishers have, in their possession, only the following remarks by Mr. TYLER.]

Mr. T. stated that he did not rise to enter into a constitutional argument on the bill now under consideration. He should wait for more favorable auspices before he ventured to detain the Senate by such an argument. The period might be near at hand, when the principles of the constitution would once more be invoked, and the true democratic party be called upon to rally around the standard which was unfurled in times long since gone by. Whenever the day should arrive in which the country would be so far relieved from the unhappy spell in which it had been bound, as to listen with attention to an exposition of this subject, on constitutional grounds, he would not be wanting in his duty. I was (said Mr. T.) in that Congress which was the first to enter gravely into the discussion of the constitutional power of this Government to make roads and canals. I then attentively weighed all that was urged by the advocates of the system—if system that may be called, which is none—and my decision was against them. Every subsequent reflection has confirmed the opinion then expressed; and the experience of the last six years has satisfied me, that, in its exercise, all that is dear and should be considered sacred in our institutions is put to hazard. Experience is the parent of true wisdom, and the lights which she has furnished upon this subject ought to be bright enough to conduct our footsteps back to the path from which we have strayed. Can any man say in what this system is to end? Formerly, it was held to be national. I have no such word in my political vocabulary. A nation of twenty-four nations, is an idea which I cannot realize. A confederacy may embrace many nations; but by what process twenty-four can be converted into one, I am still to learn. Yes, sir, formerly it was contended that the road-making powers could only be exerted over national objects, but now it is gravely contended that every thing is national, and that the bounty of this Government may be exerted in aiding to construct a road but sixty miles long. And what do we hear? Why, that the stock thus taken up by the Government is destined, in the end, to yield a handsome dividend; that this road runs through the most fertile district of country in the world, and is the great thoroughfare through the State of Kentucky. Let me remark, that it is by no means the least surprising circumstance connected with it, that, when its advantages are so decidedly great, and the promised dividend on the stock so large, the State of Kentucky itself, if its citizens are reluctant to subscribe, should not take up the stock. Why permit this Government already possessed of such abundant sources of revenue, to engross this also? Why suffer it, from this time, and forever, to levy a tax for the benefit of other portions of the confederacy on the good people of Kentucky? Let the truth be spoken. The benefits of the contemplated subscription are destined to arise to certain individuals, who have been incorporated by the Legislature of that State to construct this road. Their fortunes are to be advanced, and they are earnestly urging us to aid them in this enterprise. Now, sir, I desire Senators to reflect upon the consequences of passing this bill. In all our legislation we should act upon an enlarged principle—the principle of equal justice. If we subscribe to this undertaking, where shall we stop? What company shall we deny, or what work shall we refuse to aid? Will you aid all the works of equal extent—every road of sixty miles in length? If we do not, shall we not be justly chargeable with injustice? But, sir, upon what principle is it that we shall limit our subscriptions to roads of precisely the same extent with this? Why not, if they shall fall a little short of this? I ask of gentlemen to show me the limit of their principle. Pass this bill, (said Mr. T.,) and no man can set bounds to the applications which will be made to us at the next session. We shall have a perfect jumble of all manner of schemes and plans; national and local; public and private; in lawyer's phrase, a perfect hotchpotch. Can any Government bear such an operation? Can any community exist in peace under such a system? It will terminate precisely as has done another magnificent scheme. Four or five years ago, our ingenious politicians found the power in the constitution to improve harbors, and to make our rivers navigable. They began with roadsteads for the navy; and in what has it terminated? Let our observation this session illustrate. We have got now to surveying creeks which have not water enough to keep at work a common grist mill. The appropriation made but the other day, for the survey of Mousen River, in the State of Maine, in the very face, too, of an explanation of its actual condition, made by the Chairman of the Committee of Commerce, has left me no room to hope that any opposition to the bill now under consideration will be successful. It is, nevertheless, my duty, as a member of the committee who reported this bill, to state to the Senate the objections which I have to it. When the subject was before the committee, it was attempted to show that it was but the part of a scheme, more enlarged and more extensive. It was said to be but a link in a great road hereafter to be finished by this Government from Zanesville, in Ohio, to a point opposite to Maysville, on the Ohio River; and from Lexington to Nashville; and from thence on to Florence, in Alabama. On this ground, it claimed nationality of character. The chain was broken by the interposition of the Ohio River; and what was to be done to supply it, I do not know. A bridge would scarcely have been thought of, and a ferry, founded by authority of this Government, might subject to too severe a test this road-making power. Now, sir, it is the easiest thing imaginable to make a road a national road. Every road in the country readily becomes so. Each is connected with every other, whether by a straight line or otherwise, is not material. The angle at which the county road passing by my door intersects the principal road leading from this city to Richmond, and from thence to Huntsville, in Alabama, whether it be a right angle or an acute angle, must be wholly immaterial. It is a part of a national road, and is immediately connected with every other road in the United States. If this Maysville road rested on a pivot, and could be turned round from its present posture of east and west, to north and south, it would be still as much a national road as it now is. The only difference would be, that it would lead to other States and to other cities. Here, then, is the termination of this stupendous national scheme—this great American system of road-making and canal-digging—this system, in support of which the constitution was carefully scanned through all its provisions. Here is exhibited the rightful exercise of this power under the authority to raise an army, and, ex vi termini, to construct a permanent road for military purposes. Here the great power of regulating commerce, not in truth by making rules or regulations by which it shall be carried on between the States, but by affording facilities in travelling from Maysville to Lexington, a distance of sixty miles. Splendid and magnificent, truly, has this great American system become, now that this Government is set down by the side of some few of the citizens of Maron, Bourbon, and Fayette counties, to deliberate upon the important questions which must arise in the construction of this road, whether there shall be a cart-load of sand or gravel, more or less, deposited on this spot or on that.

It has pleased one gentleman in this debate to indulge in certain remarks relative to the condition in which Virginia is placed from its want of good roads; and he has been pleased to denounce our prejudices, as he has thought proper to call them. I have but one reply to make to the Senator, and it is, that we as little desire his sympathies as we deserve his denunciation. If we are content with our situation, surely no one else has any right to complain of it. The Senator might have drawn very different conclusions in reference to us, from the very facts which he has stated. Sir, I will not deny that my native State would be greatly benefited by the application of governmental resources to its improvement. No State in this confederacy requires the expenditure of larger sums of money to objects of internal improvement; and none would be more benefited by such application. When then we stand aloof from this system; when we close our ears to the syren voice which has won so many others to the support of these measures, what is the true attitude in which we stand before the world? Can we be charged with interested or selfish designs or feelings? If we were actuated by any such, we should reach forth our hands, and gather this golden fruit. Instead of this, we give no vote for those measures, even which appertain to our immediate benefit; against the appropriation in aid of the Dismal Swamp canal, the Senators of Virginia on this floor have uniformly voted. No, sir, we will never consent to sacrifice the constitution of this land to a mere ephemeral policy. Pleasure has ever more been represented by poets and by painters as clothed in perpetual smiles, and adorned with the richest jewels; and in real life, we have known many who, allured by her deceptions, blandishments, and hollow but showy temptations, have followed as she pointed, until ruin has befallen them. So will it be with us as a confederated republic. These are the feelings and sentiments of those whom I represent on this floor. Unmoved by the whispering of a seductive policy, Virginia can only regard that course of governmental action as sound, which falls clearly within the pale of the constitution. Think you, sir, that we were more insensible than others to the advantages of good roads and canals? Not so, (said Mr. T.,) let them be made out of the proper treasury—that of each State; and they will find in no quarter a more devoted advocate than myself. But when the interposition of this Government is invoked, and the high reward which an exuberant Treasury offers, is held out, I say nay to the exercise of the power. It is in vain that gentlemen represent to me the benefits of the system. It is in vain that I am told of its being a harmless policy. Show me the grant in the constitution in plain terms, not extorted by a forced interpretation, and not until then will I listen to you. In my youth, I remember to have read in that wisest of all wise books, if the moral be well observed, I mean, Æsop, the fable of the cock and the fox; and as it serves to illustrate my feelings and views on this particular subject, I beg leave to repeat it as well as my memory enables me to do it. A fox, in search of prey, passed by the door of a hen roost, and, finding the door locked, resolved to try his skill in obtaining admission. He resorted to an expedient, sir, which so often proves successful in the affairs of the world, that of flattery and hypocrisy united. His salutation was friendly and courteous. He expressed his great concern at having heard that the cock had been indisposed. The cock assured him that his health was perfectly good, and much the better from the circumstance of Mr. fox being on the outside of the door, and the door being locked. The fox pretended not to credit this, and desired permission to see him, so that he might bear testimony to the fact from ocular demonstration; and such was his great anxiety to look in upon him, that he urged the very humblest request of being only permitted to get his nose in at the door. The cock very wisely refused this permission, declaring to him at the same time, that, if he permitted him to get his nose in, his whole body would soon follow. Such were my feelings when this road-making power was first claimed for this Government. But, sir, it was vain that Virginia protested against it. Vain that she urged upon others the moral of the fable which I have just recited. The good and true State, North Carolina, reasoned as did Virginia; but all in vain. This harmless and beneficent power was yielded; and what has followed, let the whole South testify. She can bear witness throughout all her borders; measure after measure has followed; until powers as supreme and as universal are claimed for this Government, as if the parchment upon your table had never been executed. The internal policy of the States prescribed, the industry of the country regulated, and all the mere charities of life exercised as fully by this Government as by an imperial monarch. The States sinking every day with accelerated velocity into the condition of mere provinces; and a great national Government to grow out of the ruins of the confederacy. Can the people of these States be reconciled to this? Or, will they continue supine, until the whole fabric of the Government is changed? Sir, does any one believe that we can exist under a consolidated National Government? Look to the present condition of things, and the question is answered. I ask every member of this House, whether it could have been conceived, that, when this American system was entered upon, the results which are now constantly transpiring would have arisen. What scenes are exhibited on the legislative floor under the influence of the feelings of local interest? I do but glance at them, and will not dwell upon them. When were sectional lines ever before so strongly drawn? But I forbear, sir, I forbear. Let those who believe that a National Government will best suit our condition, turn to the map, and their doubts will be solved. A country embracing so great an extent of territory—possessing such a diversity of interests; one extremity congealed by the frosts of an almost perpetual winter, the other parched by almost tropical suns. Can a National Legislature know the interests of these extremes, feel their wants, or advance their wishes? It is in vain to disguise it; a central Government here, call it by what name you please, which shall attempt to legislate for local interests, is an open and manifest despotism. Ingenuity is tortured to bring this Government to this. The first fruits are bitter enough; combinations have arisen, and combination will follow combination, to the end of the chapter. The South now suffers, and anon it will be the turn of the North and of the West. Suppose that all Europe existed under a consolidated Government, each State being degraded to the condition of a mere principality, what scenes would not be exhibited, and how tremendous a tyranny would be created, wielded not by a single man, but by stern, inflexible, immovable majorities? Russia, Prussia, Sweden, and Denmark, uniting with Austria, would evermore wage a war of plunder against France and the southern provinces. The more fertile the country, and more genial the climate, the greater temptation to combine against it with a view to legislative plunder. Who can doubt this? And yet the States of this Union are not differently circumstanced. A National Government, acting here through the instrumentality of law, in other words, in obedience to an underleague of interests, will operate as forcibly and as fatally. The gentleman has in these considerations the true foundation of our prejudices, if so they are to be called. We opposed ourselves to every strained construction of the constitution, under the knowledge that the concession of one power, however slight, leads to the claim of another, and another, until all will be gone.

It has become customary, of late years, to ridicule the Virginia doctrines, as they are called. That State which has stood by this Union, through good and through evil report, is sneered at and reviled. So was it in former times. Under the first Adams she was declared rebellious and factious; and it was said that her republicans should be trampled into dust and ashes. She, nevertheless, with Kentucky, raised her voice against the infractions of the constitution. She does the same now. And what were the infractions against which she then protested, in comparison with those against which she now protests? Bad enough they were, it is true. But the art of construing the constitution, and the efforts to make it a nose of wax, was then but barely commenced. The sedition law was passed, and thereby the principle of force was resorted to. Now, sir, a more insidious, and a more dangerous principle is brought into action. Money is now relied upon; cupidity—avarice, are the infernal agents now invoked. These are the fatal sisters who weave the web of our destiny; and, if we do not destroy that web before we come to be more fully entangled, if we permit first an arm and then a leg to be tied up, there will be left to us no means of escape. Let us now begin the effort, and, by drawing back this Government to its legitimate orbit, save our institutions from destruction. My untiring efforts shall not be wanting in so holy a cause. But if we surrender ourselves into the hands of ingenious politicians, those aspirants for high office who seek evermore to enlist in their support the strongest passions of human nature, with a view to their individual aggrandizement, the ark of the covenant will be destroyed, and the temple rent in twain. Let us expel the money changers from that temple, and introduce the only true worship. In this way only,

I am fully satisfied, can we preserve the Union of these States, and secure their unceasing happiness.

The Senate is indebted for these remarks to the gratuitous attack which has been made upon Virginia in this debate. They have been as unpremeditated as that attack was unexpected; but I could not forego the opportunity thus afforded me of expressing my feelings.

[The bill, as it is known, passed the Senate.]

SATURDAY, May 22.

Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

The bill authorizing a subscription to the stock of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, was taken up as unfinished business.

Mr. GRUNDY said he would like to know the price which the stock of that company would command in market; and, previous to his voting on the subject, he would make an inquiry to that effect of the Senators from Maryland.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he did not know that he could give the gentleman from Tennessee a satisfactory answer to his query. The stock was now at par, but if forced into the market, he did not, and could not, with any degree of certainty, say what it would sell for. The company was certain of success. It was calculated that the annual proceeds would amount to eighty thousand dollars; but, from the most moderate and reasonable calculation, it would produce an annual income of forty thousand dollars, which must be divided among the stockholders.

An amendment having been proposed by Mr. LIVINGSTON, which required that the funds to meet the subscription on the part of the United States should be drawn from the sales of other stocks invested in works of similar character, Mr. L. urged the propriety and necessity of such a course, in a speech of great force and eloquence. He said that the numerous and heavy calls on the Government for aid in works of internal improvement, in different sections of the country, admonished him that nothing could save the system of internal improvement from destruction, but the adoption of some such measure as that which he had proposed. When the applications, now before Congress, for aid in the execution of works of internal improvement, were contemplated, and the amount of money which they would require enumerated, and viewed in connection with the numerous claimants who are now calling upon the country for debts which were justly due them, he saw no alternative left but the adoption of this measure. The Treasury of the Union would otherwise prove utterly inadequate to meet the calls of the different companies engaged in works of internal improvement, most of which had equal claims on the aid of the Government to carry their design into effect. Unless this system was adopted, and the funds of the General Government transferred from the one to the other, as soon as the works in which they were invested shall have been completed and in full operation, the best friends of internal improvements would be forced to abandon them, and the whole system would fall into disrepute. He was one of the most devoted friends of the system, and it was therefore that he took this means of endeavoring to preserve it.

Mr. WEBSTER said he agreed with the Senator from Louisiana, in the principles laid down in his amendment heretofore offered to this bill. He thought that the funds of the General Government in works of internal improvement ought to be a circulating fund, to be applied as circumstances might demand, for the purpose of encouraging and promoting those works in different sections of the country; and when the works have been effected, the stock should be sold out, and again applied to the encouragement of similar works. But he thought that the disposal of these stocks required the exercise of great prudence and discretion; because, if the market was glutted with funds of this character, it would produce depreciation in the price of these stocks, at once injurious to the Government and the other stockholders.

Mr. CHAMBERS said he had already expressed to the Senate his views of the merits of the bill, as also the reasons why its passage should not be delayed; and he rose at this time to make a few remarks exclusively on the amendment now proposed. He did not mean to oppose the principle which the amendment assumed, of returning to the Government the sums which might be advanced to promote various schemes of internal improvement. He did not suppose the idea had anywhere been entertained, that the Government was to remain permanently a stockholder in the numerous corporations to which, from time to time, it had contributed, or should hereafter contribute aid. At a proper period, and under a judicious system, he thought it was fit that the capital, so often necessary to bring into existence an improvement highly useful in itself, and which, in its incipient state, might fail without our patronage, should be re-occupied, after its purpose was accomplished, and re-invested in some other improvement, equally useful, and equally requiring aid. In these general views, he concurred with the Senator from Louisiana; and if he would lay a foundation for this system, by procuring such information of the value and peculiar character of the various items of our property thus engaged, he would unite in adopting and protecting it. But was it wise to begin at the point whence the Senator proposed to start his project? Could we be asked first to offer our property in the market, and afterwards inform ourselves of its value? The question asked by the Senator from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) and the answer of his colleague, (Gen. SMITH,) fully illustrated this matter. Neither of these Senators knew any thing of the value of the stock of the Ohio Canal; and probably every other Senator on this floor was as uninformed on the subject. The same remark would, no doubt, apply to nearly all stocks of the kind owned by the Government. The time had not yet arrived when these various works of internal improvement had been prosecuted to an extent to give them the value they must ultimately command, as articles of sale; nor could it be otherwise. It was only at a comparatively late period that the finances and engagements of the Government had placed in its control the pecuniary means of aiding in the accomplishment of great national improvements, involving more expenditure than individual wealth could furnish. The character and nature of these operations necessarily made the day of return too distant from the day of expenditure, to justify the expectation of their being now in a state of maturity, either to prove the actual value of the investment, or to command that value if offered for sale. The most striking evidence of this truth is to be found in the history of one of these improvements, which had been alluded to in debate a few days ago. It was then said, the stock in the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal was worth, in the market, one hundred and eighty-seven dollars per share, on which two hundred dollars had been paid. Now (said Mr. C.) it is a matter within my personal knowledge, that, five or six years ago, shares in this Canal Company, on which one hundred dollars had been paid, were sold for twenty dollars; and at a period very shortly prior to the commencement of its operations, the price was merely nominal, and it could not, probably, have been sold at a discount of twenty-five per cent., or perhaps fifty. It had scarcely commenced its operations, impeded as it is with difficulties, for the removal of some of which you have, within a few days, provided, and it already yields, we are told, a fair interest on the capital, and a price less only by five or six per cent. than par. To construct an immense canal or railroad is a work of much time, and while in progress it is necessarily unproductive. Few individuals have the ability to invest their funds in an enterprise which places them for so long a period out of active circulation, let the ultimate prospect of profit be what it may. But, whenever the enterprise is so far completed as to return a prompt and punctual interest or dividend, it becomes at once a salable property. The various improvements to which the Government has contributed its aid, are not advanced to this state of maturity, and, least of all, the Ohio and Chesapeake Canal, the one indicated by the Senator from Louisiana, (Mr. LIVINGSTON.)

These considerations had convinced him that this was not the period at which our stocks could be sold to advantage. He believed no prudent individual, owning such property, would, under such circumstances, think of selling it; being himself uninformed of its amount, its probable future value, its present current price, and the contingencies on which depended the period and the degree of its increase in value.

But (said Mr. C.) the amendment is still more objectionable on other grounds. This system of internal improvement can only be sustained by a fair and equal distribution of the favor and assistance of the Government, in the proportion which the several objects may bear to the great interests of the country. The friends of this bill present to your notice an object of vast importance in its relations to the Government, as well as to an immense mass of individuals, and to many of the States. No scheme so grand, none of so great practical benefits, in a season of war or in years of peace, has ever suggested itself as practicable since the days of the "Father of his country," who first suggested this mode of connecting the Western waters with the Atlantic by an interior communication; and yet to the bill granting to this object the comparatively small contribution of two hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, in the way of subscription to its stock, it is proposed to annex a limitation, a condition, a restraint, which has never before been annexed to any, the least of all your improvements. The Senator who offers this provision, says he is a friend to this bill. He is, certainly, a firm and well-known friend to fair and equal justice. Now I put to him (said Mr. C.) and to the Senate, the question, whether it be fair and equal justice to impose on this grant a condition or restraint which has never been imposed on any similar grant to others, either at a former session of Congress or during the present. We have for years past bestowed our patronage on works of internal improvement; the beneficent arm of the Government has been extended to sustain and cherish these objects in various sections of the Union, and often when no other power could have preserved them from destruction; but to all we have given our aid without this condition or restraint. During the six months to which the present session has extended, we have again exerted this beneficent power of the Government; and in one case—the Maysville and Lexington road—of a character so doubtful in the view of some gentlemen, that the President of the United States is said to hesitate whether he will approve of the act of the two Houses of Congress; yet we have seen no condition or restraint imposed or attempted. Then, why, he again asked, why select this bill, and make it the victim of this new conception, never before suggested or even thought of as a rider to such a bill. The grant asked for is moderate in amount; estimating it by the object to be effected, the bill asks that it may be made on the terms on which all others, without exception, have obtained it. The demand then is for equal and exact justice. If the object is not meritorious, give nothing. But if the object be such as deserves your countenance and assistance, (and the amendment assumes this to be the case,) surely you cannot gratify this reasonable demand for equal and exact justice, by qualifying this grant with conditions and restraints never before imposed. In all other cases a free and full authority has been given to your disbursing officer to pay from the Treasury the amount subscribed; and it is not fair, it is not equal, it is not just, to restrain him, in respect to this particular case, to the proceeds of stock to be sold. What particular stock, we know not; where to be sold, we know not; and at what sacrifice it will be sold, we know not.

Sir, (said Mr. C.,) the Senator from Massachusetts, (Mr. WEBSTER,) has suggested the propriety of preparing for the introduction of a system of selling our stocks, by asking information to be furnished at the next session. The only possible exception to it which could be urged by gentlemen who advocated this amendment, was the delay in bringing the system into actual execution. To remedy this objection, and to gratify the wishes of those who were anxious for its immediate commencement, he would suggest a perfectly practicable mode of effecting their object. Let a resolution be now submitted, directing that the Secretary of the Treasury shall sell our stocks at such periods, in such parcels, and on such terms, as in his judgment, or in the judgment of the Executive officer of the nation, will best promote the interest of the country. This will at once, instantly, create the system, and the sales will be made as soon as a due regard to the public interest shall furnish, which he supposed was as soon as any one desired. But this, he contended, should be a substantive and separate legislative act. There is no more propriety in its being connected with this railroad bill, than the Maysville bill, the Louisville and Portland Canal bill, the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal bill, or even the light-house bill, or, in truth, any other bill. Those had been discussed, and decided on the abstract merits of their respective claims, on considerations arising out of their connection with the great interests of the nation, their practicability, their general utility, their cost, and the amount asked for. The friends of this bill are content to place their claim to your notice upon these considerations, and will fearlessly and confidently abide the result of such an issue. But in their name, in the name of fair and equal justice, he protested against uniting with these considerations, others growing out of a new and undigested system, touching a general policy of the Government, and in relation to a large amount of its funds having no affinity to this subject, a policy now started, for the first time, when less than ten days remain of a session of six months.

Mr. GRUNDY said, the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana had produced some difficulty. He could not agree with the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. CHAMBERS,) nor concur in the force of his reasoning against the propriety of attaching the amendment to the bill at present under consideration. If the principle be a correct one, that the fund applied to the encouragement of internal improvement ought to be transferable or circulating, he saw no good reason why this bill should not be selected as the foundation on which this system shall be commenced. He went into an examination of the different stocks which the Government had invested in works of this character, the price of the stock of the great canal in the State of New York, and the depreciation it had undergone in value since that work went into operation, the demands that were now pressing upon our Treasury, from the extensive appropriation bills that had passed already, besides the numerous applicants that were calling upon the country for their just claims. He thought the nation ought to pay its just debts before it enters into further speculations and appropriations of money, that it was not known what would remain in the Treasury. If a transfer of the stock from the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company would answer the purpose, he would make no objection; but if the money for this project was to be drawn from the Treasury, he would vote against it.

Impeachment of Judge Peck.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, that he rose to exonerate himself from the charge of hostility to the bill, made by the Senator from Maryland, (Mr. CHAMBERS.) He seemed to think it a great hardship that this bill should be selected as the base on which this system is to be founded. Now he could not see what difference it would make to that company, whether the General Government paid for the stock out of the Treasury of the Union, or by a transfer of the sales of other stocks, invested in similar projects. The gentleman from Maryland must have been led into this error, from supposing that the Secretary of the Treasury was only authorized to make the subscription, in the event of his being able to dispose of other stocks at par: but this is not the fact. The Secretary of the Treasury is required to sell that stock which would command the highest price in market, and prove most conducive to the public good. He would tell the gentleman from Maryland why he was led to the introduction of the amendment to this bill. It was from a careful examination and enumeration of the different applications that are now before Congress for similar investments of stocks: they extended to a most alarming amount; and if the Government were to go on subscribing to these stocks, all recommended and supported by the same principles, the Treasury would be utterly unable to meet the demands that should thus be created. The whole system would be rendered unpopular, and its warmest friends would be reluctantly compelled to abandon it. He, for one, would be forced to abandon it, if this plan of appropriating the public money to every work of internal improvement that may be presented to Congress, were persevered in. It was, therefore, because he was anxious that the system of internal improvement should prosper, that he introduced the amendment, believing that it was the only mode left to save it from ruin.

Mr. McKINLEY moved that the bill be laid on the table, which was agreed to, yeas 21, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Adams, Benton, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Forsyth, Grundy, Hayne, Iredell, Kane, King, McKinley, Ellis, Sanford, Smith of South Carolina, Sprague, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Barton, Bell, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Foot, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Holmes, Johnston, Livingston, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Ruggles, Silsbee, Smith of Maryland, Webster—19.

TUESDAY, May 25.

Impeachment of Judge Peck.

Seats having been arranged on the right and left of the Chair, for the accommodation of the Senators, and their seats assigned to the managers and members of the House of Representatives, and the accused and his counsel,

At the hour of 12 o'clock, the Court was opened by proclamation in the usual form.

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, it was Ordered, That the Secretary give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate are now in their chamber, and are ready to proceed on the trial of the impeachment of James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri; and that seats are provided for the accommodation of the members of the House of Representatives.

Judge Peck then appeared, accompanied by Mr. Wirt and Mr. Meredith as his counsel, and occupied seats assigned them to the right of the Chair; a short time after,

The managers and members of the House of Representatives appeared, and took the seats usually occupied by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT then asked Judge Peck whether he was prepared to answer the article of impeachment exhibited against him.

Judge Peck replied, that his answer and plea were prepared, and desired that they might be read by his counsel.

The VICE PRESIDENT asked Judge Peck whether the answer now to be made was to be considered as his final answer; and the Judge having answered in the affirmative, the counsel was directed to proceed to read it.

Mr. Meredith read the answer, (which occupied upwards of two hours,) concluding with the general plea of "not guilty."

Mr. STORES, in behalf of the managers, moved That they have time to consult the House of Representatives on a replication, and that they be furnished with a copy of the answer of the respondent; which was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. WEBSTER, it was Ordered, That when this Court adjourn, it adjourn to meet again on the second Monday of the next session of Congress, at 12 o'clock, then to proceed with the said impeachment.

Mr. Wirt desired to know whether blank summons as for the attendance of witnesses would be allowed to the respondent.

The VICE PRESIDENT replied that they would.

The Court then adjourned to the second Monday of the next session of Congress.

On motion by Mr. KING, it was Ordered, That the articles of impeachment against Judge Peck, with his answer and exhibits, be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, May 26.

Removal of the Indians.

The amendments from the House of Representatives to the bill "to provide for an exchange of lands with the Indians residing in any of the States or Territories, and for their removal west of the river Mississippi," were received, and, being read—

Mr. CLAYTON moved that they be postponed until to-morrow; which motion was rejected—yeas 19, nays 24.

The first amendment being concurred in,

Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN moved to amend the second amendment, by inserting at the end thereof, "and that, until they shall choose to remove, the said tribes be protected from all State encroachments, according to the provisions of such treaties."

Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN moved to amend his motion by striking out the word "State," which was disagreed to by yeas 18, nays 25.

The question recurring on agreeing to the amendment as originally proposed by Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN, it was rejected—yeas 17, nays 26.

Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN moved to insert at the end of the second amendment of the House of Representatives, "and that all such tribes be protected, according to the provisions of said treaties, until they shall choose to remove;" which was rejected—yeas 18, nays 24.

On motion by Mr. SPRAGUE, to insert at the end of the said second amendment, "but such treaties shall be executed and fulfilled according to the true intent and meaning thereof,"—it was rejected—yeas 18, nays 24.

On motion by Mr. CLAYTON, to insert at the end of the said second amendment, "Provided also, that the provisions of this act shall extend only to the Indians residing within the State of Georgia"—it was rejected by the same vote.

The said second amendment was then agreed to. So it was

Resolved, That the Senate concur in the said amendments of the House of Representatives.

[Thursday and Friday were almost wholly spent in the consideration of private bills and executive business.]

SATURDAY, May 29.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded by ballot, to the election of a President pro tempore; and when the ballots were collected, it appeared that twenty-six members had voted.

Of these votes, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, having received fifteen, was declared to be duly elected.

The Senate having disposed of every bill before it from the House of Representatives, proceeded to consider executive business before ten o'clock P. M., and remained so engaged until the adjournment, interrupted only by messages from the other House, and from the President of the United States.

About four o'clock A. M. the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, May 31.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, and read as follows:

WASHINGTON, 31st May, 1890.

To the Senate of the United States:

GENTLEMEN: I have considered the bill proposing "to authorize a subscription of stock in the Washington Turnpike Road Company," and now return the same to the Senate, in which it originated.

I am unable to approve this bill; and would respectfully refer the Senate to my Message to the House of Representatives, on returning to that House the bill to authorize "a subscription of stock in the Maysville, Washington, Paris, and Lexington Turnpike Road Company," for a statement of my objections to the bill herewith returned. The Message referred to bears date on the 27th instant, and a printed copy of the same is herewith transmitted.

ANDREW JACKSON.

The bill referred to in the foregoing message having originated in the Senate, that body proceeded to reconsider said bill, in the manner prescribed in the seventh section of the first article of the constitution; and two-thirds of the Senators present not having voted for its passage, it was rejected by the following vote:

YEAS.—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Clayton, Hendricks, Johnston, King, Livingston, McKinley, Naudain, Noble, Robbins, Ruggles, Seymour, Silabee, Smith of Maryland, Webster, Willey—21.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adams, Bibb, Brown, Dickerson, Dudley, Ellis, Foot, Grundy, Iredell, Kane, Rowan, Sanford, Smith of South Carolina, Sprague, Tyler, White, Woodbury—17.

Thirty-eight members present; necessary to pass the bill, twenty-six.

Close of the Session.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, stating that they had appointed a committee, to join such committee as might be appointed by the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that the two Houses, having finished the business before them, were prepared to adjourn, unless he have further communications to make; in which the Senate concurred, and Mr. Wood-

BURY and Mr. BURNER were appointed on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WOODBURY reported that they had discharged the duty assigned them, and had been informed by the President that he had no further communication to make, except that he has detained the act in relation to the subscription for the stock in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and an act in relation to certain light-houses and harbors, for further consideration.

The usual messages were interchanged between the two Houses of their intention to adjourn.

The President then adjourned the Senate, sine die.

[H. OF R.]

The House proceeded to ballot for a Speaker. Mr. CONDIOT, of New Jersey, Mr. RIPLEY, of Maine, and Mr. POLK, of Tennessee, being appointed Tellers, announced, after counting the ballots, that ANDREW STEVENSON had received one hundred and fifty-nine votes; which, being a majority of the whole number, ANDREW STEVENSON, of Virginia, was declared to be duly elected Speaker of the House.

The Speaker's Address.

Being conducted to the chair, the SPEAKER elect addressed the House in the following terms:

GENTLEMEN: I receive this renewed and distinguished proof of the continued confidence and approbation of my country, with feelings of deep sensibility and unaffected gratitude; and since it is your pleasure that I should again preside over your deliberations, I accept the trust, with an earnest hope that the choice of the House may not prove injurious to its interests, or detrimental to its honor.

Of the importance and responsibility of this high office, it is unnecessary to speak. It has been justly regarded, both in relation to its elevation, and the nature and extent of its duties, as one of the most delicate and responsible trusts under the Government. Indeed, the great increase of legislative business, both of a public and private nature, (occupying, as it does, so large a portion of the year,) the number of this House, and the habit of animated, protracted, and frequent debate, have, of late, tended very much to render the duties of the Chair peculiarly arduous to the individual who fills it, and of increased importance to the public.

How far it will be in my power to meet the expectations of the House, by an able and enlightened discharge of the duties of this high station, it is not for me to say. Distrustful of my own abilities, I can promise but little else than zeal and fidelity. I shall shrink from the performance of no duty, however painful; shun no responsibility, however severe; my time and talents shall be devoted to your service; and, in pursuing the manly and steady course which duty directs, I shall, at least, be cheered and sustained by a consciousness of the purposes, and a confidence in the principles, which I shall bring with me into this arduous service. On your part, gentlemen, I shall expect and need your kind and cordial co-operation, and that general confidence, without which all the efforts of authority would be nugatory; and I entreat you to afford me that aid and support in maintaining the established rules and orders of the House, so necessary to the character and dignity of its deliberations, and the despatch of the business of the nation.

In assembling again to consider the condition of our beloved country, I seize the occasion to offer you my cordial congratulations upon its prosperity and happiness, and the still more exalted destinies that await it. Whilst our relations with foreign powers are distinguished by alliances and good will, which serve but to render our friendship more valuable to each, and more courted by all, our situation at home, under the influence of virtuous and patriotic councils, is peaceful, united, and happy. How long these blessings are to be enjoyed by us, and secured to our children, must depend upon the virtue and intelligence of the people; the preservation of our happy Union; and the virtuous, liberal, and enlightened administration of our free institutions.

That our confederated republic can only exist by the ties of common interest and brotherly attachment, by mutual forbearance and moderation, (collectively and individually,) and by cherishing a devotion to liberty and union, must be apparent to every candid mind; and, as our fathers united their counsels and their arms, poured out their blood and treasure, in support of their common rights, and by the exertions of all succeeded in defending the liberties of each, so must we, if we intend to continue a free, united, and happy people, profit by their counsels, and emulate their illustrious example.

How much will depend upon the conduct and deliberations of the national legislature, and especially of this House, it is not needful that I should admonish you. I need not, I am sure, remind you, gentlemen, that we are here the guardians and Representatives of our entire country, and not the advocates of local and partial interests; that national legislation, to be permanently useful, must be just, liberal, enlightened, and impartial; that ours is the high duty of protecting all, and not a part—of maintaining inviolably the public faith—of elevating the public credit and resources of the nation—of expending the public treasure with the same care and economy that we would our own—of limiting ourselves within the pale of our constitutional powers, and regulating our measures by the great principles contained in that sacred charter, and cherishing in our hearts the sentiment that the union of the States cannot be too highly valued, or too watchfully cherished.

These are some of the great landmarks which suggest themselves to my mind, as proper to guide us in our legislative career. By these means, gentlemen, we shall not only render ourselves worthy of the high trust confided to us, but we shall endeavor to our people the principles of their constitution and free institutions, and promote a sentiment of union and action, auspicious to the safety, glory, and happiness, of our beloved and common country.

The oath of office was then administered to the Speaker by Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, (the father of the House,) and by the SPEAKER to the members, by States in succession.

VOL. X.—37

Mr. RAMSAY, of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That Matthew St. Clair Clarke, Clerk to the late House of Representatives, be appointed Clerk to this House.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said that he was informed that there would possibly be several other individuals who would be candidates for the office of clerk. He therefore proposed to postpone the election to twelve o'clock on Thursday, to enable members to make up a judgment upon the information which they might in the mean time receive of the characters of the various candidates. This officer, he said, was the chief controlling executive officer of this body ; his situation was one highly confidential and responsible. It was due to the members, and to the candidates, that a better opportunity should be afforded for selection from amongst the latter, than he at least had enjoyed. He had himself intended to move, that on Thursday next, at twelve o'clock, the House would proceed to the election of a clerk ; and with this view he moved to postpone until Thursday next the consideration of the resolution now under consideration.

Mr. RAMSAY asked what was the House in the mean time to do for a clerk ? Could the House proceed in its business without that officer ? In offering the resolution, Mr. R. said, he had only followed the example, set by former Congresses, of electing the clerk immediately after the choice of Speaker. And he asked that the question of postponement should be taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered upon the question.

In reply to a question put to the Chair, whether the late clerk would be considered in service until an election of clerk took place, the Speaker answered that he presumed that he would.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, suggested the postponement of the election to to-morrow, instead of Thursday.

Mr. JOHNSON proposed Wednesday, as the medium between to-morrow and Thursday. The object of his motion for postponement, and the only object of it, was to obtain time to make up his mind upon information which he might receive as to the relative merits of the several candidates for this office. To-morrow the message of the President might be expected to be received, and the other officers of the House also were to be elected ; so that the election of clerk could not well be made until Wednesday, to which day, therefore, he now moved to postpone the consideration of Mr. RAMSAY'S motion.

Mr. BURGESS, of Rhode Island, said that if the old clerk could continue to act as clerk for several days, without an election, why not for the whole session ? When was his service to end ?

The SPEAKER said that that was a matter for the discretion of the House.

Mr. BURGESS said that the mere necessity of the case made it proper that the clerk to the last House should act in organizing the present. But, when the House had gone so far as to choose a Speaker, it appeared to him that the necessity was over, and that the House would be without a clerk, unless one should be immediately chosen. Without a clerk thus chosen, he did not see how the House was to make any record of its transactions.

Mr. ALSTON, of North Carolina, thought that no difficulty could arise from a postponement of the consideration of the resolution. He thought the resolution improper in itself, and, when the gentleman from Kentucky rose, he was about to have risen himself, and propose that the House should proceed to an election by ballot. He preferred that the whole question should lie upon the table for the present, and that, whenever the House should proceed to the election of a clerk, it should be by ballot. As to the old clerk continuing to act, Mr. A. said, it had been the universal practice that the old clerk should continue to act until another should be appointed.

Mr. RAMSAY expressed his willingness, if it would meet the views of his friend, so to modify his resolution, as to propose that the House should now go into an election of a clerk.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, said he trusted that such a course would be pursued as that the House should at once go into an election by ballot. And perhaps his colleague was wrong in now proposing a different course. It had been the practice, Mr. B. knew, where no opposition to the old clerk was intended, to re-appoint him by resolution. The gentleman from Kentucky, however, had stated that he believed that there were other candidates for the office. Mr. B. said he did not know the fact : but, if there were, the proper course was, as usual, in such case, to proceed to ballot for a clerk. He should, himself, vote to lay the resolution on the table, and then to proceed to an election by ballot.

Mr. RAMSAY then withdrew his resolution in favor of Mr. Clarke, and moved, in lieu thereof, that the House do now proceed to the election of a clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved to amend this last motion, so as to go into an election on Wednesday next at twelve o'clock, instead of this day.

On this question the House divided—ayes 54, the noes being a large majority.

The motion to proceed directly to a balloting was then agreed to. Mr. RAMSAY then nominated Mr. Clarke, and Mr. JOHNSON nominated Virgil Maxcy, of Maryland.

The votes having been collected and counted by Mr. RAMSAY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. BUCHANAN, it appeared that the number of votes given in for Mr. Clarke was one hundred and thirty-five ; which, being a majority of the whole number, MATTHEW ST. CLAIR CLARKE was elected Clerk of the House of Representatives, and was forthwith sworn into office.

Western Armory.

[H. OF R.]

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, it was resolved, nem. con., that JOHN OSWALD DUNN be appointed Sergeant-at-Arms to the House.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, the House then proceeded to the election of a doorkeeper. The late venerable (though now infirm) doorkeeper, Capt. BENJAMIN BURCH, was nominated, in a very appropriate manner, by Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina. Several other persons were nominated by different members. The ballots having been counted by tellers named by the Speaker, Mr. TUCKER reported that Mr. Burch had received one hundred and thirty-six votes, (a large majority of the whole number,) and was consequently chosen.

On motion, it was resolved, nem. con., that OVERTON CARR be appointed Assistant Doorkeeper to this House.

The usual message having been interchanged with the Senate, it was resolved that a committee be appointed on the part of this House, to join such committee as have been, or may be, appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that quorums of the two Houses have assembled, and that Congress are ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make.

TUESDAY, December 8.

Mr. DRAYTON, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, &c., reported that the committee had waited on the President accordingly, and that the President answered that he would make a communication to Congress this day.

The Message of the President of the United States was soon after received, by the hands of A. J. DONELSON, Esq., his Private Secretary, and read. [See Senate Proceedings, p. 405.]

Whereupon, ten thousand copies thereof were ordered to be printed for the use of this House.

THURSDAY, December 10.

President's Message.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; when the several branches of the President's Message were referred to the different Standing and Select Committees.

TUESDAY, December 15.

Refuse Lands in Tennessee.

Mr. CROCKETT moved the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed, with instructions to inquire as to the most equitable and advantageous mode of disposing of the refuse lands lying south and west of the Congressional reservation line in the State of Tennessee.

This resolution being read,

Mr. POLK, of Tennessee, moved to amend the resolution, by striking out so much as proposes a Select Committee, and moving to refer the subject of the resolution to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CROCKETT said, that he wished this subject to take the same course now as it had done heretofore. The resolution referred, he said, to a few scraps of land lying along in his district, which it was high time should be disposed of. The subject had been already several times before Congress, and had always heretofore been referred to a Select Committee; and all that he asked, was, that it should take the same course now as it had done heretofore.

Mr. POLK said, that a part of this subject was always before the Committee on the Public Lands in the shape of a memorial from the Legislature of Tennessee. He thought, therefore, that a reference of this resolution to that committee was expedient, that all parts of the subject should be placed before the same committee.

Mr. STRIGER, of Pennsylvania, said, that at the late session of Congress, a proposition had been made for distributing the vacant public lands, or the proceeds of them, among the several States. This proposition was so connected with the subject of this resolution, that, as he expected it would be renewed at this session, he moved that the pending resolution lie upon the table for the present.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was negatived.

Mr. CROCKETT made some further remarks, in which he was understood to say that the Legislature of Tennessee was disposed to withdraw its former memorial. But, however that might be, he said his colleague (Mr. POLK) had heretofore had this matter in his charge as head of a Select Committee; and, said Mr. C., as I live among the people who are interested in these lands, I want now to have something to do myself with the disposition of the subject.

The motion of Mr. POLK to amend Mr. CROCKETT's resolve was then negatived, 92 to 65; and Mr. C.'s resolution was agreed to.

Western Armory.

Mr. DESHA moved the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an armory at some suitable point upon the Western waters.

Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, proposed to amend the resolution, by adding to it, "or at the falls of ———, in the State of Kentucky," and added some observations to show the strong claims of this location for the proposed armory.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, thought that, considering the variety of conflicting claims for this object, the resolution had better be general in its terms, and refer the whole subject of the establishment of an armory on the Western waters to the same committee; that all the sites in the Western country might be considered together.

The resolution was then modified, with the consent of the mover, so as to propose a general inquiry into the expediency of establishing an armory on the waters of the Western States.

Mr. CARSON, of North Carolina, remarking that no part of the country possessed more valuable water power than the western part of the State of North Carolina, proposed to amend the resolution by adding, "or on the western waters of the State of North Carolina."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he regretted this motion on the part of his friend from North Carolina, as calculated to produce a collision between the West and the South as to the location of an armory. He was perfectly willing to vote for an independent proposition to inquire into the expediency of the erection of an armory in the South, but he was unwilling to connect it with a proposition for an armory in the West. For the last fifteen years it had been in vain attempted to procure the establishment of a National Armory on the Western waters, notwithstanding the unanimous opinion of the West, concurred in by the executive officers of the Government, that a Western armory was necessary, not to gratify individuals interested in its location, but for the defence of the country, and to prevent prodigal expenditure of the public moneys in transportation of arms, &c. We have now National Armories at Springfield, in Massachusetts, and at Harper's Ferry, in Virginia; and a report had been made to Congress, at his own instance, pointing out the various sites which the United States engineers had thought would be advantageous for an armory in the Western country. But, although his immediate constituents were deeply interested in the establishment of an armory at the Horse Shoe Bend, and others equally interested in other sites, he despaired ever seeing in his day an armory established in the West at all, unless upon the broad principle of giving the Executive of the United States the power of selecting a site, as had been done heretofore in the case of the armory at Springfield, and that at Harper's Ferry. Having no objection to inquiring into the expediency of establishing an armory in the West, as well as in the South, but being opposed to confounding the two propositions, Mr. J. moved to strike out of Mr. CARSON's amendment the conjunction or, and insert and, which would have the effect to separate the two propositions, instead of connecting them.

Mr. CARSON said he was entirely disposed to gratify his friend from Kentucky; but, as his motion had been made on the impulse of the moment, and could be readily modified to meet his friend's views, he moved, to give opportunity for that purpose, that the resolution should be ordered to lie upon the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

Annual Treasury Report.

The Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, (Samuel D. Ingham, Esq.,) transmitting his annual report upon the state of the finances.

The report having been announced from the Chair,

Mr. BUCHANAN moved that ten thousand copies of the report, and the documents accompanying it, be printed.

Mr. WHITTLESEY proposed six thousand copies, being the largest number ever printed of a public document before this session.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that the Annual Report of the Treasury Department was always looked to with great interest by the people; that it was too voluminous to find admission at large into the newspapers; that its general circulation was very desirable, &c. Ten thousand copies had been ordered to be printed of the documents accompanying the Message of the President; and this document, he presumed, would be considered of at least equal importance.

Mr. WHITTLESEY said he admitted that this document was one of importance, and sought for with avidity. He thought, however, that the largest number of copies ever before printed, was sufficiently large now; especially as the material and substantial part of the report would find its way into every newspaper in the country. He was disposed, he said, to observe, as far as was consistent with a prudent regard to the public interest, the system of economy recommended in the report of the Committee of Retrenchment at the session before the last; and he could not conceal his surprise that gentlemen who were, at the last session, so anxious to reduce the amount of expenditure, especially on objects of this nature, to which they seemed to have directed much of their attention, should now show such a disposition to swell it instead of reducing it.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he was happy to find that the gentleman from Ohio was now so decided an advocate for retrenchment; not knowing, however, that he had ever found him otherwise. He did not know but, in pursuit of this object, he and the gentleman from Ohio would be found going hand in hand. But this, Mr. B. said, was not the point at which they ought to begin to retrench. Retrenchment ought not to begin with communication of information of this sort to the people, who are more interested in knowing exactly what has been the management of their financial concerns than, perhaps, in any other subject. If we are to begin the work, said Mr. B., let it be with something else, more in accordance with the proper principles of retrenchment than this.

Committee on Education.

The question was then taken on printing the largest number proposed, ten thousand copies, and decided in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, December 16.

The resolution came up which was yesterday moved by Mr. RICHARDSON, of Massachusetts, for the addition to the Standing Committees of a

Committee on Education.

The resolution having been read,

Mr. RICHARDSON said that his proposition was a simple one, proposing only that a Standing Committee on Education should be provided, by the rules and orders of the House. Unless it was made necessary, by objections to the resolution, he should not occupy any portion of the time of the House upon it, but submit it for decision without remark.

Mr. HALL said, in due deference to the gentleman who presented this resolution, the subject was one which he conceived did not properly come within the control of Congress. I shall, said he, therefore, feel myself bound to object to the resolution. The subject of education, evidently, so far as legislation can be carried to it, properly belongs to the State authorities. If we go on assuming authority over subjects entirely foreign to our sphere of authority, where are we to end? We already have much extrinsic matter. As an instance, I will mention the subject of agriculture; over which we have, I believe, a Standing Committee. This, I have always been at a loss to reconcile to my idea of the just power of Congress. If we go on ingulfing every subject to which legislation can be carried, to what result must we come? Shall we not effectually assume all the power of the State authorities? This must necessarily be the result. Sir, there is a doctrine advanced, and properly advanced, and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, a doctrine properly deduced from one of the plainest provisions of the constitution—it is, that all the powers of this Government, though limited, are plenary, within their proper sphere. I admit the soundness of this doctrine; but if so, it at once puts this subject to rest. I presume neither the gentleman himself, nor any other, will pretend that the States have not the right to legislate upon this subject. If this be so, it is decisive that this Government cannot, because its power over the subject, being plenary, is necessarily exclusive, and therefore not to be participated. It is not my object to detain the House; but for the reasons given, I object to the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, expressed a desire to know what were the particular views which had induced the gentleman from Massachusetts to bring forward this proposition.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, made a few observations, the import of which was, that he was perfectly willing, when any subject requiring it should be before the House, to give it direction to a proper committee. He was not aware, however, of any necessity for a Standing Committee on the subject. The only way in which it had heretofore been directly presented to the consideration of the House, was in the shape of propositions connected with grants of public lands, which had been, as matter of course, referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Believing the consideration of such propositions to be safely lodged in the hands of that committee, he had no disposition to transfer it to another Select Committee. As at present advised, therefore, he should vote against the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON said, that the importance of education to the people of the United States, induced him to advocate the adoption of the resolution now before the House.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. H. R. STORRS) has said that he knows not what a Standing Committee on Education can have to act upon. Mr. R. said he would reply to the gentleman, that such a committee would have the whole subject to act upon—a long-neglected subject, and of the highest importance to the welfare of this Union.

This subject had been most earnestly and repeatedly recommended by the great patrons of liberty—the fathers of American independence—the founders of this republic. Permit me, said Mr. R., to call the attention of the House to the opinion contained in the message of the first President of the United States to Congress, in 1790:

“Nor am I less persuaded that you will agree with me in opinion that there is nothing which can better deserve your patronage than the promotion of science and literature. Knowledge is, in every country, the surest basis of public happiness. In one, in which the measures of Government receive their impressions so immediately from the sense of the community as in ours, it is proportionably essential. To the security of a free constitution it contributes in various ways. By convincing those who are intrusted with the public administration, that every valuable end of government is best answered by the enlightened confidence of the people, and by teaching the people themselves to know and to value their own rights; to discern and provide against invasions of them; to distinguish between oppression and the necessary exercise of lawful authority—between burdens proceeding from a disregard to their convenience, and those resulting from the inevitable exigencies of society; to discriminate the spirit of liberty from that of licentiousness—cherishing the first—avoiding the last—and uniting a speedy, but temperate vigilance against encroachments, with an inviolable respect to the laws. Whether this desirable object will be best promoted by affording aids to seminaries of learning already established, by the institution of a National University, or by any other expedients, will be well worthy of a place in the deliberations of the Legislature."—Washington's Message to Congress.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a solitary recommendation of this subject to the attention of Congress. In similar language, it has been repeatedly urged upon Congress by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and others.

If it be true, as the gentleman from New York says, that a Committee on Education would have nothing to act upon, the fact is enough to encrimson the cheek of every friend to his country with the blush of deep mortification. It is high time that there were a committee to make this a subject of attention—to devise and mature measures to promote an object of vital importance to this republic.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. HALL) has stated that he has constitutional objections to the proposed measure. Is it possible that the constitution prohibits the power to raise a Committee on Education, whilst there are committees on agriculture, manufactures, Indian affairs, and various interests, never named in the constitution? What is the language of the constitution? "We, the people of the United States, in order [among other things] to promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America." The eighth section, which enumerates the powers of Congress, declares expressly that "the Congress shall have power to provide for the general welfare of the United States;" and "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution." Is it possible to doubt that Congress is vested by the constitution with power to pass any laws, or adopt any measures, not prohibited by it, which are essential "to promote the general welfare?" All unite in bearing testimony that the general diffusion of knowledge in the United States is essential "to the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty." Singular, indeed, would it be, if the framers of the constitution had bound their own hands, and the hands of their posterity, under articles and sections, to exclude the great law of self-preservation from the system. I cannot impute to them, nor to the system, a folly so stupendous.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said, that, in common, he had no doubt, with many members of the House, he should have a good deal to say on the subject of this resolution, if he could conceive (which he did not) that there was any danger of its adoption. He was persuaded that the honorable mover had not meditated fully the extent of the question which the resolution went to raise. It was one of the largest, and, in the most favorable aspect, contestable questions of power which had been ever presented in the operation of the Government. It was true, as the gentleman had suggested, that the subject had been brought to the attention of Congress heretofore, on more than one occasion, but in modes very different from that now proposed. It had been suggested in the messages of Chief Magistrates, as a topic of the gravest deliberation, or there had been a formal assertion by resolution that the power resided in the Government, accompanied by propositions for a practical application of it. Mr. A. had supposed that these were times in which republican principles had attained ascendancy, and the revival of this doctrine would not be thought of in this House. If the gentleman did desire the revival, however, and thought he could find any considerable number to think with him, the mode of proceeding should be that to which he (Mr. A.) had just referred; by resolution affirming the power, to which the present resolution might be a sequel. It could not be expected that, by indirection on a mere proposition to raise a committee, a decision was to be had, to let in not only this jurisdiction, but the mass of connected constructions which were equally involved. Mr. A. professed himself entirely prepared now to enter into the discussion and disprove the power. He could not conceive that it could be necessary to do so, however; and in that view, he should content himself with moving that the resolution be laid on the table, with the purpose that it should not be taken up again.

The question on laying the resolution on the table was then taken by yeas and nays, and decided as follows: yeas 156, nays 52.

Honor to a Deceased Member.

Mr. BARRINGER, of North Carolina, rose for the purpose of performing the last sad office due to friendship, in announcing to the House the death of his late esteemed colleague, the honorable GABRIEL HOLMES. He said he would have performed this duty at an earlier day, but for his own impaired health. Before tendering to the House a resolution which he had prepared in relation to the melancholy event which he had just announced, he might, he hoped, be excused for saying, that those to whom the late Governor Holmes was known, eulogy would be unnecessary, and to those to whom his deceased friend and colleague was unknown, he felt, in his present state of impaired health, an utter inability to do justice to the eminent virtues of the deceased. He should not, therefore, make the attempt. He had the pleasure of knowing him in all the relations of life; in the endearing domestic relations, in which he was unsurpassed for the gentler virtues of conjugal tenderness and affection, for parental kindness and indulgence; as the chief magistrate of his native State, in which he discharged the duties devolved upon him with a dignity becoming his own elevated character, and the confidence reposed in him by his own constituents; as a Representative of the people in this House. How appropriately he performed his duties here, was too well known to require a recital from him.

DECEMBER, 1829.]

Distribution of Public Lands.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. B. said his deceased friend and colleague had been an honored member of the nineteenth and twentieth Congresses, and a member elect of the twenty-first Congress of this House. It had pleased Heaven to remove him, and it was due to him to say that his loss was most regretted by those who knew him best; and, as a testimonial of respect for the memory of the deceased, he asked of the kindness of the House the adoption of the resolution which he now offered.

Mr. B. then presented the following:

Resolved, That the members of the House of Representatives, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of the honorable GABRIEL HOLMES, late a member thereof, from the State of North Carolina, will go into mourning for one month, by the usual mode of wearing crape around the left arm.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, Mr. BARRINGER then moved that the House do now adjourn.

THURSDAY, December 17.

Distribution of Public Lands.

Mr. HUNT, of Vermont, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the net annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives.

The question of consideration of this resolve was demanded by Mr. STANBERRY, of Ohio, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. STERIGER, of Pennsylvania, then moved to amend the resolution by striking out, after the word "States," the words, "for the purposes of education and internal improvement." He had no objection whatever to the principle of distributing the net proceeds of the sales of public lands among the States, but he was opposed to the restriction upon the application of them proposed by the resolution.

Mr. HUNT said, that, by repeated special grants, donations of the public lands had been made to some of the States, and to particular institutions in others of the States, but in all cases for the purposes of education and internal improvement, and for none other. He wished, in the distribution of the avails of the residue of the public lands, to adhere to the same principle.

Mr. TEST, of Indiana, said, that he considered the principle involved in the resolution to be one of great importance, and one which this House ought not to be called to act upon without due consideration. He objected to the resolution, as well in its details as in its principle. It seemed to him to embrace, in effect, the proposition that the public lands should be divided among the States generally; to which he could never consent. He thought that time should be given to reflect upon the subject before it was further acted upon. With that view he moved to lay the resolution upon the table.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was negatived, 108 votes to 71.

The question on Mr. STERIGER's motion to amend the resolve was then also decided in the negative, 102 votes to 72.

Mr. SEVIER, Delegate from Arkansas, moved to amend the resolve, by inserting, after the word "States," the words, "and Territories;" and

This motion to amend was agreed to.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, asked how the resolve would read thus amended? How could the Territories become entitled to land, &c., "in proportion to the representation of each," &c.? The Territories, he said, have no representation on this floor. They would have no claim to land under this resolve, unless the House should further resolve that delegates are representatives.

Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, entered his protest against the number and variety of propositions brought before the House concerning the public lands, and proposing to dispose of them in various ways. It seemed as if the four quarters of the Union were striving with one another which should get the most out of these lands. The appetite for them appeared to be insatiable and uncontrollable. He was opposed to the whole of these propositions. This was not the time to express at large his views on this subject; but if there was any justice, truth, or reason, in the proposition now submitted to the House, the amendment which he was about to propose ought to have its weight with the House. Mr. M. said he did not conceal from the House that he meant to vote against the resolution in any shape; but if the resolution is entitled to pass at all, it should be with the amendment. The principle of the resolution is, that a distribution of the proceeds of sales of the public lands shall be made among the several States for certain purposes. If this be a right disposition of them, said Mr. M., it then follows that those who have had land heretofore should render an account of what they have already had. Let us see how the balance sheet stands. Let us see what proportion of the public lands has been given to the Atlantic States, from Maine to Georgia. Let us compare that proportion with what has been given to the States west of the Alleghany. If there be any propriety in the mode of disposing of the public lands at all, let us bring this question to the test; what proportion has been heretofore given to the States respectively, or to institutions within those States? He would not now pursue the inquiry in detail, but he said the amount which had been given to the States west of the Alleghany was incalculable; he should hardly be credited were he to attempt to state it. He concluded by moving to insert after the word "inquire," in the resolution, the words, "into the amount and value of the public lands which have been given by Congress to any State, or to any public institution in said State."

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, said, that he was very much of opinion that, in the views which he had taken of it, the gentleman from South Carolina had looked to but one side of this question. The people of the Western States had certainly received from the United States grants of land for the purpose of promoting education; or, rather, the Government had said to them, If you will buy thirty-five sections of the public land, we will give you one section for the purpose of promoting education. And the gentleman from South Carolina, if he had gone to the Western country, as the settlers of that country did, and waded through fevers and fogs to clear it, and paid as much money as they did for their lands, would have been entitled to the same benefit as they from this sort of donation. Sir, said Mr. V., I am as willing to meet this question at one time as another: I say, that we of the West have had no donations of public land. Everybody that got lands in that country paid for them; and the people of that country know how they have been fleeced of their last dollar for that purpose. It was well known, he said, to the people of that country, how they had earned their school lands. They had paid for them a sufficiently valuable consideration. He was not prepared, he said, any more than the gentleman from South Carolina, to go into this discussion; but at the threshold he was willing to meet the doctrine of the gentleman concerning these lands. Any one who had been raised in the West, or had purchased lands there, had their feelings on this subject; and he, for one, knew how to sympathize with them from his own experience.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, said, that it was true that the subject of inquiry proposed by this resolution was of great importance; but the resolution proposed only to invite to it the attention of a committee of the House, and not to settle any principle. The subject of a disposition of the public lands, it was well known, is agitated in every part of the Union. Various views are entertained of it. We know that, in many parts of the country, the people believe that the avails of the public lands, after the national debt is paid, ought to be divided among the several States. Whether this course should be pursued, or not, was not the question before the House, but whether the subject itself was of sufficient importance to invite an investigation here. In relation to the amendment which had been proposed, Mr. M. said, he did not see any thing injurious in its character, or adverse to the object of the mover of the original resolution. He did not see any thing insulting in this proposed amendment: he was perfectly willing that the committee should turn their attention to it, and he hoped that the result of their inquiries would be to present an interesting document, going to show how much land has been appropriated by Congress for public purposes in the several States. When the facts were ascertained, it would be seen whether, in a general apportionment, there ought to be a reduction from the quotas of these States or not. Mr. M. did not conceive it at all important whether the amendment should be rejected or not; but, of the two, he should prefer its being carried. For himself, he supposed that these donations of land have been beneficially bestowed. He felt, therefore, no alarm at the idea of ascertaining the amount of them; nor would the insertion of such an amendment deter him from pursuing the main object of the resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, that the subject of this resolution was one very deeply interesting to the State which he partly represented, and that he should much prefer that it should be made to contain no proposition or sentiment that in the commencement of the inquiry should promise a quarrel between the different members of the Union. He should prefer that the resolution should stand upon the liberal basis of looking to the future rather than to the time past, though he believed that the State of Kentucky, in regard to donations from the General Government, whether in money or in land, would not lose by the general settlement of the question which the gentleman from South Carolina had spoken of. At its last session, the Legislature of the State of Kentucky had had this subject under its consideration, and had requested its Representatives to present a claim to Congress for a part of the public domain, which, Mr. J. said, was rendered more interesting to the district which he represented, from the fact of its bordering on the Ohio River, by which it was separated from two or three of those States, which are alleged to have received an undue proportion of the donations of public lands. He thought, however, that the general discussion of this subject had better be postponed. He should vote for the proposition for inquiry on the most liberal principle: but, in doing so, he did by no means admit that the State of Kentucky had received from the United States an undue proportion of aid, either in land or in money.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, rose, not, he said, to engage in debate on this subject, but to show that the information sought for by the amendment under consideration was furnished to Congress at the last session, as would be found by a document on the files of the House, to which he called the attention of gentlemen.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said, he had risen at the same moment as the gentleman from Massachusetts, for the purpose of stating the same thing as that gentleman had already done. The report of the committee raised at the last session on this subject did not give the value of the lands granted to the several States, but he thought that it was sufficiently minute for all practical purposes. The amendment now proposed, was, he thought, calculated to embarrass the main question. He invited the attention of gentlemen to the report of the committee of the last session on this subject, which he thought contained a good deal of useful information, and which was deemed so interesting that six thousand copies of it had been ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, avowed himself in favor of the amendment of his friend from South Carolina, and did not consider it a sufficient reason for rejecting it, that an inquiry had been made into similar topics at the last session of Congress, and that the result of it is now to be found on the files of the House. He was opposed to the original proposition. He understood that the whole subject of the disposition of the surplus revenue of the United States, over and above the payment of the public debt, constituting, as it did, one of the topics of the President's Message, had been already referred to a committee of the House. It was now for the House to determine, whether, having referred the general subject, in all its extent, to one committee, it would place a particular portion of the question under consideration of another and distinct committee. He was opposed to this separation of its parts.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, moved that the resolution and amendment do lie upon the table; and the motion was agreed to by a majority of about twenty votes.

Postage on Periodicals.

Mr. VERPLANCK, of New York, submitted for consideration the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire and report on the expediency of reducing the rate of postage on periodical publications, and placing them at the same rate and under the same regulation with newspapers.

In offering this resolution, Mr. VERPLANCK said, that it was necessary to observe that the present rate of postage on periodical publications was about three times that upon newspapers. It was properly so graduated when that species of publication had been confined to the higher objects of criticism and polite literature. But it could not have escaped the attention of any one, that it had gradually acquired another character, having become extensively subservient to objects of a religious and moral character—to the diffusion of a knowledge of the popular sciences, and to the purposes of general education. The high postage on these publications, Mr. V. said, was an obstacle in the way of the prosecution of many benevolent plans of this sort. After the great plans for the promotion of education which had been suggested to the House, Mr. V. said his motion might have been considered comparatively unimportant; but it had the merit of being free from constitutional objections, and of being very practical: and, if he succeeded in his object, he trusted that it would turn out to be very useful.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Western Armory.

On motion of Mr. CARSON, the House proceeded again to consider the resolution moved on Tuesday by Mr. DESHA, proposing to refer to a committee the expediency of locating an armory on the Western waters.

A good deal of debate took place on this motion, and on proposed amendments to it; in which debate, Mr. CARSON, Mr. WILDE, Mr. WICKLIFFE, Mr. POLK, Mr. WHITTLESSEY, Mr. BELL, Mr. CHILTON, and Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, took part. The same feeling was displayed by several of the gentlemen, as has often been shown in the discussion of this question in Congress, by those who considered the interests of their districts to be affected in one way or other by it. But, before any question was taken upon it, the consideration of it was terminated by a motion for adjournment; and

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 21.

Western Armory.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution originally offered by Mr. DESHA, instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of establishing an armory at a suitable site on the Western waters.

Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, moved that the resolution, with the amendment proposed to it when last under consideration, be laid on the table; but withdrew the motion at the request of Mr. WICKLIFFE, who, believing that it was not practicable for this House ever to decide on a site for the armory, wished to move an amendment proposing to inquire into the expediency of giving to the Executive the power to designate the site.

As there was a previous question pending, however, this proposed amendment could not be received.

The actual question being on an amendment moved by Mr. GILMORE, of Pennsylvania, restricting the inquiry of the committee to the expediency of establishing an armory pursuant to the report of certain commissioners under the act of Congress of 1828—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed this amendment with great earnestness. He dwelt upon the impropriety of imposing this restriction, when it was known that other surveys had been since made, in consequence of a resolution of the Senate, which were entitled to as much respect as those which had been made under the act referred to in the amendment. He denied that the last-mentioned surveys were exclusively entitled to respect. He expressed his hope that this amendment would be withdrawn by the honorable mover, when he considered that, without it, the committee would be left perfectly at liberty to act upon whatever evidence might be placed before them, &c. He concluded his series of observations, by expressing his regret at being obliged thus early to enter into debate in the House, after having been ten years out of it, a member of another body: but the subject was one of such peculiar interest to the part of the country which he represented, that he could not refrain from expressing his views of it.

Mr. GILMORE expressed his regret that he could not, consistently with his duty to his constituents, comply with the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, to withdraw his proposition. This was a subject, he said, in which the district which he represented felt a great deal of interest. After a full and fair examination, the commissioners under the act of 1823 had given a preference to three sites, two of which were in the district which he represented, viz: if steam power were used, Pittsburg—if water power, Beaver: the further examination and re-examination of sites, he said, could only tend further to procrastinate the establishment of this armory, the expediency of which was admitted by all. The best proposition that he had seen was contained in the bill reported at the two last sessions, which proposed, in substance, that the three gentlemen who had made the former report, (gentlemen of high reputation for both talents and integrity,) should be authorized to determine the location of the armory. He could not consistently withdraw his motion for amendment, though he believed that, if the subject was thrown wide open, as proposed, we should be farther from the establishment of an armory on the Western waters than we now are.

Mr. MALLABY, of Vermont, took a review of the history of this proposition for the establishment of a Western armory. He was opposed to the amendment; and for reasons which he gave at large, he was opposed to any attempt to settle the question of location in this House. He showed the difficulties which would attend its settlement here. He was for leaving it open, so as to let the place be designated by the Executive.

Mr. JENNINGS, of Indiana, after a few explanatory remarks, moved an amendment to the amendment of Mr. GILMORE, in the shape of a proviso, that the site of the armory should be fixed "as far west as the longitude of Zanesville, in the State of Ohio."

The question was taken on this last amendment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. SEVIER, Delegate from Arkansas, said, that, as it seemed to be agreed that an armory ought to be established on the Western waters, he could not but urge the claims of the country west of the Mississippi to its location. What was the object of this armory, he asked?

It was to manufacture arms, for the purpose of defending the nation against its enemies. The next question was, where was the Western country to be invaded by an enemy? Either by the Indians on the frontier, or at New Orleans. If this armory should be located on the Ohio, what would be the consequence? The Government will have to buy a site, to buy fuel, &c., to manufacture the arms; and, when manufactured, it was well known that for nearly half the year the Ohio was dried up, and for a great part of the other was frozen over, so as to place great difficulty and uncertainty in the way of prompt transportation of these arms wherever they might be wanted. West of the Mississippi were to be found inexhaustible mines of iron ore; the Government owns the sites; the Government owns the fuel; the Government owns the mines, &c., &c., and all the expense of purchasing these would be saved. With these facts before the House, it appeared to him that it would be proper to locate the armory west of the Mississippi, where it could promptly and effectually furnish arms to defend the frontier, and to defend New Orleans, &c. For these reasons, he hoped that the amendment would be rejected, and the resolution left as open as possible, so as to allow of free selection.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, stated, as a reason for leaving this inquiry open and free from restriction, that, when the surveys under the act of 1823 were made, the improvement of the Western country, by means of canals, had not begun: whereas, if there had been a canal then, as now, extending within a few miles of Zanesville, that report would probably have been in favor of the location at Zanesville. At Cincinnati, also, he said, an important point was made by means of the canal. The effect of this work of internal improvement at other points was such as to warrant the whole subject being thrown open for further examination. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania would not withdraw his amendment, therefore, Mr. V. hoped that it would not be agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL, of Kentucky, trusted that the amendment would not be agreed to; for, so far as Pennsylvania was concerned, it was perfectly the game of open and shut. It was true, that under the act of 1823 the commissioners had examined and recommended the sites at Beaver and Pittsburg; but they had never examined a great variety of sites in the State of Kentucky, far superior to any others that had been examined in any part of the country. The Falls of Little Sandy (as the reporter understood the gentleman) afforded far superior advantages to the Horse Shoe Bend, or any other site that had been examined: and if commissioners were sent there, he ventured to predict that they would fix on that very spot, to which their attention had never been attracted, as the site for the armory. Mr. D. detailed the advantages of this position, and enumerated the furnaces, forges, forests, and inexhaustible iron ores of the vicinity; as proofs of the excellence of which location, he said that the best iron was manufactured there that was made in this Union, and cheaper too than in any other portion of the Western country. For this reason he was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, preferring that the whole subject should be left open.

The motion of Mr. GILMORE to amend the resolution was then decided in the negative.

Mr. MALLARY then moved to amend the resolution so as to direct the committee to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the United States to establish an armory at some suitable point on the Western waters.

Mr. VANCE said a few words against the amendment, and expressive of a wish that the whole subject should be left open to the investigation of the committee.

The question was then taken on Mr. MALLARY's motion, and decided in the negative.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, moved an amendment, the object of which was to direct an inquiry into the expediency of a further examination and subsequent location of a site, &c.

And this amendment also was lost.

The question was then taken on the original proposition to instruct the Committee on Military Affairs "to inquire into the expediency of establishing an armory at some suitable point on the Western waters," and decided in the affirmative, nem. con.

TUESDAY, December 22.

Refuse Lands in Tennessee.

Mr. CROCKETT submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the memorial of the State of Tennessee on the subject of public lands be withdrawn from the files of this House, and referred to the Select Committee raised on the subject of the Tennessee lands.

Mr. BLAIR, of Tennessee, observed that the subject of this resolution had been already referred to a Standing Committee of this House, (the Committee on the Public Lands,) and he did not see why it should now be proposed to refer it to a Select Committee.

Mr. CROCKETT said, that, at the last session, this subject had been referred to a Select Committee. He had himself now taken charge of it, and he wanted all the documents to be placed before his committee. He was not aware that it had been referred to the Committee on the Public Lands at all; but he did not see why one part of the subject should be in the hands of one committee, and one part in the hands of another. He did not know what the Committee on the Public Lands could have to do with it, since it had been specially referred to a Select Committee. On that committee were several gentlemen from the Eastern States, who know very little about these subjects, and he wanted them to have a fair chance. He wanted them to have an opportunity of looking into the whole subject. He wanted these Eastern gentlemen on the committee to be enabled to examine the subject, and make a fair report upon it. He wanted to act honorably himself, and do justice to the Government on this subject; and he did not see any reasonable ground for the opposition of his colleagues to his motion.

Mr. ISAACS said, that as a member of the House, he thought he might truly say, he felt very indifferent as to what course this subject should take. But, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, he felt bound to state, that, by the order of the House, the memorial and documents referred to were now in the hands of that committee, and the gentleman's resolution, if agreed to, would, he presumed, be wholly ineffectual. What the sense of the Committee on the Public Lands might be on this subject, he was not authorized to say. It might be that that committee might be disposed to have itself discharged from the consideration of the subject, and have it referred to the gentleman who had taken "charge" of the subject, as if he were the only member from the State of Tennessee interested in it. For himself, Mr. I. said, he did not profess to have taken "charge" of it, but, in what he had said, he acted only as the organ of the committee of which he was a member.

Mr. CROCKETT modified his motion so as to propose to discharge the Committee on the Public Lands from the consideration of the memorial, &c., and refer it to the Select Committee appointed on the subject.

Mr. POLK said, that, at his instance, this subject had been referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, believing that no other direction could properly be given to it. It was presumed that some of the difficulties attending it had been elucidated by the debates of the last Congress, at least to the members of that Congress. He had heard this morning the remark, which he had often heard before, that the report of a Select Committee had not the weight with this House of the report of a Standing Committee, and that was the only reason why, the other day, he had opposed the reference of this subject to a Select Committee. He apprehended that the House had not then understood the objection, or they would not have referred this subject, as they did, to a Select Committee. He would only add, that, after the subject had been debated here at the last session, he had submitted a resolution calling upon the General Land Office, through the Treasury Department, for all the information which it could present on the subject. That information, he understood, had been obtained, and in a short time would be transmitted to the House. Mr. P. added that he trusted that his colleague would not consider that those of his own State, who expressed any views upon this subject, were at all disposed to interfere with his rights and his privileges here. All that they wished was, that the subject should undergo that consideration which it ought, believing, as they did, that a report from a Standing Committee would carry more weight than a report from a Select Committee.

Mr. CROCKETT said, it was certainly an awkward situation for these papers to be placed in, for one committee to have one part of them in possession, and another committee another part. These lands belonged to the United States, to be sure; but he did not know what the committee on the subject of the public lands generally had to do with them. These stood on a different footing from other public lands. There never had been a surveyor of the United States in the State of Tennessee; and these scraps and remnants, left after the location of the North Carolina grants, stood upon a different footing from the general system of the public lands. His object was, that the Select Committee should propose the most equitable way of disposing of them for the benefit of his constituents and of the State of Tennessee, which, he believed, would be to give these scraps of land to the poor people living on and among them.

The question was then taken on Mr. CROCKETT's motion, as modified, and decided in the affirmative—90 votes to 67.

WEDNESDAY, December 28.

Fitting Out of the Brandywine.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, being called to the chair, and took up the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, for making an appropriation for fitting for sea the frigate Brandywine. No objection being made to the bill, the committee rose, and reported to the House without amendment.

On the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. McDUFFIE, Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, briefly stated the necessity for this appropriation. The fact was known to every member of the House, that the commerce of the United States in the Gulf of Mexico and with South America was subject to piratical depredations; and, also, that the political relations of the Governments of the south were in such a state as required that the United States should maintain a considerable naval force in that sea. The recent loss of the Hornet made it almost indispensable that another vessel should be immediately despatched to supply her place. For this purpose, this appropriation was necessary.

The bill was then ordered, nem. con., to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

MONDAY, December 28.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. BUCHANAN in the chair, on the following bill:

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives shall, at the commencement of each session of Congress, obtain from each member the name of the post office nearest his residence, and shall then procure from the Postmaster General an exact statement of the distance to said post office from the seat of Government, computed according to the post road to said post office; after which, he shall add to, or subtract from, the said statement as the case may be, the distance from the said post office to the residence of said member; upon which statement the mileage of each member is to be computed.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, on the final settlement of the account of each member, he shall subjoin, at the foot of his account, a certificate that he has deducted from his account all and each of the days on which he may have been absent from the seat of Government during those days on which the House to which he belongs may have been in session."

Mr. WICKLIFFE, Chairman of the Committee of Retrenchment, by whom this bill was reported, briefly explained its objects, which are, as appears from the face of it, generally, to establish a uniform rule for computing the allowance for travelling expenses of members, and to limit their per diem allowance to such days as they shall actually be in attendance on Congress.

Mr. HAYNES asked how the gentleman from Kentucky proposed, where there was more than one post road by which a member's mileage might be computed, (as was the case with many members,) to determine by which of those roads the computation of distance should be made. There ought, he said, if the bill passed, to be such precision in its terms, as to leave no doubt as to the manner in which it should be construed.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said that the difficulty suggested by the gentleman from Georgia showed still more the necessity of some legal provision on this subject. If there was a difficulty in determining between post roads as the measure of computation, there was still a greater difficulty where there were river routes, as well as roads, to compute by. In cases where there were various post roads leading to and from the same point, the gentleman from Georgia might attain his object by amending the bill so as that the nearest road should be taken as the criterion. Mr. W. had no objection himself to such a provision, though he would not move it, because, he said, there were some post routes on which there was no convenient travelling, or accommodation for travellers, even on horseback. He did not see, however, why this objection of detail should be an objection to the principle of the bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HAYNES expressed his regret that the gentleman from Kentucky should have misconceived the motive of the very few remarks which he had made. It was no part of his purpose to interpose any obstacle in the way of the bill. He only suggested a difficulty in its detail, which he wished to see obviated.

Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina, moved to amend the bill, by inserting the word "shortest," so that the distance should be computed according to the shortest post road.

This amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STRICKER moved to amend the bill, by striking out, where they occur, the words "and shall then procure from the Postmaster General." In support of this amendment, Mr. S. said, that, when we reflect upon the manner in which the distances on post roads are ascertained at the General Post Office, it was probable that the Postmaster General would know as little accurately about them as the members of this House, and perhaps less. The distances upon these roads were more or less uncertain, even where best known; and he believed that the information could be got from the members of the House better than elsewhere, and he thought that credit ought to be given to their statements on the subject. It was a fact beyond dispute, that no certain reliance can be placed on the distances between different post offices, as stated on the Post Office books; and he thought, therefore, that the statements of members ought to be relied upon in preference.

Mr. WICKLIFFE observed, that one main object of this bill was to throw from the members here the responsibility of fixing the amount of their own mileage. That, if they were allowed to fix that, it would involve the exercise of as much discretion as if they were to be allowed for the amount of their own per diem allowance. He knew no better standard, he said, by which the distance of the residence of the members could be ascertained, than the books of the Post Office Department. More universal certainty, he thought, would be attained by fixing the distances in this way, than by leaving the matter to the discretion of the members of the House.

Mr. STRICKER said, that his amendment did not propose to leave this matter wholly to the discretion of each member in each case, for it confined him to stating the distance of the nearest post road to his residence—a responsibility which, Mr. S. thought, ought to be thrown upon him, and him alone.

Mr. BURESS said he would not permit himself to doubt that any gentleman, making a statement to this House, would make it truly; and if any misstatement of distances had been made, he felt bound to presume that it had been made accidentally, and would be corrected as soon as discovered. He could not see the utility of this bill at all, he said, unless it was intended to say, by a solemn enactment of this House, that the members of Congress are not to be trusted in questions in which their interest may come in conflict with their veracity. If, however, facts warranted such an assumption, there might be sufficient reason to justify the passage of that bill. Until some statement of facts, showing grounds for this assumption, should be made on the authority of the committee which reported the bill, he could not be warranted in voting for a bill authorizing such a reflection on the House. He had never heard that any such report had been made by the committee. He had never heard authentically that any gentleman of this House, or of the Senate, had ever taken any more money for mileage than, on a fair calculation, he was entitled to receive. He could not vote for this amendment, therefore, or for the bill, but should be disposed, when the bill came before the House, to move its re-commitment, with a view to obtain from the committee a report of such facts as should show that the bill was not merely justified, but called for, by a due regard to the public interest.

Mr. STONE, of New York, hoped that the amendment would prevail. It was proposed by the text of the bill to impose on the Postmaster General the responsibility of determining the distances which members travel from their residences to this House. This, said Mr. S., was distrusting the veracity of the members of this House. It was, besides, turning over the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House to the direction of the Postmaster General, who is not an officer of this House, and ought to be allowed no control over its officers or its action. The Sergeant-at-Arms was responsible to the presiding officer of this House; and why was he to be turned over to an officer not responsible in any manner to this House? Why rely upon him, and take away the supervising power of the Speaker of this House? Mr. S. hoped that the amendment would prevail, and that the subject would be left in charge of the officers of this House, as it now is, and to whom it properly belonged.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, in reply to the gentleman from Rhode Island, who said that he could not vote for the bill, because the committee which reported it had not reported a statement of facts, stated, as a member of the committee, that the facts of overcharge of mileage by members was within the knowledge of that committee. He felt no disposition, as a member of the House, to present, in a specific report, the names of individual members, who, under the law of 1818, had drawn an undue amount of mileage, but he now stated the fact generally, that a practice had obtained in this House, as its records would prove, by which members from the same State, and the same neighborhood, have been in the habit of computing their mileage differently, some by water and some by land. It was believed by the committee that there should be some uniform standard by which this mileage should be computed. He alluded to the fact, within the recollection of gentlemen near him, that, in the year 1828, the practice first began in this House of charging mileage by the river route; since when, the practice had been gradually extending itself. At that time, a gentleman, not now a member, claimed the privilege of charging for the distance of descending the Mississippi, ascending the Ohio, and thence by land. Nor was it for that session only that the charge was made; for he went back six preceding sessions, and claimed and received the same rate of allowance. This fact would be shown by the accounts now on file in the Treasury Department. Nor was this, said Mr. W., the only instance of such charges. We (the committee) then conceived, that, whilst we were complaining of constructive journeys, and charges for journeys never made, &c., on the part of other public agents, it was proper, from a regard to consistency, that we should at least put a stop to this business of constructive journeys among ourselves. The act of 1818 declaring that the computation of the distance of travel of members of Congress should be made by the most usual route, the computation of the circuitous river route was a plain perversion and abuse of the law. To remedy this evil, the committee thought it best to give to the Postmaster General the power to determine the distances. If the amendment now under consideration should prevail, by what criterion will the officers of the House be governed in ascertaining the nearest post road? It will not do, said he, to tell us, with the facts before our eyes, that the decision of each member, in his own case, will be an infallible test. For the same reason, we might leave the whole subject of compensation open. But, said Mr. W., we propose to take from the member the privilege of fixing, at his own will and pleasure, the extent of his compensation. If the House should require from the committee a statement of facts, they would discharge that duty rigorously, as far as they could. They would ascertain what were the actual distances of the post offices near which members reside, and report the sums which each had received for mileage. But they had not conceived this necessary. They wished to make no implication of individuals, but simply to provide for carrying into effect the intention of the act of 1818.

Mr. COULTER vindicated the committee from the suggestion of their having presented this bill unadvisedly to the House. All the facts on which this bill is founded (he said) were distinctly stated in the report of the Committee of Retrenchment at the session before the last, when a bill was reported to the same effect as this, but not acted on for the want of time; as, too, was the case with the same bill at the last session. If the facts stated in that report were true, (and that they were true there could be no doubt, for they had not been questioned,) it was important that some remedy should be provided: for, it appeared, either that the law was defective, or that, in the execution of it, abuse had crept into the proceedings of the House. He presumed, now that the evil was so clearly pointed out, the presiding officer and subordinate officers of the House might correct it, and the passage of the bill might therefore be said to be unnecessary. But, inasmuch as the attention of the House, and through the report of the Committee of Retrenchment, that of the nation, had been heretofore attracted to the subject, it would be as easy now to pass the bill, if it affords a remedy, as to reject it. That the bill does afford a remedy, (he said,) could not be denied. It must be admitted, as argued, that this law, too, may, in course of time, come to be abused. What human law cannot be abused? You cannot place a barrier to human ingenuity or error. The only question is, does this bill offer a competent remedy to an admitted evil? On that subject there can be no question: for, if it passes, a computation of distance by water courses can never be substituted for a computation of distance by land. It was comparatively indifferent to him, (he said,) whether the proposed amendment prevailed or not: but, if it did, the distance of travel, and, of course, the amount of compensation for it, would still be left in each member's own breast. He meant no imputation on members of Congress; but (he said) all laws go upon the presumption that man is not a competent judge or witness in his own case: and it was assuming too much for this House to ask for its members exemption from this rule of law, established and practised upon in all civilized nations. The rules of this House have already made all the imputation upon members which can be inferred from this bill, by excluding any member from voting upon any question in which he is personally interested, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, said that one of the present rules of the House, in stating the duties of the Committee of Accounts, says "it shall be the duty of the committee (among other things) to audit the accounts of the members for their travel to and from the seat of Government, and their attendance in the House." As far as he was advised, (Mr. T. said,) the practice of the presiding officer always had been, when any difference arose between any member and the Sergeant-at-Arms as to compensation, &c., to refer the question for decision to the Committee of Accounts, and to settle with the member according to the decision of that committee. He knew that this had sometimes been the case, and, as far as he was advised, it had always been the case. The Speaker had not been at liberty to decide such questions, since they were thus, by rule, especially referred to another organ of the House. My own choice would be, (said Mr. T.), thinking, from the statements which have been made, that a remedy is required, instead of imposing the duty on the Postmaster General of fixing the distances, so to amend the bill as to require the officers of the House to procure the necessary information. After requiring that the shortest post road should be the standard of compute-tion, I would leave it to the officers of the House, under the direction of the proper committee, to ascertain the distances.

The question was then taken on Mr. STERRE's amendment, and decided in the affirmative, 60 votes to 46.

Mr. SIMMONS, of Maryland, moved to strike out that part of the first section which follows the word "post office" in the ninth line, as above. He thought this was descending too much into minutiae, giving much trouble without any practical benefit.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WICKLIFFE moved an amendment of a proviso to the second section, exempting members detained from the House by known sickness from the operation of this section.

With these amendments, the bill was reported to the House.

A motion was made by Mr. VERPLANCK, that the House do reconsider the vote taken on Thursday last, the 24th instant, on the question to agree to the following resolution, moved by Mr. CARSON, viz:

"Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch of the United States Mint in the gold region of North Carolina."

And on the question, "Will the House reconsider the said vote?" It passed in the affirmative.

Mr. CARSON rose, and said that he had been induced to offer the resolution from various considerations, one of the most important of which was, the highly interesting information he was induced to believe would be elicited by such an inquiry. That it will prove necessary to establish a mint in North Carolina, to the extent to which such an establishment now exists in Philadelphia, he was by no means prepared to say; and were he to hazard an opinion, as at present advised, he would say that it would not be necessary. A branch, however, of the Mint might be found necessary. For instance, (said he,) an office under national authority, connected with a mother institution, to assay our metals, and show us their correct value—to stamp our bars of gold, and prepare them for a circulating medium, or as an article of deposit, upon which circulating medium might issue. This would also prevent frauds from being practised: for, while it would show the owner the real value of the metal, it would also secure the purchaser from frauds, such as mixing alloy with the gold, which otherwise would be difficult to detect. In a word, (Mr. C. said,) the inquiry would do no injury, while there was a probability of its doing good, for any report made by the committee will be subject to the future action and control of the House.

When I introduced the resolution on Thursday last, (said Mr. C.,) I will not disguise the fact that I felt considerable solicitude for its passage. But, sir, my anxiety has in a degree been diminished, not that I deem the inquiry less important, but because I observed an honorable colleague (Mr. CONNER) voting in opposition to the resolution. For that gentleman, sir, I have always, since our first acquaintance, entertained the highest personal respect, and so also have I for his opinions: and, sir, from a knowledge of the fact that no part of the State is more deeply interested in all subjects connected with the precious metals than the district represented by my colleague, (for, sir, the greatest proportions, as yet, have been found within his district and by his constituents,) I am constrained to believe that important considerations have induced his opposition. What those considerations may have been, I have not been able to learn, and it may be that his withholding them from the House has resulted from his kind feelings towards me, wishing rather to cover than expose the defects of my proposition. Should this be the case, sir, I certainly thank him. Mr. CARSON concluded his remarks, by tendering his thanks to the House for agreeing to the motion for reconsideration, and, as no injury could result from a mere inquiry, hoped the House would adopt the resolution.

Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD rose, and remarked, that, as his colleague had made an individual allusion to a member from North Carolina coming from the gold region, and being himself from that desirable country, he wished to know whether the remarks of his colleague were intended for him, [Mr. CARSON explained, and said his allusion was to his colleague representing Mecklenburg—that he did not know how his colleague now making the inquiry voted on the question.] Mr. SHEPHERD continued by saying, that, owing to his bad health he was necessarily absent at the time the resolution was offered and rejected: had he been present, he should have voted for its adoption, not merely because it happened to come from a colleague, and to embrace a subject interesting also to his own constituents, but from a belief that, upon a mere question of inquiry, it was the more courteous, if not indeed the more prudent course to accede to the proposition, unless it be absurd in itself, or clearly adverse to some established rule of legislation. Should the resolution be adopted, the committee raised upon it would doubtless elicit much information, interesting not merely to the country in which the precious metal is or may be found, but to the nation at large; and even if the inquiry proposed should not at this time result in a transfer of a branch of the Mint (that powerful attribute of Government) to the region proposed, yet it cannot but be important, in a national point of view, to have authentic information as to the probable capacity of any portion of our country to produce this important basis of the circulating medium. I repeat, sir, that, was there not (as indeed I think there is) a manifest importance in the proposition, courtesy to the mover would, in my humble opinion, be a sufficient reason to lead to its adoption. I would, Mr. Speaker, have preferred that the terms of the inquiry had been more liberal in their character, by embracing also the States of Virginia, Georgia, and South Carolina; in all of which gold also is found, though by no means so extensively as in the State from which I come; for, whenever, sir, any inquiry is proposed here, relating to any particular interest in our country, I am not for confining it to my own State or immediate district, but would embrace also any other portion of this Union where the same interest is known to exist. But without waiting to cavil about the terms of the resolution, permit me to hope that it may be adopted in its present form.

The question was then taken on the resolution moved by Mr. CARSON, and decided in the affirmative.

TUESDAY, December 29.

Distribution of the Public Lands.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT, of Vermont, on the 17th instant, proposing an inquiry into the expediency of appropriating the net annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States and Territories, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives.

The question being upon agreeing to the motion of Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, so to amend the resolution as to direct an inquiry also "into the amount and value of the public lands which have been given by Congress to any State, or to any public institution in said State,"

Mr. MARTIN said he was indebted to the kindness of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. SPEIGHT,) who yesterday moved the postponement of this resolution, and to that of the House, which agreed to it, because of his casual absence when it was called up. The subject of the resolution (he said) was one of great delicacy, and respecting which he felt much difficulty: it was one of great public importance, also, and in which the people take great interest. He knew of no subject on which, at this moment, public opinion was more divided, or on which public inquiry was more excited. It seemed to him, therefore, before deciding anything in reference to this question, it ought to be examined with much deliberation and with great caution, that nothing might be done in regard to it which should produce confusion or difficulty hereafter. He had so fully believed that the subject was laid upon the table for the remainder of the session, that he had not prepared himself, as he otherwise should have done, for entering freely into the discussion of it. He had intended to prepare a statement showing the amount of the public debt, for the payment of which the public lands were pledged: for, though he entertained no doubt that the public debt might be paid from other sources, there was still an indelicacy in touching upon the security which had been given for the payment of that debt until it should be redeemed. Whatever may be our ability to discharge the public debt according to our obligations, (he said,) the proposition to alter the security for its payment certainly ought to come from any other quarter than that by which such security had been given. The precise amount of debt for which the public lands stand pledged, he was not, for the reason already given, prepared to show; but that it does stand pledged in this manner, no one would question. Mr. M. went on to say that he was opposed to the whole object of the resolution; he should be so if the amendment which he had proposed should be adopted: but, if the mover and supporters of it were serious in their proposition for the distribution of the proceeds of sales of public lands according to representation in this House, or according to any other ratio, they ought to recognize the principle to its full extent; which would require that those States which have already received a large portion of the public lands should receive of the residue only in their due proportion.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, said, that he, too, with the gentleman from South Carolina, had supposed that this resolution had been laid upon the table for the remainder of the session. Without going into the subject at all, he rose to suggest that this subject had been already referred to one of the select committees appointed upon the President's Message. [At his request, the resolution was read referring so much of the Message as relates to internal improvements, and the distribution of the surplus revenue, after payment of the public debt, among the several States.]

Mr. PERRIS, of Missouri, regretted that the resolution now under consideration had been offered, and he regretted, also, that the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. MARTIN,) had thought fit to offer this amendment. Whatever his opinions might be in relation to the proposition for making a distribution of the net proceeds of the public lands among the several States according to their representation in this House, he thought the present an improper time to make the inquiry proposed. The resolution seemed to contemplate an immediate distribution. The public lands were pledged to aid in the liquidation of the public debt; and he asked gentlemen, if this plan were immediately carried into effect, whether it would not embarrass the Government in its views in paying off this debt. The offering of this resolution was to be regretted on another account. It was expected that some improvement in regard to the mode of disposing of the public lands would be attempted, and he feared that the plan proposed by this resolution would throw difficulties in the way of that measure. Sir, the people of the new States desire to see some reasonable prospect for the arrival of the period when the title of the United States to lands within their several limits may be extinguished. They thought that some better mode might be provided for, which would be better for the Government as well as the new States. He said he regretted to see the excitement which prevailed in this House on this subject; and he supposed from this that the public mind was also excited. It did appear as if gentlemen considered this a mere scuffle for the public lands, who should get most. And while he thought that some improvement could be made in regard to the mode of disposing of the public lands, he could assure the House, that on this, as well as every other subject of legislation, he should, while attending to the interests of those he represented, not be unmindful of the interests of the United States.

Distribution of the Public Lands.

Mr. REED, of Massachusetts, said, it had been remarked that this subject excited more of the public attention at this moment than perhaps any other. If so, did it not become the more the duty of the House to examine it? As to the proposed amendment, (Mr. R. said,) he had no disposition to retrospect in this matter, considering the argument to be correct, generally speaking, that the gifts to the new States have not diminished the value of the public domain, but that they have increased the value of the remainder sufficiently to compensate for the loss of what has been given away. As coming from one of the old States of the Union, (Mr. R. said,) he claimed nothing, and wanted nothing, for the past. But, as regards the future, the disposition of the proceeds of the public lands was a question which presented much difficulty, and should be met unencumbered and unembarrassed. He thought the amendment wrong, therefore, because it tended to embarrass the main subject. When a proper occasion should offer, of so much consequence did he deem the main purpose of the resolution, he should move to refer it to a Select Committee, rather than to the standing committee, which is already too much burthened with business to give to this question the attention which its importance demands.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, was in favor of the amendment, and gave his reasons for being so. What, he asked, was the object of the resolution? To inquire into the mode of disposing, for the future, of the proceeds of the sales of public lands. We all know that Congress has, from time to time, made disposition of portions of them, sometimes in answer to the demands of justice, sometimes in liberal donations towards the accomplishment of useful public objects. The question presented by the amendment is, whether the committee shall be charged with an inquiry into the amount of donations which have been thus already made to different States. He was in favor of the amendment, because it would enlarge the scope of inquiry. He should vote for it, to disembarass, and not to embarrass, the inquiry, as some gentlemen seemed to suppose it would. If the amendment were rejected, what would be the effect? The gentleman from South Carolina would institute the inquiry in a different form, and ultimately it must and would connect itself with the main inquiry. Was it not more important that the House should have this information in the outset, than have it called for in a later stage of the proceedings? Whether these grants of land heretofore ought to be taken into account or not, in any arrangement for the future, was a different question. He was for having all the information, which was or would be asked for, at once; for (said he) meet this question we must. We have got to hear it; and the more we can anticipate the difficulties which are likely to embarrass it, the better.

Mr. DUNCAN, of Illinois, said, he was perfectly willing to see a full investigation of every subject which relates to the public lands. He cared but little about the resolution, or the amendments offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. MARTIN,) although he was opposed to the general object. His object in rising was to notice some of the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, and those made by the gentleman from Vermont. He said that the gentleman from South Carolina, and other members of the House, appear to misapprehend the objects, or considerations, received by this Government for the grants of land, or donations as they are called, which have been made to the new States. He said that the largest portion of those donations, as they have been styled, was the school lands, or the sixteenth sections given to the inhabitants of each township for the use of schools to be established in said township; and as these lands have always been appropriated before the sale, they have been justly considered as a part of the consideration, and an inducement to the purchase of all the remaining lands in the township; and so far from their being a donation to the States, they have been, and are selling to the inhabitants of the townships in which they lie.

He said that some small grants of land had been made to the new States by the General Government when they received their admission into the Union; but they were made upon the express condition that those States would never tax the public lands within their limits, nor those sold by the General Government within five years after the sale. Surely (he said) this is no donation, it is a fair bargain, and the new States have much the worse part of it, as they have given up a right which would be worth more to them now than a hundred times the quantity of land they have received. He said that it was a fact, which could not be questioned, that the new States would now have the power to tax all the lands, public and private, within their bounds, if they had not bartered away their right to do so for a few acres of land, and some other equally unimportant considerations. He said that those lands had been purchased by the surrender of all right to levy a tax, which would have amounted every year to more than the land is worth. He said, if it should be determined now to charge these new States with this land, (and the proposition to give an equal quantity to each of the old States before the contemplated division takes place, is, in effect, to do so,) he hoped that the new States would be restored to their natural rights—the right to tax and exercise a sovereign power over their own territory, which in a single year would be worth more to the new States than all the lands in question.

Mr. D. said that the gentleman from South Carolina could not certainly be acquainted with the situation of the new States, and their peculiar relation to the General Government, or he would not have raised a claim by the old States for those lands which have been given to some of the new ones, to assist them in making internal improvements, such as roads and canals. He said that it was a fact well known to every man of common observation, that every valuable improvement in a country, such as a road or a canal, is calculated to increase the value of the lands through and near which they are constructed; and as the General Government owned much the largest part of the land in the new States, and especially where some of those improvements are to be made, he thought he should hazard nothing in saying that, in every instance where the improvement is made, the increased value of the public lands occasioned exclusively by the improvement will amount to ten times the value of the donation. He said that a policy which would be wise in an individual owning large quantities of wild land, would also be wise in a Government; and he appealed to any gentleman to say whether he would not consider a portion of this land well appropriated in this way, when there was a certainty of its hastening the sale, and increasing the value of the residue.

Mr. D. further said that the United States were bound by every principle of common justice to contribute something to the improvements which were making, and contemplated to be made, in the new States, as every canal, road, or bridge, made in those States, had a direct tendency to increase the value of the public lands. He said that about eighteenth-twentieths of all the lands in the State he represented belonged to the General Government, and that his constituents were burthened with a heavy tax to construct roads and bridges, which, though necessary to their own convenience, had a direct and certain tendency to raise the value of all the lands over which they are made. He said he knew the States had no power to compel the General Government to contribute its part to these improvements; but he hoped that a sense of justice would prevent its receiving such advantage without contributing its full portion towards it. He said that all the old States had the power of taxing the lands over which they made roads or other improvements, and that the holders of land rarely complained of a tax of this kind, as it generally gives a great increase to the value of their estates. He said that there was a county in a remote part of the State of Illinois, containing about ten thousand inhabitants, all of whom are tenants of the United States, and pay near fifty thousand dollars per annum tax or rent to the Government; and he supposed no one could think it reasonable or just that those people should be burthened with an additional tax to make roads in a country where every foot of land is owned by this Government. Mr. D. regretted to hear the reasons given by the gentleman from Vermont in favor of this proposition. It was true (he said) that some individuals, and one State, had asserted a claim to all the public lands, but he did not believe that any large portion of the people would sustain any pretension of that kind. He said he believed his constituents would be satisfied with having their just and reasonable claims satisfied, which were, that the price should be reduced, and the sales so regulated as to enable all the settlers to obtain their homes on reasonable terms.

WEDNESDAY, December 30.

Distribution of the Public Lands.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT, of Vermont, proposing to direct an inquiry by the Committee on the Public Lands into the expediency of distributing the net proceeds of the sales of public lands among the several States for the purposes of education and internal improvement.

The question being stated on agreeing to Mr. MARTIN's proposed amendment, for directing the committee to report the quantity of lands already granted to each State by the General Government,

Mr. POLK, of Tennessee, said that, from the time which had been already occupied in the discussion of this resolution, proposing an inquiry merely, it must be evident not only that this discussion is premature, but that it is not likely to arrive at any profitable end. It was admitted by those who supported the resolution, that it is not expedient to make this distribution, at all events until the public debt shall have been paid. That the public debt will not be paid for several years to come, was known to every one, and therefore this discussion was premature. Another reason against entertaining the resolution at present, was, that the whole subject of the distribution of the surplus revenue, after the payment of the public debt, had been brought to the notice of Congress by the President of the United States, and was now under consideration before a committee of the House. When this whole subject was thus before one committee, why should this part of it be referred to another committee? Another reason against the present discussion was that, that if it should be the policy of the country, after the public debt was paid off, to levy more taxes than the Government should require for the ordinary administration of public affairs, and the question should be between the present plan of internal improvement and the proposed plan for the distribution of the public revenue, he was free to say that, between the two modes, he should prefer the latter. But this was a question which it will be time enough to argue when it shall actually have arisen. It might be, possibly, that, when the public debt should have been paid off, there would be no surplus revenue, and no occasion for this absorbent process.

Distribution of the Public Lands.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BUCHANAN said: The House is placed in a singular position in regard to this resolution. The course pursued by its friends has been unfortunate. Upon this resolution, which merely proposes to institute an inquiry before a committee of the House, the skilful tactics of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. MARTIN,) have involved us in such a debate, as can only become proper in case the committee should report a bill for the division of the net proceeds of the public lands among the States in proportion to their population, and that bill should be before the House for discussion. Yet, in this preliminary stage of the business, we have been drawn off from the main subject of inquiry, and have been seriously engaged in discussing the question, whether the new States, who have hitherto received donations of public land from this Government, shall account for them in the general distribution. The gentleman from South Carolina, who proposed this amendment, has frankly avowed, that, whether it prevailed or not, he would vote against the resolution. Such is my regard for that gentleman, and of such value do I estimate his support, that I might be willing to sacrifice something of my own opinion to secure it; but when he proposes to amend our resolution, and informs us, at the same time, he will oppose it in every shape, we ought to view his amendment with jealousy and distrust.

"Timeo Danaos, et dona ferentes."

Without being drawn into an argument upon the subject, it is my decided opinion that it would be both unjust and ungenerous to charge the new States with donations of land which they have already received, and that an inquiry into the expediency of such a measure could only tend to distract and divide the friends of the resolution.

What (said Mr. B.) is the true and the only proper question for discussion at this time? It is, whether the subject of the resolution is of sufficient importance to demand inquiry. Upon this question can a doubt be entertained? The vast importance of the measure proposed must be impressed upon every mind, whether we regard its consequences to the people of the old or of the new States of this Union. The public feeling of the country is alive to the subject. And shall such of us as are friendly to its thorough investigation suffer inquiry to be stifled? I trust not.

The report of the Select Committee of the House, at the last session of Congress, has furnished us all the statistical information upon the subject which can be desired. There are two important questions which that report does not embrace, and which ought to be carefully investigated by a committee of this House. I desire to have a report from such a committee, upon the question whether the proceeds of the public lands are pledged in such a manner to the public creditors, that, without violating our faith, we cannot distribute them among the States until after the total extinguishment of the national debt. In the course of the debate the affirmative of this proposition has been stated with a degree of confidence which would almost seem to preclude doubt; and yet there are probably strong reasons to sustain a contrary opinion.

It is very true, that, when the funding system was first established in 1790, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands were directed to be applied solely to the extinguishment of the debt of the Revolution; but it is equally certain that this pledge was often disregarded. In the year 1817, when the present sinking fund was established, all previous laws which had made appropriations for the purchase or payment of the funded debt were repealed. That fund of ten millions of dollars annually, for the discharge of the public debt, was to be raised from the import and tonnage duties, from the internal duties, and from the sales of Western lands. It may be (said Mr. B.) that the obligation imposed by this act will be equally satisfied, whether the annual sinking fund shall be provided from one or from all these sources. Such was probably the opinion of Congress, when, in less than one year after they had created this fund, they abolished all the internal duties, and thus cut off one of the sources from which it was to be supplied. I wish to express no decided opinion upon this question; but it is certainly well worthy of investigation by a committee. Its proper understanding and correct decision may aid us much in arriving at a just conclusion in regard to the main question.

Mr. B. wished to be distinctly understood, that even if we could, consistently with the public faith, at once distribute the annual proceeds of the public lands among the States, he had not for himself determined whether it would be expedient to do so until after the national debt should be discharged.

There is (said Mr. B.) another important question involved in this inquiry, on which I desire to have the report of a committee; and that is in regard to the constitutional power of Congress to make the proposed distribution among the States. The power to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States to which they now belong, is, in my opinion, very different from that of distributing among them the surplus revenue arising from taxation. I purposely refrain from entering upon the discussion of this question at present; but I think I might appeal with confidence to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. MARTIN,) whether there is not an obvious distinction between the two cases. A gentleman might, with perfect consistency, admit the power of Congress in the one case, and deny it in the other.

Mr. B. said he thought this resolution ought not to be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, as the mover of it (Mr. HUNT) had proposed. Highly as he respected that committee, it was well known they were chiefly selected from the members representing that portion of the Union within which the public lands were situated, and who were therefore best acquainted with the laws which related to them. The subject proposed to be referred was one of deep and general interest to every State. In his opinion, a Select Committee, composed of members from different portions of the Union, should be raised for the purpose of investigating it. The subject involved important questions in regard to the construction of the constitution and of the laws of the country, which did not appropriately refer themselves to the Committee on Public Lands; and the information peculiarly within the province of that committee, we have already received from the report of the Select Committee raised at the last session.

Mr. B. said he thought the present the peculiar and the appropriate time for inquiry. The country were expecting, nay, they were demanding it. Are we prepared to stifle this inquiry? Are we prepared to declare that we do not think this important subject even worthy of a reference? Such, he trusted, would never be the determination of the House; and he was convinced the friends of inquiry would never be diverted from their purpose, until they had obtained all the information necessary to enable them to act with wisdom.

Mr. B. said he would read a substitute for the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. HUNT,) which was in accordance with the remarks he had just made. He trusted it would be acceptable to that gentleman. He knew that, under the rules of the House, he could not at present offer it as an amendment; and if he could, he would not, because his time was already too much occupied on the committee of which he was already a member, to make him desire to be placed on the Select Committee to which this subject ought in his opinion to be referred.

Here Mr. B. concluded by reading the following:

Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed, to which shall be referred the report of a Select Committee made to the House of Representatives the 25th February last, relating to the distribution of the net proceeds of the sale of public lands among the several States, in proportion to the population of each; and that the said committee be instructed to inquire, and report to this House, whether there be any provision of the constitution, or of any act or acts of Congress, in relation to the discharge of the public debt, which ought to prevent Congress from making such distribution, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TIER, of Indiana, said: Coming from the part of the country where I do, and where a question of this kind so vitally affects the interests of my constituents, it will be expected that I should say something upon the subject. Indeed, I should think myself derelict from my duty if I were to remain silent. The amendment, sir, looks forward to the general operation of the original resolution. I shall, therefore, be necessarily led into the examination of the principles of the latter, to come fairly at the effects of the former. What, sir, is the question before the House? The first or original proposition is to appropriate the net proceeds of the public lands towards internal improvements and the promotion of learning, to be divided among the States according to their representation in Congress. The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina proposes an inquiry into the quantity and value of those lands, in order, as I understand it, to a division among the States, with a view to come at a fair settlement as he calls it; and that those States, who have received a portion of those lands, may be charged in the account current with what they have received. It is necessary to look into the motive or consideration which induced the State of Virginia, and others, to cede their wild lands to the United States; and then to see if the proposition now before the House is calculated to promote the grand object which those States had in view when they made these cessions; and the determination of this point will test the utility of the measure. It is considered, on all hands, that one of the motives was to enhance the resources of the Federal Government, which were at that time very limited indeed, and to enable them to discharge their obligations to their creditors; but, sir, I am very far from believing this was the most prominent or urgent motive. There were higher and more important considerations. The prime object of all was, to maintain and secure a continuation of the confederation. Virginia possessed almost as much territory as any two or three of the other States, and it was readily seen that, in a course of time, an increase of population must give her a vast ascendancy over the balance of them. Looking with a philosophic eye through the course of events, it was not difficult to discern that the growing greatness of an individual State, already the most powerful in the confederation, would be calculated, in the very nature of things, to create fears and jealousies in the smaller States, which might, in time, grow into discontents and bickerings, which, being fostered by those fears and jealousies, would lead directly to a dissolution of the Union or confederation. The prime motive, then, must have been to provide against that event, by reducing the amount of territory in the larger States, and limiting their size as near to an equality as possible, thereby to produce a balance of power in some measure like that of Europe. Passing, for the sake of brevity, over all the intermediate steps, and without adverting to further evidence, it must appear clear to any gentleman in the House, that that must have been the most powerful inducement or motive (and truly patriotic it was) in the larger States to make this great sacrifice of their power and resources; which, coupled with the idea of doing justice to their creditors, and relieving the confederation from its distressing embarrassments, form the consideration upon which these lands were ceded to the General Government; and I hold it to be the duty of Congress to sacredly regard this consideration in all its legislative acts, and to promote the generous and benevolent views of the States in making those enormous though necessary sacrifices. Let us see then whether the amendment to the resolution which forms the proposition before the House is calculated in its consequences to promote that great and magnanimous object. So far from doing so, I view it as the most dangerous proposition that ever was agitated in this House, or brought before this nation. What is it, sir? It is to divide the public lands among the different States, and to require the new States to answer, and pay for all the appropriations made by the Government towards their improvement, while you have reaped the benefits of those improvements to a much greater degree than they. You have furnished the capital, we have done the labor, and we are now to be called upon to pay back all that we have received, after doing the labor for you. How are you going to make this calculation of value? what is to be the standard? where are you to begin? at what point of time? shall it be calculated for the future? will you make it as of now, or shall it be nunc pro tunc? We are very gravely told by the gentleman from South Carolina, that to talk about the benefits the United States receive from these appropriations for improvements, is the most fallacious and preposterous idea he ever heard suggested. Let us see if it be so silly and fallacious as that gentleman supposes. What is the effect of those appropriations and improvement of the country? Do they enhance the value of your lands, or do they not? Do they not induce population to flow in by hundreds of thousands? Are they not the means of selling thousands and millions of acres of your land, which would otherwise lay waste and wild? Does not this add to the resources of our country, besides augmenting the value of the lands? To reduce to practical results the argument of the gentleman, I will make such a calculation as I suppose he would ask the committee to make, and see whether he be right or wrong. Shall we make it at the minimum or maximum price? Sir, I presume the gentleman would calculate them at the price which they sold for. I will gratify him in making it so: then, suppose, by your appropriations and our labor, the lands shall bring ten dollars per acre, do you gain nothing? And the more labor we add to the appropriation, the more it enhances the price, and we are to be charged at that price. Sir, it amounts to this, the more labor we do, the more we have to pay; the more money you receive in consequence of our improvements, the more we have to pay you—we could have purchased the land of you at the minimum price, but in consequence of receiving it as a donation (as the gentleman would call it) we have to pay three prices. It is a valuable gift to you, but it beggars us—and I should say, take back your "Deganire," take back your fatal gift, it is poisoned. Sir, it is like a man laying out a town, and selling his lots for a high price, and afterwards calling upon the purchasers to pay him for the streets and alleys which he had laid out. You have been cunning enough to give, and we silly enough to receive. Sir, it is reversing the whole order of things, upon this calculation the less we have of your gifts the better. Poor Indiana, there is a terrible day of reckoning coming; she has been silly enough to receive some of your gifts; and on the great day of reckoning, if it shall be found that she had received more than her share of the lands, she must pay up the balance; and how is she to do it? Sir, she never will do it, no new State will do it; and to enforce such a proposition would be to strike them from the confederation and dissolve the Union.

Do you believe, sir, that the new States would stand and look on, and see you carrying away the fruits of their hard labor, without a struggle to prevent it. It would take away every motive in them to remain a part in the confederacy, every ground of attachment to the Union, and cause them to look to their own resources for protection. I have said that your appropriations had been the inducements to thousands to emigrate to those new States. They have broken up, and left their homes, to seek a home in the wilderness, allured by your deceitful gifts, and, after arriving there, they find themselves called upon to pay back the pretended boon. What will they say to you? Would they admire your justice, or would they despise your avarice and fraud? Sir, I have inquired at what point of time will you refer this calculation of value and division of the spoil. Will you commence at the present period? Will you go back to the time when those lands were ceded to the States? or will you refer it to some point of time in advance? If you refer it to the time when the cessions were made, little Delaware would receive as much as any of you in the general distribution, for she had as many representatives in Congress then as New York; and would she not contend with you that that was the correct principle? She had then, and has yet, all the burthens of sovereignty to support, without the means of the other States; and the lands being a gift to you at a time when she had as much right in the confederation as any of you, it would seem an argument in her favor to fix the division, or allotment, at that point of time. The object of the trust having now expired, and the trustees about to take the estate into their own hands, and appropriate it to their own use, it seems to me it would be equally if not more just to distribute it according to the situation and relation in which the parties stood at the time of its creation. I say, by this sort of distribution, Delaware would get a share. Suppose you refer the calculation and distribution to the present time, how would it stand? What would Delaware get? However, sir, I will pass by this part of the subject for the present, and take another view of it. Sir, I shall never consent, nor will my State, or the new States generally, consent to stop here with the division, calculation, or distribution. We must go the whole, or perchance we shall not be able to pay you for the liberal donations you have made us; and where will be the justice of distributing a part of the public domain without the whole?

Congress Mileage and Compensation.

The question being upon concurrence in the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole, the object of which is to strike out that part of the bill which places the calculation of distances travelled under the direction of the Postmaster General,

It was decided in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, the bill was further amended, so as to require the proper officer of the House to obtain from each member the place of his residence, and then, with the aid of the presiding officer of each House, to ascertain and fix the distance, &c.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, adverting to the second section of the bill, (requiring from each member, at the close of each session, a certificate of the number of days he may have been absent from the seat of Government,) expressed the opinion that (this principle being introduced into the bill) it ought to be still further amended, so as to make it effective to secure the attendance of members at the sitting of the House. This would not be accomplished by requiring an account of days of absence from the seat of Government, because, in legal phraseology, the seat of Government includes the whole ten miles square of the District of Columbia. To make the provision of the bill more definite, therefore, Mr. T. moved to amend the bill so as to require from each member a statement of the number of days that he should have been absent from the sittings of the House.

After some observations between Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. TAYLOR, this amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR then moved further to amend the bill, so as that the computation of distance of the residence of members should be by the shortest road, instead of the shortest post road—on the ground that the post road was frequently not the nearest or most convenient road for travelling to a given point.

After some observations between Mr. WICKLIFFE and Mr. TAYLOR, this motion was negatived, 100 votes to 50.

Some further verbal amendments were made to the bill, on the motion of Mr. STORES, of New York, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. HAYNES.

Mr. CARSON moved to strike out the second section of the bill; upon which motion the mover, and Mr. WILDE and Mr. WICKLIFFE, made some remarks, the first and last of these gentlemen at considerable length. When

Mr. SPEIGHT, of North Carolina, moved an adjournment. This motion was negatived.

Mr. LETOCHER, of Kentucky, said, that with the greatest pleasure he would have accorded with the request of the gentleman from North Carolina for an adjournment, were it not for what he believed an unnecessary consumption of time which it would have occasioned. This House (said Mr. L.) has been already four days engaged in vain debate on a plain and simple proposition. An evil is admitted by all to exist in the variant computation of the mileage of members, and a bill is before us to make the construction of the legal provision on this subject uniform: and, somehow or other, great difficulties seem to stand in the way of the passage of this bill. But when we take into consideration the word "retrenchment," that powerful and magical word, so much the favorite of my colleague, and his idea of its beginning "at home" by the passage of this bill, with a view to that object I would earnestly recommend to him the saving of time. Time, sir, itself is money, and we ought to economize it. And, although it may be due to that gentleman that he should be allowed to advocate this darling of his bosom with zeal, I might yet acknowledge, without intending any personal disrespect, that he has occupied an undue proportion of the time of the House in doing so. If he had allowed the bill to pass without so much debate, after going through the Committee of the Whole, there would have been no difficulty in it. I invite the attention of that honorable gentleman, when he next looks into the subject of retrenchment, to the devising of ways and means by which we can get along with business in this House a little better: that we may not be obliged to hear any gentleman, on a subject of this sort, more than one hour at a time, nor have him repeat the same speech more than three times within that hour: nor to hear him take a wide range concerning himself and the difficulties he has encountered in getting here. I speak of this in general terms, as an evil that needs the correcting hand of the Retrenching Committee, or some other committee. Upon principles of justice and equality,

Congress Mileage and Compensation.

(Mr. L. said) he thought that this bill ought to pass in some shape or other, and he could not but regret its delay, and the obstacles which its friends had, no doubt unintentionally, thrown in the way of its progress. He admonished his colleague not to be too particular as to terms, and, if he obtained a bill sufficient for a correction of the evil, to be satisfied. This might have been done (he said) without any great parade, by the introduction of a resolution declaratory of the opinion of this House as to the intention and construction of the law of 1818. The committee, however, having preferred a different mode of accomplishing the same object, he was disposed to acquiesce in it.

This child of the bosom of his colleague had been long in coming into the world. The nation has looked for it with intense anxiety. It had been slow in its conception, and tardy in its delivery. It was old; though it had been said to be small, yet it was comely. It was a production which (Mr. L. said) he himself admired very much, since it had seen the light; although, from the great difficulty in bringing it to life, some had apprehended that the Cæsar-like operation would have become necessary before it saw the day. It has come, however, (said Mr. L.,) and I rejoice to see it. I rejoice the more, because it has a striking resemblance to its father—not to the colleague of mine who laid claim to it yesterday, but to him who has the charge of it; though, really, from the affectionate struggle between my two colleagues as to its paternity, I did not know but we should have to resort to the plan of Solomon of old, and settle the question by dividing the offspring between them. But, to speak seriously, he believed that his honorable colleague who reported the bill was the real father of it, and should have all the credit of so hopeful an heir. He hoped to see it carefully nursed, but not too closely, lest perchance it might be smothered by too much kindness. He also desired that it might inherit all the good properties of its father—all his industry, ability, and usefulness; and, in saying this, he was not speaking ironically, but he hoped that it would not at the same time inherit an unconquerable desire to talk. Mr. L. hoped (he said) that we should have its twin brother, and a good many of the same progeny. He liked the breed. He wished to see "reform" here in expenditures, as well as elsewhere throughout the country. Though it might be thought small game by some, he would be glad if his colleague would go on and pursue it. So much saved is so much gained.

As every body seemed willing that this bill should pass, (Mr. L. said,) he had got the floor to ask why the House should hesitate longer about it. Why not pass it to-day? He never had himself a doubt as to the intention of the law of 1818; for he never had the acuteness himself to be able to find out that "the usually travelled road" was the bed of a river, and, therefore, never thought of making such a charge; but, at the same time, he did not condemn the gentlemen who had calculated their travel in that way, if they thought it just and according to law.

Those parts of the bill which had been stricken out, (Mr. L. said,) he did consider as conveying an imputation on this House, by referring the computation of the mileage of members to the Postmaster General. For himself, (he said,) he wanted no overseer or supervisor of this House, or what might be called a Congress-Master General. He could never agree to let any officer out of this House regulate its peculiar and exclusive concerns. Gentlemen might, on the stump, or elsewhere, harangue about the want of integrity in this House. Mr. L. said he considered its integrity the last stay of the nation; and when that reliance was gone, he should think the Government was gone. Such things may be talked of as electioneering topics, and to be witty upon. But, when we come to be serious, the truth is known and acknowledged, this House has integrity. Having no doubt on that subject, ought we ever so far to bring ourselves into disrepute by our own vote, as to intimate that any individual at the head of a department is likely to have more honesty than we have? I do not acknowledge that any one man, the Postmaster General, or any other executive officer, up to the highest, deserves such preference over ourselves: for I believe that there is as much honesty and patriotism in this House as in any equal number of people upon earth. I look to them with hope and confidence for safety in the worst of times. Let the times be as bad as they may hereafter—I do not now speak of the present time—I look to this House to protect the public interest. I never will consent to say, either directly or indirectly, that there is any head of a department that can and will do more justice to this nation than the nation may rightfully expect from the House itself. The Post Office Department has already heavy duties to perform, with fewer responsibilities, with more power and patronage, than any other department of the Government; and all the ability and all the honesty of its head is required for its own faithful management. He would not therefore agree to place this House under the control of him, or any other officer whom it might be proposed to make its comptroller general. Mr. L. concluded by saying he did not wish to consume time unnecessarily, and expressed a hope that the House would pass the bill before its adjournment.

Mr. SPRIGHT said he had not submitted the motion for adjournment with a view of making a set speech on the subject of retrenchment and reform. He was fearful that the patience of the House was already exhausted; he had not originally intended to take any part in the discussion; but the innumerable amendments which had been made to the bill had induced him to make a brief statement explanatory of the vote he should give. He could scarcely expect that the House would attend to him with the same good humor with which they had listened to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. LETCHER.) That gentleman had been pleased to call this bill a child, which needed nursing and attention to rear to maturity, and professed himself willing to aid in rearing and educating it to useful purposes. Mr. S. thought that the chairman of that committee might say, in reference to the friendship manifested by his colleague, in the words of the Spanish proverb: "Save me from my friends; from my enemies I can protect myself." When the bill was first introduced into the House, he was opposed to it, and had so stated unreservedly, mainly on account of that clause in the first section, about which so much debate had been had, directing a reference to the Postmaster General. When this part was stricken out by an amendment, he was disposed to vote for the bill. His objections to that clause were the very incorrect estimate which the post office books give of the distances on some of the post routes. Their distances were no doubt generally obtained from deputy postmasters and mail carriers, who evidently knew very little of the matter. In his district, he had heard no complaints about the per diem allowance on the mileage of members. The committee had, however, reported an abuse or an error, and had demonstrated how it had originated, and had proposed a remedy. The fact that this matter, thus disclosed, had not been spoken of at such a distance, shows that this error has been gradual in its growth, and that the people have never been fully apprised of its extent. It ought, therefore, to be corrected, and the amended bill afforded a proper remedy. Mr. S. could not agree in opinion with his friend and colleague, (Mr. CARSON,) his bosom friend, he might say, that in this matter corruption or dishonorable motives were to be imputed to members, and that they should resent such attempts.

He saw nothing in the bill to awaken such feelings. It was based upon the admitted fact that something had been done which ought not to have been done; and that the present law was so defective that such errors might occur even with good intentions. The enactment of this law would prevent a recurrence of these things, by establishing a uniform rule. He saw in this nothing to impeach the character or ruffle the complacency of members. He reprobated the doctrine that members of Congress were too honorable to need accountability, and that they should be exempted from responsibility. Members of Congress were, he doubted not, equally fallible with other men; and, in this matter, the question is about that in which men are most fallible, their self-interest. He was for discarding such pretensions, and for putting a stop decisively to these malpractices. Mr. SPEIGHT said that, two years ago, when these matters were first broached, this Hall, and every Hall in the country, rung with the accounts of the waste of public money, constructive journeys, double outfits, &c. He was then, as now, of opinion that the question of retrenchment should be fully met, and a thorough investigation ordered into all the departments of the Government. But his opinion was, unequivocally, that this reform and investigation should commence, like charity, at home, and here in this Hall. This bill, in part, met his view; and when this should be settled, he hoped the committee would prosecute the inquiry into certain other matters about the House, the use of stationery, &c. And when the affairs of that House were retrenched and reformed, he hoped they would proceed through all the departments, from the Executive down through every office, and examine and reform all the abuse which may exist. He had heard, during the last nine months, a great deal of the removal of faithful public officers, men who, for many years, had served the public well, and the appointment of others. If these things have been done without cause, it is proper that such an abuse of power should be detected, and its authors punished by public opinion. In these remarks he had no intention of alluding to individuals; the question simply was, the abuse being admitted, should not the remedy be applied? He thought it should, and therefore supported the bill as amended.

The question was then taken, by yeas and nays, on striking out the second section of the bill, and decided in the negative by a large majority, 158 to 15.

Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, then moved further to amend the bill, by adding the following as a new section:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of six dollars per day, and six dollars for each twenty miles travel, and computed according to foregoing provisions, be allowed to each member of Congress, in lieu of the present allowance; and that all laws making a greater or different allowance be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

This motion Mr. CHILTON supported by a speech of some length, and concluded by asking for the yeas and nays upon it.

The House refused to order the yeas and nays to be taken, by a vote of 162 to 19.

A motion was then made to adjourn, and decided in the negative.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the motion of Mr. CHILTON, and decided in the negative, yeas 26.

And then the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, in the following form, viz:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Senate and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives shall, at the present and at the commencement of each subsequent session of Congress, obtain from each member and delegate the name of the post office nearest his residence, and shall then with the aid of the presiding officers, ascertain and fix the distance to said post office from the seat of Government, computed according to the shortest post road on which letters are usually transmitted by mail from the seat of the General Government to said post office; after which, he shall add to, or subtract from, the said statement, as the case may be, the distance from said post office to the residence of said member; upon which statement, the mileage of each member is to be computed.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, on the final settlement of the account of each member or delegate, he shall subjoin, at the foot of his account, a certificate that he has deducted from his account all and each of the entire days on which he may have been absent from his seat in the House of which he is a member, during those days on which it may have been in session: Provided that nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to prevent a member receiving a daily compensation, if the absence of such member was occasioned by sickness after his departure from home; in which case, a member so prevented from attending the House, shall annex a certificate of the fact of sickness, and its duration."

THURSDAY, December 31.

Distribution of Public Lands.

The House having resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. HUNT, proposing a distribution of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands among the several States for the purposes of education and internal improvement,

Mr. TIER rose, and said that he had but a few words more to say, and he should close. I think, sir, (said Mr. T.), I was calling the attention of the House to the modus operandi under the provisions of the amendment to the resolution by the gentleman from South Carolina, and particularly what was to be taken into this account current which was to be made out. I had said, we shall call upon you to go the whole; we shall not only call upon you to throw in all the lands in this district, besides the useless millions you have laid out upon this building and the President's house, but we shall call upon you to take an account of your navy also, for it will be extremely onerous to call upon us in the new States to pay for the lands you pretended to give us, without allowing us to draw out of the general stock our money portion of the funds. I shall be told that these public buildings are a part of the staple improvements of the country, which were never intended as a fund; this I admit; and so, by your pretended gift, these lands (so far as they have been applied) have become a part of the permanent improvements of the country as much as your public buildings; but we are called upon to pay for them, and we cannot do so except we be permitted to draw upon the joint stock. It will be no answer to our proposition to tell us that the cost of these buildings, &c., are money appropriations, and not land. Sir, I would inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina, what distinction he will draw between an appropriation of money and of land—except that money is preferable.

Sir, I should think the gentleman's precipitancy a conclusive evidence that he was afraid to submit his proposition to the deliberate cogitations of the people. He is fearful that that monstrous sentiment which he has heard in whispers might assume a more audible tone—he is fearful it may gain upon public opinion. Sir, if it be true, that such a sentiment or opinion be gaining ground, it is one of the strongest reasons under Heaven why the decision of the question should be postponed. Let the people deliberate upon it, and my life for it they will come to a correct conclusion concerning it. Is the gentleman afraid to postpone it till after the next census? I should think so, from his desire to push the matter now. Why, sir, drive us into a decision now? Why not let it remain till public opinion has decided upon it? The new States are but weak in numerical strength; why cram this measure down their throats before they shall have acquired the strength which the new census will give them? It shows there is something wrong about it, and that he is afraid to trust it to the searching investigations of time. If we must have a scramble for this property, give us a chance with you—do not take the advantage of our present representative weakness, when you know we have a large portion of original physical strength just ready to organize and bring into action. It would not be fair; if we must lose our lands, let us at least have the benefit of all our strength before we commence the unequal struggle. Sir, I can say to my friend from Vermont, I have never heard such principles as he mentions contended for—I have never heard any man deny but that Congress had the right to dispose of those lands according to the tenor of the compacts with the various States which have made cessions. But I will say to my friend, that whatever lands the United States may have in the new States, at least the Western ones, Vermont has no land there, nor ever will have, until the Western States consent to it, or the most solemn engagement shall be violated by the Congress of the United States. Sir, I have said this, and I will say it here, that the gentleman may be apprised of it, that when the motives or considerations for ceding these lands to the United States, by the several States, shall have been fulfilled, that, from a principle of equity, connected with the contract, they must and will fall to the States in which they lie; and, sir, I will give the gentleman the grounds of my opinion. Sir, it is evident that these lands were ceded to the United States upon two considerations, the most prominent of which was, to create a sort of political balance in the Union, as I have heretofore said; the next was, the payment of the public debt. The lands are, therefore, a trust estate in the hands of Congress or the United States, for the purpose of fulfilling the design of the States which ceded them, that is, to lay off a certain number of new States, not to exceed a certain size, so as to create the balance of power I have before stated—which States were to be free republican States, possessing all the rights of sovereignty and independence of the original States; and, at a proper time, to be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with them. Now, sir, is it not a settled principle, in the construction of all trusts, from which no tribunal ever thought itself at liberty to depart, that when the whole object or consideration for which the trust was created shall have been fulfilled, that the estate reverts to the original donor, unless otherwise directed by the terms of the trust? Here, sir, it is otherwise directed; it never can revert to the donors. But, sir, when these new States shall have been laid out, and the public debt paid, these lands must go to those new States according to the provisions of the grant—having all the rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence of the original States. Sir, I am forbidden to travel upon this ground—it belongs not to the amendment, but to the original resolution, which I have been warned not to discuss. When a proper occasion, however, shall offer, I may take up the subject more at large, but, for the present, I will not trouble the House longer.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, said that he rose to make a very few remarks. The gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. WILDE,) had correctly stated that the resolution was merely for the purpose of inquiry; it was an initiatory proceeding with a view to certain results, and every thing pertinent to the inquiry should be embraced in the resolution, if nothing more. He presumed it had not been the intention of the mover of the resolution that donations, in land, or otherwise, to the new States, should be taken into consideration; and the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. MALLARY,) although he had expressed an intention of voting for the amendment, had distinctly disavowed taking into the final account those donations against the new States. He was opposed to any retrospect as to grants or donations to any of the States, and he believed those who acted with him in support of the resolution were opposed to it. In the first place, they wished to avoid any excitement; and, in the second place, they considered such retrospect unjust. He fully agreed with the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. VANCE,) that the donations which had been made had promoted the interests of the United States, by greatly increasing the value of the residuary lands; and he even felt that those hardy adventurers, who had entered our forests, and, amidst privations and sufferings, reduced the wilderness to pleasant abodes, were entitled to even more than they had received. He said the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. MARTIN,) was a Pandora's box, and had produced the excitement which had been displayed; that gentleman, instead of uniting to put that down, had opposed the original proposition, as containing the unjust principle of taking the donations to the new States into account in the final distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public domain. The gentleman from South Carolina had candidly avowed that he was hostile to the inquiry, and should vote against it if his amendment was adopted. He had never perceived the propriety of the amendment, and was satisfied that it would produce no other purpose than that of exciting, unnecessarily, and improperly, the feelings of the representatives of the new States. His own opinion was, that the subject should be examined now, and that it should be settled by this Congress; and that opinion had been strengthened by what he had heard from the gentleman from Indiana. He had never before heard the reasons assigned by that gentleman for the cessions made by Virginia and North Carolina. He had never supposed that these cessions were for the purpose of making new States. It was notorious, that, by the treaty of peace terminating the war of the Revolution, the lands falling within the original boundaries of those States were wrested from the Crown, and enured to the States within whose limits they were situated; in consequence of the arduous struggle for independence in which all the old States participated, and by the common blood and treasure of the then States, these lands had been acquired. Virginia, and the other States who made cessions, magnanimously surrendered a portion of the territory thus gained. This surrender was dictated by a high sense of justice, and never has been, and never ought to be, viewed as a donation. He should suppose that the ratio of representation in this House was the proper measure by which to ascertain "the proportion of charge and expenditure." Let inquiry be made, as it ought, in order that, in our future distribution, we may conform to the intention of the granters. The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. TIER) had admitted that the legal title to these lands was in the United States, but he has said that eventually they ought in justice to go to the States within whose boundaries they were. Suspicions that such sentiments were entertained by the new States had probably led to the introduction of the resolution. It must also be recollected that there was a vast quantity of public lands, which had been acquired by purchase, for which the United States had paid large sums, and assumed onerous burdens. He referred to Louisiana, Florida, and the Georgia and Alabama lands. Have the United States been reimbursed for the consideration money paid out of the common treasury for these lands? He believed not. And on what plea then can the new States claim the unsold lands as theirs? It certainly was to be apprehended that at some future time the claim which had been intimated by the gentleman from Indiana would be more boldly advanced, and that the right of the old States would eventually be denied. He was glad that, in the enumeration of the States, which had largely participated in the public expenditure, the gentleman from Indiana had not named New York; she had indeed had but little of the expenditures of the General Government; she had applied for its aid when about to undertake her great work, but was denied all assistance on the ground of unconstitutionality. She then went on with that great enterprise unassisted and alone, and had succeeded, and was now enjoying the rich harvest of her enterprise. He thought this the precise time to make inquiry as to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, and he desired to make the inquiry and measure entirely prospective. He thought the friends of the resolution should unite to disencumber it from the amendment, and that they should adopt the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) and send it to a Select Committee.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, remarked that he was sorry to see, in that House, such a strong and inveterate disposition to scramble for the public funds. During the short time they had been in session, frequent attempts had been made to commit that House on the subject of appropriating public lands, or setting apart the "surplus revenue" for objects of "internal improvement" or education. Some gentlemen seemed to be very much afraid we should not know what to do with our surplus revenue. This reminded him of the story about the hunter, who sold the skin before he had killed the bear. Mr. B. said he thought common prudence and ordinary delicacy would require gentlemen to wait until the Government had paid its debts, and had really a little spare cash over and above its necessities, before they undertook to dispose of its surplus funds "in advance." Mr. B. said, although he very much wished to see this Government out of debt, yet he never expected, and he never wished, to see it possessed of surplus revenue to any considerable amount. He feared it would only serve to engender discord and corruption. The true policy of this country (he said) was to pay off the public debt as soon as possible, and lessen the duties on imports so as to meet only the real exigencies of the Government. It was a folly to say, or to imagine (as he had understood some gentlemen to intimate) that the people, after having realized the convenience and advantages resulting from low duties, would resist such an increase of them as might become necessary to meet any contingency or emergency that might arise. This (he said) would be a bad comment on their patriotism. He hoped they had not yet so far degenerated from the political virtue of their Revolutionary fathers. No, sir, (said Mr. B.,) when the people see the Government disposed to ask no more from them than is really necessary to support it, they will, in cases of necessity, submit to the greatest burdens. They will not only give their last dollar to aid a Government thus mindful of their interest, but, along with their money, they will freely give their blood. Mr. B. further said, that, after the public debt is paid off entirely, and the public lands thereby redeemed from the pledge they are now under for the obligations of the Government, he did not know that he should have any objection to a fair and equitable distribution of that territory; and if South Carolina could only get justice—sheer justice—in all other respects, he should not be disposed to squabble about those lands. Those who seemed to have such an "itching palm" for them, might take them, rather than he would enter into a scramble with them, like school boys scuffling for chestnuts. But, until our honest debts were paid, (if he might call them honest,) at any rate until all the pecuniary obligations of the Government were discharged, he hoped the public lands would be held as sacred as is the cash in the Treasury itself.

TUESDAY, January 5, 1880.

Distribution of Public Lands.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th ultimo, concerning a distribution of the public lands among the several States.

The question recurred on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN, on the same day, to amend the same.

Mr. CLAY, of Alabama, said, that, but for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. MARTIN,) he should have claimed no share of the indulgence of the House on this occasion. That amendment (he said) involved the rights and interests of the new States, one of which he had the honor to represent, in part, in no small degree—at least, according to the exposition of its friends—consequently, he felt it a duty incumbent on him to repel some of the remarks which had been made upon the subject.

Mr. C. said he did not wish to be understood as being ready to assent to the general proposition embraced in the resolution, as originally offered by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. HUNT.) He would not undertake, at this time, to say what might be his vote upon that proposition when the proper time for giving it might arrive, but he certainly now considered it objectionable. It seemed to him that the measure contemplated was entirely premature. Though Congress might now deliberate and act upon the question, by passing such a law as was proposed, of what avail would it be? It was agreed on all hands, that it could now have no effect, nor would it have any for several years to come. In the mean time, for several successive sessions, the measure might be discussed, and changed and modified again, and again, or even repealed, before it went into operation; which, it was agreed, could not happen before the extinguishment of the public debt. Mr. C. said he believed it was an acknowledged axiom in political economy, that too much or unnecessary legislation was always improper; that it was always a sufficient objection to any measure which might be proposed, when its inutility could be demonstrated. If it be allowable to adopt the measure now proposed, we might with equal propriety be continually legislating in advance and upon contingencies. Upon the same principle we might begin to legislate upon the subject of apportionment in this House four or five years before the proper period arrived; though any act which could be passed upon the subject would for four or five successive sessions be open to consideration, alteration, or repeal. He would ask whether this would not be an indiscreet consumption of the public time and an unwarrantable expenditure of the public money. He thought it would, and, under such impressions, he was not prepared to give his assent to the proposition, in any form.

But (said Mr. C.) the amendment is much more objectionable. It assumes the fact, as explained by its friends, that many and large donations have been made to the Western States, and calls on us to perform the ungracious and unenviable task of now raising an account, a charge against them for their value. Sir, (said Mr. C.), I will leave to other gentlemen to determine, if the fact be as supposed, how far it is consistent with the generous spirit in which gifts are presumed to be made, to demand or claim an equivalent in this manner. But (he said) the assumption of facts on which the amendment was predicated he by no means admitted. On the contrary, he felt authorized to controvert them. He believed that it would be found on examination of the various grants alluded to, that every one of them had been upon some consideration, supposed to be adequate, and upon terms and conditions. As to the sixteenth sections of every township reserved for the support of schools, they were part of the original consideration of purchase offered by the Government, in "an ordinance for ascertaining the mode of disposing of lands in the Western Territory," passed as long ago as the 20th May, 1785. The like reservation had, he believed, been made in every subsequent law which had been passed for the disposal of the public domain, from that time down to the present. It was part of the consideration and inducement held out to the adventurous pioneers, that, if they would buy thirty-five sections of a township, they should have the remaining one to assist in the education of their offspring. They cannot be said to be donations, then, but are part of the original contract between the Government and the purchasers.

Mr. C. said there had been other grants for different purposes; some for roads, some for canals, and some for seminaries of learning. It would be found, however, that all these grants were for the advancement of some great improvement, of a character national rather than local, or for some advantage, or benefit, which amounted to an equivalent. Grants had been made to Ohio, to Indiana, to Illinois, and more recently to Alabama. In all instances, the Government still retained lands, the value of which would be greatly enhanced by the improvement; and in many, perhaps half the cases, every alternate section through which the road or canal was to run, was reserved from grant or sale, thereby increasing the value twofold. He believed, in every case of a grant for a road or canal, one condition was an exemption of the property of the United States and persons in their employment from toll; and another pretty general feature in them was a rigid accountability on the part of the State receiving for the application of proceeds or funds arising to the particular object contemplated. But independent of this, every road and every canal, for which an appropriation had been made, improved facilities of commercial intercourse, as well as of defending the country in time of war. One of those grants contemplated the construction of a road from the Atlantic coast to the Ohio River; others contemplated canals, or roads establishing communications between the Northern lakes and some other principal rivers of the Western States; and still another class were made for the removal of obstructions to the navigation of our rivers, so as to admit of uninterrupted navigation at all seasons far into the interior. Mr. C. asked, could it be pretended that any of these grants were for the exclusive benefit of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, or Alabama? He thought it could not with propriety; but contended, on the contrary, that the State to which any of these grants were made, was constituted a sort of trustee or agent, to superintend the accomplishment of improvements, in which her sister States were often equally, and sometimes more deeply, interested than herself. The experience of the last war has shown the want and the value of such facilities of intercourse between remote parts of the country; and had, probably, induced the making of some of these appropriations.

Mr. C. said that the grants which had been made for seminaries of learning, so far as he had examined them, had either been made upon some one of the considerations which he had mentioned, (for example, the enhancement of the value of the remaining public lands,) or in consideration of concessions made by the States upon their admission into the Union. He spoke more particularly in reference to the grant made to Alabama for the establishment and support of a seminary of learning. But what was required of that State in turn? Nothing less than the surrender of some of the most important rights of sovereignty, common to the older States; whilst we were told, in the act passed for our admission, and in the resolution declaring it, that we were admitted, or to be admitted, "upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever." Yes, sir, we were compelled to disclaim all right to the primary disposal of unappropriated soil within our chartered limits, and to abandon all right to tax the lands of the United States, or lands sold by the United States, till five years after such sale. He said he knew nothing pertaining to sovereignty of more importance than the power of taxation; without it, he presumed, no Government could long exist. Again, when this grant was made to Alabama, the Government of the United States still owned a large quantity of land within her limits, the value of which was augmented.

Mr. C. said that one gentleman who had addressed the House, (he did not then recollect from what State,) had urged the claim of the old States to this distribution of the public land, on the ground that they had achieved the independence of the country. The argument had struck Mr. C. with some surprise. The gentleman could not certainly mean that the independence of our country had been achieved by those who now reside in the old States and by their ancestors; and could not the people of the new States claim the same ancestry? Had not they, and indeed some of those who fought the battles of the revolution, emigrated from the old States? They had, (he said,) and had shown themselves, in the late war, worthy of such ancestry; they had evinced as much courage, as much enterprise, and as much patriotism, as the people of any other section of the Union. Mr. C. said he invited the attention of every gentleman to an examination of the terms of these grants; and repeated, that he had full confidence that each one of them would be found to be grants, upon some adequate consideration, or for the accomplishment of some national work. Under these impressions, he hoped that the amendment under consideration would be promptly rejected.

When Mr. CLAY concluded, Mr. HUNT obtained the floor, but had not proceeded far, when the hour allotted for the consideration of resolutions having elapsed, the remainder of his remarks was deferred to another day.

TUESDAY, January 7.

Distribution of Public Lands.

Mr. POTTER said, that, when he recollected the subject of the resolution before the House, that it proposed nothing definite—nothing conclusive—it appeared to him that this debate was most unnecessarily protracted. Gentlemen took for granted the matter which it is the object of the resolution to ascertain, and have founded their arguments upon what they apprehend might be the report on the resolution, if agreed to. They certainly seemed to be the impression of gentlemen who had spoken in opposition to the amendment; for those from that part of the United States where the amendment pointed, discussed it with as much zeal as if the final proposition to distribute the proceeds of the sale of the public lands amongst the several States, for the purposes contemplated, had been under consideration, and to exact a rigid account of the new States of the proportion they have received. What did the amendment propose? It simply proposes to instruct the committee to lay before the House a statement of the quantity and value of the public lands which have been given to any State, or the public or private institutions thereof. It implies (said Mr. P.) a pledge as to the use which the House will make of this information when obtained. For my own part, (said Mr. P.,) I have no disposition to demand a strict reckoning on this score from the people of the new States. No one sympathizes more than I do with the difficulties they have had to encounter, or admires more the courage with which they have sustained them. But, before I proceed to act in prospect upon this subject, I wish to see what has been done with it heretofore. It is with a bad grace that gentlemen seek to suppress this information. They talk to us about the valuable public considerations for which the donations in question have been made. Be it so. It will be time enough to bring up those arguments when we have a proposition before us to demand an account of them. All that we want now is such information as will enable us to determine, correctly, whether such an account shall be demanded. Mr. P. said, I would rather have the facts than the statements of any gentleman, whatever might be my own confidence in their integrity. I will never act upon faith when facts can be produced, in relation to any matter whatever, and shall therefore vote for the amendment. There is surely a most fastidious sensibility here upon this subject. We have even heard the title of the Union to these lands drawn into controversy, and a comparison instituted between the military merits of the old and new States. This, sir, is idle. I apprehend there is no man here, who will dare to deny the right of the United States to its own property. That is a proposition I would no more consent to discuss, than the plainest axiom in Euclid. Having been alluded to, however, it was placed on the true ground by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. SEKNOKER,) who favored us with his remarks on Thursday last, so much to the satisfaction of every one who heard him. We have heard something said of the share which the individual States have contributed of this common stock. The State which I have in part the honor to represent, gave up to the Union a territory, which, whether you look to the quality or the extent of it, forms one of the most valuable portions of the public domain. Yet North Carolina, one of the oldest and most liberal members of the confederacy, has received but a step-child's portion. She will not stoop to the language of complaint, but at a proper time she will present herself to the justice of this House, and of the nation, and in mere justice will ask their co-operation in measures which may be necessary to enable her people to receive and retain in their own hands the avails and the profits of their own labor and industry—measures, in short, which will unchain her navigation, and place her in free and fair communication with the commercial world.

This, however, is a consideration not to be gone into at this time. I merely mention it now as that which will govern my vote in this and all similar questions. Our situation in North Carolina requires all the resources we can command; and I feel it to be one of the most sacred duties I owe to my constituents, to take back from the federal treasury every dollar I can put my hand upon of the sum contributed by us, over and above our fair proportion in the general charge and expenditure, to be expended, however, at our own option, and under our own direction. I regret to have heard the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. HUNT,) who introduced this resolution, decline yesterday receiving the proposition which had been suggested, but not actually proposed to the House, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN.) That proposition even avoids the semblance of a committal on the part of the House, either as to the constitutionality of the power proposed to be exercised, or the time when it will be expedient to put it in operation; and when the amendment before us is disposed of, I will myself, if no one else will, present that proposition as a substitute for the present resolution. It is desirable on another account. It proposes to substitute a Select Committee for this reference, instead of the Committee on the Public Lands. This is obviously proper; and, from what I have seen of the mass of business before that committee, I am sure they will be obliged to be relieved from the task of this investigation. In giving the pledge to offer a substitute to the resolution before us, I have no disposition to take the management of this matter upon myself. I shall wait, therefore, when the pending amendment is disposed of, to see if some other gentleman will not introduce it.

Mr. Lewis said, that, as a member from a new State, he felt that no apology was due in claiming for a few minutes the attention of the House. The subject was one of great interest to the members generally—to the new States it was a matter of incalculable interest. It is no less than a proposition to distribute these lands among the different portions of the Union. In fact, (he said,) the process was actually going on, and the Representatives of these States cannot be expected to sit the silent spectators of a scene in which their constituents have so great an interest.

The mover has said that this is a mere question of inquiry; and infers that it should not meet with opposition, until it is embodied in a report from the Committee of the House. Sir, it is a question of inquiry, and one of a character so decisive of the destiny of the new States, that it should be met at the threshold. He thought that it would be well to discuss most propositions on a motion of reference. The question is then fairly presented, divested of all extraneous matter, and the unbiassed sense of the House is taken alone upon the merits of the inquiry.

Mr. L. said he should vote for the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, but from views very different from those of the honorable mover. He thought it a requisition of sheer justice, that, before any distribution of the funds of this Government should take place, it should be known what amount the several States have previously received for purposes of education and internal improvement. It was but fair play, and should precede every other inquiry. So far from avoiding such an inquiry, he was disposed to extend it, not only to the donations of land actually received, but to donations of moneys for splendid roads, canals, breakwaters, &c., in different sections of the country.

Mr. L. said he was, he believed, the only member from the new States, who had declared actually in favor of the amendment; and he did so, from a conviction that, so far as Alabama was concerned, she had nothing to fear from the investigation. Other gentlemen had asserted the same, in relation to other new States. Then why oppose the amendment? Mr. L. thought that, when the debits and credits were fairly stated between the General Government and Alabama, a considerable balance will be found in her favor. He believed he could get a verdict for that balance, before any impartial Committee of this House; and hence he had every reason to invite the inquiry.

Previous to any sales of her lands, it was known that there were to be certain reservations for the purposes of education and internal improvement. These are what gentlemen call donations; but, sir, I think I can prove that she has treble paid for them in the enhanced price of her lands, and in her relinquishment of certain portions of her sovereignty. I mean the right of taxing these lands. Can any gentleman believe that these stipulations in favor of the purchasers of public lands did not enhance their price? That they did not enter into the considerations of the purchase, as much as fertility of soil, health of situation, or any other local cause? Yes, sir, these stipulations were as well known at the land sales as they are in this House. They entered into the price of every acre of land, and into the calculations of every individual purchaser, from the keen and cautious speculator to the humblest individual who sought to purchase an eighty acre tract on which to place his little family. Gentlemen who argue differently, must suppose that the people of Alabama are the most uncalculating beings on earth. They are not, perhaps, as calculating as the population of some other sections of the Union; but to impute to them a disregard of such obvious advantages in the settlement of a new country, would amount to a charge of idiocy. As well might it be urged that an acre lot of land, twenty miles from this in the country, would sell for as much as one advantageously situated on Pennsylvania avenue. The conclusion is inevitable, that, whatever advantages were offered by the Government to purchasers before the sales, were well understood at the sales, entered fully into the price of the public lands, and were fairly paid for in an enhanced price. In addition to this, an injudicious promise had been extorted from the State not to tax the public lands, nor the lands of individuals, until five years after their purchase.

Here was another of those favors to the citizens paid for at the land sales. But (Mr. L. asked) what has been the effect of this concession on the part of Alabama? It has impoverished her finances, and created the necessity of the most oppressive taxes on other kinds of property. Mr. L. said that he was somewhat acquainted with the finances and taxes of Alabama, and he believed that if the lands within her limits had been subjected to as heavy a tax as other property, it would not have fallen as low as the annual amount of fifty thousand dollars since her admission as a State. How long this sacrifice would continue under the present slow, tedious, and objectionable mode of disposing of the public lands by auction, it was impossible for him to calculate. Perhaps at the end of fifty years all the land will not be sold. In one-third, however, of that time, the sacrifice will doubly exceed the value of the land secured to the State by compact. These (Mr. L. observed) were the advantages which Alabama had received from the General Government, and which have been alluded to in this debate. Sir, Alabama has experienced a rigid policy from the Government. At the time that this compact was formed between her and the United States, she was a territory. The General Government stood to her "in loco parentis," in the situation of a guardian to his ward. Alabama, as to the exercise of her political rights, was in her minority—in her childhood; and these sacrifices were demanded of her as conditions precedent to her admission into the Union. The compact has been discreditable to this Government, and injurious to Alabama, crippling her energies, destroying her fiscal resources, and, at the same time, operating in every respect advantageously to the United States. Sir, from the situation of the parties at the time of this contract, I am induced to believe that it would be declared a nullity before any equitable tribunal. It was a compact entered into by Alabama, not only in her minority, but under duress and fear of not being otherwise admitted into the Union.

Mr. L. said, that, as a citizen of a new State, he should oppose the proposition, as unjust and unequal to the new States. What was the value of these lands before they were reclaimed and subdued by the enterprise of the first settlers? To quote the language of the mover of these resolutions, (the honorable gentleman from Vermont,) they were "waste and uncultivated deserts." Sir, their value has been imparted to them by the industry, enterprise, and sufferings of that hardy population who precede the comforts and conveniences of a more advanced condition of every newly settling country. Who levelled the forests, who opened the roads, who established the towns, who gave, in fact, a determinate value to all the lands in the country, by converting a wilderness into a country possessing all the comforts of cultivated life? The people of Alabama. The labor and hardship were with them; and shall they be placed on no better footing than the old States? Shall they receive but three shares out of two hundred and thirteen, in all the lands within their limits? Shall their improvements and industry be sold and distributed, for the purpose of establishing roads and canals, schools and colleges, in other States, whose citizens have shared with them none of the hardships, the labor, and the sufferings, of settling the country? Sir, the proposition is unjust, and the system would render the new States tributary to the old. Besides, what would be the share of Alabama under this system? Three shares would probably be worth fifteen thousand dollars, and yet her citizens pay perhaps four or five hundred thousand dollars a year for land. A constant drain upon the resources of the State to this vast amount, a continued current of circulation setting from them in its onward course, with the paltry return of fifteen thousand dollars. This is too much the case at present; but the citizens of Alabama will not complain so long as this money goes in payment of a debt incurred in defence of national rights and honor. If applied to any local purpose, they will and ought to complain.

From whence, asked Mr. L., does this proposition come? From Virginia, whose contributions of land to the General Government have been more than all the other States? No, sir; that great and patriotic State, whose generosity is so often complimented on this floor, and whose name is identified with every sacrifice of blood or treasure in defence of this Government—she, I say, sir, does not ask, and would be the last to ask, this distribution at our hands. North Carolina has also made an important cession of lands to the Government. I hope a majority of that State do not demand the distribution. South Carolina and Georgia have also made large cessions of lands, and I am persuaded neither of them will favor this project. From what quarter, then, does the proposition present itself? From Vermont—a State which has made no cession whatever to the Government; and that, sir, in the absence of Virginia, whose liberality has created the largest portion of the fund which it is proposed to divide. He hoped the question would not be taken until Virginia was fully represented on this floor. He should make such a motion, if no one else did.

MONDAY, January 11.

Southern Indians.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the memorial heretofore presented by him, and then laid on the table, from a meeting of citizens of New York, praying the interposition of the General Government to protect the Southern Indians from injustice and oppression, be now referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, rose, and said, that, disclaiming all intention of opposing the reference proposed, he would, however, question the propriety of entertaining every petition or memorial which may be addressed to Congress, whether it be the result of an accidental meeting at a grog-shop or not. It appeared to him to be a perfectly useless waste of the time of the House, to order a reference of the memorial in question to the Committee on Indian Affairs, inasmuch as the subject-matter of the memorial was generally and fully presented to Congress by the President's Message, and was by an order of this House referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Mr. T. said he did not wish to provoke discussion upon the subject alluded to, because that was not the proper stage for its discussion. He was, however, prepared to meet the question then and at all times.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, said he had waited to see whether the mover of the memorial, or some other gentleman, would rise and repel the allusions of the gentleman who had just sat down. Since this had not been done, he felt himself called upon to speak as a representative of the State from which the memorial emanated. This was not the result of "a meeting in a grog-shop," as had been so unjustly insinuated, but one of the utmost respectability, and held in an enlightened and moral community. The chairman of that meeting was a revolutionary officer, known, respected, and beloved. Mr. S. said he knew many of the individuals whose names were attached to the memorial, and he knew their standing to be of the most respectable character; and the doctrine which had been here advanced, that they ought not to be heard—that their respectful memorial ought not to be received by this House, was one which he had not expected to hear advanced, and against which he must enter his solemn protest. The language of the memorial was decorous and respectful. It was true it was upon a delicate as well as an important subject; but, however unfashionable the doctrines which it advocated were upon this floor, or however much they might clash with his own sentiments, or those of others, it was not to be submitted to, that the respectable memorialists should be refused to be heard. He hoped, therefore, that the memorial would have its appropriate reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and meet with that consideration and respectful treatment to which it was entitled.

Mr. WILDE, of Georgia, said, inasmuch as the memorial had been laid upon the table, at his request, a few days since, for the purpose of giving time to examine its contents, it might be expected of him to say a word or two on the subject. Without professing any particular skill in the signs of the times, it seemed to him, from movements in that House and elsewhere, that the question of our Indian policy was destined to create much feeling and discussion. He did not mean to say that party feeling would mingle with their deliberations, though he feared they would not be entirely free from it.

He rose, not to express, in advance, opinions upon matters of high moment, worthy of grave deliberation; nor should he oppose the reference of this memorial, however objectionable he considered its language. It did not become him, as one of the representatives of a State interested in this question, to manifest any undue degree of sensitiveness to the terms in which the memorialists had been pleased to express their sentiments. But it might not be improper for him to offer a few words by way of comment.

The memorial appeared to have two objects. One was to remonstrate against the opinions of the present Chief Magistrate, in regard to the Indian tribes. The other to stigmatize the legislation of particular States. He did not understand, from reading the memorial, that the memorialists complained of any injury or injustice to themselves. The suggestion was, that other persons, not citizens of the United States, have reason to apprehend evil from the course pursued towards them by the President and some of the States. Now, sir, said Mr. W., when any one is injured, it is time enough to complain; and it is well enough, usually, to let those who are injured complain for themselves. For though it has been said by a great moralist, that the fate of complaint is to excite contempt rather than pity, no one has been persuaded by the adage to suffer and be silent.

Whence, then, the necessity of the petitioners' interference? Might they not be told that every one was ready enough to detail his own grievances? Was it less true now than formerly, that, if everybody would take care of themselves, and of their own business, everybody and everybody's business would be well taken care of? Give me leave, sir, said Mr. W., to ask, why, according to their own statement, these petitioners came before this House? They set forth no grievance of their own or of their fellow-citizens. They suggest no remedy resting in the action of this House for the real or imaginary grievances of others. Why may we not as well entertain supplications in behalf of the suffering people of Ireland or Hindostan? In what character, he inquired, did the memorialists present themselves? Was it as self-constituted guardians of the public faith? Were they voluntary superintendents of the treaty-making power? Curators by assumption of the persons and property of the Southern Indians? or censors—he knew not by what right—of the Legislatures of sovereign States of the Union?

Southern Indians.

[H. OF R.]

Taking their own showing, they applied to us, because the President refused to recognize the sovereignty and independence of some savage tribes; and because certain States, within whose territory they were at present found, contemplated extending their laws over all persons included in their constitutional and chartered limits.

And what then, sir? continued Mr. W. If these barbarous hordes are indeed sovereign powers, it belongs exclusively to the President to regulate the diplomatic intercourse with them. If an ambassador acceptable to the Cherokees should be required, the deep learning of the memorialists in the law of nations, he trusted, would not be overlooked. But at present it was the pleasure of the President only to maintain an agent near the new Government.

Mr. BELL, of Tennessee, said he did not rise to enter into the discussion of any matter connected with the question of the policy which this Government should pursue towards the Indians. He wished, however, to express his regret that, upon a mere question of reference, any thing should be said by gentlemen from any quarter, tending to call forth a discussion, which was premature, which could result in no good, and for which the House could not then be prepared. Mr. B. said he had not availed himself of the privilege of examining the language of the memorial for himself, but he had learned from others, who had done so, that it was not of such a character as to exclude it from the House; he could, therefore, see no good objection to its reference to the proposed committee, and he hoped it would be so referred without further argument. He concurred with the gentleman from New York, (Mr. SPENCER,) that the subject referred to by the memorial was one of great delicacy and importance. It was necessary that this House should come to a decision upon some of the questions presented by the present condition of the Indians, at this session of Congress. The whole subject would shortly be presented to the House by the committee which had it in charge; and when, in this way, some distinct proposition was presented, gentlemen would have ample opportunity of expressing their views upon whatever side of the question they might feel it their duty to array themselves. As an individual member of the House, and looking to the necessity of forming some opinion upon the subject to which the memorial related, he was pleased that all the information, in the power either of individuals or public meetings to give, should, in some shape, be brought to the notice of the House. He would not object to memorials, that they contained nothing more than expression of feeling in relation to this subject; but he was particularly gratified with the presentation of memorials coming from a source so respectable and enlightened, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. SPENCER) had assured us this one had come. He trusted it contained some original matter, some new views upon a question of so much importance. As a member of the committee which had this subject under consideration, he would feel obliged by the reference of as many such memorials as might be presented from any quarter.

Mr. DRAYTON, of South Carolina, said, the sole ground upon which he opposed the commitment of this memorial was the language in which it was couched. The memorialists, in common with other citizens, said Mr. D., have the constitutional right to petition Congress for the redress of grievances. As they possess the right, it is for them to decide what are the proper occasions for its exercise. The only limitation which has been, and which, in my judgment, ought to be imposed upon those who address the Legislature, is, that their language should not be indecent or disrespectful. But this memorial so plainly offends against decorum, that we should, it appears to me, be wanting in what is due to ourselves and to those whom we represent, were we to permit it to be referred to any committee of the House. Having taken it up within a few minutes, I have not been able to peruse it entirely. I have glanced over it, so as to collect its object—the temper of its framers—the general scope of their reasoning, and the conclusions at which they have arrived. Although the proposed object of the paper is to demonstrate that to the Indians, rightfully, belong the territories which they occupy, yet it is evident that the real intent of those who subscribed it is to show that the State of Georgia, in her conduct towards the Cherokees, has committed an infraction of the constitution, and departed from the obligations imposed upon her by treaties and by the principles of justice and humanity. The memorialists “call the attention of Congress to the relations which have always existed between Georgia and the Creek and Cherokee nations of Indians. Treaties (they state) were repeatedly made between the colony of Georgia and Indian nations residing, &c., &c., and always upon the ground of the distinct national character of the Indians,” and of their right of soil and “of sovereignty within their national limits.” Reference is then made to treaties between Georgia and the Cherokees, upon the same basis, since she became an independent State, “which are binding upon her in honor, law, and conscience.” It is a fact of which none of us are ignorant, that the Legislature of Georgia passed a law before the date of this memorial, directing, at a future period, a division of some of the lands of the Cherokees, (considered to have been ceded to the State by treaty,) and declaring that the laws of Georgia, after a certain time, should be binding upon the Cherokees within her limits. Of the propriety or impropriety of this legislation, I shall not now speak. I have noticed it merely to show the application to the State of Georgia of the following passages:

"Your memorialists cannot avoid the conclusion that the bringing of State laws to bear upon the Cherokees without their consent, or the division of their lands among the citizens of any State, would bring great and lasting disgrace upon our country, and would expose us as a people to the judgment of Heaven." Congress is then implored to interpose, in order that our national character may be preserved "from so indelible a stigma, and is solemnly invoked, by that abhorrence which every upright legislator will feel at the suggestion of measures that will rest upon the brute force, by the apprehension of Divine displeasure, &c., by all these considerations to interpose and save the Cherokees from such injustice and oppression as can hardly fail of accomplishing our ruin, and of bringing opprobrium and perpetual shame upon our country." Sir, no one can doubt, for a single moment, that the passages which I have extracted from this memorial, directly and unequivocally charge one of our sister States with trampling upon all laws, human and divine, under the instigation of the most foul and criminal motives—with the perpetration of deeds which ought to excite the abhorrence and execration of civilized man, and call down the malediction and vengeance of an offended Deity. Can petitions for the redress of grievances not be preferred, without abuse and crimination? I do not attempt to take away, or in the slightest degree to impair, the right of petitioning Congress. All I require is, that this right should be so exercised as not to be diverted from its true intention by grossness and abuse; with this limitation, the right will be preserved, without being degraded. We ought surely to pay as much respect to a sovereign confederated State, as to an individual; and would any member of this body feel himself authorized to present the memorial of an individual, containing such language as I have quoted? The questions involved in this memorial are of momentous interest. I have reflected upon them sufficiently to convince me of their complexity and their delicacy. However embarrassing they may be, we shall be compelled to examine into, and to decide upon them. I do not desire to postpone their consideration. All I desire is, that a constitutional right should not be converted into a vehicle for opprobrious epithets, and that the Legislature should not lend its aid to the circulation of what grossly violates common propriety and common decency. With this view, Mr. D. moved that the memorial be laid upon the table. He, however, withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. LUMPKIN, of Georgia, who acknowledged (for it was known to all his acquaintance) that he was sufficiently sensitive upon subjects relating to himself; and it was known to this House that he was equally so upon all subjects relating to the rights, honor, and character of the people and State which he had the honor in part to represent. Moreover, he believed he had not one constituent who would suspect him of being deficient in zeal and fidelity upon all subjects relating to their interest. Nevertheless, he must express his deep regret that this memorial, emanating from a few enthusiastic citizens of New York, was not permitted to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs without opposition, and thereby have prevented this premature discussion. He regretted the motion of his colleague (at the time it was made) to lay this paper on the table, because, if it had been permitted to go to the committee, we should have avoided this untimely consumption of time, and premature excitement of feeling, upon a subject of deep and grave importance, not only to Georgia, but to the whole Union.

Mr. L. said, that, for two years past, by day and by night, in sickness and in health, he had used his best efforts to get the Indian subject in a general and digested form before this House. The records and proceedings in this House would bear him out in saying that the general plan for Indian emigration, now under the consideration of Congress, had been repeatedly urged by him (Mr. L.) for two years past; and he would now take the liberty of saying, that one of the greatest obstacles which had impeded his progress, and, as he believed, his success, might be traced in the disposition in this House prematurely to enter upon the discussion of the Indian subject. It is known to this House that the whole subject of our Indian relations has been brought before Congress by the President of the United States in his Message at the commencement of the present session; and has been referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, of which he was a member; and, therefore, he felt himself justified in saying that that committee is and has been assiduous in labor and industry, in endeavoring to perform the important duties confided to its charge. He, therefore, regretted, that any portion of the delegation from Georgia, or any other member of the House, should subject themselves to the imputation of stifling the most full, free, and ample investigation upon this subject, in all its various bearings. As regards the paper which has given rise to this discussion, his views coincided with the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. DRAYTON) and that of his colleagues. He considered this officious act of the petitioners (to speak in the mildest terms of it) as an impertinent intermeddling with other people's concerns. But, sir, said Mr. L., I would most gladly hear and carefully examine all that can be said by every individual in this Union who thinks with these memorialists, including all the William Penns of the whole land. I want the whole subject fully and fairly before Congress. Sir, I am not vain in believing that the conduct of Georgia, in relation to the Indians, in the prosecution of her rights, will not only be justified to this House, but to nine-tenths of the people of this Union, if we can have an ample discussion upon the subject in all its bearings. Instead of a Georgia question, in relation to Indians, I wish to present to the consideration of Congress, and the people of the Union, a systematic plan, and policy in relation to the Indians, which shall not only relieve my own State, but every other State and territory in the Union, of their present perplexities in relation to the rights of the States—the rights of the Indians, as well as the rights of this Government, in relation to this Indian subject. Sir, it is time to have a definite policy upon this subject. The jurisdiction of all the conflicting parties must be defined. Your committee, upon this subject, are using their best exertions to lay before you all the facts which they can collect, connected with the subject, and which are calculated to aid in arriving at a just decision. I, therefore, do hope we shall not again suffer ourselves to be excited into a premature discussion of this subject, by those whose ignorance of the subject is the manifest cause of their zeal and forwardness.

Mr. WAYNE said he was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. DEAYTON,) and he should vote with him on the present question. He took this occasion to return his thanks to that gentleman for the stand which he had taken, in making his motion to lay the subject on the table; and he should have done so himself, had it not more properly devolved upon an older member of that body. He hoped the memorial might be read, that gentlemen might judge for themselves, whether it was couched in decorous terms. He therefore moved its reading.

[The reading of the memorial at length, by the Clerk of the House, here took place.]

Mr. MALLARY observed that he was not aware that difficulties could ensue upon the subject before them. A great number of respectable citizens had memorialized Congress on a very important subject. It had been said by the gentleman from Georgia, that it would be much better if persons, instead of taking care of the business of others, would attend to their own affairs. But what, said he, are to be considered as our affairs, and what are the affairs of the nation? Has not the President of the United States himself recommended, in his Message, the subject to the consideration of the Committee on Indian Affairs? And why, therefore, should objections be raised to the reference of it to that committee, by those who laid claim to the character of genuine republicans? Mr. M. proceeded to contend in favor of the memorialists to admonish, if he might use the term, the members of the National Legislature, upon the subject of any public measure in contemplation, and also to express their opinion as to what might be the probable consequences or results of their decision. He thought that the citizens of the United States, under such circumstances, had the right not only to express their opinions, but also to urge their arguments in support of such opinion.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, said he certainly did not rise with a view to prolong the debate. On the contrary, it was with extreme regret that he had seen the debate take the range which it had already done. But the gentleman from New York (Mr. SPENCER) had seemed to intend to fix on him (Mr. T.) the charge of having not only unnecessarily provoked debate upon the merits of the subject referred to in the memorial, but of having done injustice to the memorialists. Mr. T. disclaimed having said, or intended to say, any thing (when he first addressed the House) on the merits of the important subject referred to in the memorial. He had read that paper, and, as a representative of the people of Georgia, he felt indignant at the insult apparently intended to be offered by the memorialists to that State. He repeated what he said when he addressed the House before, that he had no intention of opposing the proposed reference. That he had implicit confidence in the integrity and intelligence of the Committee on Indian Affairs, who already had the subject under consideration. That he had the fullest confidence in this House, and in the American people, as well as in the perfect fairness of the claims of Georgia, and that, therefore, he did not fear the result. Mr. T. said, that, but for the assertion of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. SPENCER,) that the memorialists are gentlemen of respectability, the ungenerous, illiberal, and indecorous language used by them towards Georgia, would justify the belief that the memorial was the result of an accidental meeting at a grog-shop. Mr. T. said he was a Georgian, and had the honor to be one of the representatives of the people of that State. He asked the gentleman from New York, therefore, if it were possible that an apology could be expected from him. Mr. T. repeated what he said when he first addressed the House, that a reference of the memorial in question was superseded by a submission of the subject at large to the Committee on Indian Affairs, through the President's Message; and he would now add that the vast accumulation of trash which appeared in the columns of the National Intelligencer over the signature of William Penn, and circulated through the United States during the last summer, did away any necessity which ever in the conception of the memorialists might have otherwise devolved upon the people of New York to take the Indians located in Georgia under their special care and protection: for, if gentlemen would take the trouble to compare the memorial with the essays before alluded to, they would find that the memorialists have consulted their convenience, by taking such parts of the arguments used by William Penn as are the least profound, and, therefore, the least troublesome to the intellects of the memorialists. But with what grace, Mr. T. asked, do complaints against Georgia come from the land of the Mohawks, the Norridgewocks, the Pequods, and Narragansetts? Mr. T. said, the gentleman from the North (Mr. MALLARY) had taken exceptions to the maxim, that "if everybody would attend to their own business and let others alone, everybody's business would be well attended to," as quoted by Mr. T.'s colleague, (Mr. WILDE.) Mr. T. asked how the gentleman from Vermont would like a substitution of the maxim, "Physician, heal thyself." He deprecated the idea, in conclusion, that his intention had been either to provoke discussion, or oppose the proposed reference, and expressed a hope that the discussion would for the present be discontinued.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said that no one could deny that the subject-matter of the memorial pertained to the business of the House. The President had called the subject to the notice of Congress at the commencement of the session, and invited the special attention of the House to it. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, at the head of the Committee on Indian Affairs, (Mr. BELL,) had also invited its reference to that committee as a matter to be properly disposed of in that way. If the memorial was, therefore, on a subject pending here, he (Mr. S.) could not discover, as clearly as some gentlemen seemed to, how that which was of such interest to the whole country, should not have been a proper subject of petition to this House from these memorialists as well as anybody else. It was said, however, that the language of it was indecorous to the State of Georgia. He did not understand it to be objected to the memorial that it was at all disrespectful to the House—but it was said that it was not to be treated here with favor, because it imputed to other persons motives or conduct calculated to bring them into disrepute. Now, sir, said Mr. S., it becomes us to remember, here, that this right of petition has been deemed so sacred that its security has been provided for in the constitution itself. It is a right to be tenderly dealt with. This petition is not addressed to "His Most Sacred Majesty," or laid at the foot of a throne. The memorialists are our own constituents—the free people of this country—and addressing us, their own representatives. It is their right to speak to us—and to speak their opinions frankly and fearlessly, and it is our duty to listen to them respectfully. We can only require, on the other hand, that they speak in respectful terms of this House. Beyond that, I doubt if we have any moral right to inquire. If we undertake to criticize the language of these appeals from our constituents to this House beyond that point, we may overstep our own limits, and, under the notion of repudiating their petitions as disrespectful, we may in fact abridge the right of the people to petition their own representatives. If we are now to deny to these petitioners a respectful notice of their complaints, because they are supposed to have spoken of one of the States in terms which that State might consider offensive, why should not we at least set up the same rule for other departments of our own Government? We should then realize more distinctly the nature of the principle we have heard advanced in this debate. If our constituents were to petition us for an impeachment of the Executive or the judges of the court, and charge them with injustice, oppression, and usurpation, in unlimited terms, should we repudiate their complaints because we might be disposed to feel a tenderness for these high functionaries? If they speak respectfully of this House, it is all which we have a right to require for ourselves. I will not say whether, if this petition was presented to the Legislature of Georgia, it should be considered so respectful to that State, as to entitle it to favorable notice there. Georgia would determine that for herself. But it is enough for us that it contains no imputations on this House. Whether the conclusions which the petitioners have drawn from their own views of the subject, to which they call our attention, are just or not, is not the question at this time. But it is a question on which we may be called at this session to act as their representatives; and, as they have the right, as our constituents, to be heard on any question here, which in their opinion may affect the interests or the character of the country, we are bound to treat their complaints with great respect. If we are to err at all on so delicate a point as the right of petition involves, we had better err on the other side. Mr. S. then proceeded to examine the passages which had been alluded to as particularly disrespectful to the State of Georgia, and said that he considered the terms used as founded entirely on the hypothetical correctness of the conclusions which the petitioners had drawn from the documents to which they referred. But whether these terms were in any sense disrespectful to that State or not, he did not admit the right of the House to determine for the petitioners. If they treated the House itself with respect, it was all that the House had any right to require of them.

Mr. FOSTER, of Georgia, said it was little matter how much gentlemen may deplore the agitation and discussion of this question. They had got into it, and it was impossible for them to retreat. They might as well encounter it first as last. We have heard much, said Mr. F., on the constitutional impossibility of refusing to listen to this memorial, or rather argument, for he was in favor of calling things by their right names. Gentlemen were mistaken in the name which had been given to the instrument before them; but the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. MALLARY) had explained the whole matter. The paper is sent here, not only as a petition or memorial, but as an argument in opposition to the views expressed by the President on this subject, in his last Message to the House. For his own part, he, in common with others, had full confidence in the Committee on Indian Affairs; and he did not oppose the reference of the subject to them; but he was desirous of stripping it of its fictitious character. The many delicate terms made use of in the paper, in relation to the State of Georgia, and its policy, were sufficient indications of the motives which prompted it. It had become fashionable, he said, to lavish abuse upon Georgia and its policy, both in the newspapers and in popular assemblies, and she was now considered fair game—a fair mark for all the shafts of ribaldry; but he could say of that State, in the language of a distinguished individual on another occasion, the policy of Georgia “would stand the scrutiny of talents and of time.” The paper referred especially to the conduct of Georgia; the conduct of the sovereign State of Georgia, (he was glad to see that term had become more fashionable lately than it was two or three years ago,) in her internal relations—and contains threats of the vengeance of Heaven against her. Mr. F. said, if it was desirable that the sentiments contained in this document should come before this House, the gentlemen who advocated it could express them there without referring them to the committee. He said the weakest member from New York could enforce those sentiments as strongly as they were set forth in the document in question. Mr. F. here referred to the condition in which other States stood upon this subject; and said, if this sort of investigation was proper in relation to one State, it was equally applicable to others. But what, said he, would be thought of the citizens of Georgia, should they call upon New York to make restitution to the Indian tribes who once resided within her territory? The doctrine would be considered as monstrous; but now, said Mr. F., that the memorialists reside in the great commercial emporium, they are entitled to all deferential consideration; and it is matter of surprise that their right to interfere in the matter is questioned. Mr. F. concluded by repeating his dissent from opinions expressed in that House on the subject of the memorial.

Mr. AROHER feared that this question would produce a feeling in the House, mischievous, and prejudicial to the performance of the public business. He agreed with Mr. CAMBERLENG on the subject, but would say a word or two on the question which had been debated. It was said the memorial contained language disrespectful towards one of the States of the Union. He confessed he did not perceive it. He had read the petition, and did not find any thing disrespectful; and he quoted the language deemed exceptionable, to show that it was so. The memorial spoke merely of a hypothetical course of measures on the part of Georgia, which would lead to certain consequences, which the petitioners deemed grievous, and to be deprecated. It was the right of all men—not merely freemen, but all men, said Mr. A., to express their fears of what would grow out of an apprehended course of public measures.

This was a memorial of a respectable meeting of citizens—on what sort of a subject? Why, relative to Indian affairs. It would be their just right—no one would deny it—to address us on any of our foreign affairs, said Mr. A.; and should we think of meting out to them the ardor with which they should express themselves to us on that subject, or any other subject of public concern? He put it to the gentlemen of Georgia themselves, whether there was any part of the Union where the people would brook such an assumption by this House, if it were attempted in regard to a memorial from their own State. They were the last people in the Union by whom ardor of language on public topics should be rebuked. Mr. A. concluded by saying, that if the gentleman from South Carolina should press his motion to lay the memorial on the table, he, (Mr. A.,) though a Southern man himself, must object to it, and favor the reference of the petition.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that, if the discussion upon the matter were further prolonged, it was obvious that the presentation of petitions on the part of the States which had not yet been called over by the Speaker, must be deferred until Monday next, and thus a week's time be lost to the petitioners. He saw no prospect of utility from a continuation of the debate in the present stage of the affair; and he should therefore move the previous question.

The motion was sustained; and the main question recurred as to referring the memorial to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Upon this Mr. REED asked for the yeas and nays; but the call was not sustained, and the question was, upon a division, carried in the affirmative.

So the memorial was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

WEDNESDAY, January 18.

Distribution of Public Lands.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th of December ultimo, concerning a distribution of the public lands among the several States.

Mr. BURESS said, that whatever might aid education and extend intercourse among the people throughout the various parts of the country, always did, when brought to the consideration of the House, appear before its members attended by circumstances of deep and vital importance. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Vermont, (Mr. HUNT,) proposed to give such appropriation to some portion of the national funds, as would facilitate the operations of both these sources of national improvement. However desirous I may be to aid this proposition, said Mr. B., yet, feeling myself within the interdiction of that rebuke so graciously bestowed on a gentleman whose State had ceded no lands to the Union, I shall, first of all, offer some reasons why a representative from such a State may be permitted to mingle in any debate concerning a disposition of the public lands. It is true, Rhode Island neither did, nor could, in the great revolutionary conflict, make any cession of broad lands or more extensive claims, in aid of the war, or of the confederation. The great founder of that State was able to find no longer space than its very limited territory, wherein, for the first time, among all the kingdoms and colonies of this world, a Christian man might, at that time, obtain full permission "to hold forth a lively experiment, that a civil State could best stand and flourish with the utmost freedom, in religious concerns." Although Rhode Island could not do what more fortunate conditions enabled other States so liberally to perform, yet, in every great passage of arms, and in all which might illustrate patriotism or signalize valor, she stood in the very first rank of devotedness and achievement. History will continue to do justice to all the efforts of all the States in their revolutionary contest. Should it ever be otherwise, and the North become oblivious of these things, the honor and magnanimity of the South will not suffer them to be forgotten.

The lands comprehended in the resolution have been acquired by disbursements from the common funds of the nation. The history of your finances will disclose the several amounts contributed to these funds by the several States. New Orleans is the great port of entry for nearly the whole valley of the Mississippi. Since Louisiana became a part of the United States, and up to the year 1826, about fifteen millions of dollars have been paid into the United States Treasury by the collector of that district. If all the goods on which this revenue was collected were consumed in the States on the right and left banks of the great river, the division of this amount among those States will show, for twenty-three years, their several contributions to the national funds. Averaged upon the whole nine, the annual amount of each is about sixty thousand dollars. The little State of Rhode Island has, yearly, ever since becoming a member of this Union, contributed not less than four times that amount. If it be contended that those States have paid more, because they have consumed large amounts of commodities, brought coastwise to New Orleans, or over land from Atlantic ports, it may be replied that Rhode Island has likewise paid more, by consuming goods brought into that State by the same kind of trade. If this statement do not give an accurate view of the relative contributions of these States to the national funds, it will give, what it was intended to give, something like a sufficient reason for permitting Rhode Island to be heard on any question concerning lands acquired or purchased at the national cost.

Neither the patriotism nor the efforts of other States is drawn into question. In the revolution each of the "old thirteen" did all which courage could dare, liberality contribute, or unwearied labor perform. The new States, had they at that time been in existence, would not have deserted the cause, or dishonored the generous stock from which they are descended. Could the patriotism of our days be warmed by the spirit of those times, and every lip be purified by fire from the hallowed altar of the revolution, this debate might receive a new character; and in the generous strife for the general welfare, each State, not unmindful of our high character in former times, would struggle for pre-eminence in liberality of contribution. With as much of these feelings and principles as I can bring myself, and as much as I can invoke to my aid from others, I ask for the indulgence of this House while I go into some consideration of this amendment.

It may not be in order to consider the resolution itself, unless it can first be demonstrated that the amendment, if it prevail, will, in effect, destroy this resolution. If that can be evinced, then every argument in support of the resolution will be an argument against the amendment.

The resolution proposes "That a Select Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the net annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States and territories, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives." It is moved by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. MARTIN) to amend this resolution, so that the committee should further inquire "into the amount and value of the public lands which have been given by Congress to any State, or to any public institution in said State." The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. TEST) has, in debate on this subject, announced his intention to move an amendment to this amendment, should it prevail, to the intent that the same committee may further inquire, and report to this House, the whole amount expended for national purposes in all the other States.

Now, sir, can any proposition be contrived, more effectually calculated to subvert and destroy this resolution, than those contained in these proposed amendments? If the first prevail, the second will be offered; and, if justice govern the decisions of this House, it will as certainly be adopted. With these two amendments incorporated into this resolution, what Representatives, from what States, will be disposed to vote for it? Under the first branch of the amendment, your committee would be charged to inquire what quantity of public lands, and what amount of money, have, at any time, been granted to any of the new States. These must comprehend the reservations, whether of sections or townships, for primary, academic, or collegiate education; the grants, at various periods, for roads and canals; the expenditures for improving the navigation of rivers, together with the whole amount disbursed, during almost thirty years, on the great national highway from the Atlantic waters far into the Western States. If true to the principles of justice, and to the interests of the United States, though forgetful of their own, the gentlemen from the Western States can never vote for this resolution, so amended, as to induce a report upon such inquiries. Such a vote will acknowledge those States to be accountable for those grants and expenditures; and that their several portions of them ought to be charged upon their several annual dividends arising from the sales of public lands under the system proposed by this resolution. It can never be expected that men will ever be found in such hostility to their own interest, when uncalled to it by any great claims of justice. The representation from these States will, therefore, be found unanimous against the resolution, when thus amended.

The committee, under the second amendment, will look into all the old States. They must then take account of all expenditure, since the establishment of the Federal Government, made for national purposes. The items of this account will be all the numerous and heavy appropriations, from year to year, for clearing rivers and harbors; for the building of moles and breakwaters; for light-houses upon the whole coast; for custom-houses in every collection district; for armories, arsenals, fortifications, dock-yards, and naval stations, together with all other the immense and necessary expenditures for land or maritime defence, on the whole Atlantic frontier. What gentleman, representing any of these States, will sit here, and by his consent sanction this inquiry? The very supposition is preposterous. If, therefore, the amendment moved by the gentleman from South Carolina, and that suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, are adopted, the resolution will never be passed by this House. Place them upon it, and, like the asp on the bosom of the Egyptian queen, they will bring death with their contact.

Under this view of the question, the whole subject of the resolution, with all the reasons for adopting it, are so many arguments for consideration in discussing the amendment. This resolution places before the House, as upon a great chart, the public lands, the extensive national domain. The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. TERRY) has called our attention to a consideration of the manner of acquiring some parts of it. We are cautioned by him against appropriating these lands to any object which may come in conflict with the will of the donors, in their deeds of cession to the United States. Men may fairly differ concerning the pecuniary value of these cessions made by the several States; but no one, conversant with the history of our revolution, independence, and confederacy, can for a moment question their high and patriotic motives. Those motives ever have been, and always will, as I trust, be duly appreciated; nor shall any examination by me of the history and condition of those lands, either before or since their cession, deny to Virginia her merited pre-eminence in these deeds of devotedness to the union and interest of our common country.

We must not, however, imagine that the region covered by those cessions, and which is now separated into seven new States and two large territories, was, at the time of making them, any thing like so many millions of acres of fee simple, then in possession and at the disposal of the ceding States. Not a foot of all which is comprehended in those States, or in the proposed resolution, was then holden, or claimed to be holden, as land, as freehold, under any of its legal descriptions. The ceding States claimed, and they relinquished claims; but they neither claimed nor relinquished to the United States fee simple. The House will excuse me if I go into some history of this subject, when it is observed that gentlemen discuss this question, as if the United States had acquired by this cession, and for no valuable consideration, a title to many hundred millions of acres, then held by certain of the several States quietly, and in the very highest degree of ownership.

History does not authorize us to say that the sovereigns of Europe ever claimed soil and freehold in the New World by right of discovery. Navigators and travellers in the employment of those sovereigns discovered the several parts of this continent for their respective princes; and they, under those discoveries, claimed all the rights, whatever they may be, so acquired, to their own use, and to the exclusion of all other people and potentates. These claims always recognized the rights of the aboriginal owners of the country; and, however incompatible with those rights any project of colonization in North America might have been, no European prince, either temporal or spiritual, ever denied them. No one of these princes ever attempted to plant colonies by force of conquest. They claimed, by virtue of discovery, the exclusive right to purchase the soil of the primitive owners. This was, then, precisely what is now called the right of pre-emption. The acquisition of fee simple, in this country, by conquest, papal proclamation, or royal charter, was unknown in the theory of North American colonization. The charters of these sovereigns might sometimes convey less, but they never conveyed more, than this right of pre-emption. Under such charters, and by the exercise of this right, American land titles in our country, whatever they may be, have been acquired.

It will be recollected that the first charter was granted to the London Company by the Sovereign of England for the settlement of Virginia. This covered all the lands from Old Point Comfort, two hundred miles south, and two hundred miles north; and thence, "west and northwest, to the Pacific Ocean." A charter for the settlement of New England was soon after granted to the Plymouth Company, by the same power, and with still more extensive limits. It covered all the region, from the fortieth to the forty-eighth degree of north latitude, lying between the two great oceans which wash the shores of our continent. A subsequent charter, for settling the Southern States, was, in like manner, granted to another company. This extended, on the coast, from twenty-nine to thirty-six and a half degrees north latitude, and covers the whole region, from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

The opinions of the geographers and voyagers of those days should not be forgotten. They regarded these continents as narrow belts of land, obstructing their course to the much richer regions of the eastern India. Every bay and inlet was explored; and they thrust their ships into them, expecting to shoot through into the great Pacific Ocean. The English monarchs, who granted, and the companies who received, these charters, could never have expected that the States formed under them would contain more territory than they, at this time, actually cover. Nor was it believed that the prerogative of the English crown had exhausted its power to grant new charters, within the grants to those companies. The great right of pre-emption, or power to treat with the Indians for the title to lands, might be resumed, whenever the interests of the crown, or the colonies, should require such resumption. On this principle, the charters of all the colonies west of Connecticut, and within the charter of New England, were afterwards granted.

While the English colonies were forming under these charters, the French monarch had pushed his discoveries and settlements from the Gulf of St. Lawrence, up the river, to Quebec and Montreal, and from New Orleans almost to the source of the Mississippi. The condition of things produced by these events, both in Europe and America, excited between France and England, and between the American colonies, the war of 1756. It is well known that France claimed not only the whole pre-emption right of the whole territory north and west of New England, but also that of the entire region between the high lands and the Mississippi, on the left bank of that river, from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico. During that war, the famous family compact between the two great monarchs of the house of Bourbon was made, and brought to bear on the conflict.

The English colonies had a full view of this important controversy. They knew it involved the great question whether Englishmen should colonize and settle the whole region, from the Gulf of Mexico to Hudson's Bay, and from the ocean back to the fountains and stream of the Mississippi; or whether France and the colonists of France should be settled around throughout those extensive regions, and cut them off from the waters of the North and the West. Neither nation claimed the soil, except where colonies were established; but both did claim the right of discovery, pre-emption, and settlement. This great question of arms involved these claims and rights to one large part of the lands now under consideration; and the English colonies, making it a common cause with the mother country, sent into the field of conflict all their force and valor. It was a seven years' war, exhausting, bloody, and exterminating; for the colonies, on their part, contributed to it an army of twenty-five thousand men. All made their best and bravest efforts; but New England, never in arrears in the contribution of toil and blood, furnished full two-thirds of this army. The contest was terminated, the question forever settled by the treaty of Paris, in 1763. The crown of France relinquished to the crown of England all her North American claims. This relinquishment comprehended the French claim, by discovery or otherwise, to the right of pre-emption, in all the region now covered by the limits of the seven States on the left bank and in the valley of the Mississippi, and the two territories between the lakes and that river.

It should be remembered that no settlements had, at this time, been made by the Atlantic colonies, so far north as the great lakes, or so far west as the ridge of the Appalachian mountains; nor had, or did any of them, under their charters, claim the right of pre-emption to any of the lands bounded by those lakes and the Mississippi, or watered by the streams falling from those mountains into that river. The right was then claimed by the crown of England, as the head and sovereign of the British empire. This fact is established by the proclamation of that monarch, made and given by him, in council, on the 7th of October, 1763. Among other extensive colonial provisions, it announces that, "whereas it is just and reasonable, and essential to our interest and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them or any of them, as their hunting grounds; we do, therefore, with the advice of our privy council, declare it to be our royal will and pleasure, that no Governor or Commander-in-Chief, in any of our colonies or plantations in America, do presume for the present, and until our further pleasure be known, to grant warrant of survey, or pass patents for any lands beyond the head or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the west or northwest, or upon any lands whatever, which, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, as aforesaid, are reserved to the said Indians, or any of them."

The rights claimed, and the rules promulgated by this proclamation, have never been questioned by any of the colonies. They demonstrate and lay before the world the great principle and laws of Indian relations with the whole English race, whether with the British crown, the colonies, or the United States; and that, too, from the first settlement in our country up to the present hour. From that time to the commencement of the revolutionary war, in 1775, many and grievous were the impositions and injuries committed by the English Government against the claims and rights of the thirteen colonies. These colonies lacked neither the vigilance to see, nor the ability and spirit to set down in order, and to expose to the English nation and to the world the whole inventory of those injuries and impositions. Examine the entire catalogue, and you will find that the American patriots of those times have not exhibited one allegation against the crown, on account of those claims contained in that proclamation. Colonial vigilance had never discovered in them any infringement of colonial rights.

The Atlantic States, in their struggle for existence with Great Britain, faced the enemy, and kept a steady eye on their powerful adversary. They did not, they could not, look to the West, until success gave some pause to the conflict. After the declaration of independence, after the capture of Burgoyne, and after the treaty of amity and defence with France, the Continental Congress were called, by the minister of that power, then newly arrived in the United States, to deep and anxious consideration of the western boundary. That monarch, mindful of the Bourbon family compact of 1758, had contracted with his brother of Spain to conquer from Great Britain, by American arms, his claims to the western regions, relinquished by him in the treaty of Paris, to the English crown; and, having thus obtained all his former rights under those claims, to transfer the whole territory to the Spanish monarch, and thus unite in that crown the jurisdiction, together with the right of pre-emption and settlement, to the whole valley of the Mississippi, from its source to the Gulf of Mexico.

It is true, the States within the letter of whose chartered limits this territory lay, had, before this time, moved their claims in their legislative deliberations; but this had ever been done with a patriotic view to ulterior measures in favor of the whole confederacy. In Congress it had been looked at as one of the results of a successful conflict with England. Without knowledge of the arrangement of France and Spain, Ministers had been sent to both these powers, to negotiate for aids in the war; but, at the same time, to claim for the United States the centre of the great river as their western boundary.

Among the States, the relinquishment of State claims to the Western territory had, with some of them, become a sine qua non to the Union; and unless this was done, protests were entered against the articles of confederation. Congress, on the 6th September, 1780, "Resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to such of those States which have claims to the Western country, to pass such laws, and give their delegates in Congress such powers, as may remove the only obstacle to a final ratification of the articles of confederation." In furtherance of this object, Congress, on the 10th of the following October, "Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States; and be settled, and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States." These resolutions of Congress finally resulted in such measures in the several States "which had claims to the Western country," that all those claims, under certain reservations, have been by them ceded to the United States for the great objects of those resolutions.

Before these events, and while the war was in progress, the French Minister had placed before Congress the right of his royal master to reconquer from the British crown the "Western country," for himself and the king of Spain, and had insisted on that right, because that country was a part of the British empire, and a fair subject of conquest. Congress replied, in a most able paper, said to have been drawn up by Mr. Madison, that France had, by the treaty of 1763, relinquished all right in that country to the British king, as the sovereign of the British empire in America, and to the use of his British subjects in America, and not to the use of such subjects in Europe. The United States had by the revolution succeeded to all those rights, and that, therefore, any claim of France or Spain to that country would not be a claim against Britain, their common enemy, but against the United States, their friend and ally. Notwithstanding the unanswerable force of these arguments, France and Spain persisted in their claims, and the Spanish court would not receive the American Minister. In this condition of our affairs, so anxious were some of the States to obtain the aids expected from that monarch, and to secure, if possible, the independence of the United States, as then settled and limited, that Virginia, to induce Spain to come into our alliance, did, in the year 1780, instruct her delegates in Congress to procure an amendment of the instruction to Mr. Jay, directing him to relinquish the western boundary, and the right to navigate the Mississippi. France was unwearied in her efforts to procure a relinquishment, by the United States, to all claims to the Western country; and at last prevailed on Congress, in their final instructions to their Ministers in Europe, to add, in reference to the French Ministers, the following words: "And ultimately to govern yourselves by their advice and opinion." This clause was adopted by all the States, except Delaware, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. These States would vote for nothing which might impair our claims to the Western country, and the navigation of the Mississippi.

From these instructions, fortunately for this country, our Ministers dared to depart. Had they concluded nothing without the knowledge of the king and Ministers of France, and "ultimately been governed by their advice and opinion," the western boundary of the United States would have been fixed on the highest ridge of the Alleghany mountains; and the whole "Western country" again placed under the jurisdiction and control of the Bourbon family. The English Government, aware of this, and preferring us as neighbors to their northern colonies, let the fact be known to the American Ministers; and Adams, Jay, and Franklin, without being governed by the advice and opinion of the royalty of France, first had and obtained, did immediately, with the English commissioners, make and execute a provisional treaty, not only acknowledging our independence, but establishing the great river as a western boundary. This event, when communicated by Dr. Franklin to the Count de Vergennes, produced his angry letter, disclosing, at once, the policy and intentions of France on the great boundary question; and the reply of Franklin evinced how far the American philosopher excelled the French courtier, not only in sound policy, but likewise in "a point of bienséance."

The House has been detained by this historical sketch, that a full demonstration might be placed before us, of the exact political condition of the "Western country," in relation, not only to the colonies, but also to the European powers, from the time when it was claimed by France, to the date of our definitive treaty with England, by which all claim to it was, as I trust, forever relinquished by those powers to the United States. By this it appears that the whole claim was a claim to the right of pre-emption and settlement, whether vested in France, England, the colonies, or our whole nation; and it moreover appears that this claim, once vested in England, by the common consent, and to the use of all the colonies, afterwards devolved on them collectively by the revolution, and as a necessary appurtenance of independence, won by the common blood and treasure of them all. Within the limits defined by our treaty with Great Britain, all things whatever, which had theretofore been vested in the British crown, were, by our independence, ipso facto vested in the United States, to the sole use of the American people; and that treaty did neither more nor less than acknowledge that fact, and establish a solemn covenant between the parties, to govern themselves accordingly. The patriots of those times in each State not only acknowledged this great principle, but contended for it. The cessions of the several States never conveyed, and were never intended to convey, any right to the United States, not already vested in them.

These cessions were nevertheless made upon great and patriotic considerations, worthy of the times, and the men who made them. They were each of them parts of a great system of accord and satisfaction, made and executed to strengthen the Union, by extinguishing forever all State claims to the right of pre-emption and settlement in the "Western country," and thus leave the United States in the unquestionable exercise of all the rights, in that respect, acquired by our revolution and independence. The reservations made by any of the States do not controvert, but confirm, these principles. Provision for these had been made by Congress, in their resolution of October, 1780. Under the principle of that resolution, the ceding States might and did reserve so much interest in the territory so relinquished, as would cover any expenditure by them made upon it.

By the principles of the revolution, vested with the great right of pre-emption and settlement, and by the cessions of the several States, disencumbered of any conflicting claim, the United States have gone into the exercise of that right, for the common benefit of all the Union. They have by treaties, at various times, made with the Indians, the owners of the soil, purchased it of them for a valuable consideration, either in hand paid, or by annuities stipulated to be paid to them in coming years. By this process, the United States have changed what was, in 1783, in them a mere right of pre-emption, into a clear and unquestionable title of soil and freehold throughout almost the whole of that extensive region, divided into seven States and two territories. Large tracts of these lands, so acquired, have been sold and conveyed to the people of those States and territories; and many grants made to them for public purposes, to encourage settlement, and thereby enhance the value of lands remaining unsold, as a common fund, and for the common benefit of the whole nation. These lands, so remaining, are one part of the subject now under consideration.

Another part of the national domain was obtained by purchase from Spain under what is commonly called the Florida treaty. It is pleasant to look back, and call up the course of events which put the nation in possession of the "Western country." This was the purchase of our first, and, I trust in God, it may be the pledge of our perpetual union. Every man in the nation paid his share of the price. We were united and equal in the toil and the success. In the name of justice, I wish we could so regard our acquisition of territory from Spain. That nation, stately and dilatory in every thing; slow even in her revenge; but magnificent in purpose, and just, when, having gone through all the forms, she arrives at the time of doing justice; that nation, I say, did ample justice to this; when, after years and years of delay, she remunerated our country for depredations committed by herself and her colonies, on property owned, and long claimed, by citizens of the United States. Justice, ample, magnificent justice, was done by Spain in that treaty; but unfortunately it was done, not to those citizens claiming, and of right entitled to receive it. No, sir; it was done to the United States, the agents and trustees of those citizens. The lands ceded to the United States by that treaty are immense, and of unknown value. The mere territorial jurisdiction, acquired by that cession on the east side of the Mississippi, would have been a cheap purchase for the United States, at five millions of dollars. Would you sell it, sir, for twice that sum?

The United States, by that treaty, sold and relinquished to Spain all the claims of American citizens for all depredations committed by Spanish subjects on their property. Had our country covenanted, in the same instrument, to remunerate those citizens for such depredations, justice might have been done. This was the intention of Spain, and this must have been the intention of the United States. The supposition that those depredations could not exceed five millions, and the limiting remuneration to that amount, and the time of seeking it to so short a period, have brought on those citizens extensive and flagrant injustice. Permit me, sir, to demonstrate this assertion. Nearly all these depredations had been done before 1807. In June, 1824, when the time of receiving claims had expired, and the five millions were distributed, the interest, on that amount of claims allowed, exceeded the principal. It is evident, therefore, that, though five millions were paid, much more than five millions were left unpaid. I pass over all those claims, excluded for want of time, within the limits of the treaty. Their amount is several millions. Not less than two hundred thousand dollars were by this lost to me and those with whom I was concerned. One claim, half a million, eminently just, and distressing in its circumstances, has been before this House. It was the fruit and the reward of a life of toil, peril, and disaster in Spain; but by these limitations, and by the manner prescribed for conducting such claims, it was lost, and a very meritorious family are left dependent and destitute.

It is therefore seen that the common funds of the nation did not purchase one-half of Florida, and the other extensive regions obtained by this treaty from Spain. If justice be denied to the merchants of the Atlantic cities, from Maine to Georgia, whose funds purchased two-thirds of these territories, I pray you, sir, do not refuse to their States which have lost, with them, the benefit of this large capital; do not, I say, refuse to them a just and reasonable share in the common benefits resulting to the United States from this purchase.

The other division of the public lands was acquired by negotiations with France. They comprehend the whole region conveyed in the cession of Louisiana. In treaties connected with this cession, the United States contracted to pay to France, and for her use, eighty millions of francs; and virtually to relinquish all claims of American citizens on that Government for all demands prior to April 30th, 1800. One-fourth of this amount was agreed to be paid to such of those citizens as had claims of a certain description, and who should prove their right of recovery in one year from the date of the treaty. By this arrangement, the United States received from France an immense country, in jurisdiction and in fee simple, together with the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi, and all its western tributary streams. For this the United States paid fifteen millions of dollars in money, and relinquished to France, I will not say as much, but certainly one-half as much more, in claims due before April, 1801, from France to American citizens. Nor is this all. In the Louisiana treaty of cession, the United States contract to admit the vessels of France into the ports of that State, on the terms of the most favored nation. Under this stipulation, France claims to be admitted on the same terms as British vessels, but without paying for it the equivalent paid by the British Government, the admission of American vessels into French ports on the like conditions. Under this claim, and because the United States will not so admit French vessels, the French Government, by way of offset, have hitherto refused indemnity to American citizens for all the spoliation committed by their armed vessels on the property of our merchants since April, 1800. It has thus come to pass, that Louisiana, though on the face of the contract costing the nation but fifteen millions of dollars, has actually been purchased by a further sum of twenty millions, paid by American merchants. With what justice, then, can gentlemen contend that the Atlantic States are not entitled to call, and call loudly, for something like an equal apportionment of the benefits resulting from those lands, when the property of their merchants has been so largely sacrificed for the purchase of them?

The resolution of the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. HUNT) covers the public lands comprehended in these three great divisions, and proposes, without looking back to the cost of acquisition, or any expenditure for improving their value, to introduce and establish a system, which will give, to each State and territory, a share of the proceeds of annual sales, in proportion to its congressional representation. It is intended, by the amendment, to inquire concerning, and to take account of, all such dispositions of any of these lands, and all such expenditure of money, as may have been made to any of those several States and territories throughout the whole region.

The people of the United States have, sir, from the close of the revolutionary war till this hour, looked on the public lands as their own, and equally the soil and freehold and inheritance of each and every one of them. This claim has been kept alive and invigorated by reminiscence of its common origin, and endeared by the various and multiplied appropriations from year to year by us made, as well for them, to their use, as for the universal benefit of this great national inheritance. When, therefore, their title is disturbed, their ownership questioned, and that, too, by brothers of the same family, how will you quiet the controversy? Will the people of the old States quit claim to the people of the new; and that in sight of the graves of their fathers, who won this region as a heritage for all their descendants? Why should they, recreant to their illustrious ancestry, disinherit themselves and their children? Be assured, sir, they will not, while man is man, and earth is his abiding place. Let, then, every effort be made to put this question at rest, in peace and by fair and honest legislation. It may otherwise remain for adjustment, by a process, and in a tribunal over whose record the historian shall shudder as he looks at the legend.

Should it come, and without something like the proposed measure, it may come to the "trial by battle;" should it come to that trial, who will live to say the world ever witnessed such a strife of arms? The visions of fiction have sometimes arrayed against each other the most endeared relations. Here those visions shall be embodied and embattled. Not only these long United States shall sunder, and State against State fly to arms, but brother and brother, father and son, meet in exterminating hostility. Eye to eye, or hand to hand, with no exchange of greeting but the rifle—no salutation but the sword. In such a war, shall not the last red man, who fell by bullet or bayonet, lift his head from the gory sod, and gaze and die with grim delight, while looking on those whom he regards as the spoilers of his race, mingling their blood in impious butchery, on the very grounds of his fathers, and in a most unholy struggle for his and their plunder? In the noise of war and slaughter, imagination shall hear the long buried warriors, the Metacams, the Miantinomos of other fields again mingling their war whoop with the cry of the white man's battle. Men shall see, or seem to see, grim spirits, the chiefs and warriors of other days, approaching from their blessed hunting grounds, in the far off West, or, if driven thence, from "some happier island in the watery waste," horsed on their own clouds in red brigades, "visiting again the glimpses of our moon, and making the night of war and conflagration more horribly hideous."

Once more, sir, and I have done. If this amendment do not prevail, and this resolution is adopted, the provisions of it, when finally adjusted and carried into full operation, will mightily strengthen the Union. For this purpose the sessions of it were originally made. It has been said, a national debt, divided and distributed to all its owners over the country, does form a cord of Union not easily broken. It may be so; but what is that to the almost infinite number of cords, lines, and filaments, which will, by the provisions of this system, be wound around and unite us together! Distribute to the several States the annual proceeds of the public lands, and, on its way thither, it will make the straight way broad, the rough road smooth. Travel and transportation by our present vehicles will be cheap and expeditious. When we have introduced into our country the inventions already in operation in others, movement from place to place may be so rapid, and exchange of social and hospitable intercourse between different parts of the whole country will become so easy and frequent, that men will almost forget that their homes are in different States, and become really and in fact citizens of the United States of one great republic. By roads, by railways, or by canals, by land, or by water, the produce of any part may, cheaply and with expedition, be placed in the market of any other.

Distribute to every State a fund for education, and it will be divided and subdivided into streams, until it shall reach every town, every village, every plantation, farm, and family, throughout the United States. Let the people once taste of these refreshing streams, and they will look up to the United States, the beneficent source, and regard them with delight and veneration. They would turn their thoughts to them, as the inhabitants of ancient Egypt did theirs towards the fountains of the Nile; and, though not with adoration, yet surely as to the dispensers of the blessings of Heaven.

When this system shall have gone into full operation over all the land, and but one generation has been cultivated and grown up under its fertilizing nature, no demagogue will ever rise up in our country hardy and desperate enough to divert or obstruct the current of its progress. Should a man, in aftertime, on this floor, move to appropriate a single dollar of this fund to any other purpose, he would be hissed through the country by one united cry of abhorrence from every man, woman, and child in the nation.

If, therefore, the United States would make the inhabitants of every distinct district of our territory one people, a nation, united, great, wealthy, and prosperous, let them provide, and put into successful operation in every State, appropriate funds for internal improvement. If our country would render her union and existence perpetual; if she would place deep and broad the foundations of her prosperity; if she would distinguish herself eminently above all other nations of this or any other time; then let her draw high example from Divine benignity, call little children around her, take them in her arms, and bless them with the lessons of pure, early, and efficient instruction.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 14.

Distribution of Public Lands.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th December ultimo, proposing a distribution of the net proceeds of sales of public lands among the several States.

The question occurred on the motion made by Mr. MARTIN, on the same day, to amend the said resolution.

Mr. PERCIE, of Missouri, said: Were he to consult his own feelings, or his own individual interests on this floor, he should not trouble the House with one word more on this subject. But, (said Mr. P.,) when I see a measure pressed with all the powers of argument and of eloquence, the consequences of which will, in my opinion, be highly injurious to the State which I have the honor to represent—a measure which addresses itself to the cupidity of the people of the old States—to the worst as well as the best passions of the human heart—a scheme, whose tendency is to mislead and corrupt the public mind, to cripple the West, and to fix a system of intolerable oppression upon the new States—I should be recreant to the interests of those whom I serve, faithless to the new States and to my own principles, if I did not raise my voice against it. These considerations constrain me to throw myself upon the indulgence of the House, and to solicit their patient attention to the views which I shall present in relation to this interesting subject. Sir, when this resolution was first offered, I was not disposed to engage in a discussion of its merits. Considering it as looking to an inquiry alone, I preferred to forbear making any opposition until something more specific and of a more serious character should be presented to the House. The friends of this scheme have, however, thought proper to enter into a general argument upon its merits, and have left us no alternative but that of abandoning the contest, or of at once meeting them in debate. They have done more, sir. With the intention, as it would seem, of forestalling public opinion, of gaining the “vantage ground,” and of inducing a belief that their arguments were unanswerable, they have intimated that those opposed to the resolution were directing their attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. MARTIN,) but decline arguing the main question involved. Sir, I meet that question: I cannot say I meet it boldly, for I know the argumentative powers and the eloquence of the various interests which this resolution draws to its support. But I meet it in the full confidence of the correctness of the principles upon which I rely; and indulging a hope that, if I fail to convince this House, an intelligent, just, and patriotic people will render a proper decision of the question, I take leave, in the outset, to repel the imputation attempted to be cast upon those who oppose the resolution, that they are influenced by selfish considerations. The people whom I represent desire no unfair advantages. They ask for nothing but their just and equal rights, and these they are determined to maintain. I trust that my conduct on this floor will not only prove that I request no more, but that, in the discussion of every question here, I shall meet gentlemen in that spirit of candor and of fairness which should characterize the representation of an honest and patriotic people. Sir, I will most sincerely pray, with the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. BUNSWICK,) that we may catch the spirit of magnanimity, of concession, of forbearance, and of disinterestedness, which animated and influenced the fathers of the Revolution. I will go with him to the altar of patriotism erected by them, and there freely sacrifice every feeling, either selfish or sectional—I will pray that the common interests of our common country, of our whole country, may alone influence us in all our deliberations. Sir, I had hoped that that gentleman had long since made this sacrifice—I had hoped to consider the gentleman as one of the connecting links in that bright chain which connected us with our liberal and patriotic ancestors.

Sir, from what has fallen from gentlemen in this debate, from what I have ascertained of the views of members on the subject under consideration, I have been astonished, and a little amused, too, to find gentlemen of all sorts of political opinions supporting this resolution. Yes, sir: I find those who maintain the power in the General Government of making roads and canals, and of providing for a general system of education, supporting it. I find some of those who deny this power supporting it; and I see that description of politicians who are in favor of a compound basis of construction. I mean those who are for splitting the difference between the demands for power on the one side, and the denials on the other, also rallying in its support. I find another description of politicians supporting it; those who express doubts as to the constitutional power of Congress to make donations of the public lands for any purpose, but who think it perfectly clear that we have the power to distribute the net proceeds of the public lands among the several States for the purposes of internal improvement and of education. Not the least amusing of all are the opinions of those who think that we have no power to distribute the surplus revenue (if there should ever be any) among the several States, for the purposes mentioned, but who also think we have the power to distribute for the same purposes the proceeds arising from the sales of the public lands. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) takes a distinction. He tells us there is a manifest distinction between the two cases; but he has not thought fit to point it out. Sir, what that distinction is, I cannot conjecture; but if there be a distinction at all, it is against the gentleman, as I shall presently show. When the money arising from the sales of the public lands is paid into the Treasury, how will the gentleman distinguish it from the other funds of the Government? Has it ear-mark? Can he show that the constitution gives us greater power over one description of funds than it has over another? Sir, the framers of the constitution found it necessary not to restrict the power of Congress in getting money into the Treasury, but they have limited the power as to their getting money out of the Treasury. They granted the power of appropriating money for the purpose of carrying into effect the powers of the Government. And I think it fair to presume that this limitation was intended as a check upon Congress, to prevent them from oppressing the people by unnecessary taxation. It was doubtless considered, that, if the power of appropriating money should be limited, there was no necessity of restricting Congress as to the quantum of revenue to be raised. Sir, the doctrine is held, that Congress can appropriate money for any purpose, even for purposes over which it is acknowledged they have no control. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to apply this doctrine to the case under consideration, but denies its force in relation to the distribution of the surplus revenue. Now, admitting for the sake of argument, that Congress has the power to distribute the surplus revenue arising from imports or direct taxation if you please, among the several States for the purposes of internal improvement and education, it by no means follows that they have the power to distribute the proceeds of the public lands for these purposes. In the acts of cession made to the United States by Virginia and North Carolina, are the provisions expressed, "that all the lands so ceded to the United States shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederacy, Virginia and North Carolina inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other purpose whatever." The same is strongly implied in the cessions made by other States. At the time of making these cessions, each State had to contribute its share in the general charge and expenditure of the confederacy. These lands were then ceded for the common benefit, and for the purpose of raising funds for the support of the Government, so as to diminish the sum required by each to supply the common treasury. The proceeds of these lands are consequently directly pledged as a fund out of which to defray the expenses of the then existing Government; and I ask if, under the old confederation, it would have been competent for Congress to have distributed these funds for the purposes named in the resolution now under consideration? If not, can it be pretended that Congress under the present constitution has greater powers in relation to these lands than it had during the confederation? Can they change the objects of the grant? If they cannot, what becomes of the distinction spoken of by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

I have alluded to the conflicting opinions of the supporters of this resolution, not with a view of pressing an argument on constitutional grounds, but with the intention of throwing gentleman back on their original principles, with a view of showing a reasonable ground for my apprehensions that the friends of this measure are more influenced by feelings of interest than by their unbiassed judgment. Has the time come, sir, when we are to blot out and begin anew? Are the principles of all parties to be abandoned in this scramble for the public treasure? Are the honest opinions of the people to be brought up by the miserable pittance arising from the sales of the public lands? Sir, whenever this Government shall be destroyed—whenever this blessed Union shall be divided, (and the gentleman from Rhode Island says he expects it will be some time next summer,) whenever tyranny or anarchy shall be our portion, the faithful historian will trace the cause of such a calamity to schemes like this—to schemes which tend to corrupt the principles and feelings of the good people of this Union by the money of the General Government. I can conceive of no state of things more dangerous than that which will find the people of these States looking to the Treasury of the General Government alone, expecting from that source to be fed, clothed, and educated; and ready to surrender all their principles, constitutional and moral, for the accomplishment of their objects. The time seems already come, when gentlemen, in the language of the member from North Carolina, (Mr. FORREX,) are determined to get their share of every dollar in the public Treasury.

The opponents of this resolution have asked why this measure is pressed upon us, while the whole subject of distributing the surplus revenue among the States has been submitted for inquiry to a Standing Committee of this House? We have received no answer. Sir, I rejoice, and I hope the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. BURGESS) will rejoice with me, that the President has directed our attention to the principles upon which this Government is founded. I am glad that he has reminded us that there were limitations on the Government—for I fear that some of us would otherwise have forgotten it. We hear urged that these lands were pledged for the payment of the national debt, and have asked why this subject is pressed before that debt shall have been paid—whether gentlemen intend to prevent the payment of this debt? We are told, in reply, that they do not expect to make the distribution until that debt shall have been paid; but they desire to have an inquiry made by a committee. Sir, I think I understand gentlemen. I admire their skillful tactics: they desire to bring the subject before the public; to examine the direct interests of the people; to speak of grand plans of internal improvement and of education; to sound the tocsin that the new States are about to take all the public lands, when they were purchased by the "common blood and treasure of the country;" and in this way to excite a prejudice which will demand that the distribution shall be immediately made. The supporters of the resolution will then have accomplished the double object of preventing in part the payment of the public debt of fixing upon the new States a system of grinding oppression in relation to these lands, and that of preventing any liberal mode being adopted for disposing of these lands.

The people of the new States have a just ground of complaint, that this Government is more close and rigid, in regard to the disposition of these lands, than any other Government on earth. They justly contend that the Government had lost sight of the chief object, that of settling the country, and looks mainly to the money that is to be made from its own citizens. We ask you to give us relief from a system which annually drains the new States of their circulating medium—a system which will forever keep them poor. Although the graduation has been by the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. BURENS) anathematized in its very birth, we respectfully press the justice of that measure. We ask that the minimum price of the lands may be suited to their quality, or that a reduction may be made; but we pray you not to adopt the principle of this resolution. If this be done, it will be considered the interests of the people of the old States not only to relax their present system, but to adopt one more onerous. They will force their representatives here to act as a set of heartless speculators, wringing from the poor cultivator of the soil the last cent of his earnings. It is in vain that gentlemen say to us, adopt this our system of distribution, and we will give you a liberal system of disposing of these lands. We know that when their system shall have been fixed upon us, we cannot escape. According to the famous report of the committee at the last session, "a more rigid economy" will be then adopted in regard to these lands. Yes, sir, I am one of those that fear that the main objects of the prime movers and supporters of this resolution are to fix upon us this rigid economy, to prevent the growth and settlement of the new States, and to keep their population at home.

On the 6th September, 1780, a Committee of the Congress reported, and the report was adopted, "That it appears more advisable to press upon those States which can remove the embarrassments respecting the Western territory, a liberal surrender of a portion of their territorial claims, since they cannot be preserved entire without endangering the stability of the confederacy; to remind them how indispensably necessary it is to establish the Federal Union on a fixed and permanent basis, and on principles acceptable to all its respective members; how essential to public credit and confidence, to the support of our army, to the vigor of our councils, and success of our measures; to our tranquillity at home, our reputation abroad; to our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people; that they are fully persuaded the wisdom of the respective legislatures will lead them to a full and impartial consideration of a subject so interesting to the United States, and necessary to a happy establishment of the Federal Union."

A resolution was then adopted, urging the States to make the cession. Now, sir, can any man read this report without the reflection arising, that if the holding of extensive territories by any of the States endangered the confederacy, and made it unacceptable to all its respective members, that the same inequality now existing among the States should strongly plead in favor of any measure which should give all the States the right of soil to the public lands within their respective limits. If the inequality then endangered our tranquillity, "our very existence as a free, sovereign, and independent people," will not a like inequality now be attended with the same imminent danger? And does not this report afford powerful arguments to show that the new States should, in fact, be placed upon an equal footing with the old States? But this is not all, sir.

On the 10th October, 1780, and before any State had made a cession of its territory, the Congress, with a view of offering inducements to the making of these cessions, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States."

Here is a direct pledge that the lands shall be settled, and yet the main object of the Government seems to be to sell them for the highest price. Here is a solemn assurance that the territory shall be formed into distinct republican States, having the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States; and yet the other States have, and always have had, the right of soil in every foot of public land within their limits, and the new States are deprived of this right. Call you this equality in sovereignty, freedom, and independence? Is it admitted that the new States can extend their taxing power as far as the old States can extend their power of taxation? Is not the power of taxing all the property within the State, one of the essential rights of sovereignty in any State? The new States are deprived of this power; the old States possess it; and yet it is pretended that the new States have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the old States. Sir, the argument is preposterous; it strikes the mind of every man as fallacy, a mere delusion, to contend that, under circumstances like these, there is an equality of sovereignty.

I will refer to another act of the old Congress, to show their opinion upon a question like this. Yes, sir, I will refer to the principles of that Congress, although we seem to be much wiser than they. Would to God we were so, in truth and in fact; would to God we were half so disinterested, half so patriotic, half so pure. Sir, if some of us had caught the mantle of those departed worthies, we should seldom be found engaged in sectional conflicts. We should show ourselves worthy descendants of worthy ancestors. In 1778, the States of Rhode Island and of New Jersey objected to that article of the confederation, which provided "that no State shall be deprived of its territory for the benefit of the United States." These States offered amendments, going to vest in the United States the title to all the lands in every State which belonged to the crown at the commencement of the revolution. They urged then, as the supporters of this resolution urge now, that as these lands were acquired by the united efforts of all the States, they should belong equally to all the States. That as they were acquired by the "blood and treasure" of the whole country, they should be disposed of for the common benefit of the whole country. The Congress, however, negatived the proposition. Now what are we to suppose were the principles of the Congress? Are we not irresistibly led to the conclusion that Congress considered it would be improper, unwise, and unequal, that the Federal Government should hold the right of soil to the public lands within any State; that such a course would interfere with the sovereignty of the States. This idea is irresistible, when we take into consideration the fact, that the proposition from Rhode Island and New Jersey was so modified as not to interfere with the jurisdiction of the respective States over public lands within their limits. This, then, is a full answer to the arguments of those who insist that, as we have the jurisdiction over these lands, we have all the essential rights of sovereignty. The old Congress did not think so; and every man must at once see that there is a material difference.

North Carolina ceded a great extent of territory, making, however, many provisions in her own favor; and the territory so ceded has been chiefly appropriated to the citizens of that State who settled in Tennessee, and who had military land claims in the latter State. The General Government has received but little, if any, pecuniary interest from the cession. Will the people of North Carolina, under these circumstances, support this resolution? Can they support it without abandoning their constitutional principle, and without giving up their character for disinterestedness and liberality? I think not, sir. The State of Georgia ceded her territory, it is true; but it was for a fair consideration paid. The lands recently acquired by the United States for the State of Georgia are about to be equally divided among her citizens without charge. Will she support this resolution? I know she cannot. The State of Virginia, if her good old principles permitted her, might, without reproach, insist on a share of the public lands. This State, as has been justly said, always foremost in acts of magnanimity, generosity, and patriotism, will not for any consideration, much less for the paltry one of a few thousand dollars, abandon her principles, and unite in a system which is to corrupt the best principles and sentiments of the people.

Sir, is it just or equitable that this division should be made according to representation in this House? Is it fair that we should look to the present generation alone, and not to posterity at all? The State of Missouri is nearly equal in territorial extent to the whole of New England. She is capable of sustaining a population equally great. You sell all the public lands in the new States in a few years; Missouri gets one-fortieth part as much as New England; education and internal improvements are well provided for in New England, but better aided in Missouri; and the fund is gone. How is Missouri in after times to be placed on an equal footing with the New England States? The inequality is much more glaring, when we again look to the State of New York. This State reserved all the crown lands within her limits; she retained that great, fertile, and extensive country towards her western frontier. She has sold it and settled it, and thereby gained an immense population. This population, having grown up on a part of the public domain, and which they used for their own benefit, now comes in for an equal share of the residue. Sir, this State should be amongst the last in this Union to press this measure. It is unjust, unequal, and inequitable. The same remarks will well apply to Connecticut, to Massachusetts, and to Maine.

But to return to the resolution. I have said that, if this plan be carried into effect, the people of the new States may bid adieu to the prospect of ever having the title of the United States extinguished. We shall then have the rigid system of public speculators fixed upon us; we shall then have sales of alternate sections made, so that the sale and improvement of one may enhance the value of the other. Sir, while gentlemen have been indulging in their fine feelings of philanthropy—while they are pressing this resolution forward, with a view of disseminating useful knowledge among the people, I am surprised that a little consideration should not have been bestowed on the thousands of poor non-freeholders in the several States, and in the old States, too. Would not they gladly settle and improve your wild lands? You cannot, forsooth, enable them to acquire a home by reducing the price of the public lands, and thus elevate them to the rank of the most useful and happy citizens; but you propose to educate them in poverty and starvation, and thus you sharpen their sensibilities, and make them less able to sustain themselves under their own insignificance and degradation. When we reflect on these things, sir, is it unreasonable to suspect that gentlemen are desirous of emptying the public Treasury, so that they may fill it in a way more to their liking? May we not well suppose, with the gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. LEWIS,) that the friends of this resolution know there is in this Union a tax-paying people, and then a tax-consuming people? May we not tremble for the principles of our Government when we see appeals to that description of population to support this measure, who will support it because one dollar is paid into one pocket without considering that two are taken out of the other? But the other day the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. RICHARDSON,) to undertake a system of education by this Government, was rejected upon the ground, as we all supposed, that the Government had no power over the subject. So soon, however, as a division of money among the States is proposed to effect the same object, gentlemen turn immediately round in its support. They are willing to do indirectly what they dare not do directly.

Sir, if there be gentlemen here who desire to ease the Treasury of its masses of wealth, I beg leave to recommend that they pay the just claims upon this Government. If they are at any loss to know what is to be done with their money, I point them to the war-worn soldier of the Revolution, and say, pay that debt of justice and of gratitude. Sir, when I see a poor old soldier of the Revolution penniless, homeless, comfortless; when I listen to his tales of heroic valor, and witness the ardor of his patriotism, and, at the same time, reflect on the wild, splendid, and expensive schemes of this Government, I have turned away with a bleeding heart, and blushed for the honor of my country.

Another reflection has occurred to me. I look upon the system proposed to be established by this resolution, as an anti-emigration system—a system which is intended to check the growth of the West. Has it come to this, sir? We have had American systems—anti-slavery systems—and systems the Lord knows what; and now we are to have an anti-emigration system to cripple the West, and to prevent the poor of the East from going to the West, and cultivating the fertile lands of the West. Money is to be divided among them at home—they are to be educated at home, and, I suppose, starve at home. Do you fear the increased and increasing power of the West? I hope not. That power is your power; it is the power of the whole country, and should not be feared by any part.

Sir, I have done. I have spoken what I believe.

Vol. X.—40

Heved to be the sentiments of the people whom I serve. I believe they cannot be bought up in the support of this resolution by any sum, much less the paltry and pitiful sum which would fall to their share under this distribution. I beg pardon of the committee for thus detaining them. But coming, as I do, from a new State—being the sole representative of a new State, whose interests I think are vitally interested, I felt myself constrained to enter into this discussion.

The Judiciary.

The bill establishing Circuit Courts and abridging the jurisdiction of the District Courts in the districts of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Mississippi, the eastern district of Louisiana, and the Southern district of Alabama, being under consideration,

Mr. BUCHANAN rose, and said:

Mr. Chairman: It becomes my duty to present to this committee the reasons which induced the Committee on the Judiciary to report the bill to the House which has just been read. In rising to discharge this duty, I feel conscious that the subject is in its nature dry and uninteresting; but its importance demands the attention of every member of this committee. In vain may we pass the most wise and salutary laws, unless we provide an efficient judiciary to carry their blessings and their benefits home to the people. Without such a judiciary, they remain a dead letter upon our statute book.

This bill proposes no new theory—no untried experiment. It pursues the course which has been sanctioned by long experience. The Committee on the Judiciary did not seek to be wiser than those who have gone before us. This bill, therefore, provides nothing new for the old States of the Union. It merely extends to the new Western States that judicial system which has been found to be fully adequate to administer justice to all the States east of the Alleghany.

Before I proceed to illustrate the necessity of this measure, it is perhaps proper that I should briefly present to the committee some of the prominent points of the judicial history of the United States. Our present system was called into existence by the judicial act of September, 1789; and it demonstrates the wisdom and sagacity of the Congress of that day, that they should, at the very first attempt, have adopted a system, which, with but few alterations, has stood the test of an experience of forty years. Under that act the United States was divided into thirteen districts, for each of which a district judge was appointed, who was required to reside therein, and to hold a court to be called a district court. These district courts were entirely independent of each other. Eleven of these thirteen districts, consisting of the eleven States which were then members of the Union, were divided into three circuits. These were called the eastern, the middle, and the southern circuits. The eastern circuit was composed of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York; the middle, of the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia; and the southern, of the States of South Carolina and Georgia. The remaining districts of Maine and Kentucky, not then members of the Union, were not embraced in any circuit; but their district courts were invested with the powers of a circuit court.

Under this act, the Supreme Court of the United States consisted of a chief justice and five associate justices.

In each district of these three circuits, a circuit court was directed to be held twice in each year, to be composed of any two justices of the Supreme Court, and the judge of the district.

In June, 1790, the States of Rhode Island and North Carolina, and in March, 1791, that of Vermont, came into the Union. The districts of Rhode Island and Vermont were attached to the eastern, and that of North Carolina to the southern circuit.

The committee will observe, that the act of 1789 did not assign the justices of the Supreme Court to particular circuits, but intended that they should alternate in holding their circuit courts. It was soon found to be impracticable for them to perform the circuit duties required by this act. Under its operation, the six justices of the Supreme Court, besides the performance of their duties in bank, were required, in pairs, to hold circuit courts twice in each year, throughout the three circuits which embraced all the States of the Union. In 1792, they addressed the President of the United States upon the subject, who laid their communication before Congress. This produced the act of March, 1798, which declared that any one of the justices of the Supreme Court, with the judge of the district, should compose the circuit court. This act, by dividing their duties, diminished their circuit labors one-half, and enabled them, without difficulty, to attend all the circuit courts.

Thus the Judiciary of the United States continued to be organized until the passage of the famous act of February, 1801. This act produced great excitement throughout the country at the time of its passage, and met with strong public disapprobation. It withdrew the justices of the Supreme Court from the performance of circuit duties, and made them exclusively an appellate tribunal. Under its provisions, the United States were divided into six circuits, and three judges were appointed for each of the first five of these circuits. For the sixth circuit, which consisted of the districts of East and West Tennessee, Kentucky, and Ohio, only one circuit judge was appointed; who, together with the district judges of Tennessee and Kentucky, composed the court for that circuit. The district courts throughout this circuit were abolished, and their duties were transferred to the circuit court. Such was the provision which this act made for the performance of these circuit duties, which had been ably and satisfactorily discharged by the six justices of the Supreme Court previous to its passage.

The act of 1801 had but a brief existence. It was swept from the statute book in little more than one year after it became a law, by the repealing act of March, 1802. All the judges created under it were thus legislated out of office. This has been called a high-handed proceeding, and it is one which ought never to be resorted to except in extreme cases; but yet, in my opinion, experience has justified the measure, and has proved that such an extreme case then existed. But more of this hereafter.

In April, 1802, the judicial system was re-organized, and placed upon the foundation on which it now rests. The old thirteen States, together with Vermont, were divided into six circuits: the first composed of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island; the second, of the States of Connecticut, New York, and Vermont; the third, of New Jersey and Pennsylvania; the fourth, of Maryland and Delaware; the fifth, of Virginia and North Carolina; and the sixth, of South Carolina and Georgia. These circuits have ever since continued the same, except that Maine, since its admission into the Union, has been annexed to the first circuit. This act was the first which assigned to each justice of the Supreme Court a particular circuit. From the passage of the judicial act of 1789, until that of April, 1802, the justices of the Supreme Court alternated and travelled over all the circuits. Since that time, each one of them has been confined to a single circuit. The act of 1802 proceeded still further, and recognized the principle that the justices of the Supreme Court ought to reside within their respective circuits. At the date of its passage, four of the justices resided within the circuits to which it assigned them. Upon the resignation of Mr. Justice Moore, in 1804, whose residence was in the fifth, but who was assigned to the sixth circuit, the present Mr. Justice Johnston was appointed his successor. Ever since that time, all the justices of the Supreme Court have resided within their respective circuits, except the late Judge Washington. And of that lamented judge, permit me to say, that although he was the citizen of a State out of the limits of his circuit, yet his judicial character was held in as high estimation by the people of Pennsylvania, as will be that of any man who shall probably ever become his successor.

Kentucky, which became a State of the Union in 1792, and Tennessee in 1796, were not embraced within the circuits created by the act of 1802. Each of them continued to have a district court, which, in addition to the ordinary powers of such a court, was invested with the jurisdiction of a circuit court. Ohio became a member of the Union in 1803; and, in February, 1807, Congress established a serenth circuit, to consist of the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio. Under this act, a sixth associate justice of the Supreme Court was appointed, to reside within the seventh circuit, and to hold the circuit courts. This circuit has always been too extensive, and the duties of the judge have ever been too laborious to be performed by any one man.

After the passage of the act of 1807, each of the eighteen States which then composed the Federal Union, was provided with a circuit court. That act, in this respect, placed them all upon an equal footing.

Since the year 1807, six new States have been added to the Union: Louisiana, in 1812; Indiana, in 1816; Mississippi, in 1817; Illinois, in 1818; Alabama, in 1819; and Missouri, in 1821.

The purpose of this bill is to extend the circuit court system to these new States; and, in doing so, to make such an arrangement of the two new circuits which it proposes to establish, as will enable the courts to transact the business of the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

Before I proceed to discuss the merits of this bill, it is necessary, to a correct understanding of the subject, that I should present to the committee the great outlines of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States. I need scarcely repeat, that they are composed of one of the justices of the Supreme Court and the judge of the district in which they are held. They do not possess original jurisdiction in any case, unless the sum in controversy exceeds five hundred dollars. Above that amount they have unlimited original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, in which the United States are plaintiffs, or in which an alien is one party, and the citizen of a State the other; or in which the controversy is between a citizen of the State where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another State. If an alien be sued in a State court, by any State or the citizen of a State, or if the citizen of another State be sued in a State court by a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought, the defendant in either case may remove the cause into the circuit court of the United States. The jurisdiction of the circuit court also extends to controversies between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States; and causes of this nature may be removed by either party from the courts of the States into the circuit court. Besides this extended original jurisdiction, the circuit courts are courts of appeal, in which the judgments and decrees of the district courts may be reviewed, in all civil cases in which the sum in controversy exceeds fifty dollars. When we consider that the district courts "have exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," this single branch of their power must be the fruitful source of many appeals to the circuit courts.

The judgments or decrees of the circuit courts are final and conclusive in all cases in which the amount in controversy does not exceed two thousand dollars, unless when the two judges who compose them are divided in opinion upon some point which may have arisen during the trial.

The circuit courts also possess exclusive original jurisdiction of all crimes of an aggravated nature committed against the United States; and they have concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of all other offences. Their judgments in all criminal cases are conclusive, unless the judges are divided in opinion. If there has been such a division between them, either in a civil or criminal case, the point of disagreement may be certified to the next Supreme Court for a final decision.

Having thus given a hasty sketch of the history of the Judiciary of the United States, and of the jurisdiction of the circuit courts which this bill proposes to extend to the six new States of the Union, I shall now proceed to present the views of the Committee on the Judiciary in relation to this important subject. In doing this, I feel that, before I can expect the passage of the bill, I must satisfy the committee, first, that such a change or modification of the present judiciary system ought to be adopted, as will place the Western States on an equal footing with the other States of the Union; and, second, that the present bill contains the best provisions which, under all the circumstances, can be devised for accomplishing this purpose.

And first, in regard to the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. It may be said that the existing law has already established circuit courts in these three States, and why then should they complain? In answer to this question, I ask gentlemen to look at a map of the United States, and examine the extent of this circuit. The distance which the judge is compelled to travel, by land, for the purpose of attending the different circuit courts, is of itself almost sufficient, in a few years, to destroy any common constitution. From Columbus, in Ohio, he proceeds to Frankfort, in Kentucky; from Frankfort to Nashville; and from Nashville, across the Cumberland mountain, to Knoxville. When we reflect that, in addition to his attendance of the courts in each of these States, twice in the year, he is obliged annually to attend the Supreme Court in Washington, we must all admit that his labors are very severe.

This circuit is not only too extensive, but there is a great press of judicial business in each of the States of which it is composed. In addition to the ordinary sources of litigation for the circuit courts throughout the Union, particular causes have existed for its extraordinary accumulation in each of these States. It will be recollected that, under the constitution and laws of the United States, the circuit courts may try land causes between citizens of the same State, provided they claim under grants from different States. In Tennessee, grants under that State and the State of North Carolina, for the same land, often come into conflict in the circuit court. The interfering grants of Virginia and Kentucky are a fruitful source of business for the circuit court of Kentucky. These causes, from their very nature, are difficult, and important, and must occupy much time and attention. Within the Virginia military district of Ohio, there are also many disputed land titles.

Another cause has contributed much to swell the business of the circuit court of Kentucky. The want of confidence of the citizens of other States in the judicial tribunals of that State, has greatly added to the number of suits in the circuit court. Many plaintiffs, who could, with greater expedition, have recovered their demands in the courts of the State, were compelled, by the impolitic acts of the State Legislature, to resort to the court of the United States. Whilst these laws were enforced by the State court, they were disregarded by those of the Union. In making these remarks, I am confident no representative from that patriotic State will mistake my meaning. I rejoice that the difficulties are now at an end, and that the people of Kentucky have discovered the ruinous policy of interposing the arm of the law to shield a debtor from the just demands of his creditor. That gallant and chivalrous people, who possess a finer soil and a finer climate than any other State of the Union, will now, I trust, improve and enjoy the bounties which nature has bestowed upon them with a lavish hand. As their experience has been severe, I trust their reformation will be complete. Still, however, many of the causes which originated in past years, are yet depending in the circuit court of that State.

In 1826, when a similar bill was before this House, we had the most authentic information that there were nine hundred and fifty causes then pending in the circuit court of Kentucky, one hundred and sixty in the circuit court for the western district, and about the same number in that for the eastern district of Tennessee, and upwards of two hundred in Ohio. Upon that occasion a memorial was presented from the bar of Nashville, signed by G. W. Campbell as Chairman, and Felix Grundy, at present a Senator of the United States, as secretary. These gentlemen are both well known to this House, and to the country. That memorial declares that "the seventh circuit, consisting of Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee, is too large for the duties of it to be devolved on one man; and it was absolutely impossible for the judge assigned to this circuit to fulfil the letter of the law designating his duties." Such has been the delay of justice, in the State of Tennessee, "that some of the important causes now pending in their circuit courts are older than the professional career of almost every man at the bar."

The number of causes depending in the seventh circuit, I am informed, has been somewhat reduced since 1826; but still the evil is great, and demands a remedy. If it were possible for one man to transact the judicial business of that circuit, I should have as much confidence that it would be accomplished by the justice of the Supreme Court to which it is assigned, as by any other judge in the Union. His ability and his perseverance are well known to the nation. The labor, however, both of body and mind, is too great for any individual.

Has not the delay of justice in this circuit almost amounted to its denial? Are the States which compose it placed upon the same footing in this respect, with other States of the Union? Have they not a right to complain? Many evils follow in the train of tardy justice. It deranges the whole business of society. It tempts the dishonest and the needy to set up unjust and fraudulent defences against the payment of just debts, knowing that the day of trial is far distant. It thus ruins the honest creditor, by depriving him of the funds which he had a right to expect at or near the appointed time of payment; and it ultimately tends to destroy all confidence between man and man.

A greater curse can scarcely be inflicted upon the people of any State, than to have their land titles unsettled. What, then, must be the condition of Tennessee, where there are many disputed land titles, when we are informed, by undoubted authority, "that some of the important causes now pending in their circuit courts are older than the professional career of almost every man at the bar." Instead of being astonished at the complaints of the people of this circuit, I am astonished at their forbearance. A judiciary, able and willing to compel men to perform their contracts, and to decide their controversies, is one of the greatest political blessings which any people can enjoy; and it is one which the people of this country have a right to expect from their Government. The present bill proposes to accomplish this object, by creating a new circuit out of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. This circuit will afford sufficient employment for one justice of the Supreme Court.

Without insisting further upon the propriety, nay, the necessity, of organizing the circuit courts of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, in such a manner as to enable them to transact the business of the people, I shall now proceed to consider the situation of the six new States, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, and Missouri. Their grievances are of a different character. They do not so much complain of the delay of justice, as that Congress have so long refused to extend to them the circuit court system, as it exists in all the other States. As they successively came into the Union, they were each provided with a district court and a district judge, possessing circuit court powers. The acts which introduced them into our political family declare that they shall "be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever." I do not mean to contend that by virtue of these acts we were bound immediately to extend to them the circuit court system. Such has not been the practice of Congress, in regard to other States in a similar situation. I contend, however, that these acts do impose an obligation upon us to place them "on an equal footing with the original States," in regard to the Judiciary, as soon as their wants require it, and the circumstances of the country permit it to be done. That time has, in my opinion, arrived. Louisiana has now been nearly eighteen years a member of the Union, and is now one of our most commercial States; and yet, until this day, she has been without a circuit court. It is more than thirteen years since Indiana was admitted; and even our youngest sister, Missouri, will soon have been nine years in the family. Why should not these six States be admitted to the same judicial privileges which all the others now enjoy? Even if there were no better reason, they have a right to demand it for the mere sake of uniformity. I admit this is an argument dictated by State pride; but is not that a noble feeling? Is it not a feeling which will ever characterize freemen? Have they not a right to say to us, if the circuit court system be good for you, it will be good for us? You have no right to exclusive privileges. If you are sovereign States, so are we. By the terms of our admission, we are perfectly your equals. We have long submitted to the want of this system, from deference to your judgment; but the day has now arrived when we demand it from you as our right. But there are several other good reasons why the system ought to be extended to these States. And, in the first place, the justices of the Supreme Court are selected from the very highest order of the profession. There is scarcely a lawyer in the United States who would not be proud of an elevation to that bench. A man ambitious of honest fame ought not to desire a more exalted theatre for the display of ability and usefulness. Besides, the salary annexed to this office is sufficient to command the best talents of the country. I ask you, sir, is it not a serious grievance for those States to be deprived of the services of such a man in their courts? I ask you whether it is equal justice, that whilst, in eighteen States of this Union, no man can be deprived of his life, his liberty, or his property, by the judgment of a circuit court, without the concurrence of two judges, and one of them a justice of the Supreme Court, in the remaining six the fate of the citizen is determined by the decision of a single district judge? Who are, generally speaking, these district judges? In asking this question, I mean to treat them with no disrespect. They receive but small salaries, and their sphere of action is confined to their own particular districts. There is nothing either in the salary or in the station which would induce a distinguished lawyer, unless under peculiar circumstances, to accept the appointment. And yet the judgment of this individual, in six States of the Union, is final and conclusive, in all cases of law, of equity, and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, wherein the amount of the controversy does not exceed two thousand dollars. Nay, the grievance is incomparably greater. His opinion in all criminal cases, no matter how aggravated may be their nature, is final and conclusive. A citizen of these States may be deprived of his life, or of his character, which ought to be dearer than life, by the sentence of a district judge; against which there is no redress, and from which there can be no appeal.

There is another point of view in which the inequality and injustice of the present system, in the new States, is very striking. In order to produce a final decision, both the judges of a circuit court must concur. If they be divided in opinion, the point of difference is certified to the Supreme Court, for their decision; and this, whether the amount in controversy be great or small. The same rule applies to criminal case. In such a court, no man can be deprived of life, of liberty, or of property, by a criminal prosecution, without the clear opinion of the two judges that his conviction is sanctioned by the laws of the land. If the question be doubtful and important, or if it be one of the first impression, the judges, even when they do not really differ, often agree to divide, pro forma; so that the point may be solemnly argued and decided in the Supreme Court. Thus, the citizen of every State in which a circuit court exists, has a shield of protection cast over him, of which he cannot be deprived, without the deliberate opinion of two judges; whilst the district judge of the six new Western States must alone finally decide every criminal question, and every civil controversy in which the amount in dispute does not exceed two thousand dollars.

In the eastern district of Louisiana, the causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction decided by the district court must be numerous and important. If a circuit court were established for that State, a party who considered himself aggrieved might appeal to it from the district court in every case in which the amount in controversy exceeded fifty dollars. At present there is no appeal, unless the value of the controversy exceeds two thousand dollars; and then it must be made directly to the Supreme Court, a tribunal so far remote from the city of New Orleans, as to deter suitors from availing themselves of this privilege.

I shall not further exhaust the patience of the committee on this branch of the subject. I flatter myself that I have demonstrated the necessity for such an alteration of the existing laws, as will confer upon the people of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and of the six new Western States, the same benefits from the judiciary, as those which the people of the other States now enjoy.

The great question, then, which remains for discussion is, does the present bill present the best plan for accomplishing this purpose, which, under all circumstances, can be devised? It is incumbent upon me to sustain the affirmative of this proposition. There have been but two plans proposed to the Committee on the Judiciary, and but two can be proposed, with the least hope of success. The one an extension of the present system, which the bill now before the committee contemplates, and the other a resort to the system which was adopted in the days of the elder Adams, of detaching the justices of the Supreme Court from the performance of circuit duties, and appointing circuit judges to take their places. After much reflection upon this subject, I do not think that the two systems can be compared, without producing a conviction in favor of that which has long been established. The system of detaching the judges of the Supreme Court from the circuits has been already tried, and it has already met the decided hostility of the people of this country. No act passed during the stormy and turbulent administration of the elder Adams, which excited more general indignation among the people. The courts which it established were then, and have been ever since, branded with the name of the "midnight judiciary." I am far from being one of those who believe the people to be infallible. They are often deceived by the arts of demagogues: but this deception endures only for a season. They are always honest, and possess much sagacity. If, therefore, they get wrong, it is almost certain they will speedily return to correct opinions. They have long since done justice to other acts of that administration, which at the time they condemned; but the feeling against the judiciary established under it remains the same. Indeed, many now condemn that system, who were formerly its advocates. In 1826, when a bill, similar in its provisions to the bill now before the committee, was under discussion in this House, a motion was made by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MERROB,) to recommit it to the Committee on the Judiciary, with an instruction so to amend it, as to discharge the judges of the Supreme Court from attendance on the circuit courts, and to provide a uniform system for the administration of justice in the inferior courts of the United States. Although this motion was sustained with zeal and eloquence and ability by the mover, and by several other gentlemen, yet, when it came to the vote, it was placed in a lean minority, and, I believe, was negatived without a division. It is morally certain that such a bill could not now be carried. It would therefore have been vain and idle in the Committee on the Judiciary to have reported such a bill. If the Western States should be doomed to wait for a redress of their grievances, until public opinion shall change upon this subject, it will, probably, be a long time before they will obtain relief.

But, sir, there are most powerful reasons for believing that public opinion upon this subject is correct. What would be the natural consequences of detaching the judges of the Supreme Court from circuit duties? It would bring them and their families from the circuits in which they now reside; and this city would become their permanent residence. They would naturally come here; because here, and nowhere else, would they then have official business to transact. What would be the probable effect of such a change of residence? The tendency of every thing within the ten miles square is towards the Executive of the Union. He is here the centre of attraction. No matter what political revolutions may take place, no matter who may be up, or who may be down, the proposition is equally true. Human nature is not changed under a republican Government. We find that citizens of a republic are worshippers of power, as well as the subjects of a monarchy. Would you think it wise to bring the justices of the Supreme Court from their residence in the States, where they breathe the pure air of the country, and assemble them here within the very vortex of Executive influence? Instead of being independent judges, scattered over the surface of the Union, their feelings identified with the States of which they are citizens, is there no danger, that, in the lapse of time, you would convert them into minions of the Executive? I am far, very far, from supposing that any man, who either is or who will be a justice of the Supreme Court, could be actually corrupted; but if you place them in a situation where they or their relatives would naturally become candidates for Executive patronage, you place them, in some degree, under the control of Executive influence. If there should now exist any just cause for the complaints against the Supreme Court, that in their decisions they are partial to federal rather than to State authority, (and I do not say that there is,) that which at present may be but an imaginary fear might soon become a substantial reality. I would place them beyond the reach of temptation. I would suffer them to remain, as they are at present, citizens of their respective States, visiting this city annually to discharge their high duties, as members of the Supreme Court. This single view of the subject, if there were no other, ought in my judgment to be conclusive.

Let us now suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the withdrawal of the justices of the Supreme Court from their circuit duties, and their residence in this city, would produce no such effects, as I apprehend, upon the judges themselves; what would be the probable effect upon public opinion? It has been said, and wisely said, that the first object of every judicial tribunal ought to be to do justice; the second, to satisfy the people that justice has been done. It is of the utmost importance in this country that the judges of the Supreme Court should possess the confidence of the public. This they now do in an eminent degree. How have they acquired it? By travelling over their circuits, and personally showing themselves to the people of the country, in the able and honest discharge of their high duties, and by their extensive intercourse with the members of the profession on the circuits in each State, who after all are the best judges of judicial merit, and whose opinions upon this subject have a powerful influence upon the community. Elevated above the storms of faction and of party which have sometimes lowered over us, like the sun, they have pursued their steady course, unawed by threats, unseduced by flattery. They have thus acquired that public confidence, which never fails to follow the performance of great and good actions, when brought home to the personal observation of the people.

The Judiciary.

Would they continue to enjoy this extensive public confidence, should they no longer be seen by the people of the States, in the discharge of their high and important duties, but be confined, in the exercise of them, to the gloomy and vaulted apartment which they now occupy in this capitol? Would they not be considered as a distant and dangerous tribunal? Would the people, when excited by strong feeling, patiently submit to have the most solemn acts of their State Legislatures swept from the statute book, by the decision of judges whom they never saw, and whom they had been taught to consider with jealousy and suspicion? At present, even in those States where their decisions have been most violently opposed, the highest respect has been felt for the judges by whom they were pronounced; because the people have had an opportunity of personally knowing that they were both great and good men. Look at the illustrious individual who is now the Chief Justice of the United States. His decisions upon constitutional questions have ever been hostile to the opinions of a vast majority of the people of his own State; and yet with what respect and veneration has he been viewed by Virginia? Is there a Virginian, whose heart does not beat with honest pride when the just fame of the Chief Justice is the subject of conversation? They consider him, as he truly is, one of the greatest and best men which this country has ever produced. Think ye that such would have been the case, had he been confined to the city of Washington, and never known to the people, except in pronouncing judgments in this capitol, annulling their State laws, and calculated to humble their State pride? Whilst I continue to be a member of this House, I shall never incur the odium of giving a vote for any change in the judiciary system, the effect of which would, in my opinion, diminish the respect in which the Supreme Court is now held by the people of this country.

The judges whom you would appoint to perform the circuit duties, if able and honest men, would soon take the place which the judges of the Supreme Court now occupy in the affections of the people; and the reversal of their judgments, when they happened to be in accordance with strong public feeling, would naturally increase the mass of discontent against the Supreme Court.

There are other reasons, equally powerful, against the withdrawal of the judges from the circuits. What effect would such a measure probably produce upon the ability of the judges themselves to perform their duties? Would it not be very unfortunate?

No judges upon earth ever had such various and important duties to perform, as the justices of the Supreme Court. In England, whence we have derived our laws, they have distinct courts of equity, courts of common law, courts of admiralty, and courts in which the civil law is administered. In each of these courts, they have distinct judges; and perfection in any of these branches is certain to be rewarded by the honors of that country. The judges of our Supreme Court, both on their circuits and in bank, are called upon to adjudicate on all these codes. But this is not all. Our Union consists of twenty-four sovereign States, in all of which there are different laws and peculiar customs. The common and equity law have thus been changed and inflected into a hundred different shapes, and adapted to the various wants and opinions of the different members of our confederacy. The judicial act of 1789 declares "that the laws of the several States, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide," shall be regarded as rules of decision in the courts of the United States. The justices of the Supreme Court ought, therefore, to be acquainted with the ever-varying codes of the different States.

There is still another branch of their jurisdiction, of a grand and imposing character, which places them far above the celebrated Amphictyonic council. The Constitution of the United States has made them the arbiters between conflicting sovereigns. They decide whether the sovereign power of the States has been exercised in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the United States; and, if this has not been done, they declare the laws of the State Legislatures to be void. Their decisions thus control the exercise of sovereign power. No tribunal ever existed, possessing the same, or even similar authority. Now, sir, suppose you bring these judges to Washington, and employ them in bank but six weeks or two months in the year, is it not certain that they will gradually become less and less fit to decide upon these different codes, and that they will at length nearly lose all recollection of the peculiar local laws of the different States? Every judicial duty which each of them would then be required to perform, would be to prepare and deliver a few opinions annually in bank.

The judgment, like every other faculty of the mind, requires exercise to preserve its vigor. That judge who decides the most causes, is likely to decide them the best. He who is in the daily habit of applying general principles to the decision of cases, as they arise upon the circuits, is at the same time qualifying himself in the best manner for the duties of his station on the bench of the Supreme Court.

Is it probable that the long literary leisure of the judges in this city, during ten months of the year, would be devoted to searching the two hundred volumes of jarring decisions of State courts, or in studying the acts of twenty-four State Legislatures? The man must have a singular taste and a firm resolution, who, in his closet, could travel over this barren waste. And even if he should, what would be the consequence? The truth is, such knowledge cannot be obtained; and after it has been acquired, it cannot be preserved, except by constant practice. There are subjects which, when the memory has once grasped, it retains forever. It has no such attachment for acts of Assembly, acts of Congress, and reports of adjudged cases, fixing their construction. This species of knowledge, under the present system, will always be possessed by the judges of the Supreme Court; because, in the performance of their circuit duties, they are placed in a situation in which it is daily expounded to them, and in which they are daily compelled to decide questions arising upon it. Change this system, make them exclusively judges of an appellate court, and you render it highly probable that their knowledge of the general principles of the laws of their country will become more and more faint, and that they will finally almost lose the recollection of the peculiar local systems of the different States. "Practice makes perfect," is a maxim applicable to every pursuit in life. It applies with peculiar force to that of a judge. I think I might appeal for the truth of this position to the long experience of the distinguished gentleman from New York, now by my side, (Mr. SPENCER.) A man, by study, may become a profound lawyer in theory, but nothing except practice can make him an able judge. I call upon every member of the profession in this House to say whether he does not feel himself to be a better lawyer at the end of a long term, than at the beginning. It is the circuit employment, imposed upon the judges of England and the United States, which has rendered them what they are. In my opinion, both the usefulness and the character of the Supreme Court depend much upon its continuance.

I now approach what I know will be urged as the greatest objection to the passage of this bill—that it will extend the number of the judges of the Supreme Court to nine. If the necessities of the country required that their number should be increased to ten, I would feel no objection to such a measure. The time has not yet arrived, however, when, in my opinion, such a necessity exists. Gentlemen, in considering this subject, ought to take those extended views which belong to statesmen. When we reflect upon the vast extent of our country, and the various systems of law under which the people of the different States are governed, I cannot conceive that nine or even ten judges are too great a number to compose our appellate tribunal. That number would afford a judicial representation upon the bench of each large portion of the Union. Not, sir, a representation of sectional feelings or of the party excitements of the day, but of that peculiar species of legal knowledge necessary to adjudicate wisely upon the laws of the different States. For example, I ask what judge now upon the bench possesses, or can possess, a practical knowledge of the laws of Louisiana? Their system is so peculiar, that it is almost impossible for a man to decide correctly upon all cases arising under it, who has never been practically acquainted with the practice of their courts. Increase the number of judges to nine, and you will then have them scattered throughout all the various portions of the Union. The streams of legal knowledge peculiar to the different States will then flow to the bench of the Supreme Court as to a great reservoir, from whence they will be distributed throughout the Union. There will then always be sufficient local information upon the bench, if I may use the expression, to detect all the ingenious fallacies of the bar, and to enable them to decide correctly upon local questions. I admit, if the judges were confined to appellate duties alone, nine or ten would probably be too great a number. Then there might be danger that some of them would become mere non-entities, contenting themselves simply with voting aye or no in the majority or minority. There would then also be danger that the Executive might select inefficient men for this high station, who were his personal favorites, expecting their incapacity to be shielded from public observation by the splendid talents of some of the other judges upon the bench. Under the present system we have no such danger to apprehend. Each judge must now feel his own personal responsibility. He is obliged to preside in the courts throughout his circuit, and to bring home the law and the justice of his country to his fellow-citizens in each of the districts of which it is composed. Much is expected from a judge placed in his exalted station; and he must attain to the high standard of public opinion by which he is judged, or incur the reproach of holding an office to which he is not entitled. No man in any station in this country can place himself above public opinion.

Upon the subject of judicial appointments, public opinion has always been correct. No factious demagogue, no man, merely because he has sung hosannas to the powers that be, can arrive at the bench of the Supreme Court. The Executive himself will always be constrained by the force of public sentiment, whilst the present system continues, to select judges for that court from the ablest and best men of the circuit; and such has been the course which he has hitherto almost invariably pursued. Were he to pursue any other, he would inevitably incur popular odium. Under the existing system, there can be no danger in increasing the number of the judges to nine. But take them from their circuits, destroy their feeling of personal responsibility by removing them from the independent courts over which they now preside, and make them merely an appellate tribunal, and I admit there would be danger, not only of improper appointments, but that a portion of them, in the lapse of time, might become incompetent to discharge the duties of their station.

The Judiciary.

But, sir, have we no examples of appellate courts consisting of a greater number than either nine or ten judges, which have been approved by experience? The Senate of the State of New York has always been their court of appeals; and, notwithstanding they changed their constitution a few years ago, so much were the people attached to this court, that it remains unchanged. In England, the twelve judges, in fact, compose the court of appeals. Whenever the House of Lords sits in a judicial character, they are summoned to attend, and their opinions are decisive of almost every question. I do not pretend to speak accurately, but I doubt whether the House of Lords have decided two cases, in opposition to the opinion of the judges, for the last fifty years. In England, there is also the court of exchequer chamber, consisting of the twelve judges, and sometimes of the lord chancellor also, into which such causes may be adjourned from the three superior courts, as the judges find to be difficult of decision, before any judgment is given upon them in the court in which they originated. The court of exchequer chamber is also a court of appeals, in the strictest sense of the word, in many cases which I shall not take time to enumerate.

I cannot avoid believing that the prejudice which exists in the minds of some gentlemen, against increasing the number of the judges of the Supreme Court to nine, arises from the circumstance that the appellate courts of the different States generally consist of a fewer number. But is there not a striking difference between the cases? It does not follow that because four or five may be a sufficient number in a single State where one uniform system of laws prevails, nine or ten would be too many on the bench of the Supreme Court, which administers the laws of twenty-four States, and decides questions arising under all the codes in use in the civilized world. Indeed, if four or five judges be not too many for the court of appeals in a State, it is a strong argument that nine or ten are not too great a number for the court of appeals of the Union. Upon the whole, I ask, would it be wise in this committee, disregarding the voice of experience, to destroy a system which has worked well in practice for forty years, and resort to a dangerous and untried experiment, merely from a vague apprehension that nine judges will destroy the usefulness and character of that court, which has been raised by seven to its present exalted elevation?

It will, no doubt, be objected to this bill, as it has been upon a former occasion, that the present system cannot be permanent, and that, ere long, the judges of the Supreme Court, must, from necessity, be withdrawn from their circuits. To this objection there is a conclusive answer. We know that the system is now sufficient for the wants of the country, and let posterity provide for themselves. Let us not establish courts which are unnecessary in the present day, because we believe that hereafter they may be required to do the business of the country.

But, if it were necessary, I believe it might be demonstrated, that ten justices of the Supreme Court will be sufficient to do all the judicial business of the country which is required of them under the present system, until the youngest member of this House shall be sleeping with his fathers. Six judges have done all the business of the States east of the Alleghany Mountains, from the adoption of the federal constitution up till this day; and still their duties are not laborious. If it should be deemed proper by Congress, these fifteen Eastern States might be arranged into five circuits instead of six, upon the occurrence of the next vacancy in any of them, without the least inconvenience either to the judges or to the people; and thus it would be rendered unnecessary to increase the bench of the Supreme Court beyond nine, even after the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the Union. The business of the federal courts, except in a few States, will probably increase but little for a long time to come. One branch of it must, before many years, be entirely lopped away. I allude to the controversies between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants from different States. This will greatly diminish their business both in Tennessee and Kentucky. Besides, the State tribunals will generally be preferred by aliens and by citizens of other States for the mere recovery of debts, on account of their superior expedition.

I should here close my remarks, if it were not necessary to direct the attention of the committee for a few minutes to the details of the bill. And here permit me to express my regret that my friend from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) has thought proper to propose an amendment to add three, instead of two, judges to the Supreme Court. Had a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary believed ten judges, instead of nine, to be necessary, I should have yielded my opinion, as I did upon a former occasion, and given the bill my support in the House. This I should have done, to prevent division among its friends, believing it to be a mere question of time: for ten will become necessary in a few years, unless the number of the Eastern circuits should be reduced to five.

[Here Mr. WICKLIFFE asked if it were in order to refer to his amendment, as it was not yet before the committee.]

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would not further refer to it at present. The bill proposes to create one new circuit out of Mississippi, the eastern district of Louisiana, and the southern district of Alabama. Nature has united these three districts. They cannot be separated without violence. There is a communication by water, between Natchez, New Orleans, and Mobile, the places at which the circuit courts will be held for the whole distance, which is always safe and expeditious. No other arrangement could have been made, unless Alabama had been connected with Tennessee; and that would have been extremely inconvenient. I have a certificate from the Post Office Department in my possession, stating the distance from Nashville to Mobile, to be four hundred and thirty-nine miles. The road is not good, the streams are not bridged, and it passes through a new country, and part of the way through an Indian nation. In order to attend the circuit court at Mobile, the judge would be compelled to travel over this road, from a healthy into a sickly climate, twice in each year, a total distance of one thousand seven hundred and fifty-six miles; and this, when he could reach Mobile, either from Natchez or New Orleans, by water, in two or three days.

The circuit court cannot be removed from Mobile, and placed nearer to Nashville. It is there that admiralty and maritime causes arise, and must be decided in the district court, from which an appeal is allowed to the circuit court. It is at that commercial point the citizens of Alabama chiefly come into contact in their commercial transactions with the citizens of other States, and with foreigners; and there the chief civil business of the circuit court must arise. But, above all, it is there, near the verge of the Gulf of Mexico, where offences against the United States committed upon the high seas must be tried and punished.

Kentucky and Tennessee, under this bill, compose the other new circuit; and however reluctant these States may be to go together, I do not perceive how they can be separated, without imposing more labor upon some one of the Western judges than he ought to be called upon to perform.

In regard to the other Western circuit, consisting of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, I admit that it will embrace a large extent of territory. I am sorry for it, but it cannot be avoided. We ought, however, to consider that, if the judge shall be compelled to travel much, a great part of it will be by water. He will have but little business to transact in any of the States of which it is composed, except Ohio. It is probable, too, that ere long public convenience will suggest the removal of the circuit courts of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois from the seats of Government of those States to the Ohio River; and I am at a loss to conceive any good reason why the circuit court of Missouri should not be held at St. Louis.

After all, I regret that necessity has compelled the Committee on the Judiciary to report a bill, which, if it should pass, will impose so much travel on the judge of the seventh circuit. No man would be more disposed to relieve that distinguished individual from unnecessary labor than myself. I feel confident he will never complain. The man who, by the exertion of great ability, incessant labor, and untiring perseverance, brought the Post Office Department from chaos into order, will never shrink from the performance of any duty required of him by his country.

Another remark, and I have done. This bill does not provide a circuit court for the western district of Louisiana, and the northern district of Alabama. In this respect, these districts are placed upon the same footing with the northern district of New York, the western district of Pennsylvania, and the western district of Virginia. I possess no actual information concerning the amount of business in the northern district of Alabama; but from its position it cannot be great. I have the best information that there is but little business in the western district of Louisiana. At all events, neither Louisiana nor Alabama will complain, when they are placed upon the same footing with New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia.

Distribution of Public Lands.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. HUNT on the 17th December ultimo.

The question recurred on agreeing to that member or portion thereof, which is contained in the following words: "for the purposes of education;" and decided as follows: yeas 98—nays 84.

So this part of the resolution was agreed to.

The question was then put, will the House agree to that member or portion of the said resolution which is contained in the following words: "and internal improvement?" and decided as follows: yeas 92—nays 94.

The question was then put, Will the House agree to that member or portion of said resolution which is contained in the following words: "in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives, with leave to report by bill or otherwise?" and decided as follows: yeas 117—nays 75.

So the first, second, and fourth members of the said resolution were agreed to by the House, and the third member thereof was rejected.

The resolution agreed to by the House is as follows:

The Judiciary.

[H. OF R.]

"Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States and Territories for the purpose of education, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives; with leave to report by bill or otherwise."

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20.

The Judiciary.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and took up the bill to alter and extend the Judiciary system.

Mr. STRONG rose, and concluded his argument in support of his amendment.

[The remarks of Mr. STRONG were to the following effect:]

Mr. STRONG said, that, on most occasions, he was content to give a silent vote: but, on the present subject, so important in its character and consequences, and holding the opinions he did in regard to it, he hoped a departure from his accustomed rule would not be deemed improper.

The amendment which I have submitted, (said Mr. S.,) the committee will recollect, proposes to transfer all the powers and duties of the circuit courts to the several district courts of the United States, and to require the justices of the Supreme Court, being thus relieved from their circuit duties, to hold annually two or more terms of that court. To avoid embarrassment in discussing the principle upon which the plan depends, I have purposely omitted some necessary provisions. These, however, should the plan be adopted, may be readily supplied, either here, or by sending the subject back to the Committee on the Judiciary. This amendment opens the whole field of debate. It does more. Contrasted with the bill, it presents plainly the two great alternatives, either to go on increasing the number of the justices of the Supreme Court, for the performance solely of mere incidental and subordinate duties, or to require, in another form, and of others, the performance of those duties. It seems clear to me that the federal judiciary must be organized upon the one or the other of these cardinal principles.

The honorable chairman, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) after having described, in fresh colors, the deprivations and wants of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, contended that the circuit court system ought to be extended to those new States, in order that they might be put upon an equal footing with the older States of the Union. I have admitted that the benefits of the judiciary ought to be distributed equally among the twenty-four States. But, sir, does the bill do this? It clearly does not. It makes no provision for having one of the justices of the Supreme Court hold a circuit court in the northern districts of

New York and of Alabama, or in the western districts of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Louisiana. These are left with district courts only; and this is certainly the more remarkable, as two of these districts are in the States for whose benefit and relief we are urged to pass the present bill. Without stopping, therefore, to inquire into the practical operation of the plan which the honorable gentleman proposes, it is apparent, on the face of it, that it does not do equal justice.

But we are again earnestly entreated by the honorable gentleman (Mr. B.) to pass this bill, because the decisions of the district court in the districts to which the circuit court system has not been extended, are, in certain cases, final and conclusive upon the property and life of the citizen. If there be any thing hard or unmerciful in this, the remedy is easy, and should be applied without delay. We should at once give an appeal in those cases, directly to the Supreme Court of the United States. This would obviate the evil, and is one answer to the argument. The bill, however, is exceedingly objectionable for another reason; it is partial and unequal. It withholds the circuit court system from five large districts, and thus leaves the property and lives of the citizens in these districts at the mercy of district court judges—thereby entailing upon a large portion of our fellow-citizens the very evils which the gentleman so eloquently deprecated. No such objection exists against the plan I have proposed. It removes all these evils; it presents an equal and uniform system; it carries this equality and uniformity into every part of the Union.

If I did not misapprehend the honorable gentleman, he seemed to take it for granted that the bill involved no new principle, that it merely extended the present circuit court system, which he told us had been sanctioned by long experience. Sir, plans may appear the same on paper, and yet widely differ in principle and practical results. Had he proposed to increase the number of the justices of the Supreme Court to one hundred, instead of nine, and to create a new circuit for each, would not the committee have instantly perceived that the plan, though the same to the eye, was founded upon a new principle, and for the attainment of purposes different from those which the framers of the present circuit court system designed? It appears to me that the bill contains a new principle. I may be wrong. And should the committee think I am wrong, still I hope they will bear with me, while I state some of the reasons which have led me to the conclusion, that, by passing the bill, we shall not only depart from the old, but shall adopt a new system, highly dangerous in its character and consequences.

The duties of the justices of the Supreme Court are of two distinct kinds. One kind consists of those duties which grow out of the original and appellate jurisdiction of the court, and which they must, and they only can, perform. These, therefore, are their principal duties. The other kind consists of those duties which Congress has, from time to time, imposed upon them, by requiring them to hold circuit courts. These duties are performed by them, not as justices of the Supreme Court, but as judges, of an anomalous character. These duties can and may be performed by others. They are, in fact, now performed by some one or other of the district court judges. It seems, therefore, too plain to be controverted, that these duties are merely and wholly incidental and subordinate to their principal duties.

I agree with the honorable chairman, that we ought not to resort to independent circuit courts and judges, if a better plan can be devised. Still, I think the circuit court system less objectionable than the plan proposed by the bill; and the plan I have submitted less objectionable than either, because it is simple, cheaper, more efficient, and more uniform. But I cannot agree with him, that the prejudices of the people against the old system of 1801 still exist. Sir, I know nothing of the men, or the motives, or the measures of that day, except from history. I am no advocate of that system; it will not do for the present day; it lived but a year, and I will not open its grave, nor disturb its ashes. By recurring, however, to the history of that stormy period, the committee, I think, will find that that system was abolished, not because it proved to be intrinsically or practically wrong, but because the people thought such a number of judges unnecessary and burdensome. So in the present case. Is not the honorable gentleman in danger of falling into the same difficulty? Is not his plan obnoxious to the same objections? Are nine justices of the Supreme Court necessary? They are not for the security of the constitutions, or laws, or liberty of the country. As their numbers are increased, their individual responsibility will be less felt, and their high powers will be exercised with less and less consideration and care. Nor are nine necessary for the prompt and discreet administration of justice. But all the purposes of justice will be readily and equally attained by adopting the plan which the amendment proposes. Should experience prove that intermediate courts are convenient and desirable, they may be easily formed of the district court judges, without at all disturbing the harmony or uniformity of the system. There are now twenty-seven district judges, and thirty-two or three districts. Courts may be organized, composed of three of these judges. Take New York and New Jersey, for example. They are divided into three districts, and have three judges. It is so also with Pennsylvania and Delaware. In this way, nine courts may be organized, with appellate jurisdiction, or with the jurisdiction which the present circuit courts possess, with the merit of embracing all the States, and of producing entire equality among all, without the appointment of a single new judge.

Against the separation of the justices of the Supreme Court from the circuit courts, the honorable chairman strongly objected, because in that event, the justices might become idle, rusty, and corrupt. These are not the terms he used; but if I did not mistake the design of his remarks, these were, in his judgment, the probable consequences which might flow from withdrawing the justices from the circuits.

The existing prejudices upon this subject cannot be the fruits of experience. This plan, in regard to the Supreme Court of the United States, has never been fairly tried. And the experience of State courts, in this respect, will be found to have little application to the case before us. I readily admit that the justices of the Supreme Court will derive some advantages from attending the circuits. But I cannot admit that those advantages, be they what they may, will countervail the evils of increasing the number of justices on the bench, or that they will be such as the honorable gentleman supposed. It is true, that riding the circuits will keep them from idleness. So will travelling for any other purpose. So the time thus employed, if applied in examining the laws of the country, will not only keep them from growing idle and rusty, but will make them abler lawyers and better judges.

The same advantages, moreover, will result from attending the different terms of the Supreme Court, if my amendment be adopted. But they are to learn the laws and practices of the States, by holding the circuit courts! How is this to be done? Is it by traversing the States in stage coaches or steamboats? Or is this knowledge to be acquired from the contradiction of lawyers during the trial of a cause? To what extent? Is the circuit judge to attain a profound knowledge of all the laws, customs, and practice of the States in which he holds, and while he is holding his court? This will not be pretended. It appears to me, therefore, that, to sustain this argument, it must be shown that the knowledge of the law or the practice thus acquired at the circuits, be it much or little, cannot be obtained in any other way, and that, without it, the Supreme Court cannot come to a just decision upon causes brought up from the circuit courts. The honorable gentleman, in support of his argument, referred to the Supreme Court of England, and seemed to conclude that, as the justices of that court were benefited by performing nisi prius duties, so ours would be alike benefited by performing circuit court duties. Sir, to judge of this matter rightly, we must attend to the facts in the two cases. What are they? The Supreme Court of England has no jurisdiction of equity or of admiralty causes. The Supreme Court of the United States has jurisdiction of matters at law and in equity, and of admiralty and maritime causes. In England, there is but one constitution of Government. In the United States, there are twenty-five distinct constitutions of Government. There, one code of statute law prevails. Here, there are twenty-five different codes of statute law. There, we find, with trifling exceptions, but one system of common law. Here, we find twenty-four systems of the common law, each varying from the other. There, the rules of practice and the law of evidence are the same in all her courts of nisi prius. Here, the rules of practice and the law of evidence are different in every circuit court in the Union. What next? Why, the justices of the Supreme Court of England, when in consultation, compare the knowledge which each has acquired, of the same constitution and laws and practice, and by which each has been always and every where governed. But when the justices of our Supreme Court are in consultation; is it so with them? It is not—because the local constitutions and laws and practices are not the same in any two of their circuits. Now, according to the argument, the justice allotted to one circuit is supposed to rely upon his brother justice for information as to what the law, or the practice, in each particular case, is in another circuit. But, if each justice possesses a thorough knowledge of the whole law of the case, then such information will not be sought or required, and the decision of the case will be the judgment of the court. Whereas, if this sort of information be material and necessary, then the decision of the case is no longer the judgment of the court, but of a single member of the court.

The Judiciary.

[H. OF R.]

The honorable chairman apprehended that the justices, if withdrawn from the circuits, would probably come to the city of Washington to reside, where they might possibly, in future time, become corrupt. Sir, if I thought that the political influences of the day would act more strongly upon them, than upon other men here, I should agree with them. But is there danger that corruption will insinuate its way into the bosom of the court? If so, where is it most likely to effect its purpose? Is it here, when the eye of the nation is continually upon them, and where the concurrence of three or four, at least, is necessary to decide a cause; or at the circuits, where they may be taken in detail, one by one, and where, too, both the property and the life of the citizen may depend upon the decision of a single circuit judge?

I very much regret one remark which fell from the honorable gentleman. I was sorry to hear him invoke, in advance, the public indignation upon the court, by characterizing it as fulminating its decrees from a dark and vaulted chamber, declaring State laws unconstitutional. Wherefore utter a doubt as to the exercise of powers which are clearly constitutional? Wherefore seem to impugn the members of a court justly distinguished, as well for their learning and integrity, as for their republican meekness and simplicity? And wherefore cast the dark shades of suspicion over this high tribunal? It is the only strong barrier between armed power and the unarmed citizen. It should be cautiously touched. Sir, much handling soils the whiteness of the ermine, as it dims the lustre of fine gold. And though it do not destroy, it deeply injures.

The honorable gentleman gives me to understand that he did not deny this high power to the court, of deciding upon the constitutionality of laws. I know, sir, he did not. But his language implied that the exercise of it was odious. It is of that I complain. What is doubted, soon comes to be denied. Is not this great power indispensable to our safety? And if so, ought it to be impaired? Suppose Congress should suspend the writ of habeas corpus, when there was no war, nor insurrection, nor rebellion—in a time of profound peace, and when every man would admit the suspension to be unconstitutional? An innocent citizen is arbitrarily seized and imprisoned; what redress has he? Will he come to Congress for it? Congress is his oppressor. Where then must he go? He must go to this same "dark and vaulted chamber." There is no other power that can open his prison doors and set him free. Again—suppose a State Legislature should revive the old law of attainder, or make bank bills, for example, a legal tender, instead of "gold or silver?" Where else than to this court can the citizen go, for the protection of his property, and his blood? But if the war be carried further, as it might be, and a State Government should wantonly attain federal officers—and the Federal Government should arbitrarily imprison State officers, who could stay the strife, and redress the wrong, but the Supreme Court? It is the constitutional judge, and there is none else. The court may sometimes err. But what then? Shall we destroy all respect for it, by direct or implied charges of usurpation? Sir, it appears to me that the fear which leads some to think that the court may wantonly abuse or usurp power, rests upon no good foundation. The justices are liable to impeachment. If they wantonly abuse their high trust, they may be impeached, and turned out of office. This is a strong security. But there is still a stronger. Congress can at any time diminish, or wholly take away, their appellate jurisdiction; and thus leave them nearly powerless. Suppose, however, that we had not this security. Will adding to their number increase their responsibility, or diminish their power, or prevent error in judgment? Directly the contrary.

Should my amendment be adopted, the permanent residence of the justices of the Supreme Court at the city of Washington would not be a thing of course. There would be no necessity for it. But suppose they should come to this city to reside, could they not acquire as much valuable information from the lawyers, and judges, and other citizens, who resort to this place, from the several States, as they could obtain while on their circuits? Besides, if it requires any eye to watch over them, would they not be subjected here to the severe scrutiny of the President, the Senate, and the immediate representatives of the people? If, however, the residence of the justices at Washington be objectionable, it affords an additional reason for having two or three terms a year of the Supreme Court, instead of one. If one term of the court be held at the city of Washington, and one or two other terms be held at one or two of the following places, namely, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, or New York, some of the advantages would be obvious. It would remove the objection, if there be any thing in it, against the justices residing at any one place. They would naturally reside at different places about the country, as they now do. It would prevent delay, and make justice more prompt, by the frequency of the terms. It would be a great accommodation to suitors, by the great saving of time and expense to them. It would carry the court home to the people, and among the people. Sir, I agree that judges, to be good judges, should be employed, and constantly employed. But it is the employment of the mind that makes the judge. It is the time spent in the study, in the acquisition of legal science, and not in stages, in traversing the country, that makes the profound jurist. I have not been able to ascertain the quantity of business the court now has to do. The honorable gentleman seemed to think it might all be done in six weeks or two months. This appears to me to be too low an estimate. But, whatever the fact may be, it is very easy to give the court enough to do. By simply extending the right of appeal, there would soon be enough for the court to do.

My conviction is thorough, that the justices of the Supreme Court ought to be withdrawn from the circuits. I see no other way to maintain the integrity of the court, which I deem not more essential to its safety than to its usefulness. Think of it as we may, still this high tribunal occupies the neutral ground between the twenty-five governments and the people. No matter whether the oppression or the wrong proceed from the federal or from a State government. Uncontrolled power is the enemy of liberty, and the people's tyrant. It is, therefore, between the governments and the governed, between the powers and the duties of the people's agents, and the rights and privileges of the people themselves, that this court is the constitutional judge, and the sole judge. And he assumes a fearful responsibility who impairs this last and strongest citadel, to which man can flee for the protection of liberty or life.

Mr. POLK next rose. He said that, in considering the bill now before the committee, and the amendment offered as a substitute for it by the gentleman from New York, who had just resumed his seat, he perfectly agreed both with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and with the gentleman from New York, that, whatever the judicial system of the United States be, it should be uniform; that the inferior judicial tribunals, however organized, and with whatever jurisdiction and power it was deemed wise to invest them, as well as the mode of administering justice, should be the same in every portion of the Union. If (said Mr. P.) "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," and if the States are entitled to be governed (as far as this Government can legitimately extend its authority) by equal and uniform laws, operating alike upon every portion of the country, it is difficult to perceive upon what principle it is that the judicial system extended to one portion of the Union should be withheld from another. All the States are equal in point of dignity and of rights. The principles of this bill I prefer to the amendment, though I am not entirely satisfied with either. The bill proposes no new system, but an extension of the old one, long enjoyed by the Atlantic States, to the Western country. I could have wished that its provisions had not only extended the system, but have made it the same in all the States. The West asks this; and is her request unreasonable? In the Atlantic States there is no complaint. There should be none in the nine Western States. Your judiciary ought to expand itself with the growth and population of the country. The system which has been tested by the experience of forty years in the Atlantic States, and which was adapted to our condition in our infancy, has not been enlarged so as to suit us in our manhood. We have outgrown the garment that then fitted us, and it is now too small. Six of the Western States are wholly without the benefit of the present circuit court system, (having only district courts,) and it has been but imperfectly extended to the seventh circuit, composed of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, as I shall presently endeavor to show.

In order to show more distinctly the inequality of the present system as regards the Western States, compared with those east of the Alleghany mountains, it may be well to look, for a moment, to the judicial history of the United States, and to ask of gentlemen here representing the East, why this inequality should have been permitted so long to remain, and what sensible reason there can be now to refuse the remedy.

When the judiciary act of September, 1789, was passed, there were but ten States in the Union; North Carolina, Rhode Island, and Vermont came into the Union subsequently to the passing of that act; and the system which it provided was extended to the former in June, 1790, and to the latter in March, 1791. At the date of that act, with only ten States in the Union, and with a population not exceeding one-third of the present population of the twenty-four States, it was deemed necessary to appoint six judges of the Supreme Court. The States were divided into three circuits, the Eastern, Middle, and Southern. North Carolina was attached to the Southern, and Rhode Island and Vermont to the Eastern circuits, as they respectively came into the Union. Two judges of the Supreme Court were required to preside in each circuit with the respective district judges, and constituted the circuit court, until the act of March, 1793, when one judge of the Supreme Court and the district judge composed the circuit court, who were required to alternate or interchange circuits with each other. It is not my purpose to detain the committee by a minute account of the judicial history, further than to show the inequality of the system as it operates in the different States. The chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in his opening argument, has relieved me from the necessity of doing so. Thus the system continued until the famous act of the 18th February, 1801, familiarly known to the country as the midnight system. By that act, the Supreme Court judges were relieved from circuit court duties, and were to constitute an appellate court alone. Many additional circuit judges were created and commissioned, two of whom, with the district judge, constituted a court termed a circuit court. This system is not precisely the same with that proposed by the gentleman from New York, but differs from it only in this, that the gentleman's amendment does not propose the appointment of circuit judges, but to invest the district judges with circuit court powers. At the first session of Congress after Mr. Jefferson came into office, the system of 1801 was repealed, and the new judges legislated out of office; and, at the same session, the former system was reorganized, with slight and immaterial alterations from that of 1793, not important here to mention, and the system which we now have was established. At the reorganization of the system in 1802, Kentucky and Tennessee had been admitted into the Union. Ohio came in shortly afterwards. They were left with only district courts—being at that time unimportant districts, with a sparse and comparatively small population, with but little judicial business to transact, falling within the jurisdiction conferred upon the federal courts. In 1807, they had grown in numbers, in business, and importance, to such an extent, that a law was passed constituting them into a circuit, and appointing a seventh judge of the Supreme Court, who was allotted to that circuit; and who, with the respective district judges in those three States, constitute circuit courts. Louisiana was admitted into the Union in 1812, Indiana in 1816, Mississippi in 1817, Illinois in 1818, Alabama in 1819, Maine in 1820, and Missouri in 1821. The circuit court system was extended to Maine at the same session of Congress that she was admitted into the Union as a free and independent State. The other six States, although admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, have, to this hour, only district courts. No judge from that quarter of the Union has a place upon the bench of the Supreme Court. No judge of the Supreme Court ever aids the district judge in the trial of causes in that quarter of the Union. The constitution, the treaties, and laws of the United States, the constitution and laws of the States, which may be drawn in question in this court, affecting these junior members of the confederacy, in common with the older States, are now expounded by a court of the last resort, composed of six judges east of the Alleghany, and but one west of it, and that one having no connection with these six States. They have no participation, direct or indirect, in this high tribunal, in protecting or defending the lives, the liberties, or the property of their citizens. Sir, the population of these six Western States is already great, and is rapidly increasing. It is already near two millions of inhabitants. More than twenty-two years have elapsed since the system was extended, imperfectly as it is, to the seventh circuit. Within that period the thick forests of the valley of the Mississippi have been filled by your enterprising and adventurous citizens; and the vast region, then an uninhabited waste, but recently reclaimed from its savage possessors, now swarms with a dense, a free, and a happy population of civilized freemen. The judicial business has increased to such an extent, that they feel the inconvenience of their exclusion from the benefits of the circuit court system, and they clamor for its extension. So great has the judicial business become, that you have already found it necessary, in two of these States, (Louisiana and Alabama,) to establish two district courts in each of them. And let me say, sir, that the district courts at New Orleans and Mobile—whether regarded from the quantity of business which they do, or from the great importance of the legal questions which it often becomes their duty to decide—are second in importance to but few courts in the Union. Are these new States, let me ask, always to remain in their present condition—as judicial provinces? If they are not, has not the time come to extend to them the benefits of the system which you enjoy east of the Alleghany ridge?

I come now to speak more particularly of the seventh circuit; of the inadequacy of the system as at present extended there, and of the utter inability, the physical as well as mental inability, of any one man to perform, as he should, the various duties that devolve upon him in that extensive circuit. In addition to the large territorial extent of that circuit, and the great distance of travel which the judge has annually to perform, in attending the courts at Columbus, at Frankfort, at Nashville, at Knoxville, and the Supreme Court in this city, and in addition to the cases within the jurisdiction of that court, common to all the States, there is a very large mass of litigation there, in regard to land titles, which is scarcely known in the Eastern States. The land litigation in that circuit, over which this court has concurrent jurisdiction with the State courts, is more extensive, and the cases more numerous than in all the Eastern States together. Many of the lands in Tennessee were patented by the State of North Carolina more than forty years ago, when the territory belonged to that State, and when the lands were subject to the Indian possession; and many of the lands have been patented by Tennessee since she has been a member of the Union. It is a fact that cannot be controverted, and need not be concealed, that such is the intricacy and complexity of the land laws of North Carolina and Tennessee, constituting almost a volume of themselves, and certainly forming a distinct code different from any other I have ever seen, that but few men of the profession of law in that State with years of study and constant practice in the courts, have ever acquired the reputation of being sound land lawyers. Such was the peculiar system of acquiring titles to lands, and such the looseness and uncertainty which prevailed in practice, both in North Carolina, and afterwards practised upon in Tennessee, that one of the greatest scourges that has ever visited the people of that State is the uncertainty of their land titles, and the vast amount of litigation that has grown out of this state of things. Much the greater portion of this description of litigation, I hope, indeed I know, has been disposed of; but, at the same time, much, I fear, yet remains to be settled. This description of litigation, added to the other business, over which the court has jurisdiction, is one great cause of the great delay of justice in the federal court at Nashville. The chairman of the committee has already stated the fact, as represented by the bar of that place, to this House, several years ago, that such was the delay of justice in that court, that some of the causes on the docket were older than the professional career of almost every member of that bar, some of whom had been in practice a dozen and more years. In Kentucky and Ohio, but more especially in the former, much litigation of the same character has existed. Kentucky, when a part of Virginia, was, in great part, patented by the State; and many of the lands in some portions of Ohio were patented by Virginia and other States. The Representatives from both these States inform us, that the courts there have not the time nor the ability to dispose of the causes upon their respective dockets. If this be the fact, and it cannot be controverted, of what consequence is it, that, upon your statute books, you extend the circuit court system to those three States; but so overburden the judge that is allotted to that circuit, that he has neither the merits nor the physical ability to do the business? When those three States were constituted into a circuit in 1807, their population did not exceed half a million of souls. It amounts now to more than two millions. Then the litigation was comparatively small; now it is great.

I have thus attempted to present to this committee the true present condition of the nine Western and Southwestern States, in reference to the operation of the federal judiciary within their limits. That condition presents many evils and inconveniences that require a remedy. What that remedy should be, it will be proper that I should next consider.

And first, will this bill afford the remedy which the existing evils require? It will unquestionably in part, and but in part, remedy some of the existing inconveniences of the present organization of the courts; but I regard it as a misfortune that the Judiciary Committee who reported it had not gone further, and afforded a complete remedy. Three additional judges, instead of two, would have enabled us so to arrange the circuits as to extend equal justice to the West, and to afford a system that will require no alteration or extension in all time. This bill makes no provision for the western district of Louisiana, or the northern district of Alabama. The courts at Opelousas and at Huntsville are still to be left with only district courts. The four States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, are crowded into one circuit; Kentucky and Tennessee are united in one circuit; and the southern district of Alabama, Mississippi, and the eastern district of Louisiana, are thrown in one circuit. Sir, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has stated that Tennessee and Kentucky must be united in one circuit, however reluctant the Union may be. That, he says, is the only arrangement by which nine judges can be made to answer for the present. That gentleman, when this subject was last before Congress, in 1826, voted with a large majority of this House to separate Kentucky and Tennessee, and throw them into different circuits, because of the undue proportion of judicial business in those two States; that gentleman, at that time, voted for ten judges instead of nine. He then thought less than ten judges would not do. If it was then proper to separate Tennessee and Kentucky, what has since occurred to render it so peculiarly necessary to unite them now? If the state of the Western country was in such a condition then, that, in the opinion of the gentleman, ten judges were required to do the business, what has since occurred to change that opinion? Has not the Western country been advancing rather than receding in population, since that time? Has the judicial business decreased, or, rather, has not the gentleman himself labored to prove to us that it has increased since that time? At that time, I believe, it was admitted by all who advocated the extension of that system, that less than ten judges would not afford a remedy for the evils of which the West complained. The then chairman of the Judiciary Committee in this House, (now a Senator from Massachusetts,) in reporting the bill with ten judges, I well remember, stated that he rather assented to ten judges, than recommended their appointment at that time. He rather inclined to prefer nine to ten judges, but ultimately voted for ten. I see gentlemen around me noting this. They will be pleased to note, too, the ground upon which that opinion was expressed by the then chairman of the Judiciary Committee. It was that, in his opinion, the three Northwestern States (Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri) "might well enough go on for some time longer, and form a circuit of themselves, perhaps, hereafter, as the population shall increase, and the state of affairs require it."

The Judiciary.

[H. OF R.]

This was the only plan by which the then chairman of the committee thought it practicable to make two additional justices of the Supreme Court answer the demands—the just demands of the West. It was to leave Missouri, Indiana, and Illinois, with only district courts for the time being, and constitute them into a circuit at some future period. The bill in 1826, after a protracted discussion of many weeks, passed this House, adding three additional judges to the Supreme Court, making the whole number ten. The same bill passed the Senate with the same number of judges, but was amended in that body so as to change the two northwestern circuits in their arrangement. The bill, as it passed this House, placed Ohio and Kentucky in the seventh circuit, in which there was already a judge residing, and constituted Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri into a separate circuit. The Senate passed the bill without alteration in its material parts; but proposed to change those to circuits, so as to make Kentucky and Missouri the seventh circuit, and to constitute Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois into a circuit. The bill, as it passed both in the Senate and in the House, placed Tennessee and Alabama in one circuit, and Mississippi and Louisiana in another. In consequence of this immaterial difference of opinion between the two Houses in the arrangement of the two northwestern circuits, the bill unfortunately failed between the two Houses. Although the two Houses then agreed in opinion that it was proper to extend the system, and to add three additional judges to the bench of the Supreme Court, yet, in consequence of this unimportant difference of opinion about these two districts, the Western country remains to this hour without the enjoyment of the system which that bill proposed to extend to her. Let, then, additional judges be appointed in the West, and let the circuits be properly arranged, and the system will last for all time. When Florida, Arkansas, and Michigan come into the Union, (and the period is not very distant when we may expect their accession to the Union,) they can be very naturally attached to the adjacent circuits, without much increasing the duties of the judges. To make the system entirely uniform I would attach the northern district of New York, the western district of Pennsylvania, and the western district of Virginia, if the gentlemen from those quarters of the Union desire it, to the respective circuits already established east of the Alleghany, which they adjoin. Your system would then possess no anomalies, it would have symmetry in all its parts. If the amendment of the gentleman from New York should be rejected, and no other gentleman does, I will, myself, propose an amendment to make the system such as I have indicated. If the House shall decide to appoint only two additional judges, then justice will require that the eastern circuits should be enlarged, so as to give the services of one, at least, of the judges now east of the mountains to the West.

What, sir, let me inquire, is the amendment of the gentleman from New York, so far as the Supreme Court, as a mere Supreme Court, is concerned, but a re-enactment of the system of 1801? It proposes to withdraw the judges of the Supreme Court from their circuit duties, and to constitute them a permanent appellate court. So did the act of 1801. It provides that the circuit courts shall be abolished, and that the district courts shall possess the jurisdiction and powers of the present circuit courts. If the amendment offered had gone on to provide for the appointment of two additional judges in each circuit, to hold the courts with the respective district judges, it would have been precisely the system of 1801. This is the only difference. The amendment has only this to recommend it which that system had not, that it does not increase the number of the inferior judges and does not enlarge the patronage of the Executive.

When we contemplate the system proposed by the gentleman's amendment, in the most dispassionate manner, there are many and irresistible objections to it. Some of these have already been stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in his general remarks in the opening of this debate. If the judges of the Supreme Court are confined exclusively to their appellate duties in bank, there is danger—indeed it is almost certain that they will cease to employ themselves in the recess of the Supreme Court, in the dry, laborious, and uninteresting employment of reading the statutory codes of twenty-four States, and the judicial decisions of the State courts founded upon these codes scattered through a hundred volumes, and all of which it is necessary they should understand. No man with the most unremitted application and study, can be so good a lawyer, no man can be so good a judge of the lex loci, or statute law of a State, who is confined to the trial of appeals and writs of error at Washington, as one who presides on the trial of the cause in the inferior court, where the law, and the decisions of the State in which it prevails, are familiar to the profession of that State, who elucidate and apply it in argument in the court below. The great advantage derived from the present circuit system, is, that, by requiring each judge of the Supreme Court to preside with the district judge in the trial of causes in the inferior courts, you make him familiar with the statute or local law within his circuit. And when the Supreme Court assembles in bank to try appeals and writs of error, some one of the judges is always familiar with the law upon which the decision of the case may depend, and by this knowledge is enabled to abridge the labor of his associates, and afford them facilities in examining the case, and in arriving at a just conclusion. What judge permanently located at Washington, however vigorous his intellect, and however profound his knowledge of the fundamental principles of the law may be, but who never presided over the trial of an ejectment in Kentucky or Tennessee, if left to grope his way unaided by the argument of counsel from that quarter of the Union, can ever understand or properly expound the intricate local laws of these States? What judge can understand the lex loci of Louisiana, where the principles of the civil law obtain? In a word, what one man, wholly relieved from the trial of causes in the court below, can or will ever understand the separate and distinct codes of these twenty-four States? Even by the present circuit court system, in those States to which it has been extended, no single judge has an accurate knowledge of the statutory codes of all these States; but when assembled in the Supreme Court, they bring together an aggregate of legal information, which no one singly possesses, and which could not be possessed by any, if they were withdrawn from their circuits. If the judges of the Supreme Court are required to preside only in the Supreme Court, they will have nine or ten months of leisure in the year, which they can, and probably will, employ in more pleasing pursuits than in poring over musty volumes of statutes. It has been often justly remarked that constant employment on the bench, and being constantly thrown in collision with the profession, makes the best judge; or, as it has been aptly expressed, "the judge who tries the most causes is the best judge." The gentleman from New York thinks that there is not much in the argument, that the judges upon the circuit can acquire legal information that will be useful to the Supreme Court assembled in bank; and he puts a case. Suppose, says he, the court to consist of nine judges, and each to perform circuit duties. One of these judges presides on the trial of a cause at New Orleans, and there is a writ of error to the Supreme Court; one judge will understand the municipal law of Louisiana upon which the case depends; the remaining eight do not, but must investigate it for themselves. The case put by the gentleman illustrates and enforces the argument which I have stated. Suppose the ninth judge had not presided on the trial at New Orleans—then the whole court would have been without the necessary legal information. Did it not occur to the gentleman in the case stated by him, that it was better for one to possess the information, than that none should? Did it not occur to him that the judge who had the information might afford facilities to his associates, by pointing them to the authorities which would throw light upon the questions to be decided?

THURSDAY, January 21.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, on the 14th instant, and laid on the table; which he now modified so as to read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House with a register, exhibiting in each and every year, the names and number of all the cadets that have been received into the Military Academy of the United States from its first establishment until the present time. Also, the names and number of applicants rejected; the States from which they came respectively; distinguishing between those who have graduated and received commissions, and such as have withdrawn or have been dismissed from the institution; how many have been in said academy, whose fathers and guardians were, or are now, members of Congress, or other officers of the General Government, or Governors of States, and how many such are now there; what the monthly pay of the cadets, and whether they are supplied with rations, fuel, quarters, &c., at the public expense, or are furnished by themselves; stating also, as far as practicable, what proportion of them (if any) were in circumstances too indigent to be educated on their own means, or those of their parents; the names and number of those graduates now in the army of the United States; also, the names and number of the professors, instructors, and all other officers employed in said academy, with their pay and emoluments—adding thereto the entire aggregate expense of the institution, annually, with such remarks as may explain and elucidate the whole."

Mr. INGERSOLL said, a call for information is one of the last things which he ever permitted himself to oppose. Nor did he rise now so much to interpose an objection to the call, as to refer the honorable mover of the resolution to several reports from the War Department in the library of the House, which will be found to contain nearly all that is sought for by the proposed inquiry. If, after looking into these documents, the gentleman from South Carolina should still wish to urge the passage of his resolution, although he (Mr. I.) might deem it in the main unnecessary, yet he could not say that he should vote against it, so reluctant was he, as a general rule, to put any obstacle in the way of an inquiry, directed to one of the executive departments, that any member should see fit to suggest. This military academy is one of those establishments that has been probably more closely watched than any other within the range of our legislation; and there have been, from time to time, so many searching resolutions sent to the War Department on its account, that there is hardly a spot left which we may wish to touch by a resolution that has not been covered by some previous call. These inquiries, so far as they had fallen within his observation, have been, in every instance, promptly and fully responded to by the department under different administrations; volume after volume of reports are sent to us, printed, bound, and placed upon the shelves of the library, not, sir, it would seem, to be opened by us, for whose benefit, and at whose beck, but not at whose expense, they were placed there, but to be followed by other fresh volumes, embracing the same facts, and sent to every new Congress, in reply to the requisition of some honorable member, to whom, as a matter of course, we extend the courtesy of our votes. This practice, he thought, was going too far. Why repeat these drafts upon the department, when, by looking at our own documents, we can find, ready printed, the very information for which we are looking elsewhere? But, to come to the resolution now before us: it asks for a list of cadets who have belonged to the academy since 1802, noting those who have been commissioned in the army, and those who have left without commissions. Now turn to the volume of documents for 1824, and we shall find a very full and lucid report from the then Secretary of War, (the present Vice President,) bringing the required information up to that period. It gives us the number admitted in each year; the number who have completed the regular course of studies; a list of those who have received commissions, and those who have been dismissed, or permitted to depart, without commissions, from the first establishment of the institution, under President Jefferson, to the then present time. But this is not all, nor a tenth part of what we have drawn from the department in relation to it. In 1822, the House, in answer to one of its resolutions, was furnished with a list of all the cadets who had left the academy without entering the army, and the amount of money paid to each during the five preceding years; also, a list of such officers as have been educated there, and who served during the last war. What more can you reach by this resolution (in regard to these particulars) than you already have, for the time, covered by these reports? Subsequent reports, and the blue book, which is put into the hands of every Congress, and which will be in a few days upon our tables, bring the information up to the present time. Besides, we had a report at the last session from the gentleman then at the head of the department, (General PORTER,) which gave us the number of cadets commissioned since 1820, designating those now in the army; and his predecessor, (Mr. BARBOUR,) in the session before, sent us, in answer to a call, a particular statement of the expenses of the institution, from year to year, ever since it was organized. What else do we now ask for? Why, that the Secretary of War would tell us how much the monthly pay of a cadet is. What, sir, after having made a law ourselves establishing the pay, shall we send elsewhere to be informed as to the wages we ourselves allow? Shall we who are a part of the legislative branch of the Government, send to an executive department to learn the tenor of our own laws? This would be an anomaly in legislation. If you wish for such information, open your statute books, would be a very proper answer of the Secretary to such an inquiry. But, as if to render this part of the call doubly useless, we have been furnished, for nearly fourteen years past, with a minute statement, in the blue book, of the names and number of all connected with the academy, whether as teachers or cadets, the States from thence they come, and an accurate account, in dollars and cents, of the sums paid to each. Other calls and other reports, similar in kind, might be referred to; for there has hardly been a session during the last ten or dozen years, that a paper shot has not been aimed at West Point from this or the other branch of Congress.

But a few words as to another item; the resolution asks for a list of officers now in the army, who were educated at the academy. Precisely this list was furnished but one year ago by the late Secretary, and is with the rest carefully bound in one of the volumes of the documents of the last Congress: surely it cannot be necessary to send again to the department to have the names written by one of the clerks, when we have them in print, at the command of every gentleman who wishes to see them.

Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, said, it had then become necessary that he should state his reasons for offering the resolution; and, in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut, it was sufficient to say, that any document or report we have ever had in relation to the Military Academy, was quite deficient in details, and altogether silent as regarded several important items of information called for by the resolution. He had examined those documents, (he said,) the most ample of which was the report made in 1828, and it was, as he had stated, quite deficient. He thought full and entire information in relation to that very expensive, if not important institution of our country, would have been desirable, not only to the Military Committee of which he was a member, but to Congress generally, and to the nation. He, therefore, had not been disposed to make a speech in support of a mere call for information. He thought he should be regarded as bestowing a poor compliment on the intelligence and honest intentions of that House, were he to offer reasons or arguments in support of such a proposition; and believing there could be no reasonable objection to the adoption of the resolution, he had been disposed to submit it to the decision of the House without a single comment. He certainly had not (he said) anticipated the opposition to the resolution which it now seemed destined to encounter. Some of the senior members of the House, (he said,) to whose examination it had been submitted before it was presented, thought it ought to pass, and would pass, as "a matter of course." Surely (said Mr. B.) it cannot be the policy of this House to suppress information, full and entire information, as to the utility and operation of one of the most expensive establishments of the Government, particularly when it is well known that jealousy and prejudice exist against the institution to a very great extent. Suppressing or limiting the information now called for, would not (he said) lessen the jealousy, or obviate the prejudice of which he had spoken. Many well-meaning and well-informed men (said Mr. B.) regard this military academy as the hot-bed of a military aristocracy. They view it as a dangerous excrescence of the Government that ought to be out off. In its original organization, under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, it was intended only to educate a few military engineers, to construct, when necessary, military fortifications, &c. But it has been perverted from its original and legitimate object, and changed, by "piecemeal," into what it is at present, and what, originally, would have been regarded as highly inexpedient on account of its expense, and quite unauthorized by the constitution on account of its objects. It is believed, too, that the public utility resulting from it, if any, is far outweighed by its cost; and although it is nominally a military school, open to all, yet it is, in fact, a school only for the great and the wealthy, where none but the sons or favorites of men possessing power or popularity can be entered—most of whom, after being educated at the public expense, retire to private life, while at the same time the expenditures of the establishment (as was well known to all) were drawn from the pockets of the poor as well as the rich. He knew it would be said the poor were received into the Military Academy, as well as the opulent. Well, (said Mr. B.) this is one thing among many others that I wished to ascertain by the resolution I have offered. The fact is doubted—or if a few instances can be adduced where poor friendless cadets have been nurtured by the institution, they only weigh as the "dust in the balance" against those of the opposite description; and if not dismissed for incompetency—as it rarely happens that a poor, friendless lad can obtain credit even for a little common sense—they are retained only in a few solitary instances merely to "save appearances."

Mr. B. said further, if the inquiry was permitted to be made to the extent he proposed, he thought it would be found that the patronage, favors, and benefits of the institution were principally bestowed upon those least in need of them; he meant the sons and favorites of the wealthy—men possessing office and authority; who would be educated if the Military Academy had never existed—and who, not being absolutely dependent on arms, or any other profession or business, generally preferred their ease to a continuance in the public service; and, indeed, if they continued in service, we would soon have more officers than men.

Sir, (said Mr. B.), all those objections, and all those doubts and suspicions are entertained by a respectable portion of the community. He, therefore, thought the friends of the institution (if indeed those doubts and suspicions were unfounded) ought to encourage a full and complete inquiry into all those matters. If the operation of the institution had been as beneficial and impartial as its friends seemed to imagine, they had nothing to fear from the inquiry. If (said Mr. B.) they have done well in fixing upon us this expensive establishment, I hope they will not refuse to exhibit its results. "They ought not to keep their candle under a bushel." If (said he) the institution has operated impartially and for the public good, a development of its merits will make it more popular. If, on the contrary, it is partial and exclusive in its operations—carrying with it some latent danger—and is, at the same time, more expensive than useful, the sooner it can be known the better—and it ought to be known both in and out of the House—it ought to be generally and universally known. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would be adopted. The information it contemplated, was altogether desirable; as a member of the military committee he asked it; as a member of that House he requested it; and as one of the American people he demanded it.

Mr. B. concluded by offering a modification, by adding after the words "members of Congress," all other officers of the General Government, or Governors of States.

Mr. DORSEY said he hoped the gentleman would accept a verbal amendment which he was about to offer. He professed himself a friend to the institution. He wished to see it flourish—he wished to allay all prejudice against it. It had been his uniform temper and disposition to encourage resolutions for inquiry, and he should not object to it on this occasion. But he could not consent to a resolution which would emblazon to the world the names of juvenile delinquents, who might now be useful members of society and ornaments of their country. He could not agree to harrow up the feelings of fathers and families, by publishing the names of such as may have been expelled or discharged for boyish indiscretion, which the individual guilty of them may now deeply deplore. He asked what earthly good could result from it? After some further remarks, he proposed to amend the resolution by striking out, 1st, "names and" where they occur the first time; 2d, "how many have been in said academy, whose fathers or guardians were, or are now, members of Congress or other officers of the General Government, or Governors of States;" 3d, "also, as far as practicable, what proportion of them (if any) were in circumstances too indigent to be educated on their own means, or those of their parents."

Mr. BLAIR replied, that he would have no objection to any amendment that would make the inquiry more broad, or render the desired information more ample and complete; but the amendment proposed would have the opposite tendency. It would, if adopted, render the resolution almost a nullity, make it quite useless. Indeed, (he said,) he should regard the adoption of the proposed amendment as tantamount to a rejection of the resolution itself. The names (he said) were essential for the purpose of showing how the patronage of the institution had been bestowed, and to what class of society its benefits had been confined. For example, (said Mr. B.,) suppose that ten cadets, from South Carolina, Maryland, or any other State, have been dismissed from the Military Academy, without their names; how are the people, or how are we, to ascertain to what rank of society they belong? Without their names it would be impossible to determine that point. He disclaimed every thing invidious, or calculated to reflect censure on the members of Congress; or to attach criminality to those who had recommended applicants for admission into the Military Academy. In that respect, (he said,) he presumed all, or nearly all, were equally guilty. He himself had, on one occasion, made such a recommendation, and it had been successful. He again repeated, he meant nothing invidious, and was not disposed to wound the feelings of any one, or to hold them up as objects of scorn or derision; and he was sure the report called for by the resolution could not have that effect, inasmuch as the cause of dismissal was not required. But the names being necessary to show how the patronage of the institution had been bestowed, he hoped they would not be stricken out. It was true (he said) that some small part of the information called for might be found in reports made heretofore; and that the pay, &c., of the cadets was fixed by law. But all this was scattered—little as it was, it was scattered through various documents; and those who might have an opportunity to peruse the report, might not have it in their power to examine the law. But few of the people could ascertain the laws of Congress on any subject; and his object was to have the whole of the information, contemplated by the resolution, in one document, that members might not be under the necessity of hunting through half a dozen offices, and plodding through twice that number of documents, for a few items of information about the Military Academy.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, followed with some remarks on the subject of the resolution.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. BLAIR, of South Carolina, on the 14th instant, the question being on the amendments moved by Mr. DORSEY, yesterday. The first amendment was rejected; and the question being on the second,

Mr. CROCKETT, of Tennessee, hoped the amendments would not be agreed to. He labored under a considerable responsibility respecting this academy; he himself was opposed to the school; and as it was possibly for the want of knowledge, he wished to have all the information he could get respecting it. His responsibility arose from the views of his State on the subject. The Legislature had proposed to instruct the Senators and requested the Representatives from that State in Congress to oppose the West Point Academy in every shape; and although the instructions did not pass, his own immediate constituents would expect him to promote the fullest inquiry into the management of the institution. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would be adopted, as it was originally proposed. If any thing is wrong, we ought to see it; and I, said Mr. C., would vote against every appropriation for the academy, unless I can get full information of its concerns and management. I wish to know if it has been managed for the benefit of the noble and wealthy of the country, or of the poor and orphan. There was nothing unreasonable in the call proposed by the resolution, and he approved it in its full extent. He concluded by demanding the yeas and nays on its adoption.

Mr. HAYNES demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment, but the House refused them.

The second and third amendments were then successively rejected by large majorities.

Mr. CONDOR then moved to strike out these words: "The names of those who have withdrawn or have been dismissed from the institution." It might be, and doubtless was the case, he said, that many had been dismissed, or had withdrawn, in consequence of deficiency in mental ability, or from sickness; and was it right to hold up their names to the public, as suffering disgrace, without having committed any fault? This would be an act of wanton cruelty to the parents and friends of the young men, and of harshness towards themselves, which he hoped the House would not sanction.

Mr. HAYNES did not think any thing would be gained by the amendment, and that every thing ought to be known in relation to the academy and the cadets.

Mr. INGERSOLL supported the amendment, and Mr. BLAIR and Mr. TUCKER opposed it; and it was rejected without a count.

Mr. TEST then proposed, as an amendment, to add the words, "and how many leave the institution annually." This, also, was negative.

Mr. WICKLIFFE thought this institution had almost lost the original character given to it by its founder, Mr. Jefferson, in 1802, and he wished copies of the Register of the Academy to be furnished for every year from its commencement, that its operations might be traced through to the present time.

This addition was accepted by the mover of the resolution, and the question recurred on the resolution as amended.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, was not opposed, he said, to obtaining any information which might be deemed necessary by any committee or member of the House. He therefore would not object to this resolution, if it were in a form which he could approve. This, however, was not the case; and he pointed out some of its features, which he deemed not only useless, because the information could not be furnished, but invidious and improper if it could be. The resolution requires, for instance, that the Secretary of War report to the House, "how many have been in said academy, whose fathers or guardians were members of Congress, and how many such are now there." This is a strange inquisition, said Mr. E., for this House, even if it could be made with success, which it could not be with any materials in possession of the War Department. Another branch of the resolution requires the Secretary to report, "as far as practicable, what proportion of the cadets (if any) were in circumstances too indigent to be educated on their own means, or those of their parents." In the first place, it would be impossible for the Secretary, from any records in his office, to ascertain the circumstances of those who had sent their sons to the academy; and, secondly, said Mr. E., no man, however opulent, could obtain for his son an education elsewhere, such as that institution afforded. He knew something, personally, of the character and extent of the instruction given there, and he did not hesitate to say that no man, whatever his fortune, could obtain for his son the same education at any other institution. The ability of a man, moreover, to give his son an education on his own means, depended on many circumstances which Mr. E. particularized; and he argued at some length to show the impracticability of obtaining the information called for, as well as its useless and improper nature, if it could be obtained. He concluded by moving the commitment of the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to—91 to 72.

Cultivation of the Sugar Cane, &c.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. SPENCER, of New York, from the Committee on Agriculture, on the 18th instant:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be procured, through the commanders of the public armed vessels, and our ministers and consuls abroad, such varieties of the sugar cane, and other cultivated vegetables, grains, seeds, and shrubs, as may be best adapted to the soil and climate of the United States.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be prepared a well-digested manual, containing the best practical information on the cultivation of sugar cane, and the fabrication and refinement of sugar, including the most modern improvements; and to report the same to the next session of Congress."

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, briefly explained the views of the Committee on Agriculture in reporting this resolution; the increasing importance of this culture; and the advantage of having the best species of cane, &c.

Mr. OHILTON, of Kentucky, without doubting that the proposed measure would advance the interest of the cultivators of sugar, said that he could not for the life of him discover why this article should be thus singled out for the special favor of Congress. It was well known to every gentleman, that a great part of the people of this country live, not by the cultivation of sugar, but of corn and various other products of the soil. Why then draw on the Treasury to purchase a book in relation to sugar particularly, the expense of which could not be known to any gentleman on this floor? Is the practical agriculturist—the honest farmer of the country, Mr. C. asked, thus favored? No, sir, he is not: his walk in life is humbler, and he does not make so conspicuous a figure on this floor. Had the gentleman proposed to search out the best seed of corn, or any of those fruits of the earth which enter so largely into the comforts of life, there would have been more reason in this proposition; but when only a small portion of the agriculture of the country was proposed to be encouraged at the expense of the rest, he felt bound to protest against it, in behalf of the common farmers—the people who are the stay of the Government in peace, and a strong pillar of defence in war. Why select a single staple to spend the public money upon? If gentlemen engaged in the cultivation of sugar wished this information, Mr. C. suggested that they had better be left to purchase it for themselves, and pay for it out of the rich revenues of their large estates, and not drain the Treasury to advance one interest at the expense of the rest.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, rose, and said: As I had the honor to introduce the resolution upon which the Committee on Agriculture were instructed to inquire into the expediency of the measure proposed, and now under consideration, it may be considered incumbent on me to say a word or two in its support. The article to which this resolution refers, is one of daily use, and almost universal consumption among all classes of the civilized world. From having been employed formerly as a medicine, it has now become one of the principal objects of consumption and commerce, combining value in use with value in exchange. It is no longer considered a luxury even to the poor, but of indispensable necessity, and general use. The measure proposed, to increase the product either for home consumption, or for foreign exportation, must be viewed as one of no small importance.

The depressed state of the cotton market, and its greatly diminished value, has given an increased interest to all suggestions for the promotion of other articles which promise advantage to the agriculturist, and an accumulation of the national wealth. The subject itself is not interesting alone to that geographical section of the country, in which the sugar-cane has been or may be cultivated; it connects itself with the wants and comforts of every consumer in the United States. The collection of different varieties of the cane found in more northern latitudes, the discovery of new processes in fabrication and manufacture, and the demonstration of the facts by experiment, attested by competent persons, will double the value of twenty millions of acres of land belonging to the United States, within the latitude in which there can be no question the cane will flourish. The expenses attending the cultivation of the cane so far exceed that of any other plant or vegetable, that those who embark in it properly must understand the grounds on which they proceed. Those who wish to extend it farther north cannot confine themselves to the very little information possessed in Louisiana and the West Indies. It is known that most valuable acquisitions to the stock of knowledge possessed by them have been made by the recent experiments in France and Spain on the beet root, and lately on the cane, in Guadaloupe. This subject has not only occupied the attention of the most profound chemists of the present day, but of the most practical political economists of Europe. The various works through which the scattered materials of a good system, or well-digested manual, might be formed, are not accessible to any one planter, and, even if obtained by any one, he has not the means of arranging, translating, and disseminating it for the general benefit.

The labors of De Caseaux and Detrone on the cane, and of Achard and Chaptal on the beet, have not been seen by perhaps a half dozen planters in this country, perhaps not a single one. The plan proposed for collecting in one convenient and accessible form this valuable information, is simple and inexpensive, and within the acknowledged powers of the Government. It has been the practice heretofore by a resolution similar to this, for the collection of facts as to the cultivation of silk, and the still more important instance in which Congress granted a township of land to French emigrants for the cultivation of the olive and vine.

It is not the planter and consumer alone that are interested in extending the cultivation of cane, and manufacture of sugar. The Western States have a new market opened for their provisions, and the Northern and Eastern for engines, kettles, mills, and machinery, from their iron foundries. There is no portion of our Union, and no class of our population, who are not deeply concerned in the promotion of this great and growing article of domestic industry. The French Government have deemed it an object of sufficient magnitude to devote to it a great deal of time and money.

This resolution proposes the collection and dissemination of the improvements made in the fabrication and refinement of sugar; and another, reported by the same, provides for the collection of all the varieties of the cane, from more northern latitudes. This is also proposed to be effected in an easy and inexpensive manner, through our consuls and commanders of foreign armed vessels from abroad.

There are now three kinds in the United States. The Creole, brought from Madeira; the Otaheite, from the islands of the Pacific Ocean; and the ribbon, from Batavia. If it be true that vegetables, like animals, become acclimated, and put on a thicker covering as they are gradually cultivated farther north, the same species, planted for centuries in a more rigorous climate, may have changed its properties most materially, and might now be transplanted in the same latitude on this continent, when it would require otherwise the same time here to climatize itself. We are said to be indebted to India for the cane, from whence it was carried to Persia and China, and from thence obtained by the Greeks and Romans, who, from want of knowledge of granulation, only used the juice as medicine. The Saracens carried it to Cyprus, Sicily, Spain, Madeira, and the Cape de Verd Islands. There can be no doubt but that a most valuable acquisition may be made to our natural agriculture by the adoption of these resolutions. I saw, only a few days since, in the work of a recent traveller in Peru, the return of an Intendant to the Government, in which it was stated that the sugar-cane in one of the provinces grew eleven months in the year, and ripened five feet high; and from their ignorance of the processes of sugar-making, it was difficult to produce any thing. In our country the cane only grows eight months, and only ripens two feet; and, destitute as we are of a full knowledge of the subject, our production is annually increasing. It was considered an experiment for fifteen years in the commencement of sugar-making in Louisiana. What was experiment then, is experience now. What is now doubt and uncertainty, will be practice and demonstration in a few years to come.

I cannot, for a moment, believe that a measure so simple and beneficial will not receive the concurrent vote of this House.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the resolutions, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

Diplomatic Expenses.

The bill making appropriations for the civil list for the current year being under consideration,

Mr. INGERSOLL said he rose to correct an error to which the debate of yesterday had led, in regard to one head of appropriation. He alluded to the salaries and outfits of foreign Ministers, and the contingent expenses of the missions. It had been yesterday stated by an honorable member of the Committee of Ways and Means, (Mr. VERPLANCK,) that, although the appropriation now asked for was large, in consequence of the new missions instituted during the recess of Congress, or rather by sending out new men to old missions, yet, that even the sum now required for these purposes did not swell the amount beyond our former appropriations for foreign missions. Indeed, it was said that the money required for our Ministers and diplomatic agents, under the last administration, had been more in some years than is now required. In these statements, he believed the honorable member who made them was wrong, entirely wrong; and he (Mr. I.) would now endeavor to set the matter right. There had not been a year during the preceding four years, that the diplomatic expenses had equalled the sum now asked for. No, sir, not excepting the year of the Panama mission, which had been the means of characterizing the late as a diplomatic administration, by those opposed to it, was there as much required as we are now about to appropriate. The bill proposes to give one hundred and eighty thousand dollars for the salaries and outfits of our diplomatic agents, and for the contingent expenses of the several missions. Let us compare this sum with what we gave in 1826, the first year of the late administration. By a careful examination of the act of that year, he found that, for these purposes, there was appropriated but one hundred and forty-seven thousand five hundred dollars. In 1827, we appropriated for the same objects one hundred and fifty-one thousand dollars. Well, sir, these were large sums, but still falling considerably short of what is now required. But these sums, though appropriated, were not all expended; and when we came to the year 1828, the gentleman then at the head of the State Department informed us that there was on hand an unexpended balance of former appropriations, amounting to one hundred thousand dollars, and he only asked for an additional sum of forty-nine thousand dollars to carry that branch of the service through the year. The next year, 1829, we appropriated by two acts, the one for the first quarter, and the next for the three quarters of the year, in all one hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars. The average amount for the four years of the late administration, was one hundred and twenty-one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars for each year, and we are now starting anew, by appropriating one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, to cover the expenses of diplomacy for the current year.

Mr. I. said he did not make these statements with a view of finding fault with the items which we are now considering, but he felt it due to others, as well as himself, to state, in as few words as he could, on which administration the difference of expenditure was chargeable.

Before he resumed his seat, he would say a few words as to the sources from which the outfits of the new Ministers, during the last summer, had been taken; because, as had been before stated yesterday, these outfits were said to be derived from the diplomatic fund; and we all know that the last Congress declined making any specific appropriations for outfits, nor is there any such thing as a diplomatic fund; he meant a fund by that name. The money, in the absence of a specific appropriation for outfits, was undoubtedly taken by the Executive from the item of contingent expenses. We had heard something about these contingent expenses, and also about the practice of paying outfits from such sources, a year or two ago. The Retrenchment Committee, he believed, had put the seal of condemnation on that practice; at any rate, another committee of the same Congress, the Committee on the Expenditures of the State Department, over which an honorable member over the way, from Tennessee, ably presided, had, in 1833, denied the rights of the Executive to pay diplomatic outfits, unless authorized by a specific appropriation. This, we are told, was the true doctrine then. The able report then drawn up by the committee took the ground that the contingent fund was not subject to the payment of salaries and outfits of Ministers and charges, their compensation being specific subjects of appropriation. The committee called that practice a usurpation of power, if he rightly remembered the term. He would not stop to ask whether that was defensible now, which was usurpation in 1833. His principal object was to correct the errors which had been, as he presumed, inadvertently made, in comparing the sums now asked with what had been given under a former administration; and, having accomplished his object in that particular, he should drop the subject.

Mr. VERPLANCK said he did not intend, yesterday, to make a comparison of the economy of this and the last administration, but had then found himself called upon to defend the committee which reported the bill. He had then unintentionally committed an error in the statement he made yesterday, by not adding to the one hundred and eighty thousand dollars the sum of thirty thousand dollars, when comparing the present appropriation with that of former years. Still, on the showing of the gentleman from Connecticut himself, the present appropriation is defensible, for, compared with that made the year of the Panama mission, it is very much less, and, with that of the preceding year, it is still three or four thousand dollars less. Mr. V. said he did not wish to turn this debate into a party question. The part of the bill containing provisions explains itself—and the cause of the increase is, that at the first year of a new administration, outfits are required which will not be necessary again. But, he said, since it was invited, he would make a relative comparison of the expenditures in this respect, from an estimate he had himself made. Mr. Adams was Secretary of State in

Diplomatic Expenses.

1825, when he was elected President, and he himself prepared the appropriation bills for the first year of his own administration. After a long series of appropriations for foreign intercourse, balances of appropriation for foreign intercourse had been left, and this advantage he had, besides, with his own political friends abroad; few recalls were necessary. Yet Mr. Adams obtained two hundred and thirteen thousand dollars for the first year of his administration. The year after, and corresponding with this year of the present administration, Congress had granted him for this object the sum of one hundred and eighty-seven thousand five hundred dollars, to which is to be added the appropriation of forty thousand dollars for the Panama mission. How stood the account of what was deemed necessary for the two first years of Mr. Adams's administration? The sum of four hundred and forty-two thousand dollars was deemed proper, and so estimated by the department, for the two first years of that administration. Let us take the two first years of the present administration, and examine what the amount of the corresponding appropriations will be. There was, when the last administration went out, a surplus of contingent funds in hand to a considerable amount. The Secretary of State, with a laudable accuracy, asked for no increase, but said the surplus fund (thirty thousand dollars) was sufficient. Under these circumstances, the sum of one hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars was appropriated last year, without any surplus fund. Public reasons—reasons which seemed good to the Executive, and which this was not the place to discuss, induced some recalls to be made, and other Ministers to be appointed in their place. Mr. Brown, besides, voluntarily returned from France, and it was necessary to appoint a successor to him. A full Minister, in consequence of the boundary question, was required in Holland, where a chargé only formerly was required. Under these circumstances, Government now asks for two hundred and ten thousand dollars, which will make an aggregate amount of three hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars for the two first years of General Jackson's administration, while that of the former administration, for the corresponding period, was four hundred and forty-two thousand dollars—the difference in favor of this administration being about one hundred thousand dollars. Whether even all this sum is to be expended, he could not say, although there was good reason to expect that even the whole of it would not be needed. The only information he had on this subject, was derived from the documents which have been transmitted to the House from the Executive within a few days—(the Message in relation to our foreign intercourse,) by which it appeared we were to go back to the good old act of 1810, which is to be in future strictly applied—a law, than which there is none in the statute book more precisely worded, nor one which had been more loosely construed. Thus, we shall not have any more constructive journeys—constructed messengers. We shall have no more outfits for accidental chargés for a six weeks' mission—no more appropriations of forty thousand dollars for roving Ministers to look for a Congress which was not to be found, unless, perhaps, in the moon, where, according to the old poetical fancy which had recently received the diplomatic sanction of Mr. Adams, "all things lost on earth are to be found."

Mr. INGERSOLL said he had not the most distant idea, when he rose on this subject, to give to the debate what the gentleman from New York (Mr. VERPLANCK) had called a party turn. It was in answer to an inquiry made by the Chairman of the Retrenchment Committee, said Mr. I., that, yesterday, I stated the causes of the increase, for the present year, of the diplomatic expenses of the country. I did this in as unexceptionable a manner as I was capable of doing it. The gentleman from New York followed on the other side, and saw fit to indulge in an unnecessary, and, as I thought, unmerited attack on the expenditures of the late administration. Whatever, therefore, of party has mingled in this discussion, the gentleman may thank himself for. I am acting, and have acted, on the defensive throughout. He now acknowledges that he was in part mistaken, yesterday, in his estimate of the expenses of the late administration, but still insists that the first year of Mr. Adams's was more expensive in this particular, than the first year of the present administration. If the gentleman will turn to the book, and examine for himself, he will find that he is as far out of the way here, as he was in his other statements yesterday. He is altogether mistaken in this matter, or there is no truth in figures. The year 1826 required but about one hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars for the missions, and all of that sum was not expended, but went to help out the expenditures of one of the succeeding years. Again, we are told that during Mr. Monroe's administration, and while the late President was in the Department of State, very large appropriations were made, the unexpended balances of which went to eke out the Ministers' salaries and perquisites, under the last administration. Surely he could not have been aware where this assertion was to lead him, or he would have paused much before he made it. Large diplomatic appropriations under Mr. Monroe, and through the influence of his Secretary of State! Why, sir, the largest appropriation made during that period was in 1825, when the new Governments on our own continent had been acknowledged independent; in consequence of which, the diplomatic corps was about doubled, and even then the amount appropriated for foreign missions was not over one hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars; still less, it will be observed, than you are now asking for by the bill on your table. Let us see how the other years preceding ranged, in these expenses, which we have been told were so enormous. In 1824, there was appropriated one hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars—not yet up to the mark of the present year. In 1823, only seventy-four thousand dollars were appropriated, not half of what is now required; and in 1822, there was appropriated eighty-three thousand dollars; that is, nearly one hundred thousand less than is now necessary to pay the diplomatic corps. Will it be said, in the face of these sums, that there was an extravagance in Mr. Monroe, chargeable to his Secretary of State, when not a year can be found in which these expenses have run up to their present amount? The gentleman from New York has indeed said, that it became necessary to reform some of the Ministers during the recess of Congress, and hence our present heavy expense. We once were taught to believe that reform and retrenchment were to go hand in hand; but they are now, it would seem, to be separated, and the first year of the reign of reform shows us, instead of a retrenchment, an increase which would of itself have broken down the administration which went before it. And not only an increase of this patronage, but even the doctrine of specific appropriations is getting to be rather obsolete, and outfits not provided for by the appropriation acts are now taken from the diplomatic fund. Let it not be said that I complain of this—the Executive has an undoubted right to do as has been done; but I do complain that gentlemen, when they get in, should so soon forget what was their favorite doctrine when they were out.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he had not expected that the House would have entered into a party debate upon this question, and he trusted it would not now seriously engage in such a discussion. The two gentlemen who had addressed the House upon different sides of the question, appeared to him to have taken but a narrow view of the subject. It was decidedly his opinion that, in our intercourse with foreign nations, we should pursue a liberal and wise, rather than a narrow and short-sighted policy. It was the interest and the duty of this country to cherish the good opinion of foreign nations; and in our intercourse with them, if we acted upon narrow principles, we might find that, in realizing a small gain, the country might sustain a heavy loss. We should view this subject as statesmen, and never hesitate to provide the means necessary to enable the Executive to sustain both the character and the cause of this country, in intercourse with other nations. Mr. B. said he was, therefore, astonished to hear gentlemen comparing the relative cost of our foreign intercourse in different years, and under different administrations, as if there were no other question to be considered, but which administration had spent the least money.

Sir, said Mr. B., I was one of those who condemned the last administration, not so much on account of the amount of its expenditures in our foreign intercourse, as because, in practice, it repealed the law of 1810. A practice had grown up within the last twenty years, which at least violated both the letter and the spirit of that act. One precedent in violation of law was established, which gave birth to many others. At last this act was so wholly disregarded by the last administration, that they suffered a Minister, upon leaving a foreign country, to convert his secretary of legation into a chargé des affaires, and as such paid a full salary and outfit, although he returned home a very short time after the Minister. This was not only without law, but expressly against law. He had not the least right to such an allowance. It was not a question whether the contingent fund ought to have been resorted to for his payment; but it was a case in which the President had no right, under the law, to allow him one cent, out of any fund, beyond his salary as secretary of legation. Mr. B. was willing that those matters should now rest in oblivion, and he would never voluntarily call them forth to the light. He had opposed the practice of the last administration, not because they had paid just demands out of the contingent fund, but because they had made donations to individuals in express violation of the existing laws.

Mr. B. said, the true reason why the appropriation necessary for our foreign intercourse was greater the present than it had been the past year, was, that several of our Ministers had been recalled, and others had been appointed in their stead, whom it was necessary to provide with outfits. Would any gentleman question the right of the Executive to pursue this course? For this conduct he was answerable to no tribunal but that of the American people. The appointment of foreign Ministers was peculiarly within the province of the Executive. The Constitution and laws of the United States had reposed in him this discretion; and it must be an extreme case indeed in which the House of Representatives ought to withhold the necessary appropriation. He presumed no gentleman in the House would say that such a case now existed. He had risen to say thus much; and he hoped to see the appropriation made without further discussion.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, said that he agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who had just taken his seat, as to the cause of the increase in the appropriation. That gentleman had stated it to be the recall of several of the foreign Ministers, and the outfits of their successors; and it was evident, from the comparison of the bill of this year with the appropriation law of the last, that such was the fact. He also agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the recall and appointment of Ministers was a matter of Executive discretion; and that it was only in an extreme case that the House would be justifiable in interposing to withhold an appropriation for the outfit of a Minister thus appointed. But Mr. E. begged to recall to the recollection of the House the manner in which this debate arose. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) had put the question to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, why the appropriation for the diplomatic service of the year amounted to one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, while, the last year, it was but one hundred and thirty-seven thousand dollars? To this inquiry the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had replied, that there had been, previous to the last year, an accumulation of unexpended balances of former appropriations, which had rendered it necessary to appropriate less for 1829; but that these surpluses being now all expended, a larger sum was required for this year. With great deference to the source from which this statement proceeded, Mr. E. could not agree to its correctness. He did not find, in looking at the estimate from the Department of State for 1829, that there was any such surplus under this head of appropriation.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. McDUFFIE rose in explanation. He said that it was far from his intention to make any party allusions, or any observations which could possibly be construed into such, in relation to that appropriation. He referred, on this point, to the explanation made by him on the preceding day, in answer to the member from Connecticut, (Mr. INGERSOLL,) and concluded by stating that he trusted he should not be considered an authority for the debate which had taken place.

Mr. EVERETT resumed. He said that the gentleman's explanation was in accordance with his own view of the case; and he was about himself immediately to state that the surplus alluded to was in a different fund, for which no appropriation at all was made in 1829; and that, consequently, the increase of forty thousand dollars in the diplomatic service of the present year, over the last, was not owing to any such surplus being added to the appropriation of 1829. It was an increase of expenditure, owing, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated, to the recall of the foreign Ministers, and the outfits of their successors. Supposing this matter to be now understood all around the House, he should say no more about it. He must, however, dwell a moment on another point, connected with this appropriation, in which, after what had been said, he need not disclaim being a volunteer. These outfits, to the amount of over forty thousand dollars, have been paid without any specific appropriation. On the contrary, a gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. WILDE,) last winter, proposed, in Committee of the Whole, to make an appropriation for the outfits of Ministers who might be appointed; and the committee declined making such an appropriation. They passed the bill as they found it, with specific appropriations for certain designated salaries and outfits, with an estimated addition for contingencies, he believed, of twenty thousand dollars. This looked rather, when considered in connection with the refusal of the committee just alluded to, like excluding all outfits not provided for by the bill. And yet, notwithstanding this, forty thousand dollars in outfits, for which no appropriation had been made, have been paid during the last summer. Mr. E. did not mention this as criminating the present administration, but as vindicating the past. It had been asserted and reiterated, here and elsewhere, that the late administration had improperly paid outfits out of the contingent fund, and transferred to one object what was specifically appropriated to another. Now here we have forty thousand dollars expended in outfits, without any specific appropriation; although two outfits, if he recollected, were specified in the act of the last year. From what fund the money had been taken, he could hardly tell. That part of the estimate was not very clear. There is no such thing as a diplomatic fund known to the appropriation law. The sum now asked for appears to be asked as a repayment of so much taken from other items. Of this, Mr. E. was not disposed to complain; but he hoped gentlemen would now feel how unjustly the late administration had been condemned for a course so soon adopted by the present, and which must, of necessity, be adopted by any administration.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he had never denied that outfits, under such circumstances, were to be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. EVERETT replied, that he did not maintain that the gentleman from South Carolina individually had held this doctrine; but it had been distinctly laid down in the reports of two committees of the House, at the last Congress—the Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of State, and the Retrenchment Committee. The latter committee had recommended the abolition of the fund for the contingent expenses of the foreign missions, on the ground that it enabled the Executive, at his own discretion, to augment the allowances to the foreign Ministers.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked if the gentleman from Massachusetts was not mistaken. It was the secret service money, and not the contingent fund, which the Committee on Retrenchment proposed to suppress. Was not the gentleman confounding one subject with the other?

Mr. EVERETT. I am not mistaken. The Committee on Retrenchment proposed to abolish the fund appropriated for the contingent expenses of all the missions abroad, as the gentleman will find by turning to their report.

Mr. NORRIS said, that, in the whole course of his legislative life, he had never thought it necessary to build up a political reputation, by advocating a false system of economy. He should vote for the bill reported by the distinguished statesman at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means. He (Mr. N.) had not come here to condemn the late administration, nor to applaud the present one, whether right or wrong. But he must say, that the illustrious individual who had been elected to the chair of State, was, he was convinced, actuated in the administration of the affairs of Government by the best and purest motives. He believed the President to be a bold and honest man; and he was firmly convinced that, whilst he was surrounded by his present wise and patriotic advisers, the liberties of the country would be secure.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, February 16.

The Judiciary Bill.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and took up the Judiciary bill.

Mr. HUNTINGTON said: This bill operates upon a department of the Government, in comparison with which every other department is powerless. It affects a tribunal which hears and adjudicates not only upon the conflicting claims of private citizens, but one which, while it opens the book of the constitution, and points sovereignty itself to the clause, "Thus far mayest thou come, but no farther"—holds in its hand the chain which confines it within the prescribed limits. Well, then, did the honorable member from Pennsylvania say, the subject was important. The remark was worthy of the subject, and the source from which it proceeded.

I listened with much attention, and, I will add, with much pleasure, too, (as I always do when the honorable member from Pennsylvania favors us with his remarks on any subject,) to the very able and lucid statement which he made of the reasons which induced the committee, of which he is the organ, to present this bill for our consideration. I noticed how, with the hand of a master, he drew the great outlines, the leading features of our judicial system, as it has existed from the first organization of the Government to the present time: I heard him point out the duties, the responsibilities, and the powers of the Supreme Court; the benefits which had followed the adoption of the present system; the evils which would result from its abandonment; and the necessity of its extension to the new States. He will do me the justice to believe me sincere, when I say I heard him with a desire to be convinced that my objections to this bill were groundless; but he will pardon me for saying, that although I was instructed by his learning, and gratified with the manner in which it was communicated, I still retain the same opinion as when this discussion commenced; and that is, that this bill ought not to become a law. The reasons for entertaining this opinion I am now to submit to the committee.

To arrive at a correct result as to the leading feature of the bill, that which proposes to add two to the present number of the justices of the Supreme Court, an answer to two inquiries into which the subject very naturally and obviously divides itself, seems necessary.

Are there evils attending the practical operations of our judicial system, as limited and confined by existing regulations, which require any remedy?

If there are, does this bill furnish both an adequate one, and the best which, under all the circumstances, can be adopted?

The evils complained of, and for which this bill is intended to provide, exist in one form, and are of one character, in the States of Indiana, Illinois, Mississippi, Missouri, Alabama, and Louisiana; and in another form, and are of another character, in the States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio.

To the former, the Circuit Court system is not extended at all; and the complaint is, not that their judicial business is not finished, but that it is not as well done as it would be were a Justice of the Supreme Court assigned to them. To the latter, the system is nominally extended; but, from a variety and combination of causes, the benefits of it are not realized: their complaint is, not that their judicial business is not well done, but that the unavoidable delay in completing it is tantamount to a denial of justice.

The source from whence these complaints proceed, and the manner in which they have been presented to us, claim the most respectful consideration; and, if well founded, however we may differ as to the mode of redressing them, I trust we shall not differ as to the extent of their rights, or of our duties. I do not intend to trespass long upon the patience of the committee by the remarks which I shall make upon this branch of the subject; for, with the views which I entertain regarding the remedy proposed, it might safely be admitted that the evils complained of are as extensive as has been supposed. But as this bill is professedly framed to supply the wants, the absolute necessities, and to sustain the just rights of the States, to which I have referred; as no disposition has been manifested by any member to increase the number of the Justices of the Supreme Court, except for these reasons, it may be well briefly to examine and ascertain, if practicable, how far the complaints which have been made are well founded; what real necessity does exist for the increase. And if I do not very much mistake, it will be found that the state of judicial business in the courts of the United States, in these States, will not justify, nor does it require, any such addition—at least, from the information now before the committee, the necessity adverted to is not shown to exist.

I begin with the six younger States. The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee (Mr. BUCHANAN) has informed the committee that the parental care of the Government, so far as it regards the equal and due administration of justice in the federal courts, is withdrawn from them.

Of this they complain, because it denies to them an equality of rights and privileges with the other States, and thus mortifies what is sometimes called State pride, and excites State jealousy.

I have no disposition to deny the proposition, that, by the terms of admission, the new States are placed on an entire equality with the old States as to rights and duties; and if I had the disposition, I have not the power to do it, consistently either with the letter or spirit of the acts of Congress authorizing their admission. Nor, in what I am now about to say, shall I be justly obnoxious to the imputation of entertaining unkind feelings towards the new States. Coming, as I do, from one of the old States of the Union, and from a State from which the tide of emigration has heretofore rolled with a rapidity and constancy which has not entirely ceased, I have many reasons to feel and cherish all that kindness and respect towards the younger sisters of the confederacy, as they were very appropriately called by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) which such an endeared relation should excite. Many of the sons of Connecticut are now respectable citizens of those States; some of them are distinguished members from those States of the National Legislature. I say, therefore, with frankness and with pleasure, that I would withhold from them no one right—I would deprive them of no one privilege, which, under similar circumstances, is granted to the older States. I may, however, still be permitted to say, that this principle of equality, so far as it relates to the administration of justice in the federal courts, has never been the standard by which the judicial system of the nation has been regulated, not even in the old States of the Union. Upon the principle of entire equality, each State should have a Judge of the Supreme Court; and more than one, if necessary, to enable its judicial business in the courts of the United States to be finished with the same facility and economy as in the other States.

But our judicial system does not now proceed on any such assumed basis. Why are parts of the wealthy and powerful States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, cut off from the benefits of the present system? Why are they deprived of the talents and learning of a Judge of the Supreme Court? Is not this humiliating to their pride—and yet, to obviate it, the number of the judges must still further be increased. Even the bill under discussion deprives a part of the State of Louisiana, and a part of the State of Alabama, of the same benefits. If we look at the progress of our legislation on this subject, it will be obvious that no such principle as that of State pride, feeling, jealousy, ever entered into the merits of the system. Kentucky was admitted into the Union fifteen years before the present system was extended to her. Tennessee eleven years, and Ohio four years. I need not, however, press these considerations, for the honorable member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) with his usual frankness and candor, admitted that the admission of a State into the Union, though thereby placed "on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever," did not confer upon her the right to claim that the Circuit Court system should be extended to her immediately, and that no obligation was imposed upon Congress so to extend it, until the wants of the State required it, and the circumstances of the country permitted it to be done. I am satisfied with this standard of our duty, and I ask the committee to apply it to the present situation of the six new States. Its wants, so far as they apply to this subject, are to be ascertained by referring to the extent and amount of its business in the federal courts. I was surprised that the committee were furnished with no statement regarding it. I do not know, nor have I heard, that it is such as to require that the judicial system should be extended to them; and, being ignorant of their wants, can I vote for a bill which has been framed to supply them? If I were allowed to hazard a conjecture, it would be that the judicial business of these States, in the courts of the United States, was very limited in amount. Their local situation, and the habits and pursuits of their inhabitants, (with the exception of the commercial cities of New Orleans and Mobile,) would seem to be such as not to produce much litigation in these courts. No memorial has been presented from any one of these States, at least none, within my recollection, stating their wants, and soliciting relief.

Does this bill furnish both an adequate remedy for existing evils, and the best which under all circumstances can be adopted?

In my judgment, no worse remedy can be adopted than that which increases the number of the Justices of the Supreme Court. I will briefly state the reasons for this opinion.

It tends to divide the responsibility of the judges, and thus diminishes the weight of it, which each individual judge should feel. It is a very common observation, but not the less correct, indeed it has almost the force of a truism, that in proportion as the number of agents employed to perform any service is increased beyond that necessary for its accomplishment, is the responsibility of each lessened. This springs from a principle of human nature too obvious to need illustration. I am aware that it is difficult to fix the precise limit where individual responsibility will be materially impaired by the increased number of agents, but I think it not difficult to perceive that it must be impaired, when, in the court of dernier resort, being purely a judicial tribunal, that number is nine, though there is no magic, as was said by the honorable member from Tennessee, (Mr. POLK,) in the number nine. We must resort to the practice of other nations, and to the different States in the Union, to guide us to a correct result on this point. In England, with the exception of the House of Lords, and, in this country, of the Supreme Court of Errors of the State of New York, the court of dernier resort is composed of a less number than that proposed in this bill. With regard to the court in England, and that in New York, which are exceptions, they are not merely judicial tribunals, but possess and exercise legislative powers, and there is no analogy between them and the supreme appellate judicial tribunal of this country. The House of Lords, sitting as a court, review very few of the numerous cases, either in law or equity, which are yearly adjudicated by the court of chancery and the courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas. I would appeal to many gentlemen in this House, whose observations have enabled them to form correct opinions on this subject, whether a smaller number than that proposed by this bill has not conduced to a more perfect responsibility of each member of the court, than would probably have existed had it been increased. I appeal particularly to one gentleman, whom I see in his place, (Mr. SPENCER, of New York,) and whom I hope the committee will have the pleasure to hear, whose judicial character to know, is to respect and admire. I ask him to say whether, from the observations which a long and distinguished judicial life has enabled him to make, the responsibility of each judge is not to an extent, by no means inconsiderable, greater or less, in proportion to the number of judges who compose the court. The honorable member from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) was pleased to say, that those who think the number proposed in this bill too large, confine their views too much to the several States; whereas, the true statesman looks beyond the confines of his own State, and embraces within his vision this extended republic, consisting of twenty-four States, producing a great mass of business requiring judicial investigation. I make no professions to the character of a statesman. My pursuits in life have been professional merely; but I am yet to learn, that because our country is great and extended, because much judicial business is to be done in its courts, that this affects the argument which I am now urging, that an increase of numbers impairs individual responsibility. It may, on that account, require the adoption of a different system from the existing one, but in no degree does it weaken the force of the suggestions which I have made in relation to the responsibility of the judges.

An increase of the number of judges tends to produce less concentration of action, (if I may be allowed the expression,) less union of action in the court, than would otherwise exist, and as would be desirable. It is certainly important that each judge should, for himself, examine with care and attention every case, every matter of law and fact connected with it, in which he is called to pronounce an opinion. This is oftentimes a work of time and of great labor. Increase the number, and may it not be feared that it will tend to the allotment of different cases to different judges, not merely to draw up the opinion, (which is not only proper, but necessary,) but to examine the cases; and thus, instead of bringing to the aid of the litigant parties the individual learning and industry of each, the decision will in fact rest, as it will be pronounced, on the investigation of a single judge? May it not be feared that either this result will follow, or that the business of the court cannot be seasonably finished with a due regard to the rights of the parties, or that much of the time of the court will be consumed in endless discussions, especially in cases where there is any considerable complication of facts, in perhaps oftentimes fruitless endeavors to reconcile jarring opinions and different views which may be taken of the same subject? The honorable member from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) admitted, that if the judges had no circuit duties to perform, there would be danger that the consequences to which I have alluded would follow; that there would be danger that some of them would be, as he expressed it, aye or no judges. I am at a loss to perceive how the discharge of these circuit duties would destroy this characteristic. A judge, who would be an aye or no judge on the bench of an appellate tribunal, is in great danger of being less than that at the circuit.

An increase of the number of judges will tend to impair public confidence in the court. Next in importance to an upright administration of justice, is the belief that it is so administered. Indeed, it is almost as essential to the real utility of a court, that its decisions should be deemed to emanate (to use a common expression) from a pure heart and a sound head, as that such should, in fact, be their characteristics. Let the community once believe, whether from causes well or ill founded, that the decisions of this judicial tribunal are not entitled to their confidence, and the salutary effects which would otherwise follow from the exercise of their powers would be neither seen nor felt. Am I asked how this confidence of the public may be impaired by increasing the number of the court? I answer, in one or both of two ways.

By creating a belief that the court partakes more of the character of a popular assembly than of a mere judicial tribunal; that appointments are to be made to it with reference to some supposed ratio of representation in the several States; that each portion of the Union is to be regarded, whenever a vacancy occurs, or new judges are to be added, as entitled, from its wealth, population, or political importance, to furnish the incumbent; indeed, that this of itself constitutes a reason for the increase of the court; that sectional views are to be consulted, sectional importance to be considered; that an increase of the number is necessary to advance the particular interests of particular parts of the country. I need not detain the committee to point out the deleterious consequences resulting from such an impression upon the public mind. It is very obvious the court, under such circumstances, would cease to possess much of the confidence of the people.

If the number of judges be increased, in conformity with the principle of the present bill, as the wants of the country may hereafter require, may it not be feared that it will be impossible that the business of the Supreme Court should be done with that despatch which a due regard to the right of suitors requires. Do our friends at the West tell us that delay is a denial of justice to them? How will it be with parties attending the Supreme Court in this capitol? Will there be no delay as to them? I have been informed that now, with the increased term of the court, two years elapse, on an average, before a case, after it is entered on the docket, is determined. The clerk has furnished me with a memorandum, from which it appears that on the 8th of January, 1827, there were one hundred and sixty cases on the docket. At the January term of the same year, seventy-seven cases were decided. On the 14th of January, 1828, there were one hundred and thirty-one cases on the docket. At the term of that year eighty-eight cases were decided. On the 12th of January, 1829, there were one hundred and nineteen cases on the docket. At the term of that year fifty-three cases were decided. On the 15th of February, 1830, there were one hundred and thirty-three cases on the docket. In 1827, the court were in session sixty-eight days. In 1828, sixty-three days. In 1829, sixty-seven days. And how will the period of delay be extended, as the business of the court increases with the increase of the business of this growing country? This delay will not be attributable to the court. The judges are in no fault. It is to be attributed to the system under which they are placed. They accomplish all which the most devoted and untiring industry, and incessant application to the discharge of their duties, can accomplish. But they are obliged to adjourn before all the causes are heard and determined, to enable them to hold the circuit courts. Must not, then, the present system hereafter be abandoned, or the docket of the Supreme Court be filled with a number of litigated cases immeasurably almost exceeding that of any of the Western States which now complain of it as amounting to a denial of justice to them? Why, sir, it may be feared that the proverbial delays of the English court of chancery will not exceed the necessary delays which hereafter will attend parties litigating in the Supreme Court, if the present system be then persevered in. The hand of death will remove them before their controversies can be decided. The delay and consequent expense will consume the whole of what may eventually be awarded to them. This would be not merely a delay, it would be a mockery of justice.

I have thus, as briefly as I could, adverted to the evils which in my judgment would follow, or which might follow, from the adoption of the principle, that new judges are to be created as often as the wants of the new States require them. Were it in order, as I am aware it strictly is not, to advert to an amendment which has been printed and laid on our tables, and which an honorable member from Kentucky (Mr. DANIEL) proposes to offer hereafter to this bill, which provides that a majority of all the Justices of the Supreme Court, authorized by law to be appointed and commissioned, shall concur in deciding against the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, any State, in every case in the Supreme Court, where is drawn in question the validity of such statute of, or authority exercised under, any State, on the ground of a repugnance thereof to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States, and, unless such majority concur, the decisions of the court shall be entered as in favor of their validity, and which further provides that no district or circuit court shall have jurisdiction, or take cognizance of any suit, matter, or cause of action, (other than causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction,) either at common law or in equity, where the cause of action, matter, or suit arises out of, and depends solely upon, the laws of any State, and in which no statute of, or authority exercised under, any State, is drawn in question, on the ground of a repugnance thereof to the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States; and if I could think it possible that this amendment would meet with the favor of the committee, I should think the bill so amended much worse than it now is; for then the tendency of the system would perhaps more obviously be to unsettle and put at hazard judicial decisions on great questions which take hold of the vital interests of this nation, to set afloat precedents regarding constitutional law, made after the fullest discussion and the most mature deliberation, and acquiesced in by every department of the Government, and by the great body of our citizens. But this is not the time to discuss the principles involved in this amendment. I abstain at present from any further remarks upon it.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said: I prefer altogether the system of judicial organization presented to the Senate in the year 1819, and which, as I understand, received the almost unanimous concurrence of that body, viz., making the Supreme Court of the United States an appellate court, and creating circuit courts to be filled with other judges. This is the true system for this country, after all that has or can be said; and one which will ere long be established; and much sooner, too, I am apt to think, than some gentlemen imagine.

Sir, the bill upon your table is one of the deepest and highest interest to this country. Few can be more so. It will give character to the country. It will make our law. It is an act for life. There will be no escape from it. This day we are about to establish the judicial character of the Government for years to come, if not forever. Many who now hear me will live long enough to see the fatal effects of this bill, should Congress be so unwise as to pass it into a law. I hardly dare to speak openly my apprehensions from the adoption of this bill—this accumulation of judges in the Supreme Court, to provide judges for the circuits. I hope the committee will pause, and pause a long while, before they take a step so ominous to the ultimate destiny of the country.

Permit me to say, sir, that, in establishing or extending a judicial system for this country, we ought to aim at two things, uniformity and permanence. The system should be adapted to the wants of the country; it should, if possible, carry to every part of the Union an equal participation in the judicial power of the constitution, and be capable of extension, according to the growth and exigencies of this enterprising, active, and extending republic. It is a fatal objection to any system, that it is partial, or that it must be exchanged for another. A change of system is a change of law. It is a change of judges. It introduces endless and ruinous confusion; and that, too, where certainty and harmony should prevail. If we would have uniformity in the exposition of the law, we must have a uniform and permanent system in its administration. Let us now look after such a system. It may be found without difficulty. But let us avoid as a calamity this argumentation of judges in the Supreme Court, until it is broken down by its weight, and stripped of every thing which commends it to the people.

There are, essentially, but two plans brought before the committee by the bill or the amendments proposed; one is, to leave the Supreme Court as an appellate court, and create circuit judges for circuit court duties; and the other is, to enlarge the Supreme Court as far as it is necessary to have judges to ride the circuits; and, I suppose, to add occasionally a judge or two to the Supreme Bench, just as they may be wanted on new circuits. I ask the serious attention of gentlemen to the principle of these plans or systems. Any plan can be filled up in detail, if we can but settle upon it.

I shall not deny but that, as far as practicable, we are bound to give to every part of the country an equal participation in the judicial power of the constitution. The friends of this bill set out with this position; and I shall not deny its truth, though I shall show that even they do not act up to it; nor can they upon the system proposed in the bill; and herein is one of its defects. There is a system, however, which will carry into effect this principle; but it is not the system of this bill.

Every wise man will concede to me, that nothing should be done which is calculated to subvert the Supreme Court. Nothing should be attempted which will seriously jeopardize its existence. Whatever feelings may have existed, or may now exist, in any parts of the Union, in consequence of the views entertained by our judges of the powers of the constitution, or of determinations made by them, none will deny that the judicial power is one of the noblest and firmest pillars of our national fabric; and that when its supreme organ comes (if it ever shall) to want efficiency, we shall then have great cause to be solicitous for our dearest interests. I do not hesitate to declare that the judicial power of the constitution is the great regulator, the sheet anchor, the final hope of this Government. Who is not admonished of the inestimable importance of preserving to the court all its wisdom and efficiency, by the deep and diverse interests represented upon this floor of our national council, where conflicting sectional interests and claims are putting to the severest, if not fatal test, the very elements of our constitution?

I shall not stop here to pronounce a eulogium upon the distinguished men who now fill the court. My business is rather to preserve the court than to praise it, and to preserve it in that character and condition which itself constitutes the highest eulogy upon the judges who preside in it.

The first objection I have to urge against the system proposed in this bill is, that it is not even now adapted to the country, and must and will be finally abandoned. It is not uniform throughout the country now, and is becoming less so every year; while, at no very remote period, the whole will be given up for the circuit system. It is wanting in the two particulars which ought to be kept in view in establishing a judicial system. Most of the friends of this bill admit that the Supreme Court, with its seven judges, has come to its perfect and full maturity as a Supreme Court, and that they would not accumulate judges in it, but that they are wanted for the duties of the circuits. Sir, I conjure gentlemen to stop and consider what they are about doing—crowding judges into the court that holds the destinies of the country in its hands, that we may have the necessary circuit judges. And where will gentlemen stop? They add three now. It will be easier to add two, and then one hereafter, just according to the extension and growth of the country. We shall have a town meeting rather than a court. No, sir, we must stop where we are. If the Supreme Court is perfect, as it now is, let us leave it to fulfil its high destinies, and not tamper with it, until we rob it of public confidence, and are compelled to abandon it as tumultuous and inefficient. I will never consent to a measure of temporary relief which jeopardizes the structure of the judiciary. We are now called upon to choose the true system; nor need we delay one moment.

I have no belief that the court can be made better by increasing the number of judges.

The Judiciary Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Seven is enough, if not too many. I will not, on this part of the subject, detain the committee by examining minutely the reasons of the consequences which must inevitably follow in cumbering the Supreme Court. I appeal to the observation and experience of all who hear me, for the truth of what I now say. The court will become unwieldy, dilatory, less uniform, less efficient; the judges will feel less personal responsibility, and they will often be divided in opinion. I beg gentlemen to weigh these considerations, and give them their due influence. Lord Mansfield, after he had been the chief justice of King's bench thirteen years, in giving his opinion in a case in which one of the judges differed from the other three, expressed his regret that the court were not united, and said that it was the first instance of a difference among the judges since he had been on the bench. What has been the effect of such unanimity in the English courts? The great commercial principles of that people have been settled once, forever. Place nine or ten judges upon the King's bench, and what think you would be the unanimity or effect of its decisions. Is it not a subject of regret, that the appellate tribunals of the country so often present jarring opinions and discordant views, the result of a numerous bench? There cannot be ordinarily mature consultation where there is a multitude of judges. Where do the friends of this bill find any examples to sustain their views? I stop not to speak of the House of Lords, nor of the Senate of the State of New York. Neither of them, in point of judicial character, are worthy of imitation or praise. They are no more competent to decide questions of law, than is this House, in which there is as much judicial talent as in either of them. But I fear we should make a sorry figure with the abstruse and complicated principles which undergo an examination in the other part of this capitol. The highest court of law and equity in England consists of from one to four judges. There are four on the King's bench, four in the common pleas, four in exchequer, one in the court of equity, and one in the court of admiralty. Who has not heard of the wisdom and the fame of her lord chancellors, whose jurisdiction and power are immense? Of the enlightened administration of her admiralty and other courts? What would be thought of a proposition in Parliament to encumber those courts with ten judges? And, sir, what do we find in our own country to recommend this bill? Massachusetts has but four judges, New York three, Pennsylvania five; and these are among the largest and most commercial States in the Union. The idea has been gaining ground in this country for a few years past, that our supreme judicatories should consist of a few, but able men.

WEDNESDAY, February 17.

The Hornet, Sloop of War.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the following bill, which was the special order of the day for this day:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the widows, if any such there be, and, in case there be no widow, the child or children; and if there be no child, then the parent or parents; and if there be no parent, then the brothers and sisters of the officers, seamen, and marines who were in the service of the United States, and lost in the United States sloop of war Hornet, shall be entitled to, and receive, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to six months' pay of their respective deceased relatives, aforesaid, in addition to the pay due to the said deceased on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and thirty, up to which day the arrears of pay due the deceased shall be allowed and paid by the accounting officers of the Navy Department."

On motion of Mr. DORSEY, the bill was amended so as to conform to the date of the supposed loss of the Hornet, (10th September.)

Mr. SPEIGHT, of North Carolina, was not opposed to the main object of the bill, as far as concerned the widows and children of the officers and crew of the Hornet; but he was opposed to going beyond that line, to their parents and brothers and sisters. This, he thought, was extending the principle further than was justifiable.

Mr. DORSEY spoke in support of the bill, showing it to be sustained by precedents in like cases, and especially in the case of the Epervier, from the act passed in which case, with the exception of the name of the vessel, this bill had been literally copied. Mr. D. expatiated on the favor which the navy had won for itself in the glorious results of the late war, in which it had fought itself into the affections of the American people, under which influence the sort of provision proposed in this bill had become a part of the settled policy of the country. Of the well-founded objections to the establishment of a pension system he was well aware. But they would not apply in any manner to this bill, which must be considered rather in the light of an expression of national sympathy, and of condolence with the bereaved, than in any other; for it could not enter into the mind of any man, that the provision contained in this bill was to be considered as any thing like a compensation for the afflicting bereavement sustained by the relatives of those who had thus unfortunately perished.

The motion of Mr. SPEIGHT was then decided in the negative; and the committee rose, and reported the bill; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

The Judiciary.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill to extend the judiciary system.

Mr. CRAWFORD said: It will be conceded that the subject is one of extreme delicacy and difficulty. In all countries, it occupies the anxious thoughts of those who are charged with the public interests. When, therefore, a plan has been happily laid in our own land, which, in its execution, commands the public confidence, and so ensures obedience to its decrees, will prudence, will the careful watchfulness that belongs to our stations, allow us to leave the road we have found so smooth, and fragrant from the flowers that bloomed upon its sides, and to enter upon an unbeaten way that may lead us into miry and swampy grounds? This tribunal, like every constituted authority of these United States, finds its strongest, its enduring foundation in the belief that it is enlightened and of the purest integrity—it is armed with power to enforce its mandates, but its best authority is the regard I have mentioned; and, if it shall ever happen that a different estimate will be made of its decisions from that which now prevails, it and our other institutions will soon sink together.

Let us not then put to hazard this rich fruit of our noble form of government—it has all the raciness of the soil on which it grew, and all the mellowness that the brightest and strongest intellectual rays, steadily beaming upon it, could produce. The Supreme Court is ripe in its fame and in its usefulness—it will never be greater than it is. I beseech the committee to take no step that may, by possibility, relax its present hold upon public esteem, founded on the best and strongest reasons. The Supreme Court is known as it is now constituted—as such, it is regarded to be wise, learned, and honest. It should not be lightly changed—it should be looked on as so far permanent, that while the individuals enjoying its honors come and go, the system remains the same, at least so long as it may be found to answer the end designated at its formation—make it not, by an augmentation of its members, less responsible, or less effective.

I do not like an increase of the judges for many other reasons; among the most important of which is the consideration that it will have a tendency to destroy the confederate character of the court. This was deemed a most material quality by those who framed the constitution; for we find that, by the law of 1789, in enacting which many of those who were in the constitution-convention took a part, the judges of the Supreme Court were appointed indifferently from every quarter of the country, and were strictly circuit judges, that is, itinerant, and holding courts as might be arranged by themselves—indeed, I think the act contemplated alteration. The reasons for my preference of this plan I will submit hereafter; at present I wish to contrast it with the representative system—representative not, says my honorable colleague and friend, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) of local partialities, sectional feelings, and interests, but of local intelligence. Sir, the purpose is fair; but if the end be obtained, it will not be obtained singly. The book of human nature tells us on every page that man, how pure soever his integrity, however clear and strong his mental endowment, how elevated soever his station or responsible his duties, if we except some rare beings, whom surpassing excellence (if it may be said without irreverence) brings into some slight resemblance to Divinity, is imbued with the prejudices and passions and frailties of his abode. If from every part of this wide empire you bring a judge, or make it an indispensable official qualification that he shall reside within designated limits, he will carry with him into court all the peculiarities, not only of character and learning, which are desirable, but of jealousy and feeling, that naturally arise out of State pride and State doctrine. Need I go out of this hall for the truth of what I assert? Every gentleman on this floor is, I doubt not, as pure as any judge—on many points as learned—perhaps on all as wise—each no doubt acts upon his own convictions; and yet is it not easily perceived that we come from different quarters? We have, as we ought to have, representation in its best shape in this House—we have it in another aspect in the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature—but the court of the last resort should be the court of the nation; and, in making these remarks, I trust it will not be supposed that I am for consolidation—far from it; but I am in favor of a court which, perched as the Supreme Court is, upon a lofty eminence, shall be surrounded by the country's honor and confidence, and leave far below the passions and feelings which would push it from this elevated point.

The honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee has referred to the consideration of economy. It is well worthy of attention. I mean that liberal economy which leads, in public and private affairs, to the best consequences—a principle that, while it freely appropriates or expends money where a correspondent benefit may be reasonably calculated on, steadfastly refuses the application of its means to any purpose that does not promise an adequate return. He spoke of it as furnishing a good reason for preferring his bill to the circuit court system, which some honorable gentlemen advocate; but, as I do not intend to recommend either the one or the other to the adoption of the committee, regard to proper economy comes to me in aid of other considerations, for retaining the present judges without addition, under certain modifications of their duties.

But the reason which, in my judgment, is decisive, is, that the proposed change is not necessary. How? Has not a different idea prevailed for years past? Was not a bill very much, if not altogether, like the one under consideration, reported four sessions since, and debated at length, and yet this opinion not advocated—nor has it now been brought into view? True—and perhaps temerity may be thought to mark my conduct, while I attempt to show the committee that the ground I have taken is one upon which I can stand.

The business of England, multifarious as it is,

FEBRUARY, 1890.]

The Hornet.

and various as it must be, from the complexity of her extended commercial pursuits—from her manufacturing and agricultural transactions, and the varied intercourse of a large and very dense population, is done, and well done, by fewer judges than we have now; if you embrace your Supreme Court and all the district judges, by fewer than one-half, exclusive of our State judicial magistrates—amounting to some hundreds, many of them possessing the deepest learning, and the most enviable reputations for talents and probity. The fact is they labor more; an English judge will go into court in the morning, and, instead of returning home to dine, will, perhaps, in a press of business, eat a few mouthfuls on the bench to sustain him. Our State judges devote a much larger share of time to judicial duty, than is done in the United States courts. In Pennsylvania not less than nine, perhaps ten, months are employed annually and assiduously in public business, by her Supreme Court judges. Great labor, greater responsibilities, and an abstraction from social pleasures and domestic joys, are the price that every kind of distinction costs. Look at your Chief Magistracy; it is the highest office in the world—desired by many—attained by few—and rarely by those who desire it most; although the distinguished individuals who have filled it, the illustrious man who now graces it, and those who shall hereafter occupy it, are and will be identified with our country; will live in her history, and be regarded as the most fortunate of men; yet I do not hesitate to say, that however fortunate it may have been, or will be, for the country, that some of them have reached, or may hereafter reach, her highest honors, to themselves it brought no happiness—that it never will bring any in the discharge of its duties; the highest rewards may soothe their retirement; the good opinion and gratitude of their fellow-citizens, and the consciousness of having performed well the highest duties, which belong to such as deserve them, when they have ceased to be public functionaries—but while they direct or shape the destinies of the country, they must look for labor and anxiety without cessation or stint. Shall the most elevated judicial stations be exempt from the common rule? Shall citizens ascend the political ladder, and not be measured by the scale which regulates responsibility and toil, and which assigns an increased portion of both to increased dignity and honor? By no means. What is your plan? Simply to model the circuits so as to spread them over a greater surface, and to require of the judges the discharge of extended duty. Show us, I think I hear gentlemen say, that the required duties can be performed, on any reasonable modification of them, by the present judges, and we will yield. I do think that the present circuits, although greatly enlarged so as to be co-extensive with the provisions of the bill, may be so modified that seven judges can discharge the duties readily and with ease.

The confidence which the nation feels in this tribunal, and those who constitute it, is owing, in part, to their discharge of circuit court duties, the advantages of which I fully appreciate, and concur in many of the views in relation thereto, taken by my colleague, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) but I should hope a higher and better principle than personal regard lay at the bottom of the almost reverence with which its decisions are received; that the great element of the permanency of our Government, a determination on the part of the governed to submit to the constituted authorities, so long as they moved in their proper orbits, produced the acquiescence in opinions formed in uprightness, and delivered with ability. I conceive that this tribunal was never shaken by party tempests, nor moved by the storms which, while they agitated, served to purify our political atmosphere, because the constitution had ordained that its decisions should be final—because lengthened official existence had been given to its functionaries, and because it was, by the league, made unchangeable, unless crime or death interposed.

It will continue to be respected and confided in, when those who, now exercising the highest judicial powers the world knows in the most dignified stations, are nevertheless themselves more dignified, and giving back to the bench a lustre greater than that which it shed upon them, shall be remembered among those who have been our benefactors.

THURSDAY, February 18.

The Hornet.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the widows and orphans of the officers, seamen, and marines of the sloop of war Hornet," was read the third time; and the question was stated, "Shall the bill pass?" when

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Virginia, said he could not vote for this bill if the words brothers and sisters were retained. When a man fell in the service of his country, he had no objection to make a reasonable provision for his wife and children, if he had such; but to extend it further, was a dangerous precedent. He felt no hesitation in saying he could not and would not sustain it. If we could make donations—to the relations of officers who have perished in the service of their country, to brothers and sisters, where, and at what point, shall we stop? Have we entered into an agreement to provide for all the relations of our officers now in service, in case of their deaths? If such engagement has been entered into, I hope it will be produced. The system of pensions, sinecures, and donations, name it as you please, is a dangerous system; it has been sustained in most countries where it is now permanently enthroned, by passionate appeals to the liberality—the generosity of the people. Those appeals have also been too successful—they have produced bitter fruits.

In the Old World palaces have been built, estates purchased for distinguished individuals—with money drawn by a rigorous and cruel and oppressive taxation, from the poorest classes of the community; I say the poorest classes of the community, for while many fatten upon taxation, there are in all countries those who feel its burthens only. I do not like the term generosity. We have no right to be generous and charitable with the money of other people. We may give pensions to the widows and children of those who perish in the service of the country; for we have every reason to believe that they have thereby been deprived of the means of support; go beyond this in your pensioning system, and you are in great danger. The isthmus which separate acts that are generous from those that are venal, is very narrow, and we must be cautious, or we may pass it, and be involved in all the consequences that an overgrown system of pensioning has brought about in some of the more ancient nations of the earth. Our system has gone nearly as far as that of Great Britain, except that as yet we have no civil pensions. Let in civil pensions, and then you have the British plan—a system that has entailed an enormous debt on that nation, subjected their people to the horrors of heavy taxation, and reduced a large portion of their population (if their own writers are to be believed) to penury. Such have been the effects of pensions, sinecures, and donations indulged in by another country. When you have equalled them in the extent of your pensioning system, you may witness here what is witnessed there, for nature is not the partisan of a cis or a transatlantic world. My alarm is the greater, because no one pretends to know any thing of the condition of the brothers and sisters of the deceased officers. Those who support this bill assume (I suppose) they are poor. I may assume that the officers of the army and navy are most generally related to the wealthiest men in the community. Let no one suppose he venerates the glory of the navy more than I do. I esteem the navy most highly. My willingness to provide, for a reasonable time, for the wives and children of the officers and seamen who have perished in the service of the country, is proof of this disposition to the cause of the navy. The amount that is depending on this question is not of very great consequence. But it is a question of principle, and that makes it all-important. It is a great and memorable principle, that will fix hereafter, if settled as in the bill contained, the expenditure of millions. That is what constitutes its importance. I enter against the passage of this bill my protest. I will detain you no longer.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays upon the question of the passage of the bill; and the call being sustained by a sufficient number, they were accordingly ordered.

Mr. TEST moved the recommitment of the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to strike out that part of it granting the gratuity proposed by the bill to the brothers and sisters of the sufferers.

Mr. DONNER said, the duty of reporting the bill now under discussion having been assigned me by the Committee on Naval Affairs, it will be expected, however reluctant I am to mingle in the discussions of this House, that I shall state the principles involved in it, and reply to the objections which have been presented to this committee in opposition to its adoption.

The committee, before they reported the bill, deemed it their duty to search into the practice of the Government, in making provisions for the crews of national vessels lost at sea. It has pleased Divine Providence that the number of those should be but few. The first that occurred was that of the frigate Insurgent, captured from the republic of France by the gallant Truxton; the second, that of the brigantine Pickering—they both foundered at sea, in the same destroying gale. In April, 1802, Congress voted four months' additional pay to be paid to the widows of the officers, seamen, and marines who perished on board of those vessels, and if no widow, then the gratuity to be distributed among the children. The next like visitation of Providence fell on the sloop of war Wasp, commanded by the lamented Blakely. Congress were called to legislate on the subject, and a more expanded principle of distribution was then adopted. By the act of April, 1816, twelve months' pay was ordered to be distributed, one-third to the widow, and two-thirds to the children; if no child, then all to the widow; if no widow nor child, then to the parent; if no parent, then to the brothers or sisters of the officers, seamen, and marines. The Epervier and her crew, commanded by the gallant Shubrick, soon thereafter met the same untimely fate; and Congress, at the next session, provided for the distribution of six months' extra pay—first to the widow; if no widow, to the child; if no child, to the parents; if no parent, then to the brothers and sisters.

Thus Congress adhered to the diffusive principle contained in the bill now before this committee, while the mother was preferred to the child, and had all the gratuity of the Government given to her, the restricted principle, adopted in the case of the Insurgent and Pickering, confining the donative to the widow and the children, was rejected. The Committee on Naval Affairs deemed it inexpedient to disturb the question, and felt disposed to adopt the matured and settled policy of the national legislation, in connection with this subject; they therefore have reported this bill—a copy of that adopted in the case of the Epervier. A motion is now made to strike out the contingent provision for the brothers and sisters, on the ground that it is extending the bounty of the Government to collateral relations, and that it ought not to be the policy of this Government to extend the principle of the pension system, alleged to be dangerous and corrupting.

Although, if it were a new question, for the first time suggested for our action, much might be said on both sides, I now deem it unnecessary to enter into the minute considerations which may have influenced our predecessors to depart from the precedents of 1804, and recognize the enlarged policy on which the acts of 1816 and 1817 are predicated. This difference of legislation may be traced, in part, to the more enlarged views of the nation as connected with our navy.

In the infancy of our Government, this arm of our national defence was looked on with a most distrustful and jealous eye by a large portion of the politicians of this country; great exertions were made to cripple its progress, and appropriations for its increase were resisted with great pertinacity. It was deemed by some to be only advocated as a means of enlarging the Executive patronage, by others as improvident, because, in the infancy of our Government, and in the weakness of our resources, we were incompetent to contend with the naval powers of Europe, and that every ship that we sent to sea was inevitably doomed to swell the number of our enemies' ships. During the triumph of these doctrines, an appropriation was asked for the relatives of those who perished in the Insurgent and Pickering. Its restricted appropriation, as to amount and objects, displays the then apathetic indifference to the cause of the navy. But another state of national feeling controlled the legislation of 1816 and 1817. The navy then had not only conquered its foreign foes, but had achieved a victory over its domestic enemies. Every citizen participated in the glory of our navy battles; every manifestation of national respect evinced the national gratitude to those who gained for themselves such imperishable glory, and added to the renown of our youthful nation, by splendid exhibitions of consummate naval skill, daring intrepidity, and distinguished humanity.

The evidence of a high national feeling and enthusiasm was not confined to the living only, or those who perished in the blaze and glory of battle. A provident policy, and grateful respect for the memory of our naval benefactors, gave rise to a more expanded system of national remembrance of those who found a watery grave, far from home, while offering the protection of our national flag to our wide-spread commerce.

Shall we now abandon this policy, and thus admit that the course of our predecessors was unwise and dangerous, as tending to the expansion of our pension system? for surely there is nothing in the history of this gallant ship, and of her noble crew, that can justify the nation in withholding the like expression of national regret for their loss, and the same sympathy with the relatives of those who perished with this ship, as were expressed in the cases of other ill-fated vessels. Are we willing to add to their orphanage and bereavements another pang, by the invidious comparison of relative merits which will result from the adoption of this amendment? Are we willing so to legislate as to induce a belief that the Hornet and her crew have not the same claims on our country as the Wasp and Epervier, and their crew had?

The name of the Hornet will be as imperishable as the history of the last war. In her engagement (when under the command of the lamented Lawrence, who died too soon for the cause of his country, but not too soon for his own fame) with the Peacock, there was exhibited the most brilliant specimen of naval gunnery ever exhibited. In fifteen minutes the Peacock was so riddled that she sunk before her whole crew could be removed, and carried down with her three of the Hornet's men, engaged in the humane attempt to save the lives of the drowning enemy. An engagement which has coerced from the veriest foreign revilers of our naval skill the highest praise, and compelled them, on the floor of the British Parliament, to admit that the naval gunnery on board of the Hornet could not have been surpassed by the most cool and deliberate target firing.

However brilliant this achievement may have been, the distinguished humanity of the victors also added great lustre to our national character: for they so conducted themselves, that the grateful captives proclaimed to the world "that the courtesies and attention received from their hands caused them to forget that they were prisoners of war." The war on the ocean was terminated by a brilliant victory achieved by the Hornet, too, when commanded by the gallant Biddle, over the Penguin. Surely there is nothing, then, in the character of this ship that should make us unwilling to notice her loss in the same manner that the loss of national ships has been noticed. Is there any thing in the history of her gallant officer, Otho H. Norris, and his crew, that justifies a departure from the practice of the Government? No, sir; his life was devoted to his country, and marked by an untiring zeal, great nautical science, consummate personal bravery, and elevated patriotism. He was a native of Maryland, a son of a distinguished revolutionary patriot. At an early age, he displayed a great fondness for a seafaring life. His parent yielded his assent, and gave him an education to fit him for such pursuits. He entered him in the merchant service, to instruct him in practical navigation. In 1809 he solicited and procured a midshipman's appointment, and was ordered to repair on board the Syren. At this time, he was but fifteen years of age, yet, soon, thereafter, so distinguished was he for his superior seamanship and exemplary conduct, that he was placed in the command of a gun boat at New Orleans. From that time, he was constantly in service, and sailed from Charleston in the Carolina, as her second officer, under Captain Hendley, to co-operate in the defence of New Orleans against the then anticipated invasion by the enemy. In all the labor, fatigue, and dangers of that interesting crisis, he was engaged. In the battle of the 28d December, when the execution of the guns of the Carolina contributed so essentially to discomfit the foe, he was among the most ardent and brave. When she was burnt by the hot balls of the enemy, he tendered his services to the commanding general to serve on shore, and, in the ever-memorable battle of the 8th of January, he commanded battery No. 2, a twenty-four pounder, and contributed, by his skill and gallantry, to that glorious victory which on that day crowned the American arms, and the anniversary of which is celebrated by a grateful and admiring people of its authors, with every demonstration of national joy and gratitude. For his exertions on that day, he received the thanks of his general (now the President of the United States) in the following warm and cheering words: "Lieutenant Norris, who commanded a twenty-four pounder, displayed, during the several engagements, the utmost skill and courage, and merits the thanks of the country."

He (Captain Norris) was never inactive; he was almost continually in service. He was among those who encountered in vessels, (affording none but very slight comforts,) under the command of Commodore Porter, the diseases of the West Indies, while attempting to free the sea from the plunderings and massacres of savage pirates. It was rumored last August in Pensacola, that Mr. Poinsett, our Minister to Mexico, had been assassinated. Captain Ridgely ordered Captain Norris to repair to the coast of Mexico, and give such security and protection to our citizens as such a lawless and unexpected event might require. He arrived at Tampico the latter part of August, at a period when the American interest required the countenance and protection of a national ship. It was at a moment when Barradas, a Spanish General, had made a descent upon Tampico, with a view to subjugate the Mexican province to the crown of Spain. Feeling power, and forgetting what was due to the American character, this general demanded from an American citizen money, and extorted it by force and personal violence. The American consul interposed, and asked restitution and indemnity. It was not listened to. At this period Captain Norris arrived at Tampico. The complaints of the American citizen reached his ear. Faithful to himself, and indignant at the insult offered to his countryman, he demanded restitution of the property forcibly taken, and an ample atonement for the personal insult. His demand was gratified. While thus remaining at Tampico to afford further protection, it pleased high Heaven to visit that coast with the awful and terrific storm of the 10th September, and to involve in one common grave this gallant ship and her noble crew. Is there any thing in such a life, in such a service, and in such a death, as will justify this House in withholding the ordinary and customary reward, the indication of national respect and of national sympathy?

The principle of the bill has none of the objections offered to a pension system. As a precedent, it is not dangerous. The causes which give rise to legislation on this subject, have been but rare; they have sprung from the elements, from storms and tempests, from the visitation of God. Since the existence of the Government, we have had to mourn only few such losses. Let us, therefore, banish all fears, that the precedent again to be sanctioned by this bill will or can act oppressively upon our national resources. It is not a pension; there is no annual drain on the Treasury; it creates no privileged class in society, drawing their support from the revenue of the country, and thus producing a wretched spirit of dependence, disgraceful to the character of freemen, and enlarging the patronage of the Government. No, it is no more than an expression of sorrow and regret for those who have deserved well of their country, and perished in our service, whilst affording, by our flag, security to our citizens and our commerce. It is an expression of sympathy with the relatives of those who have thus perished; it is a slight offering, a slight one, indeed, to the relatives of faithful servants, to prevent the immediate and sudden distress incidental to those who have depended on them for the necessities of life, until some new pursuits can be entered into.

These, and these only, are the principles involved in this bill; and I trust that no departure from it shall manifest that the nation has not now the same remembrance of the navy, and does not cherish for it the same provident regard, as distinguished the Congress of 1816 and 1817.

Mr. STORRS said, that as the opposition to the bill appeared to be chiefly directed against that part of it which provided in some cases for the payment allowed to the brothers and sisters of the officers and seamen, he hoped it would not be recommitted for the purpose of striking out that provision. The bill follows, in that respect, others of a like character, framed on other similar occasions, and the principle seemed to him to be as fair and just as any part of it. I think (said Mr. S.) that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. CLAIBORNE) is greatly mistaken in supposing that the officers of the navy, or their relations, are among the wealthiest part of the community. I believe that it would be found, in most cases, quite the reverse, if it could be accurately ascertained. Certainly it may be very safely said, that the officers themselves are generally very far from rich, if they are even independent. I am acquainted personally with very many of them, whose parents and sisters have been in a great degree dependent on them for the comforts of life. Now, the bill provides that, in distributing the small gratuity proposed by it to be offered to them as a public testimonial of our sense of their merit and public services, if it should so happen that the deceased has left no parent, widow, or child, it shall be paid to his surviving brothers and sisters. There were many of the ship's company of the Hornet who contributed to the support of their sisters as well as their parents; and if it should happen that, in any case, the mother had deceased, it would be an unkind, not to say a harsh restriction in the bill which should deprive her daughter of the trifling contribution to her comfort. The sister stands in about the same near relation to the party as the mother; and admitting her or her brothers to share in the distribution, the bill proceeds on the same principle which allows the mother to participate in it. In both cases, we assume what we know frequently exists, that the officer or sailor contributes from his pay to the support of his sisters or younger brothers, as well as his parents, and there is no reason for making any discrimination between them. It may, indeed, happen, that, in some few instances, the relations may be in circumstances calling for nothing like relief, or even honorary gratuity from the Government. This may be the case as to some of the officers. But as to the seamen, it is not probable that there is any such case; and if we were to deny the gratuity altogether, because there may possibly be some case not calling for it from us, we may do a very unkind act to many who are justly entitled to our favorable notice. The allowance is at most, in all cases, very small; and will hardly be an equivalent for the individual property which many of the officers and seamen may have had on board the ship. The brothers and sisters would have shared in that, if their relative had died on the cruise, in the same case in which they will share under the present bill. He hoped, therefore, that the bill would not be recommitted, or changed in its provisions in any respect.

Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD advocated the bill as it was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. He thought that the provision which it contained, granting the benefit of the donation to the mothers and sisters of those who had perished in the performance of the duty which they owed and had paid to their country, ought to meet with the sanction of the House, as it would most assuredly receive the approbation of the country. By that section of the Union to which he belonged, he felt himself authorized to say that it would be cordially approved. In illustration of this, he instanced the case of one of the unfortunate gentlemen who met with an untimely fate in the disastrous event which deprived the nation of the services of so many gallant and meritorious citizens. The person he alluded to was the son of the late Col. Forsyth, of North Carolina, who fell upon the field of glory in the defence of his country. The son went to reside in the State of Tennessee; but the Legislature of North Carolina, with a generosity which redounded to its credit, and which he, as a citizen of that State, felt pride in reverting to, provided for him. The youth was eager to sustain his father's well-earned fame, by devoting himself to the service of his country; and he sought glory, not in the field, where that father's renown was acquired, but upon the ocean, in the depth of which himself and his associates were now buried. For himself (said Mr. S.) he entirely concurred in the opinion expressed by the gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) as to the propriety and justice of retaining that feature of the bill; and also as to the fact of many of our most deserving officers being the children of poor and indigent parents—a circumstance honorable to themselves, and gratifying to their families, and to all who can feel pleasure in witnessing the exaltation of merit. In relation to the individual whose name he had mentioned, he could not bring his mind to consent that the brothers and sisters of that young gentleman, the children of his amiable and respected mother, the children of his venerated father, should be deprived of the advantages which that clause of the bill might possibly afford to them. For his own part, he could not consent to leave unremembered and unhonored the memory of one whose name was connected, not only with his own State, but also with the glories of his country.

Mr. SPEIGHT remarked that he had said yesterday, and repeated again to-day, that he was opposed to the whole bill, and was opposed to it in principle. He believed he had as much sympathy for those who had been bereaved of their relatives by this great calamity of the loss of the Hornet, as any member on that floor; and when called in his individual capacity to administer to their wants from funds under his own personal control, he believed he would be as prompt to manifest it. But, he could not answer to his constituents, nor to his own conscience, the propriety of thus appropriating the public funds. As to the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. DORSEY,) who advocated the bill on the score of gratitude to the gallant crew of the Hornet, or the glorious achievements of that vessel, he would ask that gentleman if this principle obtained, where his pension law would stop? It was perfectly analogous to the whole system of the pension law, which he had opposed on former occasions, and which he could not consent to have crammed down his throat; and he hoped his opposition to it would not be emblazoned before him as a political sin. He contended that Congress had no power thus to legislate away the public Treasury, and that, too, to individuals who had actually performed no services to the country. Should he vote for this bill his constituents would have a right to demand of him on what principle he did so. If they ask me (said Mr. S.) whether I inquired into the pecuniary circumstances of those individuals to whom I voted this money, my answer must be "no; it was on the broad principle of national gratitude." And will this be a satisfactory answer? Sir, I wonder the gentleman did not carry their gratitude to its fullest extent; and in the next thirty generations of the relatives of the deceased, in their bountiful provisions. The gentleman asks if this House is prepared to reject this provision of the bill. I trust in God, sir, it is prepared for it. The oppressive system of taxation for the increase of the revenue, must and will be put down by those who feel its burden.

In conclusion, (said Mr. S.,) he could not vote for the bill. It seemed that when gentlemen put their shoulders to the wheel on the subject of pensions, they were disposed, to use a vulgar phrase, to "go the whole hog," and allow no bounds to restrain them. Mr. S. also alluded to the case referred to by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD,) of young Forsyth, who was educated at the expense of his own State, without appealing to the National Legislature for assistance.

Mr. TEST said he felt it due to himself to state, after what had been observed, the reasons why he moved the recommitment of the bill. The policy of it, (said Mr. T.,) the grounds of it are questionable. What (he asked) was the object of making such appropriations to those engaged in our land or naval service? The object is, that when they are about to enter upon scenes of danger, they may not be appalled by the helplessness of their families, should any thing occur to them by which they might be deprived of their protection and support to encourage them to meet the perils of their station bravely, by holding out the certainty of future support to their bereaved families. This is the true ground on which the pension list is bottomed. Does this case come fairly within the range of the principle stated? It is certainly very doubtful if it do. All who belonged to the Hornet were there by their own free will, and there were many who envied them the situations they held. Was it a war they were engaged in when they perished? No. Did they encounter any danger? No. There would be much stronger ground for the proposition, had this lamentable occurrence happened in time of war. But the bill, as it now stands, is wrong in principle. And I ask with the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. SPEIGHT) if this principle is adopted, where is it to stop? It must go in infinitum. They did not encounter any extraordinary danger. Their loss was an act of Heaven—of the hand of God. There is nothing extraordinary connected with it, calculated to excite our sympathies, except the deplorable destruction of human life which might not have happened to any other vessel either public or private, and it is evident that the places occupied by them might well have been desired by thousands. But how does the principle of the pension system apply to brothers and sisters? They are wholly unconnected with the service or its dangers. If, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) says, the brothers or sisters of any of these officers or men are poor, and their poverty is the consequence of this misfortune, I shall vote for them; but the sisters of some of them, for aught we know, may have husbands worth thousands of dollars.

Mr. T. denied that this principle had always been observed by this House; and, in corroboration of what he said, he instanced the case of the mother of Commodore Perry, whose claims for a pension were brought before Congress, under circumstances calculated to arouse all our sympathies. She was admitted to be poor at the time, and that she derived her sole support from her son; yet her claim was rejected. The principle now sought to be established would soon become general, and a dangerous precedent (he said) it would be. He did not view this case in the light in which pensions are ordinarily given, for he did not think it would hold out any encouragement for persons to enter into the land or naval service. It was a hard duty he had to perform in moving the recommitment of the bill; and if he were to be governed by the dictates of his feelings, he could not have done it; but his judgment pointed out to him what was his duty, and he was forced to pursue its dictate.

Mr. T. concluded, by stating that he did not wish to vote against the bill, notwithstanding the questionable character in which it comes before the House; but, as it stands, its claims are addressed much more to our sympathies than our justice.

Mr. HOFFMAN expressed his regret that a discussion on this subject should have taken place, and proceeded to explain and defend the objects and the principle of the bill. He said the naval service was promoted by grants of this kind, and he hoped that the House would not depart, in the present case, from a rule so long established, and recognized in the proceedings of this House in several instances. A departure from a system, so beneficial in its consequences to the naval service, would diminish the encouragement now held out to persons to enter it. He hoped the discussion would not be protracted, and that the bill would be suffered to pass.

Mr. ELLSWORTH said, the bill rested more upon a principle of duty, than of mere favor and gratitude. Are gentlemen prepared to say that the representatives of these unfortunate men are not, upon principles of justice, entitled to this small pittance? Upon the strictest construction, the representatives of the officers and crew of the Hornet may demand what they were earning up to the moment of their loss. And is not the claim materially the same for a short time after that event? May not their families most properly look to us for that little portion of their subsistence which they were anticipating, and need the more because of this melancholy disaster? Why do we allow pensions? It is upon a principle of duty and strict propriety. And such is the case here. Justice and true national policy imperiously demand we should pass this bill. It is the settled policy of the Government. And, sir, if a wife and children may ask, upon the principle of right, I see not why brothers and sisters may not. We owe this money to the representatives of these men. Let us not add distress upon affliction, by withholding a momentary relief.

The Hornet.

Mr. EVERETT inquired what was the precise question before the House?

The SPEAKER stated the question to be on the motion to recommit, with instructions to strike out the clause extending relief to brothers and sisters, in default of nearer relations.

Such (said Mr. EVERETT) was my understanding of the state of the question, and it seems to me, therefore, not in order to discuss the general principle of the bill. It has been admitted that this bill was to pass, and the only objection taken to it, in committee, was to this extension of its provisions to brothers and sisters. This objection assumes that the officers, seamen, and marines of our public armed ships belonged to that class of the community in which they are likely to have wealthy brothers and sisters; such as stand in no need of the gratuity provided by this bill. No one can suppose that this is the case with the petty officers, seamen, and marines, who are, of course, the most numerous class of those provided for; and, as far as they are concerned, the objection falls to the ground. The same, in general, may, no doubt, be said of the officers as a class. It is by no means true, generally speaking, (as the objection before us supposes,) that they are of an affluent class in society. But granting that they are, and that the objection taken is well founded, do not gentlemen see that it proves too much? It is urged that, by extending this gratuity to brothers and sisters, we extend it to some of the richest persons in the country. If this be so, cannot, and ought not, these rich persons support their parents, their nephews, and nieces? But it is granted that these last are entitled to the gratuity; although, in proportion as these unfortunate officers, lost in the Hornet, have left wealthy brothers and sisters, in the same proportion their widows, children, and parents have no need of the public gratuity. But to deny it to these last, is against the admitted expediency of the whole bill.

It is plain, therefore, that there is no course for those opposed to the clause in question, but to go against the principle of the whole bill, as is done, in point of fact, by the gentleman from North Carolina, and the gentleman from Indiana. I shall not engage in the defence of that principle, for it is sufficiently established in the legislation of the country. I cannot, however, forbear a reply to one or two remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, (Mr. TERRY,) by which he seemed to distinguish between this case and that of the widows and orphans of officers and seamen killed in battle. He thinks that, in time of peace, the service is on a different footing from what it is in time of war, and less meritorious. If there is any difference, however, the service is more attractive in time of war; and it is more peculiarly necessary, in time of peace, on public grounds, to strengthen the encouragements which it presents. As to the officers, of course, no distinction exists; they engage in the service for life. The men enlist for limited terms; but I believe the calculation, whether it is a time of peace or war, or whether a war is likely sooner or later to happen, never enters into their heads; and, as far as the temptations to enlist exist, it is as easy to enlist a crew in time of war as in peace. I believe, sir, that every motive of fair policy requires these encouragements in the service rather in time of peace than war.

The gentleman said, the vessel was not lost in battle but by casualty; it was not a danger to be bravely encountered; no energetic act was to be performed. I differ from the gentleman. I believe that a storm, violent enough to destroy a ship of war, is far more dangerous and terrific to landmen or seamen, than any battle that was ever fought. Gentlemen recollect the descriptions that we have had of the frightful storm which swept the Gulf of Mexico, about the 10th of September, and in which it is supposed the Hornet was lost. A letter has gone the rounds of the newspapers, from a vessel which was on the outer verge of the range of this storm; and the captain represents it as dreadful beyond description. Do gentlemen tell me that the condition of a vessel of war, oppressed by her armament, in such a storm, is nothing compared to a battle? Sir, a battle has no terrors to the gallant seaman. It is full of hope, promise, glory, and even reward, if no higher motive operated. But what is there to animate and cheer him in one of those tremendous tempests, to enable him to bear the labor, and brave the dangers that surround him? I am well persuaded, sir, that there was not one individual, man or officer, on board the unfortunate Hornet, whose muscles were not stiff with labor; whose nerves were not strained with agony, before he went down to his watery grave. And suppose it had been told them, at the last dreadful hour, that, within four months, a pittance like this (and a miserable pittance, after all, it is) would be proposed in the Congress of the United States, for the relief of the widows, the mothers, the children, the sisters, dependent on them for support, and whom they should never behold again, and that this poor pittance would be denied, would it not have added unspeakably to the agony of that last moment, and have embittered the bitter cup of death? Sir, I speak with feeling on the subject; and with good reason. Among my neighbors, there are some included within the provisions of this bill. I speak for the widow and orphan, whose wants have been brought home to me. It is my duty to them, my duty to myself, to oppose the recommitment. I hope the clause will not be stricken out; but that the bill will pass as it came from the Committee of the Whole.

The question being then taken on the motion of Mr. TEST, to recommit the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs, it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, by 114 votes to 70.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided as follows:

WEDNESDAY, February 24.

Indian Affairs.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred that part of the President's Message which relates to the Indian Affairs, and sundry resolutions and memorials upon the same subject, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill to provide for the removal of the Indian tribes within any of the States and Territories, and for their permanent settlement west of the river Mississippi; which was read, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the report and documents, ordered to be printed.

Mr. BUCHANAN said this was a subject of great importance; the more, as he had no doubt, from the nature of the numerous memorials presented to the House, that great misapprehension prevailed in the country on the subject. It was commonly believed that the Indians were to be removed from the Southern States by force; and nothing was further from the intention of Congress, or of the State of Georgia either, than this. It was right to correct the erroneous impression of the public on this subject; and he therefore moved that ten thousand additional copies of the report be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. BURENS did not rise to controvert the printing of any number of copies of the report, but in some sort to controvert the idea suggested, namely, that misapprehension and error had gone abroad on this subject. The gentleman said nothing was further from the intention of this Government and of Georgia, than to remove the Indians by force. Mr. B. presumed that nothing of this sort was intended by the Government of the United States; but when he saw Georgia making laws to extend over the Indians her jurisdiction, and excluding them from the exercise of their own rights, and calculated to drive them off, he could not agree to the remark of the gentleman. He hoped the motion would be postponed for a week, by which time the report would be printed, and the House could see what it was, and whether it was such as to deserve this great circulation among the people.

Mr. WILDE said he did not intend to be drawn into a premature discussion—premature, at least, in his judgment—of the highly important questions involved in the bill and report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, which had not yet been read. He agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BUCHANAN,) that great misapprehension had existed on this subject, and disagreed with the gentleman from Rhode Island, who insisted that there was no misapprehension in relation to the policy and conduct of the State of Georgia. That State had indeed made provision prospectively for extending her laws over every person within her limits. In doing so, she had done no more than had recently been done by some of the new States—nothing more than had long since been done by several of the old ones. He denied that the State of Georgia entertained the project of driving the Indians from her soil by force; and he believed he had at least as good an opportunity of being informed as to the views and policy of that State, as the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island.

On a proper occasion he would enter into an examination of that policy. And he imagined it would not be difficult to prove that she had treated the Indians within her limits, with as much forbearance, humanity, and good faith, as any of the States in which she has found accusers. He would not institute, yet he should not shun, a comparison between her conduct in this respect, and that of any of the old States; and he promised gentlemen, if they did think proper to institute it, he would follow it out as far as his knowledge of their history extended, and the patience of the House would allow him.

At present, he was desirous merely of correcting another misapprehension, in regard to the great excitement and deep interest which it was supposed the State of Georgia felt in the proceedings of Congress on this subject. He believed there was no such excitement as had been imagined. That State knew her rights, and was always ready and able to maintain them. She knew her duties, too, and had never yet failed to perform them. To the legislation of Congress, relative to the Indians within her jurisdiction, she looked without apprehension, certain that it would be limited to its constitutional objects only, and without solicitude, except that which she felt in common with every other State, in the condition of these children of the forest. Her interest in the question has been vastly exaggerated. The number of Indians within her limits was but little greater than that within the territory of New York, and their hunting grounds comprised about five millions of acres.

Her relations with the United States on the subject of these lands were indeed peculiar; and, when it became the subject of discussion, it would be seen whether blame rested anywhere, and with whom. It was enough now to avoid lending sanction, by his silence, to errors of dangerous tendency. He trusted that the largest number of the report proposed would be printed. All who had taken so active and ardent an interest in the affairs of the Indians and Georgia, would naturally be desirous of seeing the facts and arguments of the committee. It was to be hoped many of those persons were sincere inquirers after truth. Let us, then, afford them whatever light we have, to guide them in their search.

Mr. BATES could not, until he knew what the report was, consent to order this great extra number to be printed. He had great confidence in the committee which made the report, and especially for the honorable chairman: but he wished the report to lie on the table until to-morrow or next day, to afford an opportunity for examining it; and he moved to postpone the motion for the extra printing until to-morrow.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, called for the reading of the report. This was opposed by Mr. SUTHERLAND, as a useless waste of time; and was insisted on by Mr. THOMPSON, who said it was necessary, inasmuch as the not knowing what it contained was made a plea for objecting to the printing.

Mr. REED deprecated this departure from the old usage of the House, which was growing up. It had been the practice to print the usual numbers of a document, and, when read and understood, if found of great interest, to print an extra number. Now, it was becoming customary when a report was made, for some gentleman, not a member of the committee, but knowing something of it he supposed, to get up, and move an extraordinary number of copies. He hoped before this was agreed to, in the present case, the House would be enabled to know the contents of the report.

Mr. THOMPSON said, in deference to the opinions of friends near him, he would withdraw the call for the reading.

Mr. TAYLOR said a few words in favor of the postponement; and if that were not carried, he should call for the reading himself, as he could not vote for this extra number without knowing something of the report.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose to insist on the opinion which he had expressed, that great misapprehension existed in the country respecting this Indian question. The memorials which loaded the tables of this House proved this fact. He was satisfied that the fears of memorialists respecting the intentions of the Government, and of the State of Georgia, were totally groundless. The forcible removal of the Indians was thought, in many parts of the country, to be resolved on—a great excitement prevailed on the subject—enthusiasts have been busy in scattering firebrands and arrows throughout the country relative to this subject, calculated to create discord, to sow the seeds of disunion, and to sever brethren, who ought ever to be united. It was proper the people should have information to remove the error prevalent on this subject; and who (he asked) would desire to keep such information from the people?

Mr. WICKLIFFE would be willing to print the same number of this report as had been ordered of a report on the same subject made some years ago—he believed at the close of the nineteenth Congress—but no more. That report was made; and, without being read, a large additional number of copies were ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, said the gentleman was mistaken. He (Mr. E.) made that report himself, and he well remembered that it was read through to the House, before the printing was ordered. But as to the other question, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had said that great misapprehension existed in the country on this Indian subject; and gave that as a reason for moving the large additional number of copies of the report. Mr. E. said he would not contend about the correctness of this opinion, because that would be plunging into the discussion. But when the House is told that great error of opinion prevails on this subject, and that a certain document is calculated to contradict that opinion and correct the misapprehension, would the House favor the extensive distribution of that document without first hearing it? Was it not proper first to know what opinions it contradicts, and what it affirms? He had so much confidence in the committee, that had the printing been moved without any reason but the interest of the subject, he would have voted for it without hesitation; but it was the reason assigned for the motion which made him averse to consent to it.

Mr. GOODENOW, of Ohio, was in favor of the extra number of copies. As the subject was one of great importance, and as he had perfect confidence in the committee, he was willing, on the faith of that confidence, to vote for the motion. There was nothing, he thought, more important, there was nothing more dear to him, than giving information to the people.

Mr. LAMAR, of Georgia, said he would not now enter into any discussion of the subject; but, when the time came, he could show, that, in the conduct of Georgia respecting the Indians, there was nothing inconsistent with the constitution or with propriety. That now was not the question; but it was true that great misapprehension existed in some parts of the country on the subject; the newspapers had teemed with statements and comments calculated to mislead the public mind; and he hoped that a large number of this report might be printed, and distributed among the people, to counteract the great misrepresentation on the subject.

Mr. STERIGER, of Pennsylvania, took it for granted that the report embraced all the laws of Georgia respecting the Indians, and all the facts of the case, presented in a fair view; and, as it would therefore enable the people to form a correct opinion on the subject, he was in favor of printing the additional copies. Mr. S. concurred in the opinion that the most erroneous impressions were entertained among the people on this subject. His own correspondence, as well as the numerous petitions received by this House, convinced him of the fact. He had received a letter lately from home, expressing surprise at a proposition now before Congress, as was honestly believed, for removing the Indians by force; and the people in his part of the country were actually holding meetings to petition Congress against such a measure. Another letter was in favor of the extension of jurisdiction over the Indians by the State of Georgia; but protested against the contemplated forcible removal, in favor of that which has been done, and against that which is not intended. He cited other cases to establish the fact of great misapprehension on the subject; and as this report would correct those erroneous impressions, he was in favor of the extra number.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, preferred knowing for himself what the report contained, before he voted for printing this large additional number. The debate had consumed more time than the reading of the report could have done, and he wished it read. He had voted, some days ago, for printing six thousand copies of a report, without its being read, (the report made by Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee on Commerce,) and he confessed if he had known what that report contained, he should have voted differently. He was resolved not to commit the same error again.

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, said the objection to the printing seemed to be the idea that the report was a partial one, an argument on one side. This was mere presumption, and ought not to hinder the distribution of the information which it contained among the people. Supposing the character of the report such as was imputed to it, the House had printed a large extra number of a former report of an opposite character, and it would be unfair to withhold this.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, seeing no end to this debate, and perceiving its tendency to a premature discussion of the whole subject, if indulged, moved the previous question; but withdrew his motion at the request of Mr. CAMBRELENG, who regretted to hear what the gentleman (Mr. MILLER) had said about the report of the Committee on Commerce. He knew not whether to consider those remarks as implying a compliment or a censure, but he was bound to receive them as complimentary. Would that gentleman suppress information, or withhold it from the people, because it might not correspond with his own views, or because he might dissent from the deductions from it. Mr. C. was surprised at the opposition to printing the extra number of the present report. There had been an Indian war raging out of doors; and he wished to have the question brought in here, where they might have a fair and honorable war with the other side, who had been carrying it on out of doors. He should like to see who were the members that were opposed to having this question placed fairly before the people; and he, therefore, demanded the yeas and nays on the motion for postponement.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said that he wished to vote understandingly on every matter connected with so delicate and important a subject as that before the House. He might or might not agree to the principles of the report, and could not say whether he did or not, as it had not been read to the House, and he did not know exactly what the report was. He hoped that he should not be pressed to vote blindfolded on any question relating to it. He had, during the debate, looked very slightly at some of the sheets at the table, but had not time to read a passage of it carefully. In that part which he cast his eye upon, he saw that a paragraph from an opinion was quoted from a case in the Supreme Court of New York, but he had not time to look and see whether the report further stated that the case had been reversed in the court of errors there. He wanted information as to the nature of the report and its principles. At any rate, he did not wish to act in darkness upon it. He moved that it should be read to the House, and asked the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the question was taken on the reading of the report, and decided in the affirmative: yeas 120 —nays 56.

The Clerk accordingly commenced reading, and had proceeded about half an hour; when

Mr. OLAY, of Alabama, moved to dispense with the further reading, which was agreed to —78 to 57.

A motion was then (about three o'clock) made to adjourn, and lost: yeas 48, nays 90.

West Point Academy.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WHITE now renewed his motion for the previous question, which was seconded by a majority of the House.

Mr. STOKES, of New York, then moved to lay the motion for printing on the table, and called for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being called, the motion to lay on the table was lost: yeas 37, nays 143.

The previous question recurring,

Mr. VANCE demanded the yeas and nays on it, and they were ordered.

And the previous question being put, "Shall the main question be now put?" it was carried—yeas 126, nays 48.

The main question was then accordingly put, viz., on the motion to print ten thousand additional copies of the report, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows—yeas 118, nays 56.

THURSDAY, February 25.

Mr. CROCKETT moved the following resolutions, viz:

1. Resolved, That if the bounty of the Government is to be at all bestowed, the destitute poor, and not the rich and influential, are the objects who must claim it, and to whom the voice of humanity most loudly calls the attention of Congress.

2. Resolved, That no one class of the citizens of these United States has an exclusive right to demand or receive, for purposes of education, or for other purposes, more than an equal and ratable proportion of the funds of the national treasury, which is replenished by a common contribution, and, in some instances, more at the cost of the poor man, who has but little to defend, than that of the rich man, who seldom fights to defend himself or his property.

3. Resolved, That each and every institution, calculated, at public expense, and under the patronage and sanction of the Government, to grant exclusive privileges except in consideration of public services, is not only aristocratic, but a downright invasion of the rights of the citizen, and a violation of the civil compact called "the constitution."

4. Resolved, further, That the Military Academy at West Point is subject to the foregoing objections, inasmuch as those who are educated there receive their instruction at the public expense, and are generally the sons of the rich and influential, who are able to educate their own children. While the sons of the poor, for want of active friends, are often neglected, or if educated, even at the expense of their parents, or by the liberality of their friends, are superseded in the service by cadets educated at the West Point academy.

5. Resolved, therefore, and for the foregoing reasons, That said institution should be abolished, and the appropriations annually made for its support be discontinued.

Mr. CROCKETT said he had endeavored some days ago to get an opportunity to offer this resolution, without being able to succeed. He submitted it in compliance with a duty which he owed his country, and to his constituents especially. The people who sent him here were opposed to this institution; he had talked to the people on the subject; they had told him what their opinions were respecting it, and, if he kept his mouth shut here, he would not discharge his duty faithfully. He believed the resolution to be correct; the institution was kept up for the education of the sons of the noble and wealthy, and of members of Congress, people of influence, and not for the children of the poor. Indeed, it could be of little use to the poor any how; for if a poor boy could by chance get appointed, he could not get there, the expense would be too great; and if he could get there, it would be at the risk of his ruin, as the chance would be that he would have to go home by his own means. It was not proper that the money of the Government should be expended in educating the children of the noble and wealthy; that money was raised from the poor man's pocket as well as the rich. Every poor man, who buys a bushel of salt to salt his pork, or a pound of sugar for his children, or a piece of cloth for his coat, pays his portion of the taxes out of which this West Point academy was maintained for the education of rich men's sons for nothing, twenty-eight dollars a month besides. Another bad effect of it was, that no man could get a commission in the army unless he had been educated at West Point; but the army had been headed very well by men who never went to that academy. He remembered, in a little struggle we had a few years ago, he had gone out and performed his twelve months' tour of duty in the defence of his country, as well as he could. He did not mention this to boast of it; he there saw thousands of poor men who had also gone out to fight their country's battles, but none of them had ever been at West Point, and none of them had any sons at West Point. A man could fight the battles of his country, and lead his country's armies, without being educated at West Point. Jackson never went to West Point school, nor Brown—no, nor Governor Carroll; nor did Colonel Cannon, under whom Mr. C. said he served; and a faithful good officer he was.

The truth was, (said Mr. C.,) this academy did not suit the people of our country, and they were against it; the men who are raised there are too nice to work; they are first educated there for nothing, and then they must have salaries to support them after they leave there—this does not suit the notions of working people, of men who had to get their bread by their labor. He, therefore, felt it his duty to oppose this institution. He had intended, when the appropriation bills should come up, to move to strike out the appropriation for the support of this academy; and he waited the other day till after three o'clock, when it was expected they would be taken up when the House was in committee; and, after he went away, the bills were taken up, and passed through the committee.

Mr. C. wanted information for the people about this academy; perhaps they did not know enough about it; some of them, may be, had never heard of it, and he wanted to let them hear of it and know all about it. He must say, however, that he did not offer his resolution with much hope of succeeding; there were too many gentlemen in the House interested in this academy, he feared, to allow his resolution to pass; but it was his duty to try.

A great deal had been said in the House about retrenchment, and they had been several weeks spending time every day in trying to dismiss a poor little draughtsman, who everybody admitted had been useful, and whose duties were necessary; notwithstanding this, he must be dismissed for the sake of retrenchment. Well, what was the consequence? Why, as soon as his office was voted down, up get gentlemen to move that the committee have the same work done by the job, which everybody knows is an expensive way of having public work done. That resolution, sir—[The Speaker reminded Mr. C. that it was not in order to introduce those resolutions in debate on the present question.]

Mr. C. said he did not want to break the rules, but he thought it could do no harm to point out these things, and if we are going to retrench, (said he,) let us retrench so that we can feel it. As for this academy, however, (said Mr. C.), the young men educated there did not suit our service; they were too delicate and could not rough it in the army like men differently raised. When they left the school they were too nice for hard service. He had seen them about here, and he supposed they had good salaries, which the poor people, who consumed the salt and other things which were taxed, had to pay.

Let us (said Mr. C.) put this institution down a little while, and see how it will work. He believed the true interest of the Government was to put it down, although he did not, for the reason before given, hope much to succeed. He wished, however, to see how the House stood on it, and he therefore requested the yeas and nays on his resolution.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that the resolution was one of much importance. He would agree with the gentleman, that there were many abuses connected with the institution; but, as the resolution ought not to be hastily acted on, he moved to lay it on the table, and print it; which motion was agreed to.

Ardent Spirits in the Navy.

Mr. CONDIOT offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of inducing the seamen and marines in the navy of the United States, voluntarily to discontinue the use of ardent spirits, or vinous or fermented liquors, by substituting for it double its value in other necessities and comforts whilst in service, or in money payable at the expiration of the service.

2. Resolved, also, As a further inducement to sobriety and orderly deportment in the navy, as well as with a view to preserve the lives and morals of the seamen and marines, that said committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing some additional bounty, in money or clothing, or both, to be paid to every seaman and marine, at the expiration of his service, who shall produce from his commanding officer a certificate of total abstinence from ardent spirits, and of orderly behavior, during the term of his engagement.

3. Resolved, also, That the said committee inquire and report whether or not the public service, as well as the health, morals, and honor of the naval officers, would be promoted by holding out to the midshipmen and junior officers some further inducements and incentives to abstinence from all intoxicating liquors.

Mr. CONDIOT remarked that this subject had been already referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, but they, under the impression that it was not within their province to report with respect to the navy, merely reported with respect to the army. They made a favorable report in regard to the army; and it was because they declined reporting on the other branch of the service, that he offered this resolution to refer the inquiry to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HOFFMAN said that no man could rejoice more than he would if the use of ardent spirits were discontinued in the navy of the United States; nor was any man more convinced than he was of its injurious effects. But this ought to be left to the discretion of individuals, for he believed that no regulations would effect the object which the honorable mover of the resolution has in view. The resolution, it appears, deems whiskey that vulgar, democratic drink which Captain Basil Hall so strenuously condemned. Mr. H. said that when the people could procure good wine, although it is not so strong a drink, yet they would not ask for whiskey. With all our anxiety it would be found that any regulations we can introduce will be impracticable. The matter should be left optional with the officers and sailors themselves; and the example set to them by our people, and the judgment of the country, will be more effectual than any regulations we can adopt. It may be expedient (said Mr. H.) to make our sailors cold-water drinkers. He did not think so. He feared it would have the effect of reducing their efficiency, of impairing the courage, the generosity, and bravery, and all the other qualifications incidental to the character of our navy. If by the resolution it is intended to dispense entirely with the use of ardent spirits in our navy, the object would not, in his opinion, be obtained. If any gentleman will point out some practical scheme whereby to do away with this practice—because some practical measure will be necessary—he would willingly give it his support. He called on any gentleman to point out a practical scheme. He felt indebted to the humanity of the gentlemen who brought this subject under consideration; but he repeated that he wanted them to send to the committee some practical scheme to effect their object, which the committee could report; otherwise all their good and humane intentions would evaporate, and the adoption of these regulations would not be attended with any practical results. No one in the service was now obliged to drink ardent spirits, and he thought its discontinuance could not be enforced with advantage.

Ardent Spirits in the Navy.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said he did not believe that any practical results would be derived from the adoption of this resolution. He did not like the introduction of such topics into this Hall; and, when he said so, he did not intend any disrespect to the gentleman who moved the resolution. He knew (he said) that temperance societies of ladies and gentlemen had been established throughout the country, and he did not doubt the benevolence of their efforts to prevent the use of ardent spirits. He objected to them for one reason only. What (he asked) would the future historian of this country have to say when he should be called upon to write the history of the events of the early part of the nineteenth century? Will he not describe us as a nation of drunkards? That historian would say, to such an extent had this vice been carried, that ladies formed themselves into societies for the promotion of temperance, and for the suppression of the vice of drunkenness. He hoped that to such a description of the state of our society, erroneous in point of fact, Congress would not give its false sanction by legislating on this subject, and especially when no practical benefit can arise from the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. W. moved to lay the resolution on the table, but subsequently withdrew it at the request of

Mr. DRATTON, who said the gentleman from New York (Mr. HOFFMAN) is opposed to the resolution, because he thinks what it seeks for cannot be accomplished. He says, that in the Naval Committee the subject has been more than once considered, and that no practical mode occurred to its members, by which they could put a stop to intemperance in the navy or marine corps; that he deplored its existence as productive of the most injurious consequences, and would gladly eradicate it, if it were in his power to do so. He added, that whiskey, in moderate quantity, was not prejudicial; that it was sometimes necessary to the health and vigor of the seamen; that it ought not, therefore, to be altogether interdicted; and that he placed no reliance in legislation as a remedy for the evil complained of. The surgeons and the officers in the army and the navy tell us, as will be seen by documents which have been laid upon our tables, that ardent spirits never contribute to the health or permanent comfort of the sailor or the soldier; and that the intemperate use of them, in a greater degree than all other causes combined, occasions crimes, insubordination, punishments, diseases, and deaths. Admitting, then, that a small quantity of strong liquor is not injurious, as it is not beneficial, no reasons exist for drinking it. But it cannot have escaped our observation, that its habitual consumption, even in moderation, too frequently excites a desire for more, and gradually leads to the grossest excess. Much as I deprecate the baleful consequences of drunken debauchery, I entirely concur with the gentleman from New York, in the impolicy of endeavoring to correct it by a prohibitory law, which might raise a spirit of discontent, counteracting the object of the law. I am opposed to sudden and violent innovations. Reformation must commence with the delinquent himself. If, by appealing to the moral sense of the sailor, by diminishing the temptations to which he is exposed, by increasing his comforts, and adding to his pecuniary stipend, an impression can be made upon him, hopes may be entertained that the impression will be durable. Those powerful inducements to human action, self-respect and interest, may thus be brought to operate upon him. And this course, according to the language of the resolution of the gentleman from New Jersey, (Mr. CONDIOT,) is all that is required from this House. That from it beneficial effects may be calculated upon, has been demonstrated by several instances, in which it has proved successful in the army, in the navy, and in our merchant ships.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) is adverse to the resolution, because he conceives it to have originated in temperance societies, or similar associations, from which have issued numerous memorials and petitions of a certain cast, with which our tables have been frequently covered. Sir, no one condemns more than I do the language and the spirit of many of the papers to which the gentleman alludes. I can assure him, that the only persons with whom I have had any communication relative to the subject before us, are physicians in the army and navy and military officers. But were it otherwise—were this resolution pressed upon us by visionaries and theorists, pushing their abstract notions of morality and benevolence to fanatical or ridiculous extremes, if it contained suggestions useful and practical, I would listen to them. Whether we shall be enabled, by any means which we can devise, to effect what is contemplated by the resolution, I will not undertake to determine. It is our duty to make the effort. If we fail, we shall have the consolation of reflecting, that we have attempted to check the progress of a vice which renders its victims not only useless and disgusting, but a burthen upon society. If we succeed, though success may be only partial, we shall improve the intellectual, and moral, and physical condition of our army and our navy. I trust, therefore, that the resolution will be adopted, and that an opportunity will be afforded for making an experiment, by which much may be gained, and from which no possible injury can result.

Mr. HOFFMAN rose to reply, but the expiration of the hour cut short the debate.

SATURDAY, February 27.

Ardent Spirits in the Navy.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions moved by Mr. CONDUCT on the 25th instant; when

A motion was made by Mr. CHILTON to amend the said resolutions, by striking out from the word "Resolved," in the first resolution, to the end of the last resolution, and inserting the following:

"That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire whether the public interest and the cause of morality would be most effectually promoted, by emphatically prohibiting the use of ardent, vinous, and other fermented liquors in the navy of the United States, by the officers and seamen belonging thereto, or by permitting a continuation of the practice of issuing them as rations in said service.

"Resolved, further, That, in the event said committee shall be of opinion that it is expedient to continue the ration aforesaid, in the naval establishment, they be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing some mode for procuring the discontinuance of the use of ardent, vinous, and other fermented liquors in the various civil departments, and among the members of Congress, and others holding offices of either trust, honor, or profit, under the authority of the people of the United States."

Mr. CHILTON said that he was proud to hail the present day as a day of "Retrenchment and Reform;" and indeed so many evidences had been given of a disposition to accomplish each, that it would now amount almost to moral treason to dispute the rapid and mystical progress of either. So far as relates to "Retrenchment," upon a mere guess, (said Mr. C.,) I should suppose that not more than one hundred thousand dollars have been expended in arguing the question in its various ramifications, while not one solitary dollar, so far as I am advised, or can understand, has been saved to the Government. I am much surprised, sir, to discover gentlemen, as I humbly think, so vastly inconsistent, and yet so externally sensitive, and ferociously virtuous. These "American system gentlemen," both by precept and example, adopt, in my opinion, a doctrine wholly at war with the provisions of the present proposition, and their former declarations. They have been clamorous for the "Tariff," the encouragement of "Domestic Industry," and an increase of the duties on the importation of articles manufactured abroad. One of the staples of the Western country is whiskey, into which, by distillation, the farmers convert their immense surplus of corn, rye, fruit, &c. To have a market for this article, we must have consumers; to prevent its consumption, no legislative sanction can be adequate. Sir, I am no friend to intemperance, either on land or at sea; but I think it infinitely better to abandon the votary of intemperance to his fate, than to abridge the natural liberties of man.

I make the remark, and I make it seriously, that legislation upon this subject is as useless as was the attempt of King Canute, who, flattered by his courtiers, commanded the "tide to recede," and was well nigh overwhelmed in its waves, before he discovered his presumption and folly.

[Mr. DEATTON, of South Carolina, here rose, and said that he had heard the amendment read, and it appeared the object of the gentleman was merely to indulge his humor. The Speaker, nevertheless, decided that Mr. CHILTON was in order. Whereupon, he proceeded as follows:]

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the gentleman's pardon for his polite interruption of me, while I was surely not interrupting him. I understood perfectly well what I had intended to say, and what it was in order for me to say; and if the gentleman will look more deeply into the question presented, and anticipate me with slower progress, he will perceive that I am in good earnest, and not playing with either the feelings or time of the House. But, sir, as I before remarked, while we are extending through so boundless a range the work of "Retrenchment," I should be gratified to despatch for its helpmate the fair nymph "Reform." Surely its way is lovely—its dimensions being small, and the company of a twin-sister cannot be unacceptable.

Whether this "reform" in the navy is to be charged under the head of "cleansing the Aegean stable," or whether it properly falls under some other head, I will not pretend to say. But I will say that the legislation is as partial in its effects and character, as was that which I witnessed in this House a few days since; when gentlemen, who even denied me the yeas and nays upon a proposition to "retrench" their own wages, voted to discontinue the humble draughtsman of this House. I am determined in this case, as in that, to try the liberality of gentlemen, and to ascertain whether they are as willing to "retrench" their own allowances of intoxicating liquors, as they are to limit those of others. I venture to predict that in this, as in the instance alluded to, there will be opposition to having the question taken by yeas and nays. It behooves me to show why my substitute should be adopted. It is here attempted to bargain with men to become "virtuous." I am reminded, sir, of a maxim which I learned at an early age, and in which experience has confirmed me, to wit, that "virtue which required to be watched, is not worth watching." Vows to be temperate (where the restraints imposed by public sentiment—by the endearing and heart-rending tears which often flow around the domestic fireside—aided by the claims of helpless innocence)—are all insufficient. If the pride of character cannot avail, money cannot.

The question to agree to this amendment was decided in the negative.

Judiciary Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. PEARCE then said, he was prepared to express his opinions on this subject; but as he presumed the House had heard enough on it, he moved that the resolutions lie on the table; which motion was negatived—yeas 57, nays 108.

The previous question was called for by Mr. STERIGERE; and, being demanded by a majority of the members present, the previous question was put and carried; and

The main question was then put, viz: "Will the House agree to the resolutions as moved by Mr. CONDIOT?" And passed in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, March 10.

Judiciary Bill.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAMBRELENG in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the Judiciary bill.

Mr. WICKLIFFE said: The constitution vests the judicial power of the United States in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress, from time to time, may ordain and establish. Whatever inferior courts Congress shall ordain and establish, should alike extend themselves to the whole Union. The system should be one system for all the States, uniform in its character, and harmonious in its action.

At the commencement of the Government, uniformity in the organization of the judiciary department was preserved throughout the then thirteen States; and, in every change of the system since made, uniformity has been sedulously preserved.

For a moment allow me to call your attention to the history of the judicial system of the United States, as illustrative of what I have said upon this subject:

In 1789, Congress, in obedience to the mandate of the constitution, organized the Supreme Court, and established the district and circuit courts in the several States, and imparted to them severally most of that jurisdiction which they have since exercised. A district and a circuit court was established in each State, and the Supreme Court was constituted of six justices. The Union was divided into three circuits, the eastern, middle, and southern circuits. Two of the justices of the Supreme Court were required to hold, jointly, two terms in each year, in each of the States, besides two terms of the Supreme Court, at the seat of Government. In 1792, the justices themselves, in a memorial to the President of the United States, complained of the onerous duties exacted of them under the act of 1789, and declared their inability to perform the labor which that act imposed upon them. This memorial was made the subject of Executive communication to Congress, and, in that year, instead of three circuits, six were created, and one justice of the Supreme Court was required, in conjunction with the district judge, to hold the circuit courts in each State, twice each year.

Vol. X.—43

At that time, sir, our population did not exceed six millions; our Union was composed of thirteen States; the banks of the Ohio formed, in fact, our western boundary. The Congress of 1789 did not then think six judges of the Supreme Court were more than necessary to the discharge of the high duties confided by the constitution and laws to that tribunal. The judges themselves, and the Congress of 1792, believed that the duties imposed by the judiciary act of 1789 were too onerous; and they divided the labor of the circuit duties. From that day to this I have never understood that those justices had not enough to do. Indeed, I have often heard it said they had more labor to perform than they could well discharge, in justice to themselves and to the country. Now, sir, when the number of States has nearly doubled; when our population has increased from six to twelve millions; when our commerce has extended itself to every country and clime; our relations as political communities have increased in importance, and every day becoming more and more delicate; the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. CRAWFORD,) is ready to start these judges upon a judicial race over twenty-four States twice in each year. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. SPENCER,) conscious that his friend from Pennsylvania has exacted more than human labor can accomplish, stops the judges at the limits of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and proposes to give to these States a provincial judge, a judge with full and ample salary, but he is not permitted to take his seat upon the Supreme Bench, that is, the judicial sanctum sanctorum, which must not be contaminated by a western man. The one proposition is, of itself, utterly hopeless of success, and the other cannot be regarded, though not so intended, but as an insult to the States who are thus marked by the exclusion alone as applicable to themselves. A system something like this of the gentleman from New York, was reported by the judiciary committee, in 1828. That system, however, allowed the provincial justices, when it should please God to remove by death any of the then justices of the Supreme Court, to take the place thus vacated. It met with one universal condemnation from the nine western States, and was by the committee abandoned, as utterly offensive to those whom it proposed to benefit. Such, I have no doubt, will be the fate of so much of the amendment of the gentleman from New York as proposes to send to these three proud and gallant States a provincial judge.

I proceed, sir, with the history from which I have been diverted in a moment's reply to a part of the opposition to the bill under consideration.

The system remained under the organization of 1792 until that eventful period in the political history of our country, the month of February, 1801. The party then in power, but which was soon to retire, under the indignant frowns of an insulted and abused people, looked to the judicial department of our Government as a point of safe retreat—a point from which they could renew their assaults upon their conquerors, the people; and succeed in establishing principles in our Government, which the constitution did not warrant, and which the people abhorred.

In that year, the judicial system of the United States was changed. The Supreme Court was to consist of the six justices then in commission, to discharge appellate duties only. Thus separated from the States, and the people of the States, the judges were destined to become the mere engines of power, devoted to the establishment of a great consolidated government, and regarding the States as mere corporate existences, deriving their power from, instead of imparting it to, the General Government.

The better to effect this grand purpose, six circuits were enacted, and three circuit judges in each circuit were appointed, besides the district judges then in commission.

It will only be necessary to look to the then state of the times, and to the names of such judges as were commissioned, some in the hour of midnight, to justify the inferences which I have made.

This system did not require the test of experience to satisfy the American people of its enormity—its want of adaptation to the system of government, such as the Union was and ought to be; and so soon as they could lay their hands upon it, they erased this federal citadel to the foundation, and rebuilt that of 1789.

Between 1789 and 1807, Vermont, Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee had been admitted into the Union, and, in the latter year, (1807,) a seventh justice was added to the Supreme Court, to reside in the seventh circuit, and to hold circuit courts in the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Vermont was added to the eastern circuit; and thus the system of 1789 was made to expand itself, and to embrace these four new States, and has continued from that time to the present moment.

It has given to our nation a character, at home and abroad, for judicial intelligence and weight of character, which the gentlemen opposed to this bill have been emulous of each other in praising. I will not detract from the just claims of our national judiciary, nor will I speak of it irreverently.

I have no incense to burn at the altar of any department of this Government; and if I had, it would not burn at that of the judiciary.

That department, like every other, is filled by men liable to err, and responsible to the people, whom I regard as the supreme power in this Government. To them and to their will I acknowledge my obligations; and, in the execution of that will, as their representative, I will speak of the other co-ordinate departments of their Government as I think they deserve.

This is in theory, and should be in practice, a representative Government, in all its departments. The Executive, in his appropriate sphere, is no less the agent or representative of the people, than the members of this House, though his functions are different. The judges must be regarded as the agents or representatives of the people, in the discharge of their functions in the judicial department of this Government.

The doctrine which repudiates the idea of representation in the judicial department, is anti-republican, is at war with the genius of our institutions. Gentlemen startle at the idea of judicial representation, and say they do not comprehend it. If they do, they have not dealt fairly by those who believe that there ought to exist in that, as in every other department, the representative principle.

The member from New York (Mr. STROBE) seems to be astounded at its mention. He never before heard of the idea of "judicial representation." In his mind, it must mean, if I have his words correctly, the representation of the prejudices, the passions, and the factions of the people. There is a class of politicians in this country who have always, when speaking of the people, supposed them to be governed alone by prejudice, passion, and faction. I will not say that the gentleman belongs to that class, but he will pardon me for entertaining an opinion more favorable of the intelligence and virtue of the people. They are capable of thinking, reasoning, and acting, free from prejudice or passion.

The other gentleman from New York (Mr. SPENCER) repudiates, in strong terms, as wholly improper, the idea of preserving in our judicial department the representative principle. Indeed, he seems to go further upon this subject than his colleague. He would have the judge unknown to the people, and the people unacquainted with the judge. He would have the judge, in order to preserve him from the contaminating influence of the people among whom he is to administer the laws, reside as far as possible from them, to be sent among them at a distance from where he resides.

If these views be sound, if there be any thing in them consistent with propriety, and in harmony with the principles of our Government, it would be well to test them by experiment. Let us disband our own judicial corps, and call upon the chancellor of England, the judges of the courts of King's bench and common pleas, to visit us, and decide upon the rights and liberties of our citizens. They would be as likely as any set of men, if not the most so, to preserve untarnished the new and pre-eminent qualification of a judge, a total ignorance of the people of the United States, and consequently the genius and spirit of their institutions, which depend upon public opinion for their excellence and pre-eminence of character.

For my own part, I am wholly averse to the idea of importing judges as we import our cattle, under the hope of improving their breed.

When my rights are involved in a judicial contest, I like to know something of the men who are about to decide upon them. When a judge is known to the people among whom and for whom he administers justice, to be a man of high character, undoubted integrity, and legal attainments, his decisions give satisfaction, and inspire confidence in the public mind. Not so with a judge of whom the people know nothing.

The Tariff.

I will tell the gentlemen what I understand by judicial representation.

In the first place, as this is a representative republic, I would not have upon the bench a monarchist in principle. I would have the judges responsible to the people; and, if I were about to form a constitution, I would limit the term of their office, and remit them to the appointing power, at stated periods.

To come to the question now under discussion: In the organization of a court, such as that of the Union, whose jurisdiction is defined by the Constitution of the United States, whose powers are co-extensive with the boundaries of twenty-four distinct and sovereign States, the same system should be extended to each State. In making the appointments to office, I would look to the various geographical divisions of these sovereign communities, and I would make the selections from among the citizens of those States, with a view to give to each its due and relative proportion and weight in the judicial department. To illustrate my idea, I would extend the present judicial system to those six, I might say nine States, to which it has not been extended. I would give to those States, when divided into proper circuits, a judge selected from among the citizens of those States, to reside within the respective circuits, and administer justice in the inferior courts, and to repair, once in each year, to the seat of Government, bringing with them each a knowledge of the local laws and judicial decisions of the respective States, and, if gentlemen will have it so, possessing, in common with the people, those principles of government, and attachments to our institutions, so necessary to make a man either a good politician or a sound judge.

To illustrate my idea of judicial representation further, I need only advert to the fact that your court is now composed of seven judges—six of whom reside on this side the mountains, and administer justice in courts of original jurisdiction in States containing a population of about seven millions, while nine States, with a population little short of five millions, is left with but a single judge, and he confined to three out of the nine States.

If the honorable gentleman will, for the sake of the argument, imagine the entire vacancy of the Supreme Bench, and that the President would be weak or wicked enough to appoint the whole seven from the State of Kentucky or Ohio, and the Congress of the United States unjust enough to say, by its legislation, that, in the six New England States, and in the "great State" of New York, there should not be held a circuit court, they will then have a just conception of my idea of judicial representation. My word for it, sir, if that were the case, and it were necessary to extend the system to these States, to increase the number of judges to nine or ten, this bill would pass.

I put it to the candor of gentlemen to say, if it is consistent with their own notions of equality in the States, with their own notions of justice to the people west of the Alleghany, that the present system, limited as it is, shall remain when these States, in their sovereign character, present their high claims to the Congress of the United States, demanding the extension of this system to them, and claiming, as they have a right to claim, an equal participation in the administration of this Government in all its departments.

THURSDAY, March 11.

The Tariff.

The House then resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. ANDERSON:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to bring in a bill allowing a drawback of nine cents per gallon on all rum distilled in this country from foreign molasses, when such rum is exported to a foreign country."

Mr. ANDERSON said he was aware that it was the general practice of this House to instruct its committee to inquire into the expediency of adopting a measure, rather than to instruct them to bring in a bill; but as the Committee of Ways and Means had brought in a bill embracing the subject matter of this resolution, and as that bill was rejected by the House, this, or any other committee, he apprehended, would not deem it expedient to act again on this subject, unless they were under the especial direction of the House; and Mr. A. deemed it due to the House to say, that, if the subject of this resolution had been presented, unconnected with other matters, and had been acted on by the House, he should so far respect such decision, as not again to agitate the subject this session. But, as many gentlemen saw, or thought they saw, objections to some of the items of that bill, and voted to reject the whole, who, Mr. A. believed, were disposed to sustain this resolution, he submitted it in this shape, deeming it as well to take the sense of the House directly on the proposition to bring in a bill, as to take the opinion of the House after a bill is introduced.

The tariff of 1828 (said Mr. A.) proposed to encourage American manufactures, and to protect domestic industry. This resolution relates immediately to the manufacturer, and proposes to restore him in part to the situation in which that tariff found him, and, if adopted, will not only aid the manufacturer, but various other important branches of American industry. The resolution does not place this class of manufacturers in a situation as good as they were before the passage of the law, for it still leaves them oppressed with the whole of the enormous increased duty on the raw material used by them, which must still be paid if the article is consumed in this country; but as it will open the foreign market for their manufactured goods, it will be a great relief both to this class of citizens and to the commercial interest of our country. Before the passage of the tariff of 1828, the duty on molasses was five cents per gallon; then a drawback was allowed of four cents on each gallon distilled into rum, and sent out of the country. The duty is now ten cents per gallon; and this resolution proposes to allow a drawback of nine cents per gallon on all rum made from this molasses when it is exported, still having the double duty to be paid on all that shall be used in this country. I cannot conceive what rational objection can be urged to the re-establishment of this drawback. We grant a debenture equal to the duty on the same article distilled by foreigners and in a foreign land, while, by our law, as it now stands, we refuse it to our citizens, and yet we please ourselves with the idea that we are protecting American industry. When this drawback was repealed, it was done with the expectation of helping the whiskey distiller. It was thought that it would increase the demand and price of whiskey, and thereby aid the grain grower. We have now tried the experiment nearly two years, and I believe all are convinced that its expected benefits have not been realized. Does whiskey find a more ready sale or better price than it found before the tariff of 1828? Or has the demand and price of grain improved since that period, in consequence of this restriction on the distillation of molasses? I believe, sir, if we take every price current which has been published since June, 1828, we shall find that neither whiskey nor grain has improved one cent, but, on the contrary, both have fallen greatly in price. If then, the repeal of this drawback has not answered the expectations of those who voted for it; if it has not benefited the interest it was thought it would subserve; if it does good to no one, and a positive injury to some, why should we not restore the protection, and again extend to this class of our manufacturers the encouragement we profess to extend to all others. If we wish to introduce the more general use of whiskey, and thereby aid so much of the grain market as is used in this article, it is certainly expedient to open a passage through which this rum may go out of the country, and give place to the consumption of whiskey. The effect, and only effect, this repeal of the drawback has, is to encourage and aid the foreign distiller, at the expense and to the destruction of the American distiller, to confine this rum to our own market, force it to compete with our domestic spirit made of grain, and, so far as this competition can go, to destroy the market for whiskey at home. If we honestly intend to encourage domestic industry, and enable our manufacturers to compete with foreign manufacturers, we ought to allow our citizens to obtain the raw material on as good terms as the foreigner. Let our duties on imports be what they may, it is for the interest of the manufacturer and for the country to encourage the export of all such imports as by our labor and skill shall be made of double value to the foreign purchaser; and the export will not be so well encouraged in any way, as by allowing a return of the duties paid on the raw material when it is exported in the manufactured article. While we have commerce, cargoes must, in some way or other, be made up; and as long as it is necessary for a profitable voyage to make a part or the whole of a cargo of rum, so long will rum be obtained, and continue to be an article of merchandise.

It is not merely for the distiller that we should pass this resolution, but for other extensive branches of industry that will receive great relief and support from it. Every branch of industry connected with the West Indian trade will be relieved, revived, and protected by it. And let me here remind the House, that we never had cause of complaint, and never, so far as my knowledge extends, have complained of this trade. It is a trade of fair, free, unrestricted exchange. It is a market for any thing we choose to send out; and many articles that now form a valuable part of the exports of our country would be nearly, if not quite, worthless without this trade. We can in this market exchange what is of little or no value to us here, for articles of great value to us—articles that not only administer to our wants and comfort, but out of which, if we do not tie up our hands by restrictions and prohibitions, we can make an important and valuable article of export. Sir, this trade is worthy of all encouragement. It gives life and employment to a vast amount of the labor and industry of this country. On this trade the lumberman, millman, ship carpenter, fisherman, and sailor are almost entirely dependent for employment; and there is no class of men in this country more deserving of our protection than these, if severe, hardy, and unremitting labor can entitle them to our protection. Sir, the life of the northern sailor and fisherman is too well known to require any comments from me. Hardier beings never floated on the ocean. But the life and hardships of the lumberman, I believe, are known to very few on this floor. We should think an army making a winter campaign in the storms of our northern frontier entitled to our sympathy and applause for the sufferings and hardships that must unavoidably be endured through the severity of winter. Trying and severe as may be such a service, it is no harder than the lumberman endures as regularly as the winter comes. In November, or the first of December, these men go into the forest with their teams and provisions, construct a rude camp, barely sufficient to break off the wind, while they sleep on a bundle of straw, or as often on the boughs of the pine, and work from daylight until dark, in the snows of the forest, until the rivers open in the spring. When the snow melts, and the ice of the streams breaks up, they omit their lumber to the river, and close their winter's work with a labor that no men at those accustomed to repose comfortably on snow-bank could endure for a single week. Day after day, and week after week, these men are immersed in the river, when the water is as cold as ice and snow can make it; their garments are a perfect sheet of ice, and the comfort of a dry jacket is unknown to them; and yet you find them hardy and healthy men. Hundreds may be found now engaged in the forests, with constitutions firm and unimpaired, who have, for more than forty winters in succession, been engaged in this service. I believe, sir, that you will not find, in any other description of mills, such constant, unceasing labor as in our lumber mills. The saw is running continually day and night—the millmen relieving each other at six in the morning and six in the evening, as regular as a watch at sea, and the labor is as uninterrupted and unceasing as the motion of the current that turns the wheel. This, sir, is the labor and these the men that any relief given to the West India trade will aid; and I ask you if these men, who breathe the pure January northwester, are not as valuable to you in peace or war, and as much entitled to your consideration, as those who are inhaling the confined atmosphere of a crowded manufacturing establishment?

The Tariff.

No article of export employs so much tonnage in proportion to its value as a West India cargo, and the cargo obtained in exchange. A vessel that will carry out a cargo of cotton or manufactured goods, worth from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars, would be fully freighted by one-thirtieth or one-fiftieth of that sum in lumber, and so with a return cargo of molasses; and yet she will employ as many seamen, and give double the employment to landmen, who live by loading, discharging, and tending on vessels, for she will make two voyages to the other's one, and add as much to the naval strength of the country as the rich freighted ship; and all her repairs are made in this country, the West Indies being more expensive ports to repair in. Not so with the European trader, she obtains her repairs and equipment abroad; for, by reason of the enormous duties imposed on every article necessary to the outfit of a ship, it is for the interest of our merchant to refit and equip his ship abroad.

This material, used by the distiller, is as much the produce of our soil as the whiskey which the farmer gets in exchange for his grain, the produce of his soil. We exchange our lumber, which is the fruit of our labor, for molasses; and without this exchange the whole of our industry engaged in this branch of business must stop. In the prosecution of this trade, the grain grower is more benefited than he can be by making his grain into whiskey; for, while the lumberman and the millman are engaged in procuring and manufacturing the outward cargo, the mariner in transporting it to market, and bringing home the return cargo, the distiller in converting it into rum, and the mariner again exporting this rum abroad, they, and the ship carpenter, and their dependants, are, of necessity, consumers of the grain raised by other hands. Some of this industry has been diverted already by the operation of the tariff, and been turned to raising grain; and unless you restore this drawback, a still greater number will be forced from their accustomed employments, and, as their only alternative, must go to foreign countries, or become agriculturists; and, instead of effecting the great object for which we started, to draw off numbers from agricultural pursuits, and increase the demand for agricultural products, our legislation will have exactly the contrary effect. Such are the connection and dependencies of commerce and agriculture on each other, that any check or embarrassment thrown upon the one, is inevitably felt by the other. Our commerce first felt the tariff of 1828; it bore hard on this important branch of our wealth, industry, and strength, from the very day of its operation; and, now when commerce is sinking under this load, agriculture begins to feel the blow. Some of the shackles on our commerce must be taken off, and this drawback, trifling as it may seem, will save to the nation thousands of tons of shipping, if not millions of capital. Freight, we all admit, is the soul and life of commerce; and it is our duty, while we regard its prosperity, to give every facility to multiply freights at home, and to obtain them abroad.

Grant this drawback, and you give to your vessels additional freights, by making a valuable article of export of your imports. And as it will enable you to increase your imports in this trade of exchange, so it will greatly increase your original export, and in all its operations infuse new life into this depressed trade.

Mr. POLK moved to amend the resolution, by adding, "and to allow also a drawback of four and one-half cents per square yard on foreign cotton bagging, exported either in the original packages, or around the cotton bale, to any foreign country."

Mr. P. said, in offering this amendment, he did not intend to indulge in any general discussion of the principles of the tariff. A very few remarks in explanation of the reasons which had induced him to offer it, was all that he then deemed necessary. The resolution of the gentleman from Maine proposes to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill to allow a drawback of nine cents per gallon upon the exportation of rum distilled in the United States from foreign molasses. The reason given why this would be proper, is, that the navigating interest of the East, as well as the manufacturer of spirits from this foreign material intended for exportation, were oppressively burdened by the imposition of a duty of ten cents per gallon, imposed by the tariff of 1828, on the exportation of foreign molasses. If this be a satisfactory reason why a drawback should be allowed upon this article, then he thought it could be clearly shown that, upon the same principle, a drawback should be allowed on the exportation of foreign cotton bagging wrapped around the cotton bale. The two articles stand upon the same principle; and he could see no reason for allowing drawback in one case and refusing it in the other. Foreign molasses, upon their importation into the United States, were subject to pay a duty under the present tariff of ten cents per gallon. The molasses were distilled in this country into spirits, and in that state exported to foreign countries for market. The gentleman from Maine proposed, upon the exportation of the spirits thus made from molasses, to allow a drawback of nine cents per gallon, leaving in the Treasury one cent per gallon of the duty levied upon the importation of the molasses, to defray, he supposed, the incidental expenses and charges at the custom-house. Now, did not the article of cotton bagging stand precisely upon the same principle? That article, upon its importation into the United States, was charged with a duty, under the tariff of 1828, of five cents per square yard. When it was received in this country, it was used almost exclusively by the cotton planter in baling and preparing his cotton for market. It was again exported wrapped around the cotton. It was not consumed in the country any more than the molasses distilled into spirits and exported were. His proposition was to allow to the cotton planter, upon the exportation of his cotton bales, a drawback of four and a half cents per square yard on the bagging with which his cotton was wrapped for market, leaving in the Treasury half a cent per square yard of the duty originally paid upon its importation. The East, or at least a portion of the East, complained that the duty on molasses was onerous, so much so, that it prevented its distillation into New England rum for exportation, and thereby affected the shipping interest; and that, therefore, a drawback of the duty should be allowed upon exportation. The South might, with equal reason, at least, complain that the duty of five cents per square yard on cotton bagging was an onerous and unnecessary tax upon the cotton planter; that, in consequence of it, he was compelled to pay five cents per square yard more for his cotton bagging, than he would have to pay if the duty was not levied; and that, therefore, upon the same principle, a drawback should be allowed to him upon the exportation of that article. If a drawback upon rum was allowed, New England would be relieved upon one item of the tariff, and could again, the gentleman from Maine has said, engage in the molasses and lumber trade. If the drawback which he proposed on cotton bagging was allowed, the effect would be, that the cotton planter could buy his cotton bagging for four and a half cents less per yard than he had now to pay for it. The only difference between the proposition contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Maine, and the amendment which he had offered, was, that the one was intended to relieve a portion of the East, and the other a portion of the South and Southwest, from a very small portion of the oppressive and unequal operation of the present tariff system. He thought, therefore, that molasses and cotton bagging, however strange the association might seem to be, should not be separated so far as the proposition of drawbacks was concerned. As the object was to reduce duties on one for the benefit of one section, a correspondent reduction should be made on the other, for the benefit of another section. This was but even-handed justice, and he was willing to refer both propositions to the Committee of Ways and Means together.

He was (he said) upon principle opposed to the whole system of the protecting policy called the tariff; but, as he had said in the outset of his remarks, he would not now go into the general discussion of the question. He had submitted this single proposition at this time, because it rested, as he had endeavored to show, upon the same principle with that offered by the gentleman from Maine; and because, if the friends of the system would not now modify it generally upon the principle of mutual concession and compromise, between conflicting interests of different sections, they would, he trusted, agree to alleviate the oppressive operations of some of its details. He implored the friends of this system in this Congress, to consider deliberately the present excited and agitated state of the country upon this subject; to give a listening ear to the long-neglected complaints of the suffering South, and alleviate their burdens. He appealed to them to know if it was not for the permanent interest of all sections to modify the system and quiet the public mind. By adopting the single proposition he had offered, they would, he knew, go but one step towards effecting so desirable an object, but it would be some manifestation of a disposition, on the part of the majority in this Congress, to afford at least some alleviation.

Mr. MALLARY said he was fully aware that, whenever the tariff, in any shape, came before the House, much excitement prevailed. Whatever might be the tendency of the subject itself to produce this effect, he was determined that no excitement should be justly chargeable to any observations or remarks he might be required to make. As to the resolution introduced by the honorable gentleman from Maine, (Mr. ANDERSON,) Mr. M. said he would make a brief remark. It requires the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill to allow a drawback on spirits distilled from molasses, when exported. It is well known that this subject was discussed, considered, and decided in 1828. Congress determined that no drawback should be allowed. It is also well known that he was opposed to that decision at the time. He believed that the effects would be injurious to some interests, and beneficial to none. But the House, after the fullest consideration, in its wisdom determined otherwise. A majority decided that sound policy, the prevention of frauds on the revenue, the promotion of the agricultural interest, required the drawback should not be allowed. It was thus fixed: it was thus settled. No reason is now offered for a repeal, that was not fully urged against the passage. It was as well understood then as now. No changes have taken place which were not fully anticipated. Unless a general understanding prevailed to make the change without involving any other provision of the tariff, he was in favor of no alteration. If a general disposition did exist to make the proposed change, the proposition of the gentleman from Maine would probably have his support.

The Tariff.

But (said Mr. M.) what is the consequence? What immediately follows? The proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. POLK.) Mr. M. said he had been in favor of the duty on cotton bagging. He had supported that duty for the purpose of affording aid to an important domestic manufacture. The reasons for imposing that duty certainly sustain it at the present time. There is no change in the necessity or policy. In establishing a general tariff, it could not have been reasonably expected that every branch of industry would derive all the aid that was anticipated. The manufacturers of the coarsest kind of wool complain. No doubt some had been injured. He had been urged to attempt to obtain some change in the duty on that raw material. At the time of the passage of that tariff, he was opposed to that duty on such wool as was not produced in the United States. A majority of Congress considered that the duty ought to be imposed. It was done. He would let it remain. Many were opposed to the dollar minimum. The effects were pointed out. It was fully examined and adopted. He was unwilling to disturb it. Many were opposed to the additional duty on molasses. A majority decided otherwise. He was opposed to a change. The whole tariff system is, and must be, founded on a liberal compromise among the numberless interests of this extended country. In passing the tariff of 1828, they were all consulted. It was passed on that ground. Without a just and liberal compromise, no law, involving a variety of the great interests of the country, could ever be adopted. He had no doubt the tariff of 1828 had operated in general most beneficially. But its benefits will be greatly diminished, if not wholly destroyed, by perpetual agitation. Continual attempts to change its details, before its effects are fully developed, will do a thousand times more injury than all the benefits anticipated from any proposed alteration. It was due to all whose interests were dependent on the policy of their Government, to be allowed some little repose—not to be continually alarmed for their safety. He could not consent to the proposed alterations.

Mr. MARTIN, of South Carolina, said, this proposition to allow a drawback on cotton bagging, had come on very unexpectedly. It was one he would not have made, and he did not believe it would have been proposed by any of his colleagues. It is a small, a very small business, (said he,) compared with the great drama in which they wished to take a part. But, as it had been made, he should offer no apology for intruding himself on the House. It would be expected, he presumed, that he should say something; but, independently of that expectation, he obeyed the suggestions of feelings and duty, in the course he was about to pursue. It must be admitted (he said) that the gentleman who had offered this amendment, occupies neutral ground; he stands between the manufacturers and those they would make the consumers of their bagging. He cannot be looked on in any other light than as one wholly disinterested; and so far as his object be to relieve the South of the least of its oppressions, it was, and should be, properly appreciated.

Of all the duties imposed by your tariff, sir, (said Mr. M.,) that on bagging is the most iniquitous and untenable. The facts bear me out in this assertion; they are incontrovertible. I repeat now what I said in 1828, when the tariff was under discussion. I told gentlemen they might impose the additional duty on bagging, but they could not justify it on their own principles or pretences. They did not attempt to answer the arguments urged against the increase of duty, yet they passed it, for the same reason they would have passed any other amendment, the operation of which would have been the advancement of certain portions of this Union, at the expense of other parts of it. Yes, sir, there was something due to the West for its loyalty to this idol, nicknamed the "American system;" and those who were disposed to reward idolatry, bestowed their blessing, in the form of an increased duty on bagging. Or it may be that some were disposed to punish those who consume the bagging, on account of certain very obnoxious votes given on other parts of the tariff bill. Of such, we ask nothing; and to such, we have no concessions to make. The course we pursued on that subject, has been admitted to be legitimate in legislation; I will not say since its commencement, but certainly since our acquaintance with it. How far their supposed course (he would not charge it on them, he might do them injustice) can be sustained by principle, he would not now stop to inquire.

It is charged against the South (continued Mr. M.) that we are too easily excited. Have they not sufficient cause to be excited? Do not their first and last dollar find their way to Northern pockets, without even touching at your Treasury? And what produces this state of things but the great scheme of depredation, of which this subject forms but a small part? It would be out of order, sir, to go into a discussion of the whole tariff; if it were not, he could tell gentlemen why they were excited by reciting the misdeeds of this House. He hoped, however, an opportunity would occur, when he could not be restrained in the discharge of a duty he held sacred.

What claims has the manufacturer of bagging to the protection of Government? What are their numbers, the amount of capital invested, or the product of their factories, no one will pretend to assert. It is carried on to a very moderate extent in Kentucky; it is still more limited in New Jersey; he knew of no other establishments, though possibly there may be some on a small scale in Ohio or Tennessee. So little claim has the manufacturer of this article on the protection of the Government, that it cannot be justified even on the doctrines of the most absurd, preposterous, and extravagant advocates of the tariff. A new scheme must be organized, and new theories must be manufactured, to give protection to this article the color or semblance of plausibility.

It is important to the interest and prosperity of the nation, say gentlemen, that her supplies should be drawn from her own resources. And pray, sir, (asked Mr. M.) what has the nation, as a nation or a Government, to do with the growth of cotton, or the manufacture of bagging? A small portion of your Southern Atlantic States only grow cotton, and no others can grow it. They have not asked your protection or your aid in any shape: they deprecate your interference with their concerns as an officious intermeddling, and an unconstitutional exercise of authority given you for other purposes. If they are content to receive foreign bagging as they have done, and pay for it with their own money, not with funds subtracted from the Middle or Northern States, by what authority do others interpose, or for what purposes? Not for national purposes, for it is not a national affair—not for our benefit, for you do us positive injustice and injury. I was wrong, sir, when I said the cotton business was not a national affair. It has been made so of late by the pernicious legislation of this House. It is the first and greatest resource of the Government in paying its debts, and supporting its civil list, and sustaining all its institutions. Yet the great and leading object of gentlemen in this House is so to embarrass its culture, and obstruct its transportation to a foreign market, as to compel us to suffer it to be manufactured at home; and this is what they call a "home market." Yes, sir, by paralyzing the industry of the South, and obliterating its capital, the market of the United States, any part of which is glutted by a single ship's cargo, and which consumes at most not more than one hundred and fifty thousand bags per annum, is to be converted into a market for the whole product of the United States, which now averages seven hundred thousand bags! And do gentlemen really expect us to submit to such a state of things, without being "excited?" If they do, they know less of us than we had supposed.

To sustain the proposition I have just stated, as one on which the advocates of the restrictive (I might say the non-intercourse) system rely, they tell you it follows as a consequence, that the interest of a few, or of one particular section, must yield to that policy which promotes the general good. He denied the application of any such doctrine in a Government like ours, except it be on those subjects upon which the power to legislate has been conferred on Congress. But, without discussing that question now, it was easy to show the absurdity of pretending to apply such a rule to the impost laid on bagging. No, sir, it is the converse of the proposition which was enforced when this duty was laid. Kentucky alone manufactures—for the rest are not sufficiently extensive to be mentioned—while there are no less than eight States who consume, not her manufactures, but the European fabric, if they can be allowed to do so: and to four of those States, it is a fact known to all, that the article from Kentucky cannot find its way. It can neither bear transportation over the mountains, or down the Mississippi, and thence, through the Gulf of Mexico and around the coast of Florida, to the Southern Atlantic States, at a price which will enable the holder to bring it into competition with foreign bagging. No one, however extravagant in support of the tariff, or any branch of it, will deny these facts. One who has not devoted some attention to the subject, could scarcely believe that such a state of things existed in any part of this country. But the worst has not yet been told. The gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. CLARK,) on whose proposition this duty was increased in 1828, was himself examined before the Committee on Manufactures; and from his evidence it will be seen that the factories in Kentucky already made better bagging than is imported, and that unless the crop of hemp be short, which compels the manufacturer to give a high price for the raw material, they can drive the foreign fabric out of the New Orleans market, or at least they can procure a better price than is paid for foreign bagging. Here, then, facts are at war with theory, and principle abandoned in practice. Who, sir, that has ever heard or read three distinct sentences, written or spoken by a manufacturer, or an advocate of the tariff, will not recollect that one of those sentences consisted of a declaration that, if you would protect their factories until they passed from infancy to maturity, and obtain possession of the market, they would ask it no longer? Then it was a millennium was to be produced in the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural world. Yet, with the capital, and all other facilities to make a better fabric, and in the possession of the market, to the exclusion of foreign bagging, the factories of Kentucky were to be protected—I will not say it was no protection, but they were to have a bounty; it is nothing less than a bounty, let others call it by what name they may. With the possession of the New Orleans market, and wholly unable to reach the Atlantic markets, who can be so rash as to attempt a justification of this duty? But the manufacturers of Kentucky are scarcely blamable. It was a day appropriated to the distribution of Southern capital and Southern labor, by a species of legislative lottery, and they had, perhaps, some claim to a share in the scheme, as an equivalent for the service they had rendered. How far the people of Kentucky have been benefited by the drawing of this lottery, is a question upon which they have not been very communicative.

Trifling, sir, as this duty may appear, it is one of the highest among your imposts. The duty is five cents on the square yard, but the width of bagging makes it about six cents the running yard. This, as an ad valorem duty, will vary from thirty to fifty per cent. The revenue collected by the Government in South Carolina, on this duty alone, is more than all the taxes paid for the State Government, if you exclude that collected on a particular species of property: and it is nearly one-fourth of all collected from every source of taxation for State purposes. And for what purpose is this extortion practised? For the protection of the manufacturer of Kentucky? No, sir; I have shown he is not benefited by it. Is it to pay your public debt? No, sir; the design most prevalent is to divert the funds of the Government from that purpose. Is it levied for the support of your Government and its institutions? No one will pretend that such is the object. With what view, then, in the name of justice, was it originally imposed, or is it now continued? It was first used, sir, as a punishment for the pertinacious resistance of the South, and is now continued as a fit source from which to construct roads and canals. I have said this much in relation to the imposition of this duty and its operation. I will now speak of the amendment, proposing to allow the drawback on bagging re-exported, whether in bolts or around the cotton. What do we understand by a drawback? It is paying to the shipper, by the Government, whenever he exports a foreign article, the same or a lesser duty than that received when the article was imported into the country. It has for its justification satisfactory reasons; it is not the policy of the Government to retain the duty on an article which is neither used nor consumed; and the repayment of the duty is often an inducement to re-ship the article, thus giving employment and activity to capital, and aiding in the navigation and commercial operations of the country. Another and important feature in this policy is, that when an article is imported, and manufactured or converted into a different fabric, and re-exported, by paying back the duty, encouragement has been afforded to the carrier, the capitalist, and the domestic industry of the country. These, I take it, are the grounds of the policy. Where the material is exported in its original state, there are few or no facilities for committing frauds: nor are these to be apprehended, with the guards adopted, even where the article has changed its character. Salt pays a duty of twenty cents on every fifty-six pounds; yet, on the exportation of fish, packed in foreign salt, the duty on salt is repaid to the exporter of the fish. Bagging is imported, and pays a specific duty. It is used for packing cotton, and immediately re-exported. Is not the analogy so striking as to be irresistible? If there be any distinction, is it not in favor of allowing the drawback on bagging? Both are imported, and the duties paid. One is used in consuming the enterprise and industry of the fisherman, the other in preserving the fruits and labor of the agriculturist. Both are necessary to the objects in view, and both seek a foreign market.

Thus far the claims of the two articles to a drawback are equal, unless, indeed, the agriculturist, the husbandman, who gives life and vigor to all our pursuits, be less entitled to the favor and protection of the Government than the fisherman, whose claims, by the by, it is not my purpose to undervalue. But here the claim to a drawback on the bagging rises superior, because, by reason of its identity, it affords fewer facilities for the commission of frauds on the revenue. It is imported in bolts, and undergoes no change, except that of being cut into pieces of four or five yards, and made into bags for the reception of the cotton. You have scarcely an appraiser in a custom-house of the Government, who could not be able, after the first comparison, to distinguish between the domestic and foreign bagging. But as to the use of foreign salt, that must depend on extrinsic evidence—on affidavits. Now, without intending the least imputation on those who receive that drawback, I cannot but say that the temptation and the facilities to commit frauds on the Government are greater, and more numerous, than would exist in regard to bagging. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, (Mr. MALLARY,) who has just taken his seat, to name, if he can, a single article, in the whole range of our commerce, which undergoes any change, with which it would be so difficult to practise a fraud in claiming a drawback on its exportation, as with bagging. Let him name it, if there be one in his knowledge. But says that gentleman, the tariff was a compromise! Truly it was a compromise. But between whom was this arrangement effected? The Southern States, whose capital and labor the parties to it were dividing, and whose enterprise and industry the same parties were appropriating to their own use, had no voice in the compact. Like other parties acting in concert, but to whom it would be out of order that I should compare them, they found it difficult to divide the spoils on reciprocal terms—spoils not won by valor; not the fruits of victory achieved in honorable warfare. Compromise was necessarily resorted to: the principles of justice, equality, or reciprocity—none of them were applicable to such a state of things.

Retrenchment.

[MARCH, 1830.]

This effect of this proposition must be considered in all its bearings, we are told by the same gentleman, (Mr. MALLARY.) Why, sir, the duty on cotton bagging has no bearing, except on the Southern States, and they want no time to regulate the effects of its repeal. I hope that I have shown that Kentucky did not require it. But I will not affect to misunderstand the gentleman. His allusions are to the effect which the repeal of the most trifling duty may have on the great "American system"—a system, the operation of which, it was promised, would have more beneficial effects than have ever been anticipated from the discovery of the philosopher's stone—one which was to make the poor rich by giving constant employment and high wages—the farmer was to sink under his own wealth, arising from the home market and extravagant price of grain, wool, &c.; and by an accumulation in the price of all these, constituting two-thirds of the investments in manufactories, all manufactured goods were to be rendered cheaper. Well, sir, the tariff bill passed; and how have all these anticipations been realized? The operatives, the laborers out of employment, or suffering by the low wages, and the farmer's grain rotting in his barn, or sold at a sacrifice. A portion of the goods cheaper, it is true, but of no sort of importance in estimating the benefits or injury resulting from the system. It was from the beginning a scheme of cheating; and those who innocently participated are now sensible of the delusion, but they will not acknowledge it. An abandonment of principles, when once adopted and insisted on so extravagantly, however erroneous they may be discovered to be, is a severe trial—one which few are willing to encounter. But, whenever truth, reason, and justice shall again acquire an ascendancy on this subject, (the time may be distant—I fear it is,) the fallacy of these pernicious projects will be admitted, and the extent to which they have been carried will be attributed to infatuation.

Much has been said (continued Mr. M.) as to the excitement the tariff has occasioned in South Carolina. Sir, that is not a subject for discussion here. We are not accountable to this House, on any score. If we were, I would not shrink from a contest in support of any thing and every thing the people in their collective character have said on this subject, on any occasion. There are some acts of Government, which, so far from being justifiable, are not even excusable. Of this character is your tariff; and if it does produce excitement, let those who have produced it profit by what they admit is known to them. If, instead of this, they will pursue this principle, on their heads, not ours, be the consequences.

MONDAY, March 15.

Public Lands.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill from the Senate "for the relief of purchasers of public lands," together with the amendments reported to the same from the Committee on Public Lands. The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. VINTON, he made some remarks in explanation of it; and in conclusion he observed, that in order to ascertain the sentiments of the House in relation to the amendment, he would withdraw the two last sections of it, which contained the penal enactments. If the two first sections were rejected, he said, he would renew his motion to amend the bill by adding the third and fourth sections.

Mr. CLAY said he would vote against the amendment. He expressed his hearty concurrence in the two last sections of it.

Mr. IRVIN said he would vote in favor of the bill as reported from the committee. He hoped the amendment of his colleague (Mr. VINTON) would not prevail.

The question on the amendment to the amendment was decided in the negative.

Mr. VINTON then renewed his motion to add the third and fourth sections of the amendment he proposed.

Mr. CLAY expressed himself as favorable to the objects of this amendment.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, Mr. ISAACS, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. BAYLOR, severally spoke in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. MCCOY, Mr. BURGESS, and Mr. VINTON supported it.

The blanks in that part of the amendment offered by Mr. VINTON, which specifies the term of imprisonment and the amount of penalty, were filled up; the first with "two years," the latter with "one thousand dollars."

The question was then put on agreeing to the two sections offered by Mr. VINTON, and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. DODDRIDGE moved to strike out the words "first August," and to insert in lieu thereof "fourth of July," in the first section of the bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. VINTON moved to amend the second section, by inserting after the words "possession of," in the eighth line, the following words: "And actually cultivated and improved by"—

This amendment was decided in the negative.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed, and with the bill to be read a third time.

[The bill subsequently passed, and was returned to the Senate; which body concurred in the amendments made in the House.]

THURSDAY, March 18.

Retrenchment.

Mr. McDUFFIE moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Retrenchment be instructed to report a bill, providing that whenever the first session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than one hundred and twenty days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of the said one hundred and twenty days; and that whenever the second session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than ninety days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of said ninety days.

After moving the resolution, Mr. McDUFFIE proposed to modify it so as to make it an inquiry into the expediency, &c.

Mr. WICKLIFFE adverted to a bill under the consideration of the Committee on Retrenchment in relation to this subject, on which a difference of opinion had existed, which prevented it from being reported. He, therefore, wished that the gentleman would not modify the resolution, but that he would leave it in the shape of an instruction, so that the sense of the House might be distinctly ascertained on the subject. He stated that no retrenchment more efficient in its character could be introduced than that proposed by the resolution.

Mr. McDUFFIE thanked the gentleman for the information he had given him, withdrew his proposition to modify, and moved that the consideration of the resolution be postponed till Monday. Agreed to.

Revolutionary Pensioners.

The House then took up the report of the committee on the bill declaratory of the act to provide for persons engaged in the land and naval service during the revolutionary war, which was reported with amendments.

[The following is the bill as it was reported from the Committee of the whole House:]

"That in all cases, in which application has been or shall be made to the Secretary of War, by any person, to be placed on the pension list of the United States, under 'the several acts to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the revolutionary war,' and the granting of such application shall depend upon 'the circumstances and condition in life,' as is provided in and by the same acts, of him who so applies, the applicant shall be deemed and taken to be unable to support himself without the assistance of his country, if the whole amount of his property, exclusive of the house, building, and curtilage, by him occupied and improved his household furniture, wearing apparel, the tools of his trade, and farming utensils, shall not exceed the sum of one thousand dollars, all debts from him justly due and owing being therefrom first deducted. And no applicant for a pension under the provisions of this act, or of those acts of which it is declaratory, shall be required to show what his circumstances and condition in life were, or what property he was possessed of, at any time prior to the passage of this act.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the granting of said application shall depend upon the term of service, as is provided in and by the first section of the first act of the several acts aforesaid, such applicant shall be deemed and taken to have served 'for the term of nine months, or longer,' as the case may be, within the meaning and intent of the said last-mentioned act; if his continuous service in the war of the revolution, on the continental establishment, was nine months, or longer, notwithstanding his enlistment may have been for a shorter term than nine months, and notwithstanding he may, at any time, and during any portion of his said term, have been taken and detained in captivity.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the regular troops of the several States of the United States, the enlisting and raising whereof was recommended or approved by the old Congress, shall be deemed and taken, within the meaning and intent of the acts aforesaid, to have been on the continental establishment; but nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to include in said class of State troops the militia of the several States."

Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, moved to amend the amendment made to the bill in the Committee of the Whole, yesterday, by striking out the following words: "The house, building, and curtilage, by him occupied and improved," so that the bill would provide for persons worth one thousand dollars, "exclusive of their household furniture," &c. Mr. C. said he offered the amendment under the conviction that it was not the intention of gentlemen to pension those whose circumstances were comfortable, and who were able to support themselves.

On this motion a long debate took place, in which Mr. BURGESS, Mr. BATES, Mr. WICKLIFFE, Mr. CAESON, Mr. HUBBARD, Mr. CLARK, Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, Mr. POLK, Mr. BARRINGER, Mr. EVERETT, of Massachusetts, and Mr. McDUFFIE, took part.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New Hampshire, said it was not his purpose, at this time, to go into a very full consideration of this subject; but he would detain the House for a few moments, while he stated the reasons which would induce him to vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. CRAIG,) and support the bill and amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole. I have, said Mr. H., ever been opposed to the contracted policy of the present pension system: I have ever been at war with what I have supposed to be the principle upon which that system is founded. The existing pension laws have been based on individual poverty and indigence, and not on actual services rendered, and on actual sacrifices made, in the cause of our country, during the period of our revolution.

In passing these laws, the Government have gone upon the principle that they were bestowing a gratuity, rather than discharging an obligation; and viewing these laws in this light, I never could give them my entire approbation.

It has been my uniform and firm belief, that the services and the sacrifices of those who fought the battles of our country during our revolutionary struggle, laid a just foundation for a claim on the country; and that the provisions of our pension laws should be equally extended to all such, as a liquidation of their claim. It was the service of the faithful soldier that entitles him to a pension; and, whether rich or poor, he was equally the object of his country's justice.

The present laws are of a most invidious character; and the practical operations of them are most unjust. There are those in my own State, who were engaged in the same service during most of the war, who fought side by side under the operation of your pension laws: one is taken while another is left, one is poor while the other is not rich; one receives the bounty of his country, and from the other that bounty is withheld: and why is this difference? why this invidious, this mortifying distinction? Merely, sir, because one by his own prudence has been able to save a few hundred dollars for the comfortable support of himself and his family: merely, sir, because one by his own industry has been able to keep himself from the list of town paupers: merely, sir, because he has not been the object of public and private charity; while the other has, by a course of misfortune, or by a want of ordinary prudence, experienced the embarrassments and privations of poverty. And yet it has happened, that, in extending the bounty provided by the pension laws to those embraced within the last description, you have made their situation, in point of property, far more desirable than the situation of those who are excluded from a pension by the practical application of the same laws.

Such is the partial, unjust, and invidious operation of the present pension system.

I shall most cheerfully give my aid and my support to the bill and to the amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole, for the reason that they are calculated to extend the benefits of the pension system; and that, if they shall be adopted, the cases of many meritorious soldiers will be embraced within their provisions. When a few more years shall have passed away, all those who are now, or who may, by the most liberal provisions of your laws, hereafter be placed on your pension list, will be numbered with the congregation of the dead; and then there will exist no necessity to make the annual appropriations for the fulfilment of the existing pension acts, which seem to be so peculiarly obnoxious to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. WICKLIFFE.) That gentleman says he is opposed to the bill and the amendments, for the reason that they will tend to swell the pension list; for this reason, and for this reason alone, they meet with my entire approbation, and shall receive my most hearty support. I perfectly accord with the remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. CARSON.) To the whole of that faithful band of patriots, who performed the requisite term of service, in the war of the revolution, I would extend the benefits of the pension laws—I would do that as a matter of justice—could I have my will, I would not stop short; and, at all times, I shall feel disposed to give my best aid in the support of every measure which shall have for its object the extending the benefits of the pension system; which shall in effect place the greatest number of our revolutionary soldiers on the pension list. It would be but an act of justice to include every individual who has performed the requisite term of service. It would be but an honest discharge of our obligations to this meritorious class of our citizens.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. WICKLIFFE) has further stated, that, if the amendment of the committee should be adopted by the House, it would of consequence greatly increase the amount of the appropriations for this object. It might be so; but that consideration should not deter us, if the measure is right: it cannot deter me from doing this act, which I deem but an act of perfect justice.

The number of revolutionary pensioners falls short of twelve thousand, and the number of invalid pensioners falls short of four thousand; and whether the number would or would not be increased, by passing the bill with the amendments now under consideration, I will not stop to inquire; for I cannot but consider this as a debt due to this faithful band of patriots, founded on services performed, and on sacrifices made, for this country during the war of our revolution; and it is alike due to all, no matter what may be his condition or circumstances in life. These being my views, and under the influence of these considerations, I cannot favor the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia; but shall most freely lend my aid to the most liberal extent and to the most liberal application of the pension system, until every faithful soldier of the revolution shall participate in the justice of the country; and if I cannot succeed, at this time, in accomplishing the extent of my wishes, I will do whatever my hands shall find to do, in furtherance of the object.

The first pension act was passed in 1818, and it offered encouragement to the remnant of that band of patriots who braved the storm of our revolution, to ask and to receive aid from their common country; and under this act many did ask, and many received; but in a short period an additional act was passed, which suspended the payment of every pensioner until he should make and forward to the department a schedule of his property, which should furnish the evidence that he was in such indigent circumstances as not to be able to support himself without the aid of public or of private charity; and only in such event, according to the construction which had been given to the act of 1818, could he be restored to the list. Under the act of 1820, many, very many faithful and meritorious soldiers were dropped from the list. And although subsequent explanations would have warranted the department in reinstating many of the applicants, yet such was also the construction given by authority to the act of 1820, that those who have been dropped could not be reinstated, which suggested the absolute necessity of the act of 1823; and under this last statute such rules and regulations have been established at the department, as in effect to exclude almost every applicant who is not numbered on the list of town or country paupers.

Sir, it has become indispensably necessary that some explanatory law should be enacted; and believing, as I do, that the bill with the amendments, recommended by the Committee of the Whole, will do more justice than has as yet been rendered, I shall give them my support.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Kentucky, inquired of the Chair whether it would be in order to move to strike out the sum of one thousand dollars, and insert sixteen hundred instead of it.

The SPEAKER said it would not be in order to make a motion in the House to insert a higher sum than that which had been agreed to in the committee.

Mr. McDUFFIE then moved to amend the amendment just made, by adding to it the following proviso:

"Provided also, that all applicants who shall be worth less than two hundred dollars shall receive the full amount of the pensions herein provided; and that, for every hundred dollars more than three hundred which any applicant shall be worth, six dollars shall be deducted from the annual amount of the pension to which such applicant shall be entitled."

At the suggestion of Mr. CRAIG, of Virginia, Mr. McDUFFIE modified his proposition, by changing the sum to three hundred dollars.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he would oppose this amendment, for the obvious reason that it would tend to produce fraud and perjury, since it held out an encouragement, to every applicant for a pension, to reduce his property as low as three hundred dollars. It would give him six dollars per every hundred he reduced the value of his property.

Mr. McDUFFIE said he was astonished that a gentleman of so much sagacity as Mr. B. did not discover that the same objection lay against the bill itself.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied, the only difference was, that the temptation to commit perjury was, according to his (Mr. McD.'s) proposition, sevenfold greater.

Mr. ELLSWORTH opposed the amendment. It was, he said, too much refined for any practical purposes.

Mr. BURGESS also opposed it.

The question was then put, and taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative—124 to 56.

Mr. WICKLIFFE offered the following amendment, to be added to the first amendment of the Committee of the Whole:

"Provided also, that the provisions of the bill of 1818 shall be construed to extend to the officers and soldiers who served under General George Rogers Clarke in his expedition against the posts at St. Vincents and Kaskaskias, and the officers and soldiers who served nine months at any one time in the State or continental service during the war of the revolution, in the quarter or wagonmaster's department, though they were not of the line of the army."

The question on Mr. WICKLIFFE's proposition was decided in the negative.

Mr. MARTIN then moved to amend the bill by inserting at the end of the amendment of the committee to the first section of the bill, the following words:

"And all such as were engaged in service under the command of Francis Marion, Thomas Sumter, and Andrew Pickens, of South Carolina, whether during their command as colonels or brigadier generals."

He subsequently modified his proposition, by adding to it the following words, at the instance of Mr. WAYNE:

"And all such as were in service for the time stated in this act, under Colonels John Twigg, Elijah Claude, and James Jackson, in the State of Georgia."

Mr. CHILTON moved an adjournment, which was refused.

The amendment proposed by Mr. MARTIN, as modified, was rejected.

The question being stated on the amendment offered yesterday in committee, by Mr. SILL, and agreed to,

Mr. HOWARD suggested that it was in conflict with the provisions of the act of 1820, prescribing the oath to be taken by persons claiming pensions.

To obviate this difficulty, verbal modifications were proposed by Mr. DAVIS, of Massachusetts, and Mr. BURGESS.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR submitted the following—to strike out the third section of the bill, and to insert these words:

"Provided, that the oath prescribed by the act of 1820, entitled 'An act in addition to an act entitled an act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the revolutionary war, passed the eighteenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen,' shall be so far varied as to apply to the date of the passage of this act, instead of the time in said act specified."

Mr. SILL offered the following proviso, which he thought would meet the views of the gentleman:

"But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to dispense with the oath required by the act of 1820."

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, approving of this proviso, withdrew the amendment he offered; and

The question on thus amending the amendment was decided in the affirmative.

[MARCH, 1830.]

The amendment to the amendment was then agreed to.

The amendments of the committee having been gone through,

Mr. CHILTON then moved to amend the whole bill as amended, by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting the following as a substitute :

"That the provisions of the pension laws of the United States, which are now in force, shall be, and the same are hereby, so extended as to embrace, upon the same principles, and under the same rules and regulations as to testimony, such troops as fought in the State lines, or belonged to the volunteer corps, having served at one or more periods, for the term of nine months, and to the draughted militia of the several States."

Mr. CARSON moved an adjournment, which was refused.

Mr. CHILTON then proceeded to explain his amendment for a short time, but the impatience of members (it being then past five o'clock) induced him to renew the motion to adjourn. But the House refused to adjourn. Yeas 82, nays 102.

Mr. CHILTON then asked for the yeas and nays on the question upon the substitute he offered.

Mr. DWIGHT said he thought it was but reciprocating the courtesy extended by Mr. C. to the House in not trespassing on their attention, when he discovered their reluctance to hear him, that they should indulge him, (Mr. C.,) by agreeing to have the question taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLER then called for the previous question, which was seconded. Yeas 95, nays 72.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the previous question.

Another motion to adjourn was made, which was unsuccessful.

The yeas and nays were then taken on the previous question, and it was decided in the affirmative—92 to 85.

On the main question, "Shall the bill and amendments be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading?" the yeas and nays were ordered, and were as follows :

FRIDAY, March 19.

Revolutionary Pensioners.

The engrossed bill explanatory of the revolutionary pension laws, (establishing a construction of those laws more liberal than they receive from the Secretary of War,) was read a third time, and the question stated on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, rose, and said, after the very full discussion of the bill yesterday, and the decided majority which appeared in its favor, it would be inexcusable in him now to consume the time of the House with an argument on the merits of the bill. But this was as proper a time as any to try the sense of the House on the question of providing for the militia of the revolutionary war, as well as the regular soldiers of the revolution. He should, therefore, move to recommit the bill, with instructions to incorporate such a provision in it. If either of these classes of troops were to be provided for, alone, Mr. W. avowed that he had no hesitation in saying he would give the preference to the militia, because they entered the service from different and higher motives, and were of very different materials. He would, however, abstain from any debate, and content himself with simply making his motion, which he hoped would not be cut off by the previous question, as was the case yesterday; and on his motion he called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BATES opposed the motion. The only effect of it would be to defeat this bill, for every bill which had embraced the provisions proposed, had sunk. If the House was in favor of such a proviso, it could be introduced hereafter in a separate bill; but he protested against endangering the bill by this provision.

Mr. BELL reprehended warmly the mode pursued by the majority, in cutting off debate and amendment, and forcing the bill through.

He asserted and maintained at considerable length the merits of the militia of the revolution, and their claims to reward, if any part of the revolutionary soldiers were provided for; condemned the plan so manifestly pursued, of getting the pension system extended gradually by detachments, from a fear that it would not go down all at once; and avowed and explained his objections to the original pension act of 1818, on account of its unjust and invidious discriminations between the different classes which served in the revolutionary war, and excluding the most meritorious, &c.

Mr. SPEIGHT moved to amend the amendment by the addition, that no person should be placed on the pension roll, if his property shall exceed five hundred dollars independently of his debts.

Mr. WILLIAMS did not wish his amendment to be encumbered with any other proposition. He wished to obtain the sense of the House on the simple and distinct question which he had submitted.

Mr. CARSON objected to Mr. SPEIGHT's motion, that it had been tried and rejected yesterday—that it was useless to offer it again, and he wished to see Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment tried by itself.

On submitting this amendment, Mr. S. said that he rose for the purpose of offering an amendment to the instructions of his colleague, (Mr. WILLIAMS.) He had no disposition to enter into the general discussion of the question before the House; for he was well aware of the situation in which any gentleman was placed who might venture to express his opinion in opposition to a pension bill, however partial it might be in its operation. It would seem, from the disposition manifested by some gentlemen who have participated in the debate, that all those who venture to express objections to this bill are to be regarded as unfeeling and ungrateful towards those who fought for the liberty of the country. He would inform gentlemen he felt as much regard for the welfare of them as any man. But he was opposed to this bill, because it made an invidious distinction; it contemplated provisions only for those who belonged to the regular line; and it was known that the Northern States were the theatre of war with the British, while, in the South, a partisan warfare was carried on, which eventuated in promoting the cause of liberty as much as that in the North. By the passage of this bill, no provision would be made for the troops in the South of the gallant Marion, Sumter, and Oaswell; and, in his opinion, they were equally entitled to the fostering hand of the Government as the regulars. He appealed to the magnanimity and the gratitude of the House, to say if the militia were to be passed by unnoticed. He knew many of them who were old and bowed down by infirmities, and their situation called on this House for aid as much as any portion of the revolutionary patriots. By this bill you make provision for those of the regular line; and if they, as I have no doubt was the fact with many of them, who never saw an enemy and never fired a gun, are to be provided for, while the poor militiamen, who left their homes, had their wives and children butchered, their houses burnt, and every thing destroyed, are to be unnoticed, he was opposed to the bill and all such partial legislation.

The amendment he had proposed fixed the maximum of property at five hundred dollars. In his opinion, that was high enough; and any who was worth that amount of property, after his debts were deducted, was able, without the aid of the Government, to support himself. Though, in conclusion, he would say, he could not so much as say what might be the sum fixed on, he hoped the bill would be committed with the instructions to extend the pension law to the militia.

The debate now assumed a general and comprehensive scope.

Mr. WILDE addressed the House at large, in support of Mr. WILLIAMS's amendment, and in support of the claims of the militia.

Mr. LECOMPTÉ spoke earnestly in favor of the bill, and the principle of providing liberally for the remnants of the revolutionary army.

Mr. CROCKETT, of Tennessee, said, he felt himself called on to submit a few remarks on the bill under consideration. Sir, said Mr. C., I voted against the bill yesterday, which is called an explanatory law of the act of 1818, for the relief of the old revolutionary soldiers. Sir, I consider the provisions of the bill, as it is amended, a partial one, and such a one as I cannot nor will not support. I have always been the firm friend of the old soldiers, and hope ever to remain their friend, while I am entitled to raise my voice in this House.

Sir, what are the provisions of the bill? You give any and every man a pension, who has no more than one thousand dollars, exclusive of his household furniture, house, and land. Sir, in my country, we think a man pretty well off who owns that sum after paying all his debts, and owning such property as is described. Sir, I do not consider that a man in such a situation ought to be entitled to the bounty of his Government. Sir, in my country, for the sum of one thousand dollars, a man can purchase two good negro men and one hundred acres of the best land in the country. That, sir, would support a man, without calling on the Government for a pension. I came here, said Mr. C.; to do justice to every man, and under all circumstances; and if I cannot do this, I will not vote for a partial law like this. Sir, this bill provides for none but those of the continental line, and excludes all the volunteers and militia who fought in the old war, no matter how meritorious they were. Sir, some of those very men, who fought bravely, and who are tottering through life, almost ready to drop into the grave, have been knocking at the door of Congress for years; and what are we doing, sir? Passing a law to exclude them, and to provide for men that do not need the bounty of the Government. Sir, tack them all together, and I will go as far for them as any gentleman in Congress. What was said by the gentleman from New York? (Mr. TAYLOR.) He has drawn the distinction between the regulars and the militia and volunteers, and has decided in favor of the regulars receiving the bounty of the Government, to the exclusion of the others. Sir, I must beg leave to differ in opinion with that gentleman. If I were to draw a distinction, I would give the preference to the militiaman and the volunteer. The regular sold himself to the Government for a bounty of land and money, which he received long since; and the others went and fought for the love of their country; they left their homes and their wives and children, and fought bravely through the war, and received the little pittance of common wages. Sir, is it just, is it honest, to exclude those men? No, sir; I am bound to decide entirely in their favor, if we give any a preference. But, sir, it is my wish to provide for all. I hear gentlemen say that we will bankrupt the nation. Well, sir, let it be so—I go for all or none. I see millions after millions of money voted away—for what, sir? For the petty little object of supporting your fortifications, breakwaters, or light-houses.

Sir, in my district I know some of those deserving old men, who cannot long trouble this Government with their voices, asking aid, in their old age, to make them feel comfortable. A few days more, and they bid adieu to this world. I do insist that they never ought to be forgotten or neglected, while there is one of them to claim our gratitude. They have achieved the glory and honor of our country by their bravery. The privileges which we are now enjoying on this floor, were purchased by their toil and blood. Sir, let me tell gentlemen that I had the honor, in our last struggle, to shoulder my gun, and march into the field. There I discovered who fought bravest, the regulars or the volunteers and militia. Sir, when the regular troops were living bountifully, the militia were in a state of starvation. I have witnessed this, and, therefore, I am enabled to judge from that circumstance how they fared in the first war. Sir, there are but few of those poor old veterans in my section of country, though I imagine it is very different in the North. I have been informed, and believe it, that they never die in the Eastern States. Sir, from what I can learn, I should expect that they live always there.

I discover that some gentlemen wish to get the funds of this Government distributed, and they care not for what. Sir, I came here to do justice; and I will do justice, or I will do nothing. In my district, I know one case, where a poor old revolutionary soldier, who served as a volunteer for some time, then enlisted as a sailor, and served three years on the ocean, who is unprovided for. Sir, it is lamentable to view his situation, and hear him tell of his sufferings. It is out of his power, at this time, to find any of his old brother sailors who served with him. Sir, his situation is this: one good neighbor has supported the poor old man, and another his old lady, and maintain them just as an act of charity. I presented the poor old man's claim to this House, and what is the result? He is rejected, and for the reason that he cannot obtain proof, only by his own oath. Sir, I do not believe he would make a misrepresentation for any consideration. This is one case: and I have no doubt but there are many other such cases. For God's sake, if you do extend charity to one class, do so to all. I voted against the old officers' bill, last session, because you would not attach the soldiers to them, who fought with them side by side. Now, sir, if you cut off the volunteers and militia, I will vote against this bill. I will not go for them piecemeal; I take all or none, as I have before stated. To draw a distinction between men who have performed the same services, is what I never will agree to do. If you do not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, and attach the militia and volunteers, as proposed by Mr. CHILTON, of Kentucky, I will enter my protest against the bill, and believe that I have acted honestly. Sir, I will detain the House no longer.

Mr. CHILTON took the same side, and strenuously advocated the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. RICHARDSON, remarking that this was one of the days set apart for private bills, thought it right to make an effort to prevent the day being consumed by this debate; and he therefore moved the previous question—but the motion was lost.

Mr. CARSON spoke against the recommitment of the bill, and in favor of its passage in its present shape.

Mr. WILLIAMS had refrained from going into any reasons when he offered the amendment, hoping it would be decided without debate, as every man's mind was doubtless made up on the question; but as he had been disappointed in this hope, he now proceeded to submit at large his reasons in favor of his amendment.

Mr. WAYNE followed on the same side, and addressed the House at considerable length, in support of the claims of the militia of the revolution to equal favor, at least, at the hands of the Government.

Mr. HALL handed to the Chair the following extract from a letter which he had received from the chief of the Pension Office, which he desired to be read for the information of the House:

"It appears that the following appropriations have been made for paying pensioners under the act of March 18, 1818.

The question being put on Mr. SPEIGHT's motion, it was negatived without a division.

The amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS was then also decided in the negative by the following vote: yeas 74, nays 107.

Mr. POLK then spoke some time against the passage of the bill. When he concluded,

Mr. DODDRIDGE called for the previous question, which was seconded, 84 to 74; and the main question was ordered, the effect of which was to set aside all amendments and intermediate motions. So that

The question was put on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 56.

MONDAY, March 22.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, and took up the bill to lay out and establish a national road from Buffalo, in New York, by Washington city, to New Orleans.

Mr. HEMPHILL rose, and entered into a general defence of the proposed measure, maintaining its constitutionality—being a work emphatically national—its high importance to the Union, &c. He had not concluded his remarks, when he gave way for a motion for the committee to rise.

TUESDAY, May 23.

Case of Judge Peck.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the memorial of Luke E. Lawless, of Missouri, complaining of the conduct of James H. Peck, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the District of Missouri, made a report thereon, concluding with the opinion that the said judge ought to be impeached.

Vol. X.—44

Mr. BUCHANAN, in presenting the above report, stated that the committee had deemed it fairest towards the party accused, not to report to the House their reasons at length for arriving at the conclusion that he ought to be impeached. In this respect, they thought it advisable to follow the precedent which had been established in the case of the impeachment of Judge Chase. Mr. B. moved to print the report and documents.

Mr. CLAY moved to amend the motion to print, by adding the words, "And also the memorial of Luke E. Lawless, and the address of the judge to the committee."

Mr. HAYNES moved to suspend the rule of the House which prohibits debate on motions to print, so far as concerns the subject under consideration. Negatived.

The amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY was rejected, and the report and documents were ordered to be printed.

Mr. BATES, from the Committee on Military Pensions, and by order of that committee, moved that the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution reported from the Committee on Military Pensions, on the 8th of January last, to extend the pension laws of the United States, so as to include within its provisions every soldier who aided in establishing our liberties, and who is unable to maintain himself in comfort; and that the said resolution be made the special order of the day for Monday next, the 29th instant.

Mr. B. said, gentlemen who were in favor of the amendment of Mr. WILLIAMS, on Friday last, to provide for the militia, would, by this resolution, be presented with an opportunity of effecting their wishes; and, on the motion which he made, he asked the yeas and nays. They were ordered accordingly, and were as follows:

For the motion, 129—Against it, 47.

Mr. SWIFT moved a reconsideration of the vote taken yesterday, by which the resolution relative to fortifications on Lake Champlain, offered by him on the 18th instant, was referred to the Secretary of War—the question having been misapprehended at the time it was put—many members supposing it was on his original resolution, whereas it was on the amendment.

The motion was agreed to; but the expiration of the hour arrested further proceedings to-day.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill "for making a road from Buffalo, through Washington city, to New Orleans."

Mr. HEMPHILL said: This road, leading from the seat of the General Government to Buffalo and to New Orleans, two frontiers which will be imminently exposed in the event of a war, cannot be otherwise than of the highest importance. The badness of the road from hence to Buffalo, during the last war, protracted intelligence, and prevented a quick concentration of troops and of the munitions of war to the parts required. If there had been good roads, the military disasters at the commencement of the war never would have occurred. The badness of the roads swelled the expenses of the country to a prodigious degree. A single cannon transported from the foundries on the seaboard to the frontiers of the lakes, cost about two thousand dollars, and every article necessary in war bore the same wasteful and extravagant proportion. The waste which the necessity of the times, and state of the roads, exposed us to, would more than make the road contemplated in the bill. Our country is large; and the frontiers and exposed points being at great distances from each other, render the necessity of good roads (in a time of war) all-essential. The military power of a nation, in all ages, consists not more in a numerous population and great resources, than its capacity to concentrate its forces with rapidity to the exposed points on the frontier liable to be assailed. Good communications increase the military arm in a due proportion to the population and resources of a nation or country. On a single day, sooner or later in the arrival of troops or intelligence, may altogether depend the fate of the most important places in the country.

This road to Buffalo presents advantages peculiarly national in their character. It opens a country abounding in iron, fuel, and water power; and, in the event of our foundries and armories on the seaboard being destroyed by an enemy, it would afford the means of establishing others in the interior, secure from attack, where cannon, shot, small arms, &c., might be manufactured, which, by means of this road, and other means of transportation, could be taken to any point wherever the nation should require. It would also open to the seaboard, as well as to the lakes, an extensive and fertile country, increasing in population and in the production of provisions of every description, and which could be made available at either extremity of the road.

The proposed road would derive additional importance, in a military view, from the character of the population of the country through which it will pass. In the mountain regions, it is said that there is scarcely an individual who is not well acquainted with firearms, and expert in horsemanship; the whole population in the mountain regions (as well as in the plain country) are distinguished for their physical energies, which will always render them among the best materials for military purposes. In time of peace, cannon and munitions of war might be conveyed by sea and the New York canal to the frontiers on the lakes. But, in time of war, the maritime power of the enemy would render this communication too uncertain, and in the winter time the canal would be frozen. [Here Mr. HEMPHILL read the report of Doctor Howard, one of the United States engineers.]

"The importance of such a road as that now proposed, in a military point of view, is so strongly marked, that it will not be necessary to dwell on them in detail, but merely to point them out. It will afford a ready communication to the northern frontier, from the central part of Pennsylvania, from Maryland, and from the eastern part of the State of Virginia, giving facilities for the transportation not only of men, but also of many of the supplies and munitions of war, which are the productions of these three States. During the last war, the route by the Painted Post was found so necessary for this purpose, that it was extensively used; and, notwithstanding the badness of the roads, supplies of all kinds were carried on it, at an expense which it is satisfactorily estimated would have been sufficient (in a single campaign) to have defrayed the cost of the work.

"In the present situation of things, the citizens of the western part of New York are almost as effectually separated from their neighbors of Pennsylvania, as if an impassable barrier were interposed between them."

The highway proposed in the bill will open lucrative communications between these interesting sections of our country. The location of the road from Washington to Buffalo, is left to the discretion of the commissioners, as the committee could not, satisfactorily to themselves, designate the route.

The committee have deemed it sufficient to have the road located, graduated, and bridged, and to form the bed of the road, as an earthen turnpike, except in such cases where it will be indispensable to use gravel. On examination of the estimates of the engineers for making turnpike roads on the several routes from Washington to New Orleans, they state so much for location, so much for graduation and bridges, and so much for turnpiking with stone. The committee, by deducting the latter, and taking the best pains they could upon the subject, came to the conclusion that fifteen hundred dollars per mile would make an excellent common road, graduated at an elevation of three degrees in the mile.

From this city to Buffalo, a considerable distance is turnpiked; and, whenever that is the case, it is not to be affected by this bill. The whole road to be made will be, as near as the committee could judge, about fifteen hundred miles, which will cost two millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be drawn in instalments of not more in one year than about five hundred thousand dollars; which sum the country will scarcely feel, and it will be distributed along the whole line among architects, the owners of the adjacent lands for materials, and to the poor and industrious laborers.

The great national advantages of a road from the seat of Government to New Orleans, will scarcely, I should suppose, be denied by any one. Soon after the acquisition of Louisiana, Mr. Jefferson, as I have understood, had a reconnaissance of a road to New Orleans taken at his private expense. It has been deemed of such magnitude by the General Government, that three general routes have been surveyed, under the act of 80th April, 1824; many of the reasons assigned in favor of the Buffalo part of the road will equally apply to this part. Its importance in time of war cannot be overrated; the difficulty of transporting men and arms to this exposed point (during the last war) is well known to us all. I will not descend to particulars: I appeal to the recollection of this honorable committee.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

[H. OF R.]

The routes surveyed are an eastern, a middle, and a western route. The committee, after a careful examination of the report of the engineers of 8th April, 1826, selected the western route. The Committee on Roads and Canals, at the last session of Congress, did the same; and I am persuaded the Committee of the whole House will be of opinion that it is, upon the whole, the most eligible route—each has its advantages and disadvantages. The report says, “that the eastern and middle routes will accommodate directly more States than the western; but, by anticipating the increase of the population on the western route, that the three, in this respect, ought to be placed on the same footing. In comparing the western route with the eastern route, we find that on the eastern route the soil is inferior, the bridges and causeways will be greater, the advantages to internal commerce will be less, and that this route would not be so useful in war; that the carrying of the mail and the expenses of travelling would be greater, and, on the whole, it will be more costly. Its advantages over the western route are, that the graduation will be less, that it would, in a greater degree, facilitate correspondence between our inland importing and exporting marts, and also diffuse political information between the General Government and the capitals of the South, as this route would pass through many of them. In comparing the western with the middle route, we find the materials for a road about the same. The soil on the western route is the best; the causeways will be less, and the graduation greater. The bridges on the western route will be in length only three miles and nine hundred and fifty-three yards. On the middle route, the length of the bridges will be six miles and one thousand two hundred and thirty-nine yards. The distance of the middle route is eleven hundred and forty miles. On one course of the western route, the distance is exactly the same; but on Snickner’s Gap route, it is eleven hundred and sixty-three miles. The expense of labor is rather less on the western route. For carrying the mail, the report gives preference to the middle route, but at the same time remarks, that, as to time, it does not suffice that it should be travelled over in the shortest time, and at the least possible expense; but it must also accommodate laterally to its direction the greatest extent possible of territory. In this point of view, it is said, if the western route is not as central as the others, in relation to the States it traverses, it has the advantage of being more central in relation to the States taken together, and comprehended between the Atlantic on the east, and the Ohio and the Mississippi on the west.

But, in relation to such a road as this will be, extending from the seat of Government to two exposed and extreme frontiers of the country, and which is calculated to remain a great highway for ages, a little difference in expense or distance ought not to be viewed as of much importance.

There are considerations which give a decided preference to the western route. The first is its superior advantages in time of war. The Southern States will have their own borders to defend, and this they will be always capable of doing. They are contiguous to each other, a condensed population, and nearer to the seat of Government, and to the military and naval establishments. They will seldom, if ever, be called across the mountains. The States on the Gulf of Mexico being in the vicinity of the West Indies, will be exposed to imminent danger; and their own forces being inconsiderable, they must look for assistance from remote inland States. Tennessee and Kentucky, having no frontiers to defend, and being more interested than the South in the regions of the gulf, would be their natural allies, and always ready to aid the States of Louisiana and Alabama, and to defend the naval establishments at Pensacola. This road, in case of an emergency, would afford to the Western States the most signal advantages. They could then march their troops to the field of battle. The western route will connect different sections of the country, which are separated by natural obstacles. This is one of the great advantages of internal improvements. It will form a communication between the West and the Atlantic Ocean, and augment internal trade; the people of the West could bring their produce to it and along it, in either direction, to the most convenient avenue to a market.

WEDNESDAY, March 24.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill “for making a road from Buffalo, through Washington city, to New Orleans.”

Mr. BLAIR rose, and remarked that the bill under discussion was one of the few, if not the only one, upon the long list of the bills of the House, which, in its consequences, promised direct benefit to his constituents; that, and the consideration of having presented the subject to the consideration of this House, and having been of the committee that reported it, furnished his apology for the trespass which he proposed to make upon the time and the patience of the committee. But, said Mr. B., when I look around me in this House, and see the number of friends, both personal and political, from whom I am separated on this question, and with whom, on most others, it has been my pride to act; sir, when I look to the delegation from my own State, and there see, for a time, the line of separation drawn between some of my worthy colleagues and myself, for all of whom I entertain the most friendly regard, I would willingly have avoided saying any thing on this important subject; yet, when I reflect that the Legislature of the State from whence I come, in often repeated instances, has called upon the delegation in this House to sustain the principles of this bill, and thrice repeated that language to us during the present session, my immediate constituents being almost undivided on that subject, and expecting me to represent their wishes on this floor, sir, I have no alternative, the path of my duty is so clearly delineated, that it cannot be mistaken. I was educated in that school in which the doctrines were considered orthodox, that the representative is bound to obey the will of his constituents; and, whilst I allow others the same freedom of will which I claim the right to exercise, I myself am determined that the sin of disobeying my constituents, knowingly, on questions of expediency, shall not attach to my skirts. They have a right to expect that I will not only sustain their principles by my vote, but to the utmost of my power, in the full use of all the legitimate means with which their kindness has invested me. In doing this, I have the consolation to feel that I am acting in consistency with my own views, and upon principles long established, as to the true character of national policy. On this much-controverted question, I have dared to think that all the vital interests of our country, and particularly of the interior, loudly called for a judicious system of internal improvements. As to the constitutional power of Congress over this subject, I am equally clear, and had prepared myself to sustain the views which I had taken; but, from the high-minded, honorable course taken by the worthy gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who opened this debate in the opposition, I am gratified to have it in my power to follow his example, and exempt myself from a discussion upon which there was little hope of accomplishing more than a useless consumption of public time. With him I think all has been said that could be, in support of that ground; and though no gentleman's conscience could be fettered by any precedent, yet the inutilty of such discussion should admonish us to desist. Had I been driven into the subject, I consider this as being more defensible than most others belonging to that system; indeed, if we regard it merely as a mail road, it falls within the scope of the express power granted by the constitution. If for military purposes, it is fairly deducible from that expressly granted; else we are presented with the humiliating spectacle of a Government formed for the defence of the people, so imbecile as wholly to fail in the accomplishment of that object. But I will pass on to the subject, and meet my friend from Virginia, and take issue with him upon the expediency and necessity of constructing the road. He has not only tendered to the country his issue, but has embellished his own side with an address so imposing, as to bespeak the distinguished talents of its author. Yet with this fearful odds against me, and relying solely upon the justice of the cause, and the impartiality of the tribunal, I fearlessly stake upon the result whatever of public preferment may yet be in reserve for me.

Before, however, I enter upon this subject with the gentleman, I must be allowed to submit a remark in explanation of the reasons which induced the committee to embrace, in the same bill, the Buffalo and New Orleans roads. It is true that the surveys of these roads were separately made, and separate bills reported to the last Congress: but, on the strictest investigation, the committee could see no reason for constructing the one, that did not equally apply to the other, so far as the purposes of the General Government are concerned; they are roads of the same character, meeting at the same place—presenting the like considerations. It was therefore thought most expedient to unite them, and construct from north to south a great interior artery in the body politic, with which, when perfected, other and less extensive intersections might be formed by the States, or this Government, as future exigencies might require. True, a road from Buffalo to New Orleans, in a direct course, would not pass through this city, and that is the reason for the course which is made in its delineation in the bill. But Washington being to the body politic what the heart is to the natural body, (all the great operations of your Government being carried on here,) it is most obvious that this city should be upon the line of such interior avenue, if constructed for federal purposes.

I will also, before I approach the main argument, advert to the reasons operating upon the committee, in giving its preference to the western, as contradistinguished from the metropolitan and middle routes. It is only necessary to glance at the map of the country to New Orleans, in order to see that a road from this place to that city cannot be constructed upon a meridian line, because upon such line your course would intersect the summit ridges of the lofty Alleghany, where, in many instances, the foot of man has been seldom placed; and I suppose it is not expected by any one that our conduct should, in this particular, conform to the ancient Romans, in a strict adherence to direct course, regardless of all other considerations. This road, if made, must be carried north or south of the Blue Ridge; and the question is, on which side shall it run? It must be admitted that, for mail purposes, this road would be beneficial on either side, beyond which little benefit could be expected from either of the southern routes. What are the facts? The southern routes, as surveyed, both cut at right angles all the navigable rivers and roads of the south, running from the mountains to the seaboard, the metropolitan at the head of sloop, and the middle at the head of boat navigation. What follows? For war and commercial uses, the benefit of such improvement on either line could only subserve those great purposes on the short distances between the points of intersection. What, furthermore, is the fact? Commerce is carried on from the mountains to the seaboard; defensive operations, in war, necessarily must run in the same channel: this road, then, to the Carolinas and Georgia, upon either route, leads from, not to, the seaboard, to which the military arm of the South must ever be extended. Nobody can believe, that, with a seaboard so extensive as that belonging to the Carolinas and Georgia, and with a population of the character which is found amongst them, their physical force is to be furnished to Mobile, Pensacola, or New Orleans, in case of invasion. It is therefore to the section of country intersected by the western route, that Mobile and the Gulf of Mexico must look for their support. Moreover, this bill is to construct a road through the heart of the country to New Orleans; neither of these routes reach that point, but each terminates on the Tombigbee River, in Alabama, and connects with New Orleans by descending to the bay of Mobile, and thence around by water. On this plan, what would be the utility of a great part of this road, upon the supposition of Mobile or the bay being occupied by an enemy's fleet? Useless to a great extent. Sir, I now hold in my hand the map of the several surveys made by the engineers, from which it will be seen that, if an entire land communication were not the object, the western route, on account of distance, independent of every other consideration, is to be preferred. Why so? Because, if you fancy the Tombigbee River as the point of termination, the western route approximates, within some thirty or forty miles, those southern routes at that river upon which they terminate; that being the fact, it is only necessary to see the extended land communication from that point passing through part of Mississippi and Louisiana, in order to account for the reason why it is made to approximate either, as it regards distance and cost.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

[H. OF R.]

But, as I will have occasion to speak more at large in reference to the western route, in following my friend from Virginia, I now come to the main issue. Is this road, and upon the western route, necessary for the purposes of this country on the three great and fundamental considerations which should combine in its construction, commercial, mail, and military purposes? Following the gentleman's own course, I will examine these considerations separately; and, first, commercial advantages. The gentleman emphatically asked, of what use is this road in a commercial point of view? and proceeded to show that it cut at right angles all the navigable rivers in its course, and would not be useful for commerce. I answer that objection by saying, if his remarks had been applied to the southern routes, there would have been some justice in them; but, as applied to the western route, his objection is altogether gratuitous, and is predicated upon a total misconception of facts. Look, for a moment, at a map of the country traversed by this road, after crossing into the valley; instead of intersecting all the navigable rivers at right angles, there is but one that is in any tolerable degree navigable, for near five hundred miles, (I mean the James River.) If I recollect the country through which this road is to run, between Staunton, Virginia, and Knoxville, Tennessee, the only rivers upon which it touches, of any size, are the James, New River, and Holston. How is commerce now carried on throughout that section of the country? In wagons, if indeed gentlemen will agree that commerce can be carried on in that vehicle. Sir, I tell the gentleman, that my whole journey from this to my residence (except fifty miles) is upon this very road, and I can inform him, if he did not before know the fact, that the merchandise consumed, as far west as Knoxville, is now transported from the eastern cities upon that very road, bad as it is. It is no uncommon thing to see caravans of some eight or ten wagons passing upon it to the West; and, in the nature of things, it must ever be the channel of commerce for a considerable portion of that interior section. This road, then, whether on the McAdam plan, or that more humble, as contemplated by the bill, is all that some of the gentleman's own fellow-citizens can ever expect; and to them it is what the majestic rivers so eloquently described by him are to more favored quarters. Is, then, the accommodation of those who are thrown so far within the interior as to be untouched by the refreshing showers of the Treasury upon the tide water, a matter of no moment to the representatives of the people? They are part of the American family; and, let me tell him, took their part, yes, a full share, in the difficulties of their country, whatever may be their portion now.

Let me tell the gentleman, moreover, that, in passing beyond the western boundary of his State, we come to a section of this Union with which the individual who now addresses you has the most perfect knowledge. That is the land of his nativity; and he takes the liberty to say that he does arrogate to himself the right to speak of the wants and necessities of that people, as well as the commercial advantages to be conferred by this road. There the bounties of nature have been bestowed in an eminent degree. Little else is wanting than commercial facilities in order to finish the picture upon which is delineated real prosperity. There you meet with a fertile soil, salubrious clime, inexhaustible mountains of iron ore, furnaces and forges, nail and steel factories, with water power and facilities for all kinds of manufactures. Within the gentleman's own State, and near to the margin of this road, the salt works, from whence an immense stretch of country, east and west, must (in the very nature of things) ever be supplied by means of this road. What is the fact? That indispensable article for animal subsistence is now transported in wagons to the Holston River, within the district from whence I came; and then, relying upon the bounty of Heaven to furnish rain to swell the tide, is now transported to all that stretch of country above the Muscle Shoals. The advantages of that section of our common country do not stop here. Its facilities in producing subsistence for live stock, and all the necessary means of human comfort, are not surpassed by any other quarter. Yet, what is the fact in relation to that highly favored country? They have nature's rude works to contend with in their intercourse with their fellow-citizens of adjoining States. Need I tell this committee that the edge of industry and enterprise is blunted, for the want of some channel through which to dispose of the surplus products of that valley? Let facts speak for themselves. When wheat, that indispensable article of man's subsistence, commanded from a dollar to a dollar and a quarter per bushel in other quarters of this Union, its current price there was from thirty-three and a third to fifty cents. Why was this? Because of the want of outlets to market. So in relation to iron and all the other products and manufactures in that quarter; and what has been the consequence? Many of the citizens of that part of East Tennessee from whence I came, have sacrificed their lands and surrendered their local attachments, and have gone to other less eligible situations (in most respects) in order to gain a location where the products of the labor of the husbandman would promise a just equivalent, by reason of being permitted to enter into the markets of the seaboard. Thus much, without going minutely into detail, in answer to the gentleman's question, as to the necessity and commercial utility of this road.

The gentleman next examined into the utility of this road for mail purposes. In that point of view, he has conceded, to some extent, its utility; but, upon counting, in dollars and cents, its cost and income, he has also pronounced upon it his unqualified negative. If the gentleman imagines that the most sanguine friend of this measure ever calculated upon the road, when completed, either upon the plan proposed by the bill, or any other, being the productive source of revenue to the Government, I tell him that he is laboring under a most gross delusion. Sir, it was never dreamed of by any one of its friends. But it was believed that this, combined with the other cardinal inducements for such work, (I mean the military and commercial uses,) would, when taken together, present almost irresistible inducements to the National Legislature. Do gentlemen calculate the net income of all their weighty appropriations to the maritime defence of the country? Did they, in the construction of the great Cumberland road, keep in view the restoration of its cost in dollars and cents? No! Like this, it was a matter of national concernment, and was embarked in upon more liberal and enlarged views than those which the gentleman would now extend to this. But let us look at it as a mere post road. What is now the rate of mail transportation upon that route? If I am not misinformed, it will average about fifty dollars a mile. What, is it probable, would be the reduction upon the road when completed? Upon a fair calculation, one-half the present amount of transportation would be saved, taking into consideration the increased travel upon it, and other advantages to result from its improvement. This of itself would produce some forty thousand dollars of a saving to the Government, to say nothing of the importance of reducing the time of travel.

I now pass on to the use of this road to the military operations of the Government in time of war. Sir, whatever the gentleman may think of it, this, to me, is the primary inducement. What I have said in relation to the local benefits, in a commercial point of view, to result from the measure, I wish to be distinctly understood as being accessory to, and consequent upon, this paramount consideration, national defence. This, instead of furnishing an objection to such improvements, on the contrary, establishes their importance, in a national point of view. When was it, or where, that a work of improvement, conducing to the general good, did not also address itself to the local interests of more or less of the citizens of this confederacy? This follows inevitably, because, as a general rule, your men and munitions of war are transported upon just such roads, rivers, and canals, in time of war, as are used for commerce in peace. This is obvious, because, in the nature of things, attack will be made at the same places at which are your great commercial deposits. The gentleman has asked if troops and munitions of war would ever be transported from Buffalo to New Orleans, and vice versa. I answer, no. Nobody ever thought of such thing. But it was believed that, in case of war, and Buffalo again becoming the theatre of that war, men and munitions could be transported from the interior of Pennsylvania and the adjacent States, to that quarter. It was also believed, and confidently, too, sir, that, in the event of Orleans being again attacked, troops from Western Virginia and Eastern Tennessee could be marched upon this road to its intersection with the Tennessee River, and, when improved for navigation, could thence be transported to the defence of Orleans; whilst those parts of Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, could be marched upon this road. Sir, it was furthermore believed that Mobile being the point of attack, West Virginia and East Tennessee were not only interested in it as their natural channel of commerce, but, from their geographical position, were the legitimate allies of that defenceless point. This road, and this alone, opens to the southern part of Alabama the most speedy, natural, and efficient means of defence.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

[H. OF R.]

But, suppose, for argument's sake, I were to admit that this road, running nearly equidistant between the southern seaboard and the Ohio, and part of the Mississippi River, would not of itself furnish the full means of reaching all the exposed parts on the Gulf of Mexico. What then? Would it follow that this road ought not to be constructed? Surely not. It would only prove that, when constructed, the full means of facilitating the defence of the country were incomplete. I will now ask the gentleman from Virginia, and all who stand in opposition to the passage of this bill, where, on this continent, can they point the finger to a portion of the Union through which a road can be made, combining the advantages that this will afford? I said, in the commencement of my remarks, that it was intended for a great interior communication from north to south, with which this Government or the States might, from time to time, connect other and less important ones, and thereby attach to them much of the value of this great improvement. Construct this road, pass the bill for the road from Zanesville, Ohio, to Florence, in Alabama, and you do—what? You place the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, the troops of which are disposable, because that they have no frontiers of their own, in the condition in which a skilful commander would the interior force in the square of his encampment. You keep them in readiness to push to either point where danger threatens.

This being a question submitted by the gentleman from Virginia to the American people, I shall have failed in presenting it in its true character, if I stop here.

I say to the gentleman, and proclaim to the American people, that this road, and upon the route delineated, in part, in the bill, so useless, in his opinion, for military purposes, is the identical road traversed by the East Tennessee troops for more than three hundred miles, in search of the enemies of their common country. On the margin of this road it was, where your gallant troops encountered the appalling horrors of famine, when upon its line, and not farther distant than three hundred miles from the scene of their suffering and woe, there was bread, and to spare. Has the gentleman forgotten, or does he suppose you have, that, for the want of this very road during the war, and other facilities in defence, countless millions of the public money were squandered in the article of transportation? Sir, I will call to the recollection of my friend a single fact connected with this subject. In the vicinity of this road, in the southern part of Alabama, the Government was compelled to pay from fifty to sixty dollars a barrel for flour, when, at the same time, the current price, in that part of East Tennessee in which I reside, and which is intersected by this road, has never, to my knowledge, exceeded from three to five dollars. Let this fact, without comment from me, speak for itself.

But, sir, the enormity of the price attached to articles of subsistence, during the war, was not all; your exhausted Treasury, by reason of improvidence and prodigality, might, and has been, replenished. Sir, more than money wasted, was the melancholy jeopard of human life, occasioned by the exposure consequent upon wading rivers, creeks, and swamps, on account of the want of the very means of defence now contemplated, and upon the very track delineated in this bill, which, in the estimation of the gentleman, presents so useless a project, as to merit an appeal to the source of all power, the people. I ask my friend from Virginia, what estimation he places upon human life? Would he coldly sit down and calculate its worth in dollars and cents, as he has done the cost of this road? Sir, I answer for him; I know him too well; he would not. But, sir, all the arguments and inducements flowing from the practical results of the late war are to be obviated by assumptions of supposed results, which I deny. The gentleman says that things are not again to transpire as they did during the late war; and why? Because, said he, the density of our population will enable the frontier to defend itself. This delve into futurity is beyond my ken, and my objection to it is, that it bids defiance to experience, that surest guide. It is quite too flattering, and is based upon speculative opinion, against established facts. In matters of everyday concern, confidence might be elicited; but in a matter of such interest as the safety of the republic, I have been instructed in that school, in which it was an established maxim, "Judge the future by the past;" to do which, most effectually, in time of peace, prepare for war; construct this great road from north to south, upon which you will be enabled to throw your disposable forces from the centre to the extremities, without jeopardizing life and treasure—save your high-minded countrymen and yourself from the humiliating recurrences of the late war, here, as well as elsewhere.

THURSDAY, March 25.

Pay of Members.

The following resolution, laid on the table some days since by Mr. McDUFFIE, was taken up:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Retrenchment be instructed to report a bill providing that whenever the first session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than one hundred and twenty days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of the said one hundred and twenty days; and that whenever the second session of Congress shall continue for a longer period than ninety days, the pay of the members shall be reduced to two dollars per day from and after the termination of said ninety days."

Mr. McDUFFIE said that the resolution spoke its own importance, and superseded the necessity of any arguments in its support. He would, however, say one or two words on the subject. The adoption of the resolution, while it would not impair the legislative efficiency of the House, would save at least one month of the time now consumed by Congress at every long session. He had made an estimate of the saving which this would produce, and had ascertained that it would save the sum of seventy-five thousand dollars each year of its operation; and at the same time the public business would be well done. He had made another estimate—that if Congress sat five months, the average pay of the members would be seven dollars a day; this was an adequate compensation; but, if the members chose to attend assiduously to the public business, and complete it within the time prescribed, they would still receive eight dollars. The effect of this resolution, he was confident, would be to increase attention to the discharge of public business, without diminishing the pay while here. It was universally agreed (said Mr. McD.) that the "compensation law" contained at least one wise principle—that of a salary compensation instead of a per diem one. The only objection urged against it, and the cause of its unpopularity, was, that it was enacted by those who were to receive its benefit. He, however, differed from the general opinion on the advantage of the salary principle. He thought it would operate as too powerful a stimulus on members to get through the public business, and that it would be done too hastily. His proposition combined both principles, and the advantages of both without their defects. In every view of the subject, therefore, he conceived it would be one of the most effective measures of economy ever proposed by Congress, in regard to itself.

Mr. DWIGHT concurred in the principle and expediency of the proposition. The business of Congress could be as well done by the first of April as the first of June; and when once the limit was fixed for the earlier day, there would be no difficulty in completing all the business which it was proper to perform. He hoped the resolution would pass.

Mr. WHITTLESBY said, the object of the gentleman from South Carolina was to hasten the business before the House, and that he would most cheerfully unite with him in accomplishing it. But he would suggest to the gentleman whether his object would not be more certainly attained by accepting a modification that he would mention. The gentleman from South Carolina has given it as his opinion that the business of Congress may be done in four months, take one session with another. Mr. W. said he thought if members would faithfully discharge the trust reposed in them, that it might be done in three months. We have heard much said of organizing a business party in this House, and gentlemen have patriotically tendered their services as privates; but there appears to exist a great reluctance against officering the corps. He said he was one who was disposed to put the party under complete organization. And he would propose that forty-five members enter into a solemn stipulation that they will sustain a call for the yeas and nays whenever a motion shall be made to adjourn before four o'clock. He would have this corps persevere in keeping the House in session; and if one should prove treacherous and desert, he would have him tried and shot. Notwithstanding what we have heard said about a business party, it was no longer than last Saturday that a motion was made to adjourn at about two o'clock, and, on a motion to call the yeas and nays, only thirteen were found to sustain the call, when it was known to gentlemen that there was public business of great importance to be acted on, and it was also known that there are claimants here, who will be inevitably ruined unless bills for their relief pass. We have been in session one hundred and nine days, during which time the House has met only seventy-nine days. We have enacted thirty-four laws, where the bills originated in the House, and five where they originated in the Senate; sixty-one bills are before the Senate that have passed the House, and fifty-four are before the House that have passed the Senate. The whole number of bills reported to the House is three hundred and seventy-nine, and the number of resolutions adopted is four hundred and eighty; and this mass of business is to be left unacted on, or so hastened through, that very few members will know what provisions the bills contain. The correct mode of legislating is to commence the session with a determination to attend to business—to prolong the daily session of the House, and not adjourn from Friday to Monday. The excuse offered by gentlemen for adjourning has been that they have business at the departments. Mr. W. said he came from a section of the country where some claims remained unsettled, and that he found he could generally transact the business confided to him better by writing than by a personal attendance. The business of the departments was interrupted by the calling of the members, and the officers, he did not believe, had any desire to see them. It was very rare that an answer could be given at once, and it was generally transmitted through the post office. He said he considered the excuse for adjourning over as groundless, and that the time was spent in amusement. The proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina will punish the industrious with the negligent and inattentive. He was one who believed, with the flourishing condition of the Treasury, that eight dollars a day was not too much for a member to receive for his services, if his time was faithfully bestowed on the business of the House. He knew there were members who devoted day and night to mature business, and to attend to it in its progress through the House. He was unwilling that these should be curtailed in their daily allowance because others were remiss in their duties. The modification he would suggest to the gentleman is this: that no member who is not in attendance on the House when it is called to order in the morning, or who shall be absent during the calling of the yeas and nays, without rendering a satisfactory excuse for his absence, shall be entitled to per diem pay for that day. Gentlemen need not apprehend that there is any thing humiliating in rendering an excuse to the Speaker, if they are detained from the House by business that could not be dispensed with; much less is there any thing objectionable to the most delicate sensibility in making such excuse, if the detention arises from sickness. He would go further: he would have a list of the absences published in the papers that published the laws, so that the constituents of any member might know how he spent his time here. If the people were apprised of our neglect of duty, they would correct the evil. The object of having the House composed of two hundred and thirteen members, is to unite the intelligence of that number on every proposition that is acted on; but whoever will take the pains to examine the list of yeas and nays, will find that in most cases, unless it be on a political or on some great national question, we rarely have more than a bare majority for doing business. He would throw the responsibility on every member, and ensure his constant attendance. He said he was willing to unite in any measure that would despatch the business; but he feared the present resolution would not accomplish that object—that we should waste the time of the session until we came to the allowance of two dollars a day, and then that we should leave the business undone; and for that reason he expressed a hope that the modification suggested would be accepted by the mover of the resolution.

MARCH, 1880.]

Pay of Members.

Mr. TUCKER said, it had been his object to fix the day of adjournment. He was gratified with the resolution offered by his colleague. The gentleman from Ohio said he believed the business of the House could be done in three months. Why, then, did not the gentleman vote for the proposition, and introduce his own plan afterwards?

Mr. GOODENOW made some remarks, which he concluded by moving the previous question—yeas 42. So the bill was not seconded.

Mr. ALEXANDER said, that, from his experience here, and after much reflection upon the subject, his mind had been brought to the conclusion that some such principle as the one proposed in the resolution was necessary to be adopted by Congress to enable us to do justice to the interests of the nation with which we are charged. When (said Mr. A.) I first had the honor of a seat here, I was of an opinion that the compensation allowed was but a reasonable pay, considering the extravagance at that day, and the depreciation of money. But the case is now different; the value of money has appreciated, and every thing become proportionably cheaper; and I believe the only corrective against the abuse of the time of Congress and mischievous legislation of which the people have so much right to complain, will be found in the remedy proposed, which carries along its own limitation as to the period of our sessions. What (said Mr. A.) has been the fact of late years in regard to the history of our proceedings, and of which there seems to be no prospect of a discontinuance? Why, the first three or four months of the first session of Congress, sufficient for all the necessary purposes of legislation, have been usually consumed in idle and unprofitable debate, connected with one's own personal aggrandizement, or in projecting schemes for party or political purposes, little calculated to promote the public interest. We find, during the late war, when the interest of the country was concerned in conducting it to a successful conclusion, amidst the most violent opposition, Congress rarely ever sat the first session beyond what is now the usual period of the termination of our labors. We are necessarily led to inquire into the causes, and see if there exists a necessity for it or no. I can perceive but two, and two only, neither of which, in my judgment, will longer justify a continuance of the practice.

The attention of Congress having been withdrawn from the theatre of war, it was thrown upon the domestic concerns and relations of the country, with many of which it had nothing to do; and hence have sprung up all the unhappy differences, local divisions, and calamities, with which we are surrounded, that have goaded on the people to a state of desperation. This Government, from having been confined to our external relations chiefly, and a few internal regulations, has undertaken to regulate the whole labor and industry of the country, and thereby drawn within its vortex a sum of legislative powers properly belonging to State jurisdiction.

The great evil of this Government, as of every other, and of which the people are convinced more and more every day, having experienced it in a greater degree, probably, than any nation under the sun, is the immense mass of legislation with which they are afflicted. Besides four and twenty State Governments, acting directly upon them once a year, they have an annual Federal Legislature, with all its ramifications and corruptions preying upon them with a cormorant's appetite, to a degree beyond human endurance. While I admit in theory it is perhaps the most beautiful in the world, when confined within its proper limits; in practice, I am not sure, without reform, it will prove the most tyrannical and oppressive that the ingenuity of man could have devised. What does it matter, whether the people are taxed in a republic or a despotism? It is all the same to them: and it seems that injustice, violence, and rapine can be as well exercised in the one as the other. Nay, more securely, because it works by stealth under a false denomination. Now, sir, as I have no well-grounded hope of an amendment in their condition—as I perceive the same legislative course which has been pursued for several years past, is likely to be continued—the same system of taxation and unequal distribution of the funds of the nation to be kept up as heretofore, I must look out for the best protection for them that I can, against what I conceive to be their own worst enemy—too much legislation. And this, I think, will be found in the reduction of the pay of the members. I know it to be a delicate subject, which touches the nervous sensibility of every one. But if we are in earnest in the professions that were given to the people at the coming day of a reform in the abuses and extravagance of the administration of affairs, and which they have so much right to expect at our hands, let us go into the good work, and show a devotion worthy the cause in which we are engaged. After the example set us by the Executive head of this nation, who has gone forward with a firmness and decision that bespeak his character, holding this language on his elevation, that “the recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes on the list of Executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform;” relying upon our co-operation, we should be unfaithful to the trust reposed in us, were we to halt and hesitate in so eventful a crisis. What has been done in this respect after the laborious and faithful investigation of the Committee on Retrenchment the last session, and the parting voice of the able chairman who committed to his successors the charge, with the hope that it might be prosecuted to a successful issue for the benefit of the people? Nothing but the discontinuance of the draughtsman of this House, while the other measures rest silently on your table, or sleep the sleep of death within the bosom of the committee itself. This is one of the measures they recommended to our attention.

I take it, sir, there are two principles connected with this subject, which must always enter into the character of every legislative body. The one of interest, the other of honor. If it were possible wholly to attain the latter, it would, no doubt, be the best and safest for the country. But as it is considered with us that the “laborer is worthy of his hire,” and it is not expected that any person can serve here without a reasonable compensation, the great object, it seems to me, should be to produce the happy combination of the two, in such manner, that while the one offers a sufficient inducement for talents and virtue, the other destroys the temptation. This, I think, will be accomplished by the proposition now before us.

Moderate salaries are consistent with the spirit and principles of our institutions; and in proportion as the value of our own pay is enhanced, does it regulate every thing else connected with the operations of Government. I confess that I have no faith in any improvement being made in other respects, until we direct our attention here. I do not say that it will be proper to follow up this example in regard to all the other officers of Government, as proposed by a resolution now on your table, because these, in some respects, depend upon entirely distinct principles. If they are faithful and vigilant in their respective places, it is but right that they should receive a just and adequate compensation for their services.

But the nation expects, and has a right to demand, something at our hands, in relation to those great and important expenditures which have been so wastefully and extravagantly lavished away; and there seems no likelihood, at present, of any change for the better in this respect.

As the hope is a vain one which I entertain of any thing like a recurrence to the original principles of the Government, the only safety and security for the people, that I can see, will be in the economical administration of affairs in every department thereof. And I rather think this will at last be found the only distinction between a republican and monarchical form of Government. Whether even this shall be accomplished, we have yet to learn. From the disposition that has been manifested, the progress of measures before this House, and the character of some that have passed from before us, we are met with despair even here; in what, then, I ask, have the times differed from those that have gone by? and how can we stand justified before the people who were led to expect important and radical changes? I say nothing of the head of this administration, from whom we have the assurance that, as far as depends upon him, he will not be behind us in the great work of reform. The defect is here, and he can do but little without our aid. It is, I conscientiously believe, sir, in the pay of the members, offering an inducement to continue here longer than is necessary for the transaction of the real business of the nation, doing, as they always must, mischief, when good is unattainable. I am, therefore, for striking at the root of the evil, and making a seat become here what it ought to be, rather the post of honor than of profit. I, therefore, shall give my cordial support to the proposition now before the House, with a hope that it may be referred and acted upon.

Mr. COULTER then rose, but the Speaker having announced that the hour had elapsed, the discussion was arrested.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

On the motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill "to construct a national road from Buffalo, by Washington city, to New Orleans."

Mr. CARSON said, the supporters of the bill urged the importance of its passage upon four general considerations, to wit: Commercial, Political, Military, and the Transportation of the Mail.

The constitutional powers of Congress to act upon this and similar subjects, have been assumed and maintained by the supporters of the bill. Upon all subjects of this kind, (said Mr. C.,) involving constitutional questions, which have been discussed since I occupied a seat in this House, I have studiously avoided entering into the debates upon them. I have done so, for the very plain reason that my vocation is that of a farmer; and well knowing that it required professional science and deep research to elucidate and give satisfaction upon those critical points upon which men of eminence, patriotism, and distinction differ. Under these circumstances, I may well be permitted to be, if not without hope, at least too diffident of my own opinion upon constitutional questions, to trouble the House with the reasons upon which they are founded. Yet, as I am the representative of an intelligent and most excellent community, and as I have to act under the obligations of an oath "to support the Constitution of the United States"—that charter under the guaranties of which we can alone act here—it is incumbent upon me to look into that charter, and well examine the powers which it extends to us, and to act in accordance with my own views, however crude; for, sir, on all questions in which conscience is involved, the decision must be made by that tribunal, from which there is no appeal; and however great our respect and deference for the opinions of others, in cases of this kind, we are thrown back upon ourselves, and must alone depend upon our own views of right or wrong.

But, whatever my views may be of the constitutional powers of Congress, or however averse to bills of this kind, I feel that it would be wholly useless to urge them here; and if I should not be suspected of an attempt at rhetorical flourish, I would say, that you might as well attempt to dissolve those marble columns which support the canopy of this hall, by blowing upon them the breath of your nostrils, as to convince, by force of argument or powers of eloquence, those who have made up their opinions, or who, from the force of circumstances, will not be convinced.

Yes, it would be worse than idle; for all the experience which I have had upon this floor but strengthens me in the conviction, that if ever constitutional arguments are argued with effect, it will be in other halls—not this. But do not infer any thing like a spirit of disunion in me, from this remark—far from it. I look upon that as the last resort, resulting from insufferable oppression which a minority may be forced or driven to, when it would cease to be patriotism to submit. But, should that ever arrive, (which may God of his infinite mercy avert!) may we not justly fear that the world may then bid a long farewell to all republics, and to the rights of man?

But, whilst I disclaim any thing like a disposition to disunion in the remark, it may be proper here to say that it partakes something of the nullifying doctrines, which, while they are more pacific in their nature, will be found to be, in my opinion, as effectual in their results. Upon a more proper occasion, I may give my views fully upon this subject of "nullification," as it has been denominated in the other branch of this legislature. But, as I am somewhat the creature of impulses, I shall be governed, in this particular, by subsequent feeling and reflection.

My design is to speak of the expediency, or rather inexpediency of this measure; not that I can add anything to the powerful argument of the justly distinguished gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) for the grounds which he took were so fully and ably occupied, that he has left little to be said by others. I shall, however, take the same side of the question; not that I shall be able to shed a new ray of light upon the subject, but for the reason that the bird of more humble flight may sometimes see what the eagle overlooks.

The supporters of this bill do not claim the power under which they act, as expressly delegated by the constitution, but as an incidental power; or, in other words, as a mean necessary to carry into effect some of the expressed powers.

Admitting this position to be correct, and which I do to a certain but limited extent, the question then naturally arises, does the exigency of the country demand at our hands the exercise of those incidental powers, or the use of those means, to effect any of the objects contemplated by those powers expressly delegated? And if so, another question will also arise: Will this road meet those exigencies, and effect the object? To both of these propositions, I answer in the negative most positively. There is no necessity which demands at our hands the application of the public funds for purposes of this kind. Neither the "common defence," nor the "general welfare," demands it. And if the security of either of the points, to which this road is contemplated to be constructed, did demand the exercise of those powers, and the application of our treasure, I ask in the name of common sense, sir, if this road, a mere paltry earthen way, would afford the security desired?

But, four general considerations have been urged in support of the bill, and they may truly be said to be most pliant considerations; for they are brought to bear upon all subjects of internal improvement, requiring the public lands or the public money.

It shall be my object to show that not one of those considerations requires that this road should be made. I shall take them up in the order in which I find them in the report of the engineers made to this House at the first session of the nineteenth Congress. And the first in order is its commercial advantage.

It has been gravely maintained that this road is all-important as a line of intercommunication between distant points for the facilities of commercial intercourse, and the transportation of produce and merchandise. Now, sir, admitting the constitutionality, and the propriety of making roads for commercial purposes, is there any one who seriously believes that this, or any other road, can possibly be brought to compete successfully with the mighty father of rivers, and its tributary streams? What, sir! change the channel of produce from the finest rivers in the world, with the powerful agency of steam, propelling boats hundreds of miles in the twenty-four hours, with a mere "earthen" road! When the mighty Missouri shall turn her current back upon her source, and force a passage through the Rocky Mountains, and empty her vast tribute of waters into the Pacific, and the beautiful Ohio shall be brought through the tunnel proposed to be cut by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MEXCER,) and pour her waters into the Chesapeake, then, and not till then, let the gentleman propose the construction of roads through that region of country for commercial purposes.

But what kind of road have we proposed to us by this bill? "An earthen road," sir. Yes, sir, a miserable, paltry, earthen road. The honorable chairman and his committee have not only fallen far in the rear of the march of science and the arts in road-making, but they have gone entirely back to olden times. Earthen roads were the first system of intercommunication known to man. They were superseded by turnpikes, as they are called, which consisted in the application of stone, gravel, and other materials, which improved the foundation, and made it capable of bearing greater weight. Mr. McAdam has improved upon those roads, by a peculiar and regular method of preparing and applying the stone; and from his celebrity in his improvements, has arisen the name of McAdamized roads.

But, above all, is that highest effort of the human intellect, in perfecting a system of road intercommunication, which, for ease, safety, and expedition, challenges the astonishment and admiration of the world.

That system which has outstripped canals, and ruined their stocks in England; and that system which will supersede canals here, as well as all other systems of the kind, which have been devised by human ingenuity—yes, sir, the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MEXCER) must hear the appalling, the heart-rending fact, that this mighty monument, (Chesapeake and Ohio Canal,) which, for years, he has been laboring with a zeal and exertion to erect to his memory, and which, no doubt, he had fondly hoped would transmit his name down to the latest posterity, must fall, and must give place to the superior improvement of railroads. I could sympathize with that gentleman if I did not believe that a remedy is within his reach; that is, to give up his exploded canal system, and embrace the railroad plan; and a most happy opportunity now awaits him. Let him unite the interest of the company over which he now presides, with that of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and, by a unity of action, and community of feeling, they will find their interests mutually advanced, and the most happy results growing out of the arrangement. I hope I shall be pardoned for this digression. But let me ask the honorable chairman who introduced this bill, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) how he can reconcile it to his vast notions of grand and magnificent internal improvements, and the resources and capacity of this Government to prosecute them, to an indefinite extent, as he set forth in his speech? But what is more, how can he reconcile it to himself, to fall so far behind the advance of the age in improvements, as to propose an "earthen" road as a means to facilitate commerce, and promote the "common defence and the general welfare?" Now, if the gentleman had proposed a plan for the construction of a railroad on some plan commensurate with the greatness and resources of this nation, there would have been some plausibility in his arguments. But, upon what have we heard his beautiful theories and high-wrought figures exhausted? Why, upon an earthen road—a road of mud, liable to be washed by every shower, and subject to the vicissitudes and casualties incident to every season.

Before I take leave of this branch of the subject, I ask leave to read a brief passage from the report of the engineers; we shall then be able to judge of their views as to the commercial importance of this road.

I read from the report of the engineers, which may be found in the 9th volume of Executive papers, session of 1825-1826, document 156, page 22:

"In relation to external commerce," say the engineers, "it appears to us that a road from Washington City to New Orleans will not afford, as to transportation, advantages of national importance; for the road will cross generally all the main water courses perpendicular to the coast; and in the directions and by means of which all the transportations are effective which relate to operations of external commerce."

"However, we have remarked in the foregoing

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

[H. OF R.]

part of this report, that the main water courses were crossed by the eastern route at the head of sloop navigation, and by the middle route at the head of boat navigation, therefore a road in the direction of either will accommodate the districts through which it passes, for the transportation of their products to the navigable streams. Under this local (mark the words, gentlemen, local, not general) point of view, the external commerce will become benefited to a certain extent," &c.

Thus we see that, in the view of the engineers, this road would not ensure benefits general in their character, but such as are merely local; and even that, no farther than to afford districts through which it may pass the advantage of transporting their produce to the navigable streams.

This being the case, is there any one who will press the application of the national treasure (which should never be disbursed only with a view to national objects, wherein all the parts are equally benefited) to purposes local in their character, and that to a limited extent? It would be merging the "general welfare" into local welfare, and, against all principle, the greater into the lesser.

Next in order are "political considerations." I shall be brief upon this branch of the subject, as there is only one prominent consideration, in a political point of view, which can be urged, which is, that roads and canals will operate as bonds of union, and more strongly cement us together, and prevent a falling off of the parts. Without stopping to controvert the correctness of the position, it certainly presupposes one of two things: either that there is a disposition in the States to fly off from the centre, or a repulsive action at the centre to throw them off, and hence the necessity of these additional bonds of union.

Nothing, in my opinion, is to be apprehended from the former; would to God I could say so much for the latter! If ever the calamities of disunion should be experienced by this nation, the causes, proximate and remote, will be traced to the action of the Federal Government.

The mismanagement of this central machinery, so beautiful in its conception, and so perfect in its structure, and which worked so harmoniously whilst kept within the legitimate sphere prescribed by those rules expressly laid down for the government of its action, will alone produce those fatal consequences. By overleaping here the constitutional boundaries so clearly defined, by throwing the whole machinery out of gear, and giving a looseness to our operations, propelled on by the force of combined interests, composing a majority against a minority, the latter will be compelled to take refuge under the old relation in which the States stood to each other; that of separate, distinct, and independent sovereignty. The States themselves will cling to the Union whilst there is a hope left to rest on; the oppressions of this Federal Government can alone drive them off.

Perhaps if there were ever a crisis in the affairs of our Government which required additional bonds to hold us together, that crisis is now at hand. But if this road is to be the remedy, the committee have certainly mistaken its proper location. Western Virginia and Eastern Tennessee are not about to fly off from the Union, and therefore do not require this work; if danger is to be apprehended, it is from another quarter. The South is the point to which we should direct our attention. Certainly every political consideration would direct us to the metropolitan route. We must encircle South Carolina with some band, or she, from report, will be off at a "tangent," and that suddenly. But let me seriously ask of every member of this committee, what stronger bonds of union do freemen need, or the States require, than those forged out, wrought, and put in order by the master workmen of the revolution? Link connecting link, forming a chain of government more beautiful in its principles, and beneficial in its results, (whilst acting within the limits of the original design,) than any ever devised by the wisdom of man. What was this design? It was, that all the parts should share in equal proportion the benefits or injuries resulting from the compact; a perfect reciprocity was to be observed and preserved. Under a strict observance of those sacred principles, sir, what have we to fear? I answer nothing, either from external or internal causes. If fears are to be entertained, they are upon the other side of the question; and let me here admonish gentlemen who are seeking to provide additional bonds of union, by cutting canals and constructing roads, to beware lest they by their operations cut the ligaments of the constitution which now bind us together, and which form the only sure and certain ties by which we can remain united. No political consideration, therefore, in my opinion, does require the construction of this road; but, on the contrary, eminently demands the rejection of the bill.

"Military considerations" are the next in order, and to which I shall ask the attention of the committee.

The honorable chairman (Mr. HEMPHILL) set out by telling us that the two points to which this road is contemplated to be run, are dangerously situated, and eminently exposed in case of invasion, &c., and that this is important as a military road for the transportation of troops and munitions of war. With regard to the exposed situation of New Orleans, I beg leave to differ entirely with the honorable chairman. As to Buffalo, I know but very little about it, nor have I sought to know, because I looked upon that end of the road as having been tacked on by the committee, merely as a means of buying up votes, and not that the necessity of the nation required the work. I shall leave that end, therefore, in the hands of others.

What say gentlemen who urge this branch of the subject? Why, "that New Orleans must always look to Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, &c., for men and provisions to protect and feed them in time of war." Well, I grant this; but what further do they urge? Why, "that this road must be made to transport these troops and provisions upon." Now can it be possible that any man, in his sober senses, and under the influence of reason, can, for one moment, entertain the belief that, if this road were made, even one soldier or solitary barrel of provisions, from Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, or any other State north of those, would travel over it? What! bring men from the State of Ohio across the States of Kentucky and Tennessee? Aye, and across the Ohio River, too, with its current teeming with steamboats, ready to waft the soldiers and provisions to the point of destination. But no, they must trudge through the muds of Kentucky and Tennessee, by marches of from ten to fifteen miles per day, till they intersect this road (after crossing navigable and inviting rivers) at Florence, Alabama; and then they will have the peculiar advantage of travelling this superb national earthen road from thence to New Orleans.

I invite gentlemen who think despatch and saving of time important in military operations, to calculate how long it would take troops to get to New Orleans by this "national road" from Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, &c., and compare it with the ease, convenience, and despatch, afforded by steam power on the navigable rivers which pass through those States and empty into the Mississippi. It cannot be denied that troops from any part of Kentucky or Ohio could get to New Orleans by steamboat conveyance before they could reach Florence, in Alabama, the point of intersection with this road. Under this view of the case, the positions laid down by the honorable chairman, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) with regard to the "exposed condition" of New Orleans, and the necessity of this road as affording means of defence, fall to the ground, and the whole superstructure of argument based upon them falls also.

If further arguments were necessary to show the impropriety, nay, the excessive folly, of making this road for military purposes, they would be found by a recurrence to the history of our last war, particularly in the operations in the southern section of the Union. There was a time when New Orleans was "dangerously situated and eminently exposed;" there was a time, sir, when that city was invaded by a powerful and well-disciplined army; an army, too, stimulated to action by the "booty and beauty" which were promised them. This was a case of great emergency—this was a time of deep and dreadful anxiety; but sufficient for the occasion were the spirits convened, and hastily convened, for the defence of the city. Yes, an army was convened, defeated the enemy, and saved New Orleans. What military road, made at vast expense of time and treasure, were those troops transported over? None; yet they got to New Orleans, fought the battles of their country, and got home again; and thus will it be ever; this country will always find security in the strong arm of her "citizen soldiers." Dangers may stand thick around them; they only stimulate to exertion. The noblest deeds are done upon the most dangerous emergencies, and the glory of achieving them is the strongest incentive to action. Need I say more? Does the history of all ages that have gone before us, present a solitary example of a nation, at peace with the world, and whose policy it is to cultivate and maintain those pacific relations, preparing for the transportation of troops by large expenditures of public money for the construction of roads in this time of profound peace? But, on the contrary, does not all history prove that the first generals the world has produced, asked not roads over which to transport troops for the advancement of their military operations? Let me ask, what engineers designated the route, or what nation appropriated the funds, to construct a passage over the Alps for Hannibal and his Carthaginians, when he pushed his conquests to the very walls of Rome? Or who directed Cæsar to the point at which to pass the Rubicon, when he pronounced that "the die was cast," and struck the fatal blow at the liberties of his country?

But to come down to the present time—to things which transpired but yesterday, on the other side of the water. Did Nicholas tax his subjects to raise a revenue to open those passes through the Balkan, over which Diebitsch led that army which shook the Ottoman empire to its centre? and which, had they not been stopped by pacific measures, and, I might add, by the interposition of other European powers, jealous of the rising greatness and resources of the Russian empire, the Christian flag would this day have been waving on the walls of Constantinople? It is by the energy of powerful minds and capable commanders, that armies are led to victory and glorious achievements; not by roads for they might lead to defeat as well as victory. And here let me remark that those facilities to military operations are always occupied by the strongest; and such a work might prove a curse instead of a blessing, (as was proved, said a gentleman standing near Mr. CARSON, (Mr. DAVIS, of South Carolina,) upon the Bladensburg course last war.) Yes, (resumed Mr. C.) but I would rather lose the argument afforded by the mention of that disagreeable subject, than wound the pride of the House by recalling their recollection to it.

The "transportation of the mail" is the next and last consideration to which I shall ask the attention of the committee.

I feel that my strength is failing me too much to go into this branch of the subject to the extent I had desired. I will lay it down as my opinion, however, that the framers of the constitution did not intend, by the words "establish post offices and post roads," to confer the power to construct roads, &c., but only neant that Congress should designate the roads over which the mail should be carried, and the points at which it should be opened. I shall not attempt an argument, sir, to prove the correctness of this construction, but it being mine, it is sufficient to govern me.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

[H. OF R.]

The first inquiry which suggests itself with regard to the expediency of constructing this road for the transportation of the mail is, does any necessity for impediment exist to the transportation of the mail, which requires the application of this sum of money to remove or remedy?

Has the Post Office Department complained of a want of facilities in this particular, and asked the construction of a road at our hands? Or have they even suggested the propriety of the appropriation of any sum of money for purposes of the kind?

They have not; but, upon the contrary, we are informed by the very able report of the distinguished gentleman who presides over that department, that the facilities are now ample, and will be increased as the means of the department will justify, or the public interest shall require. I ask the attention of the committee while I read part of that report, which treats of the very subject now under consideration.

[Mr. C. read the following extract from the report of the Postmaster General:]

"The mail communication between New Orleans and the seat of the General Government, by way of Mobile and Montgomery, in Alabama, and Augusta, in Georgia, will, from the commencement of the ensuing year, be effected three times a week, affording comfortable conveyances for travellers, and the whole trip performed in the period of two weeks, each way, through the capitals of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

"Lines of four-horse post coaches will also be established, from the first day of January next, to run three times a week, both ways, between Nashville and Memphis, in Tennessee. This improvement was deemed important to keep a regular and certain intercourse between the Western States and New Orleans—Memphis being a point on the Mississippi to which steamboats can come at all seasons of the year; it being contemplated to extend this line to New Orleans by steamboats, so soon as the means of the department will justify, and the public interest shall require it. To give greater utility to this improvement, a weekly line of coaches will also be established at the same time from Florence, in Alabama, (where it will connect with the line from Huntsville,) to Bolivar, in Tennessee, at which point it will form a junction with the line from Nashville to Memphis."

Now, what more can be required? Does not this report also prove that steam navigation will supersede roads for all purposes, wherever it can find water for the boats to run on? The despatch and quickness of steamboat passage from Memphis to New Orleans has drawn the attention of the Postmaster General to that point; and it is already viewed as the route which can be travelled with most expedition, because of the advantages of steam power. Does not this speak volumes against the expenditures of public money upon roads, when it must be manifest that they never would be travelled for the purposes pretended here as the strong reasons for constructing them? It may be possible that, with regard to despatch, and saving of time, a direct road from this place to the Mississippi River, thence by steamboats to New Orleans, would be the best. But, taking this as granted, it does not prove the necessity of our constructing a road for the purpose. Roads are already made. The mail is now transported from this to Nashville, Tennessee, seven times a week, in post coaches, at a cost of upwards of thirty-four thousand dollars per annum; and this line, sir, as we see from the report just read, is to be continued three times a week to Memphis, and from thence to New Orleans by steamboats. What more is wanting? or what more, in modesty, can be asked?

I shall now turn my attention to the relative merits of the different routes; and, if this road is to be made, I think I can show the propriety of selecting the most direct practicable route.

For all purposes connected with the transportation of the mail, the saving of time, cost of construction, distance, &c., the most "direct, practicable route," as proposed by the amendment I had the honor to lay upon your table some days since, and which was printed by order of the House, and which I shall offer to the committee before I take my seat, is certainly the preferable one.

I lay down, then, as incontrovertible facts, that the route I propose will be better, the cost of construction less, the distance less, and the number of inhabitants accommodated much greater.

Now, if I establish these positions, what member can refuse to vote for the amendment, whether he be for or against the bill?

Mr. CRAIG said he should play the hypocrite were he to attempt to disguise the interest he felt in the bill under consideration. Many of the people whom I represent (said Mr. C.) have a deep and direct interest in the road which it proposes to establish; and if, under existing circumstances, I did not give it my humble support, I should feel a conscious conviction of misrepresenting their interests, and of betraying the trust with which they have honored me.

The representative, according to my political creed, is bound, in all cases, except where the constitution interposes barriers, in this, or any other body, to reflect the wishes and interests of his constituents, and not his own individual views. To do this is happily felt by me not to be less a duty than a pleasure.

Although I am one of those who construe the constitution as denying to Congress a general right to make roads, even though their extent invests them with the characteristics of nationality, yet the peculiar combination of circumstances which exists in relation to this subject, at this time, rids my mind of all scruples upon this point.

The constitutionality of the measure, as I conceive it, is not now involved. The question is not whether Congress possesses, under the constitution, power to make this road; but it is, more properly, has Congress a right to re-distribute the surplus money in its Treasury, beyond what may be necessary to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government, and what may be applied to the extinguishment of the national debt, among the people of the Union?

A little reflection will satisfy you, sir, that the appropriation of money involved in this bill is an evil (if it be an evil, as some apprehend it to be) which has its root in the existing revenue system. So long as the present tariff of duties is maintained, it is manifest that we shall find in our Treasury a large annual residuum, after all ordinary appropriations have been made. And who can doubt, after what has occurred here, in this session of Congress, that it is the fixed determination of a majority of this body, and, by inference, the determination of a majority of the people of the United States, to persist in the existing tariff system? The question, then, unavoidably occurs, what disposition ought to be made of this surplus money? Surely no one will contend that it ought to lie rusting in our coffers; none will contend that, after it has gotten there, the constitution will require it to remain there. And to what use shall we appropriate it? Can we appropriate it to any more valuable use than to internal improvements?

I would myself have preferred that this surplus of revenue should have been apportioned out amongst the several States, according to their population, for purposes of internal improvement; but in this we, who construe the constitution rigidly, are opposed by a majority. Congress now, as to all practical effects, possesses the power to appropriate the money of the public Treasury to objects of internal improvement, as fully as if the constitution, in so many words, gave that power. Nor has this power been dormant. It has been exerted in a variety of instances.

The money collected into the public Treasury from imposts, &c., belongs to the people in the mass; and it becomes our duty to return it to them by that mode that will most equally distribute it among them, and, at the same time, effect for them the greatest general good. In no way, does it seem to me, can this end be more advantageously attained, than by expending it upon a work like that proposed in the bill under consideration. The road will extend from the northern to the southern extremity of the Union, and, as a road, will accommodate a vast proportion of its citizens; besides, the money expended in making it will be as generally scattered among the people as it could be by being appropriated to any object or improvement whatever. It is utterly impossible, after having collected by taxation a sum of money from the people, ever to return it to them again individually, in the proportion in which it was taken from them. The nearest approach that can be made to such a distribution is to be effected by throwing it into general circulation, and leaving it to the influence of individual enterprise to control its particular destination. It seems to me, then, that we cannot adopt a better policy, at this time, than to put into general circulation a few hundred thousand dollars annually of the people's money, by constructing with it, for their accommodation, this great national road. You will then have the pleasure of reflecting that you have returned to them, not only their money, but, along with it, a great national improvement. And here, sir, the question is not unworthy your most serious reflection, how far this capital, thus collected, and thus expended, will have suffered diminution when it returns again to its legitimate channels of circulation among the people. Will it have suffered any diminution? As I view the subject, it will not. Then, if it will not have suffered any diminution, is it not a fair deduction that the road will be a clear gain to the people?

The policy of a nation, in regard to its pecuniary funds, is very different in some important particulars, from that of an individual person. It is the policy of a nation to have on hand no greater capital than is sufficient for the emergencies of the time—it is the policy of individual persons to augment their funds as much as possible. The wealth of an individual depends upon himself—the wealth of a nation depends upon the wealth of its citizens; and whether capital be in the private pockets of the citizens, or in the public Treasury, it is alike the capital of the nation. Now, if, without occasioning any sensible inconvenience or distress to the people composing the body politic, a sum of money can be drawn from them in the course of a few years, sufficient to produce a work of great national benefit, a work of the advantages of which thousands of your citizens will be highly sensible, what sound objection, upon the score of policy, can be urged against the execution of such a plan?

There have been, for many years past, large annual balances in the Treasury, which have been, to the nation and the people, dead capital. On the first day of January, 1828, there was in the Treasury an unexpended balance of six millions six hundred and sixty-eight thousand two hundred and eighty-six dollars and ten cents; on the first day of January, 1829, there was a balance of five millions nine hundred and seventy-two thousand four hundred and thirty-five dollars and eighty-one cents; on the first day of January, 1830, there was a balance of four millions four hundred and ten thousand and seventy-one dollars and sixty-nine cents; and, on the first of January, 1831, according to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, there will be a balance of four millions four hundred and ninety-four thousand five hundred and forty-five dollars and two cents. Now, sir, it strikes my mind, if Congress had commenced this road four, five, or six years ago, it might, before now, have been finished; and yet no portion of the people would have been sensible of the least pecuniary loss or pressure. And now, sir, if you proceed to its construction, what pecuniary embarrassments can you expect to encounter? The whole sum estimated as necessary to complete the road is considerably short of the balance which, it is believed, will be in the Treasury on the first of January next, and which must be regarded as dead capital, if not employed. What mischief, I ask, will you do? What injury to the people, or any portion of the people, will you do, by appropriating a part, or even the whole, of this balance to the construction of an improvement so valuable as that proposed by this bill will be?

But, sir, I have not yet presented this subject in its most flattering point of view, in reference to the resources of the nation. It should not escape reflection, that in five or six years from this time at most, the annual balance in the Treasury will rise from four, five, or six millions, to ten or twelve, or, if the tariff of duties should be reduced to such a standard as that no one could complain of it as oppressive, to a steady balance, as I believe, of from five to eight millions. When our revenue shall thus overflow, which will certainly be the case after the extinguishment of the national debt, what course of policy shall be pursued? Will it be constitutional or expedient that a portion of the people should sit still and obstinately refuse to participate in the excess of revenue, because it was collected in a manner they did not approve?

By voting for this bill, it may happen that an expenditure of money will be made, advantageous to the country, in the welfare of which I am more directly interested, and that an improvement will be effected, which will directly diffuse its benefits through it. And I know that, to the nation, nothing in the form of money will be lost, by appropriating three, four, or six millions of dollars to this road; because, it cannot be denied, that, if the surplus money of the Treasury be not appropriated to this object, it will be appropriated to some other, perhaps, of less national value; so that, at last, the whole effect of voting for this bill will but tend to decide the choice of Congress in favor of this over many objects, some of which are destined inevitably to absorb your surplus funds. If we, in the South, will not take your offered favor, others, less fastidious, in other sections, will.

I am not disposed, because the world will not go on precisely as I could wish, to fall out with it, and turn cynic. On the contrary, I find it to be the easiest and the best policy, generally, to conform in some degree to that uncontrollable state of things which I find around me. I have no idea of denying myself a fair participation in the blessings of this Government, because every thing is not done according to my notions of sound policy and constitutionality. It would be too much to expect that my opinions should rule in all things. I can estimate the respect which I owe to the opinions of other gentlemen, by the respect which I would claim for my own.

Whenever a people become so dissatisfied with their Government as to refuse to accept its benefits when tendered to them, they or their Government must be in gross error. If the Government be in such error, (a condition which cannot be induced without corruption,) it should be reformed at all hazards. If the people, or a part of them, be thus in error, the cure is to be expected from their own sobered reflections.

It has been intimated here, and elsewhere, that the people are, in some sections of the country, in such a state of inquietude as to endanger the Union. In relation to this intimation, I can only speak for those whom I know, or think I know. I cannot believe that there is any portion of the Virginians, much as I have heard since I came here of the nullifying doctrine, who meditate a dissolution of the Union, or who would not deprecate it as the severest calamity. Sir, I think I know the temper of Virginia upon this subject. I have had many opportunities to know it; and I may say, that, so far from harboring any wish adverse to the Union, her sons would be among the first, if danger threatened, to rally round its sacred standard. Nor can I do my fellow-citizens of South Carolina, to whom allusion has been made in this debate, the injustice to believe that her sons cherish any such design. It may be thought extravagant, after what we have witnessed in the other branch of Congress during the present session, but I do not hesitate to say it, as my opinion, that the approach of danger to the Union—the common palladium of their liberties—would again unite even old Massachusetts and South Carolina in those strong bonds of affection which held them together in the struggle for independence.

Go among the common people, who form the body and strength of your community, and I shall be much deceived if you do not hear another than the language of disunion, even in the South. The hot-headed politician is not at all times to be regarded as affording fair indications of the temper of even the people among whom he resides. His inflammation is very often personal, and therefore does not threaten imminent danger to the Union. Indeed, I believe much less is meant, generally, in relation to this subject, than the language used would seem to import. It may be, and I think sometimes is, intended merely to deter from the prosecution of disagreeable measures.

Having made these remarks, I will now endeavor to answer some of the arguments used by my colleague (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) for the purpose of showing that it is inexpedient to make the proposed road. I am sorry that this gentleman, and that other gentleman should, on account of their opposition to it, have thought it necessary to undervalue this road. Sir, if we are to give full credit to their arguments, we could not resist the conclusion, that, if this road would not be indeed a national evil, it would be, at least, useless. The warmth of opposition, I must think, has carried gentlemen too far. The utility of this road is not to be seriously denied by any whose situation enables them properly to estimate it.

The honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. CARSON) has advanced the opinion that it will not be even an indirect accommodation to the people of Kentucky. My situation enables me to correct this misapprehension. I live directly upon the track along which it is proposed to construct this road; and I do know, that many Kentuckians do, yearly, use this track, and that great quantities of stock are taken along it from that State to the interior of Virginia, and sometimes to Pennsylvania.

My colleague (Mr. BARBOUR) asked, will this road be of any commercial advantage? It will run, (said he,) a great part of its way, between the waters which flow to the East, and the waters which flow to the West, crossing some of them near their head springs, at right angles: and almost in the same breath said, that if the road ran parallel with any of these navigable waters, it would be still of less commercial importance. To what does this argument amount, except to this: that although the road is most judiciously located, in reference to the interior navigation of the country, yet it is wholly useless. Who can believe this? What country was ever so situated as not to feel the advantage of good roads. The gentleman here, as indeed throughout, seems to have been under the influence of feelings excited by the warmth of his opposition.

The gentleman next intimated that the estimate of expense in the bill was far too low; that the road would, more probably, cost ten or twelve millions of dollars, than two and a quarter millions. Now, in answer to this remark, I have only to say, that, whilst it is undeniably true, that ten or twelve millions will make a better road than two and a quarter millions, it is equally true, that two and a quarter millions will make a very good road. Again, the expenditure of two and a quarter millions upon this road will not, as insinuated, lay Congress under any obligation to expend a further sum upon it. But if the prosperous state of the Treasury hereafter, combining with other circumstances, should make it expedient, Congress may, in its discretion, appropriate additional funds to that object. I cannot see that Congress may not, as I cannot foresee that it will be wrong to do so, at some future time, say fifty years hence, if you choose, cause the whole line of this road to be Macadamized.

Mr. SMYTH said, I have had no concern whatever in forming the bill now before the committee. I am to vote upon it; and I will do my duty to my constituents, the commonwealth, and the constitution. I will very briefly discuss first, the power claimed by this Government to make roads, and assume jurisdiction over them; second, the power to appropriate money for the purpose of making roads, without assuming jurisdiction over them; third, the power to aid internal improvements, by subscribing for the stock of companies incorporated to make them; fourth, the power to appropriate money in fulfilment of a compact; fifth, the power conferred on the President by the bill; sixth, the general expediency of this appropriation; seventh, the particular utility of the road proposed to be made.

The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ISACKS) contends that the power to establish post roads, conferred on Congress by the constitution, is a power to make them. I contend that "establish," wherever used in the constitution, signifies, to give legal existence, or legal effect. The people "ordain and establish the constitution;" one of their objects is declared to be "to establish justice;" Congress shall have power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization;" "the ratification of the convention of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution." "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." In all these cases, it is obvious that to establish means to give legal effect, to give legal existence, to set up by law. Congress have power "to establish post offices and post roads." Whatever be the meaning of establish, as it relates to post offices, must be its meaning as relates to post roads. The same word, used in different sentences, may have different meanings; but the same word, only once used in the same sentence, cannot have different meanings. Does power to establish post offices signify power to build, to put up brick and mortar? No, it signifies power to give legal existence to offices. So, power to establish post roads, is power to designate, by law, the roads on which the mail shall be carried; and this construction has been acted on by Congress during forty years.

The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ISACKS) contends that Congress have power to regulate commerce "among the several States;" and, therefore, may make roads for carrying on that commerce.

Sir, the power to regulate commerce, signifies power to pass laws controlling commerce. Laws are regulations. Regulations are laws. "No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce, or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another." The power given to Congress to regulate commerce among the States, is a power to control it, and to prevent the State Legislatures from burdening it by duties, taxes, or licenses, and so on; by which one State might oppress the inhabitants of another. Will the gentleman from Tennessee contend that to make a canoe is to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes? Will he contend that to build a ship is to regulate foreign commerce? If not, how can he contend that to make a road is to regulate commerce among the States? Sir, when it shall be proved that canoes, ships, and roads are commercial regulations, otherwise commercial laws, then I will give up this point.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

[H. OF R.]

Sir, if there is any question respecting the power of Congress, that has been decided against the claim of power, in a way that ought to be satisfactory, final, and conclusive, it is this. We have the authority of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, that Congress do not possess jurisdiction to make roads. Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe expressed their opinions in the most solemn manner, when rejecting bills passed by both Houses of Congress, assuming this power. The last act of Mr. Madison's administration was to return, rejected, a bill assuming this power. But we have not only the authority of these great names. This House has repeatedly, on great debate, decided that Congress have not the power; and there is not an act in the whole statute book that assumes it. In March, 1818, after a protracted discussion, this House decided that Congress had not power to construct post roads and military roads, by eighty-four votes against eighty-two; and that Congress had not power to construct roads between the States, by ninety-five votes against seventy-one. And when Mr. Monroe had negatived the bill establishing toll-gates on the Cumberland road, and returned it with his objections, on reconsideration, a majority of the House voted against it; a satisfactory proof that it had been passed without due consideration.

Sir, as this power is claimed by implication, and as in forty years not one act has been passed that asserts it, this long nonuser should be taken as evidence that it is not contained in the grant; and we should now consider it as settled, that Congress have not power to enter into a State, assume jurisdiction, and construct roads.

I will now consider the claim of power to appropriate money to the making of roads, without assuming jurisdiction. I have not found it in the constitution. But more than fifty acts of Congress, passed during the last twenty-eight years, make such appropriations. The ground on which we, who oppose the construction which authorizes such appropriations, stood, is nearly beaten from under us. The States and the people may construe their constitution; and the construction thereof, by them, must be conclusive. The long use of a power by Congress, by the approbation of the State Legislatures and the people, may sanction the construction of the constitution by which it is assumed. I would like to see the opinion of the State Legislatures taken, to ascertain if three-fourths of them admit that this power is in Congress. The people, by re-electing those who have assumed it, seem to have given it their sanction.

I will next consider the power of Congress to aid internal improvements, by subscribing for the stock of companies incorporated to make them. I have always been of opinion since I had a seat here, that Congress possessed this power as a fiscal operation, which might be necessary if the Treasury was full. It is well known to my colleague, the late Chairman of the Committee on Internal Improvements, (Mr. MERRICK,) that such has been my opinion. If we have a surplus revenue, it would be inexpedient to have it lying in the Treasury, or in bonds, unproductive. It must be a question of expediency, whether money should be thus invested; and I hold that it will be always inexpedient, when we have a debt to pay, and that debt is payable. The object of such an operation should be a profitable investment of our money. The promotion of internal improvements would be an incident. This power, duly exercised, would give to the Government command of the accumulated surplus of its revenue, on any emergency; and it would be very convenient to have fifty millions of productive stock to dispose of at the commencement of a war. This power has been exercised, and we do possess stock to a considerable amount. I am next to consider the power of Congress to appropriate money in fulfilment of a compact. In 1802, the United States entered into a compact with the State of Ohio, on admitting that State into the Union, that five per cent. of the net proceeds of land in that State, sold by Congress, should be applied to the making of roads from the navigable waters of the Atlantic to and through the said State, under the authority of Congress, with the consent of the States through which the road should pass; and, in consideration thereof, the State engaged to exempt from taxes, for the term of five years from the sale thereof, the land to be sold by Congress. In pursuance of this compact the Cumberland road was made. And here again we have the authority of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Monroe, who severally approved the appropriations for this purpose.

Now, sir, you have the like compacts with the States of Alabama and Mississippi. That with the State of Alabama provides that five per cent. of the net proceeds of lands within the territory, "shall be reserved for making public roads, canals, and improving the navigation of rivers, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects, within the said State, under the direction of the legislature thereof; and two-fifths to the making of a road or roads leading to the said State, under the direction of Congress." And, in consideration thereof, the State of Alabama has engaged not to tax the lands sold by Congress for five years; that the lands of non-residents shall be taxed no higher than that of residents; and that no tax shall be imposed on the lands of the United States. Here, then, we have a valuable consideration for the money which we shall appropriate to make this road, leading to Alabama and Missisissippi. We owe a debt; we have an unquestionable right to appropriate money to pay it. This appropriation, in pursuance of our compact, is as fully authorized as the appropriation of fifteen millions for the purchase of Louisiana, made in fulfilment of a treaty.

I will next consider the powers granted to the President by the bill. He is authorized to appoint commissioners, who are to lay out the road; he is then to take the necessary measures for the construction of the road; contracts are to be entered into, and releases obtained from the proprietors of lands. No jurisdiction is assumed; no power is given to take and condemn the lands. In adopting measures for the construction of this road, the President must pursue the authority given by this bill, or have recourse to the existing laws.

I will now notice some of the objections made by my eloquent colleague, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) who opposed the bill. He would dissuade Congress from making this appropriation, because there are seven and a half millions of imposts which might be repealed without touching the duties which protect domestic manufactures. Sir, many of those duties which he would thus repeal, protect agriculture; many of them are paid by manufacturers, and they are the only duties which are not imposed for their benefit. Repeal those duties, and you exempt the manufacturers from all burdens. Let me caution Southern gentlemen against repealing these seven and a half millions of duties. Such a measure would render the reduction of the imposts which oppress their people hopeless. Let the whole of the imposts be gradually reduced, so as not suddenly to affect any interest. The manufactories being brought into existence by protection, it ought not to be suddenly withdrawn.

My colleague would not follow the example of France and England, in making internal improvements. The people of those countries are depressed, and many of them paupers. Sir, it was not the canal of Languedoc that depressed the people of France in the reign of Louis XIV. That great work cost five hundred and forty thousand pounds, and was finished in fifteen years. It was the perpetual wars of Louis XIV., which, in his latter days, were disastrous. It was that despicable bigotry which drove five hundred thousand Protestants from their country, and scattered their wealth and arts over all Christendom. It was not the expense of making canals and roads that depressed the people of England. Canals in England are but of recent date; they are made by companies; occasionally the Government gives a small grant. It is the public debt of England that depresses the people. At the end of the year 1701 it was six millions; in 1714 it was fifty millions; in 1775 it was one hundred and thirty-five millions; in 1784 it was two hundred and sixty-six millions; it is now perhaps a thousand millions. Thus, we see that it was the wars of the American and French revolutions that have involved England in a debt which can never be paid; and this depresses her people. Her hierarchy adds grievously to the burden. The revenues of the Episcopal Church in England amount to about forty millions of dollars, paid to eighteen thousand priests; while eight thousand other priests receive about two millions two hundred and twenty thousand dollars. It is not the expense of internal improvement that has reduced seven thousand of the people of Dublin to live on three half-pence each day. In Ireland, seventeen hundred episcopal priests receive five millions seven hundred and seventy-two thousand dollars, extorted from agriculture, while two thousand seven hundred and thirty-eight other priests receive one million and sixty-one thousand dollars. There is no danger that internal improvements will depress the people.

I will say something of the general expediency of this appropriation. If there is a surplus of revenue to expend in a beneficent way, it should be distributed as generally and as equally as circumstances will admit. This appropriation will be extensively beneficial; seven great States will share in its benefits. This road will extend through the interior of the country, where nothing has been dispensed for internal improvements, and little for any other of the expenses of the Government. Set one point of a pair of compasses at my residence, describe a circle of the diameter of five hundred miles, within that extent, not a cent has been disbursed by this Government for any work or improvement; not a salary is paid within my knowledge, and no compensation, except to members of Congress, mail contractors, postmasters, jurors, and for taking the census. Your expenditures for the army, navy, fortifications, and collection of revenue, are on the seaboard, in the cities, or on the frontier. The interior suffers by a perpetual drain of its money, none of which is restored by the Government. The prevailing policy is to have a revenue above the amount of the necessary expenses of the Government. I did not sanction this policy; but, as it is adopted, as the system is fixed upon us, let a small part of the surplus be expended, according to our compact with the Southwestern States, in the district of my colleague, and of mine.

I am to say something of the particular utility of the road proposed to be made. My colleague (Mr. BARBOUR) supposed it of no commercial utility. Commerce, he says, goes from West to East. He has never been in the southwest quarter of Virginia, and knows nothing of the direction of the commerce of that part of the country. The commerce of East Tennessee and Southwest Virginia does not go to the East. The merchants obtain their merchandise from Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York. The caravans of wagons which carry on merchandising between Knoxville and Baltimore, now pursue the proposed route three hundred and fifty miles; and, when the road is made, they may pass through this place, or continue through Winchester, as at present. It is true, that, eastward of the Blue ridge, in Virginia, commerce goes to the East; therefore the middle route, on the east side of the Blue ridge, would be useless for commercial purposes, except that some hogsheads of tobacco, within thirty or forty miles of James River, or Roanoke, might be carried along the proposed road, if made on that route, to those rivers. The commerce of the interior and western ports of North Carolina passes eastward to her own towns, or to Norfolk and Petersburg. The most eastern route through the capitals of the Southern States will only facilitate governmental and commercial correspondence. On the western route, the cotton of Alabama and the south of Tennessee may be brought to, and manufactured in, the towns of the great valley as far as Winchester, and will pass four hundred miles along the proposed road. The engineers have given this route a decided preference; they show it to be the best and the cheapest; it will require less expense in causeways and bridges; and the expense of making the road from this place to New Orleans, should it be Macadamized, would cost, according to their estimate, more than a million of dollars less than making it on the middle route, advocated by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. CARBON.)

The engineers do not seem to have observed the fact, that James River is navigable where the western route passes that stream. There will terminate the trip of wagons bringing from the Southwest produce for the Richmond market. To the other recommendations of the western route, I will add, that the accommodations for travellers, along the great valley, from Knoxville to Winchester, about four hundred and fifty miles, are, in my opinion, not equalled, in goodness and cheapness, on any road, of the same length, in the world. Sir, the road through the southwest of Virginia is an exceedingly important highway. It was formerly the usual road to Kentucky; but the making of the Cumberland road, and the Kenhawa road, has lessened its importance. It is still necessary to the inhabitants of the south of Kentucky, as the gentleman before me (Mr. LETCHER) well knows. They send along it to market vast numbers of live stock, to the northern parts of Virginia, to Maryland, and even to Pennsylvania.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. C.) asks if this road can ever compete with the Mississippi. Sir, the Mississippi does not run near us; and if our branches of that river were navigable, New Orleans never can compete with Baltimore in supplying us with merchandise.

On motion of Mr. SHEPARD, the committee then rose, and reported progress.

MONDAY, March 29.

Pay of Members.

The House again resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. McDUFFIE on the 18th instant, relative to a reduction of the compensation of members, in case they remain in session after a certain period in each session, as specified therein.

Mr. COULTER said: I would not of my free choice say any thing concerning the proposition now before the House. I am induced to do so solely by the accidental circumstance of my belonging to the Committee on Retrenchment, whose especial duty, it seems to be considered, is to aid and abet every gentleman in cutting down and breaking up every part of the machinery of this Government which does not meet with his approbation. As I cannot, in this instance, labor in the vocation which has been assigned to me, it is perhaps due to myself, and only respectful to the House, to state my reasons. If however, this resolution had been offered, as some have been, and I suppose will be again, by gentlemen who love to amuse their constituents, I should not have touched it. It might have come upon the stage, made its bow, and exit, and went off, like its predecessors and associates, in a flourish. But it comes upon us urged and sustained by a gentleman of high political consideration, who is likely to win for it much favor, here and in the nation. It is meet, therefore, that it should be considered with the gravity and respect due to the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE.) I regret that those who now give this proposition their patronage, had not brought it forward at an earlier period of the session, especially as a most appropriate occasion was then afforded them for presenting it to the House. It will be recollected that one bill, concerning the compensation of members of Congress, passed this House about the last of December. In that bill the proposition now under consideration was once contained. But a majority of the Committee on Retrenchment of this year divested the bill of what they considered an unjust and odious feature. Yet, when it was undergoing the action of the House, it was competent for the gentleman from South Carolina, or the Chairman of the Retrenchment Committee, (Mr. WICKLIFF,) to have offered an amendment, embracing this their favorite proposition. Business had not then thickened upon the House, and time, which, it is now said, was then wasted, might have been employed in considering what we are now discussing. If it had then been acted upon, it might, by operating on our avarice, have produced some of the good with which the gentleman from South Carolina feeds his fancy. Now it is too late for this Congress, at all events. But at that time we heard nothing of this proposition. No, not even from the Magnus Apollo of retrenchment. A proposition in relation to the daily pay of members, which the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CHILTON) did then offer as an amendment, received so little countenance or encouragement, that the House refused to order the yeas and nays upon its rejection. I think the House did wisely and well. It is certainly a delicate affair for this or any other legislative body to agitate the question of its own compensation. The necessity of the case constitutes it an exception from the general rule, which forbids public functionaries to be the judges of their own salaries. It has been judged safer, in all free countries, to vest this power in the legislature, though interested, than in any other department. But the delicacy of their position ought to make them cautious in their movements. If they attempt to increase their allowance, it will be ascribed to love of gain. If they attempt to reduce it, ten to one if they either get or deserve credit for patriotism or sincerity. They will most probably be charged with the grovelling design of purchasing popularity, by relinquishing a modicum of their pay, without deserving it by merit. The best way, therefore, seems to be, for a statesman to leave the matter as he finds it, until the people complain. They know how we stand; and if we are entitled by law to more than we deserve, they will demand that we shall set the matter right. I have heard of no voice of complaint among them. Their minds are tranquil, and have settled down for many years with contentment upon the present rate of compensation. They know that we are the nearest power of the Government to themselves—the representatives of their wisdom, their virtue, their feelings, and their patriotism—and they have not demanded of us to cut down our compensation below that of clerks in the public offices; nay, even below that of the humblest messenger employed about this hall. Under these circumstances, I regret that this measure has been brought forward at a period of the session when it can produce no practical result, except that of displacing business well matured, and delaying the action of the House upon measures, the progress of which the public eye is watching, and in relation to the fate of which the public feeling is now engaged. Sir, it appears to me that an economist of time could hardly have been less fortunate in the selection of an occasion or a mode of doing public service. The question of compensation, as presented in the resolution, comes in a form as noxious and offensive as could possibly have been given to it. So far as my recollection ranges over the history of representative governments and deliberate assemblies, whether in free or monarchical countries, I can bring to mind no example or precedent, no proceeding that bears any likeness or parallel to this. It has at least one merit, that of originality of invention. Of what character is it? Is its object to produce deeds of patriotism, of honor—to advance the interests and extend the renown of our country, by appealing to our nobler feelings? No—but by addressing itself to the base and sordid passions—to those feelings which actuate the most degraded and worst of mankind. Looking to the ancient republics, we find that they, when they wished to elicit deeds worthy of a free people, addressed themselves to the higher feelings, to the patriotism, the love of country—the honor and integrity of their public functionaries. That is the mode in which I should like to see the lagging integrity, the slow attention, the wandering thoughts, of this assembly, if such things be urged into concentration and quickened into action. We have fallen on evil times indeed, if our bosoms can respond to nothing but such a call as this. We have experienced a rapid and premature decay, if, at the end of fifty years after the declaration of independence and before the last, lingering, and almost hallowed footsteps of one of those who proclaimed it, have left the earth, we have so lost its spirit, become so degenerate in purpose, as to be urged to duty and honor by no other incentive than a small pecuniary penalty hanging over our heads! Sir, we are required to perform an undefined and undefinable amount and extent of legislation, to provide for the interests, wants, and exigencies of twelve millions of people, and a vast extent of country, in a specified time, or be fined for it. Knowledge and wisdom are thus to be measured by hours, and patriotism by dollars. The iron bed of Procrustes is the only thing I know, to which the resolution bears a resemblance.

The reproach which the resolution conveys, (not designed, I am sure, by the gentleman who offered it,) may be correct or not. I will not undertake to say that the majority of gentlemen on this floor are induced to waste the time, and lengthen out the session, for the purpose of receiving their per diem allowance. There are many members, of whose character, standing, and virtue, I am unacquainted, (the gentleman from South Carolina has more experience than I have,) but there are many with whom I am acquainted; of these last I can say with confidence, and candor, that they are not influenced by mercenary motives, and that while they remain here they are influenced by a sense of public duty, and sustain an actual pecuniary loss. But to them money is not the primary motive to action. Other and more exalted motives actuate them. To them, absence from kind friends, from their accustomed scenes, from the domestic hearth, which I trust comes home to the bosoms of all who are intrusted with a seat on this floor, is sufficiently painful—Spring returns, but not to them return its accustomed joys—daily and hourly they are recalled to the scenes of their home—their hearts yearn after their wives, children, and friends, but public duty, their obligations to their constituents, keep them here. When they have accepted the honor conferred on them, they will remain here so long as duty requires them. To such men this resolution only offers insult—it is addressed to them in vain. But it seems to be addressed to men of different mould, with whom it may be supposed the gentleman from South Carolina has "sounded the depths and shoals of honor;" and I would ask the gentleman whether even as to them it is not bottomed on a wrong estimate of human nature. Upon the principle of the resolution they are selfish. They have no care for, and pay no regard to, the public interest. Their feelings and passions are absorbed in speechifying, as the word goes, for their own aggrandizement. They will, of course, go on in their usual course until the period when the eight dollars per diem shall cease, and, after having picked up the crumbs and offal of every debate, to make themselves notorious, will go home at the end of the four months, and leave the public business undone. The old adage, that "you cannot bring blood out of a turnip," is too true to be overturned by this resolution. I do not wish to be understood as believing that this is the true character of this House, or any very large portion of it. I believe the members generally to be actuated by as high and honorable motives as any former Congress. It is not requisite I should, in candor, say that they possess the same amount of talent. I know that in this session, as in all former ones, time has been consumed in what has been often called frivolous debate, but still I am satisfied, from the information of those sufficiently qualified to know, from correct and official sources, that we are not behind any preceding Congress in the amount of business actually done, and that we are much ahead of them in important national affairs, well matured by our committees, and now awaiting the action of the House. In addition to this, it ought to be recollected, by experienced gentlemen, that we have had three contested elections, each of which was the subject of warm excitement and debate, and which for the time entirely excluded ordinary legislative business. I know that many "wise saws" have been uttered about a debate of two days on a small Indian memorial. I do not set myself up as a censor upon any gentlemen who may think proper to enter a debate upon any question before this House. They are all of age, and act upon their responsibility to their constituents, and are amenable to the high bar of public taste. But as I did not enter into that debate, and have been generally "a looker on in Verona," I may be permitted to say that it involved an important principle. It ought to be supposed that gentlemen from various quarters of this Union, meeting together here, somewhat strangers, debate from mutual and public instruction. For my part, I listen with pleasure and delight to the effusions of genius, talent, and experience, on any subject, and bear with patience its concomitant evil, garrulity without wisdom. The public never said that the time so consumed was wasted, until some gentlemen here, perhaps with a view of building up their own reputation at the expense of others, made some stir about it. If we could all see ourselves as others see us, it might, perhaps, be considered that the best way to build up a reputation for business habits, is to attend diligently to the matters before us, without making a parade about it. A close mouth is not only the sign but often the very perfection of wisdom. The discussions of the early part of this session may have led to no practical measure, still they may have awakened public attention, and sharpened public inquiry. I believe there is no valuable institution in this world without some alloy; assembled here from the different sections of a mighty empire—the representatives of a free and intelligent people—overlooking the multitudinous interests of this great republic—exercising the right of free discussion—that great and glorious right—can we expect to have it without some alloy? It is impossible—discussion would not be valuable if it were so controlled as to exempt it from being abused. We cannot have that bean ideal in legislative proceedings which gentlemen seem to desire, and we should be careful lest, in attempting to take away what may seem objectionable in debate, we do not destroy the value of the right of discussion altogether.

The resolution is founded upon an assumed fact, the contrary of which is proved by experience. It would doubtless be a wise measure, if it was satisfactorily established, that the legislative business could be transacted in four months. If not, the resolution ought to be abandoned. How are we to ascertain that the business can be done in one hundred and twenty days, not only now, but in future time? Are we to resort to experience, the sure guide which statesmen ought always to follow, or draw upon our imaginations? We must consult the records of our country, and they will admonish us that it is a gratuitous supposition, a mere fancy, to say that our business can be transacted in four months. I have looked at the sessions of Congress from the commencement of the Government, and I find that, at no period, has the first session of any Congress been less than five months, not even when the population of the country did not much exceed three millions of souls; at times, too, when men of the purest patriotism and most distinguished talents appeared in the councils of the nation; men whose bright escutcheons were never stained with the imputation of eking out a session for the love of their per diem allowance. The first Congress sat, in the two years, five hundred and nineteen days. I admit, that putting the new machinery into operation required more than ordinary time; but in the years '98 and '94, when the whole machinery of Government was in harmonious operation, Congress sat three hundred and eleven days; in '99 and 1800, it sat two hundred and seventy-two days. At that period the population was five millions three hundred and nineteen thousand and thirteen souls, less than one-half of our present population, and the great States in the valley of the Mississippi have since grown up, as if by magic, claiming the paternal care of this Legislature. But I have turned to another period of our history, in the hope that its example would be more prevalent here. Mr. Jefferson came into power upon the basis of economy and reform, and I believe he had a sincere desire to promote both. But I have looked in vain to find that the first session of any Congress, during that administration, was brought to a close in less than five months. The first session of his administration lasted one hundred and forty-eight days, and the second eighty-eight. Supposing, however, to humor the fashion of the times, that they had some trouble in clearing away the rubbish left by General Washington, and Mr. Adams, in the first Congress, yet the second Congress of that administration, influenced by the strictest economy, conducted by the purest republicans, sat two hundred and eighty-two days. Is it to be expected that this Congress, legislating for more than double the number of people, covering a much wider extent of territory, and embracing six additional States with less of political experience and wisdom, can do the business in two-thirds the time? The gentleman from South Carolina would task us too hard, he would fix a badge of disgrace upon us, unless we far surpass the Roger Shermans, the Albert Gallatins, the James Madisons, of other days. Sir, it may do very well for the gentleman from South Carolina, but it will not do for me. But, if we cannot trust the National Legislature of primitive times for an example, let us look to the State Legislatures. There the members stand in close affinity and contact with the people, under the eye of their constituents; yet it will be found that they consume as much and more time than we do, making allowances for the difference of circumstances under which we operate, and the magnitude and variety of interests for which we provide. I speak with knowledge of the State from which I have the honor to come. The Legislature of that State met one month before Congress, and has not yet adjourned. If the members have done wisely, they will hear, when they return home, the words "well done" from their constituents; because that people look more to the worthiness and value of legislation, than to the ordinary time expended in maturing it. I think, then, I may safely say, deriving my information from that great source of political knowledge, experience, and we should always pursue our path into futurity by the light which beams from the past—looking to this authority, I may safely say that the resolution of the gentleman from South Carolina is bottomed upon a presumed fact, the converse of which is established by experience. Shall we, then, who are intrusted with the concerns of a great nation, be guided by experience, or follow the imaginings of the gentleman? I choose to follow in the path of those wise and patriotic men of our early days, with whom the spirit of the revolution abided, who were honored in their lives, and, in their deaths, were embalmed in the recollections of our people.

Mr. EVERETT expressed himself as friendly to the object of the resolution, so far as regarded an abridgment of the sessions, but not disposed to employ the means which the resolution proposed to attain this object. He moved to amend the resolution, so as to limit each session to a fixed term, which, he thought, would obviate the objections which had been urged against the resolution in debate, and suggested to him by many of his friends.

Mr. STANBERRY said that he did not like the resolution, and he lamented that it came before the House from so respectable a source. It proceeded upon the supposition that a majority of the members of this House procrastinate the session, for the purpose of increasing their own compensation. If gentlemen can persuade the people to believe this, it will have a manifest tendency to bring us into contempt and dispute with them, and prepare their minds for certain irregular movements against this Union, with which we have been threatened. The truth cannot be disguised, that the people have a deep-rooted attachment for the Union. This attachment is much stronger than a certain class of politicians among us perhaps may wish. Not all our measures for the protection of the industry of the country, and for its internal improvement, complained of as so oppressive by some, will, I am persuaded, have the effect of stimulating the people in any quarter to sanction any of the irregular movements to which I have alluded. Those who may wish to prepare the minds of the people to look with approbation on any measures of this kind, have yet a great work to perform. They must first bring this Government into contempt: nothing would so effectually do this as the passage of this resolution, which would proclaim to the world that we, the Congress of the United States, the immediate representatives of this great people, are public robbers.

But, sir, it is not true that this House, or any considerable portion of its members, desire to remain here without performing any public service, for the mere purpose of entitling themselves to their pay; neither am I prepared to admit that this Congress has been less industrious or less patriotic than any which have gone before us. An immense mass of business has been prepared by our committees, and is now ready for the action of the House. The passage of many of the measures before us, for the internal improvement of the country, and which the state of our finances can at present so well afford, and the passage of the bill on our table for the enforcement of the laws already in being for the protection of the woollen manufactures, are, I believe, loudly called for by a large majority of the people; and if it be one object of this resolution to defeat all or any of these measures, by depriving us of sufficient time to act upon them, it only affords an additional reason for my opposition to it. If it were in my power to go any further than to vote against the resolution, I would vote it a libel on the House.

Mr. McDUFFIE replied to Mr. S. with equal warmth, and vindicated his resolution against the objections urged by others.

Mr. SCOTT said that, were it not for the imposing appearance which the resolution now under consideration presented to the view of the public, he would have rested perfectly satisfied (as he had heretofore done on other occasions) with giving a silent vote. And now I regret, said Mr. S., that I have to differ in opinion with the gentleman from South Carolina, who offered it, because I believe his motives were pure, and that his only object was to facilitate the business of Congress; and I now disavow the most distant intention of attributing any improper motives to him. But I feel well satisfied that the introduction of a principle, such as is comprehended in the resolution, would have a tendency virtually to destroy one, the most valuable co-ordinate branch of our republican Government. I mean the representative branch, which is at all times under the immediate control of the people, and ought to be free and unrestricted in its deliberations. In my humble opinion, it would be imprudent, impolitic, and unjust in us, who sit here in the time of peace and prosperity, to limit the sessions to a certain period of time, when we know not the day that troubles and misfortunes may befall us. Yea, sir, there is a possibility, though, I grant, not a probability, that, previous to the end of our present session, an indignity may be offered to our flag upon the ocean, which might render it absolutely necessary for the present Congress to take the matter under their most serious consideration. I hope a kind Providence may avert any such evil, as no one would deplore it more than myself. But this and many other circumstances may occur in future, which may require the solemn deliberations of Congress, when they may require time, and the utmost extent of their talents—whenever national safety may hang suspended on the lips and the wise deliberations of the statesmen within this hall. And, from what I have seen and experienced of the gentleman who is the author of the resolution now under consideration, I, for one, would have as much confidence in his integrity, talents, and opinions on such an occasion, as of any member within these walls. But, much as I have admired the general course which the gentleman from South Carolina has pursued, since I have had the honor of observing it, I must be permitted to think very differently from him on some subjects; and, at present, I feel opposed both to the resolution, and the amendment to it, which has been offered by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT,) because I believe that either of them is at variance with our republican institutions, and that, if either is adopted, and should become a law, the most pernicious consequences will most inevitably follow. The very principle implied, both in the resolution and amendment, is, that the members of this body prolong the sessions, from the mercenary motives of receiving their per diem allowance, trifling with the business of the people by an unnecessary delay. The gentleman has himself illustrated this view of it most satisfactorily, because he insists that if such a law was in operation, there would be as much business transacted in the term for which they were to receive eight dollars per day, as there is at the present time, when the session is extended so much longer; and he has, but a few minutes since, given it as his opinion that Congress would not sit either at two dollars per day, or without a compensation. When he first advocated his resolution, we were informed that if Congress would sit a month after the eight dollars per day would expire, and then receive two dollars per day, there would be an ample compensation for the session, as the aggregate would be about seven dollars per day. This position, I apprehend, only goes to show that eight dollars per day is too much; because, if seven dollars is "amply sufficient," for a long session, it is equally so for a shorter one; and, if gentlemen are in earnest, and have any desire to reduce the wages of members, I shall go with them most cheerfully to reduce the daily pay to seven dollars, because I believe that sum is worth as much for ordinary uses at the present day as eight dollars was at the time the present pay was established by law; and this will be a certain saving to the Government, and much more congenial to our republican institutions.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

The previous orders of the day were, on the motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, postponed; and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and took up the bill making an appropriation for a road from Buffalo, in New York, to New Orleans by Washington city.

Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD said he rose principally for the purpose of offering an amendment to the bill now under consideration. I have hitherto forborne to do so, from a wish that my colleague (Mr. CARSON) should have an opportunity of offering one that was long since printed and laid on our tables; but as he has twice had the floor, and twice been induced to withhold his proposition, I now feel myself at liberty to present my own; the effect of which will be, as I intimated when I obtained the floor, to make up an issue different from that already pending, by preventing something like an interplea in favor of the people east of the mountains, and bringing directly before the committee the relative claims of the different routes proposed from this place to New Orleans.

These examinations and surveys were executed by order of the Government, under authority of the act of April, 1824, directing the survey of such objects of internal improvement as might be considered of national importance. But while it is my purpose to show from them that the routes east of the mountains, as indicated by the reports of the engineers, and especially that termed the middle route, possess advantages superior to those west of the mountains, I must be permitted to express my regret that these documents do not furnish that accurate information so desirable in deciding the perplexing question of the proper location of this road: they exhibit a mere outline, without noticing many of the prominent difficulties or peculiar advantages characteristic of the face of the country through which these surveys are carried. I have understood, sir, that the visit of the engineers detailed on this service was known to very few persons throughout the line of their survey in the western part of North Carolina; and that they neither sought nor obtained, from intelligent individuals, such local information as might have tended to a full understanding of the advantages which that route presented. They seemed to have travelled with the caution and expedition that might have been expected to characterize an excursion into an enemy's country. It is true that, at the time of the performance of this service, some of our southern politicians, both here and elsewhere, had assumed a rather threatening attitude in their denial of the power of this Government to execute surveys, and construct roads and other works of improvement, in the several States; but whatever reason this might have offered for a careful and unobtrusive passage through other parts of their journey, yet, in North Carolina, these Government officers had nothing to fear—they were there, at least, on neutral ground. Not that the people of that State are indifferent to, or united in their opinions as to the powers of the General Government upon this and other subjects, but, influenced by that spirit of concession and compromise which gave existence to the constitution, they are prepared to yield much; yes, sir, they would pause long before they uttered even a gasconading threat of opposition to this or any similar act of authority on the part of the General Government; and though they may believe that, in many acts of legislation here, a due regard has not been paid to their interests, their complaints will be found to mingle with them no spirit of resistance—no sentiment of disunion. This is a subject that they have not been taught to think or talk about; and I, sir, am the very last man on earth that would attempt to teach them so fearful a lesson. But I return to the immediate question before the committee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEMPHILL) asserts that the western route, the one embraced in the bill, has decided advantages over any other; but he has not told us to which of the routes his assertion is intended to apply; or, is he ignorant of the fact that two directions and two distinct surveys west of the mountains have been reported? I may well suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania to have fallen into this error, not only from what he has said, but from the fact that the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. BLAIR) has triumphantly exhibited a chart of the route reported in 1826, and has referred to it as giving the only western direction indicated by the engineers; but, sir, I have procured from the Engineer Department, and now have before me, a map of a route which diverges from the first a few miles beyond Knoxville, Tennessee, crosses the Clinch River at Kingston, is then found winding its way through the Cumberland mountains, and toiling up Spencer's hill, and, after a fatiguing journey of many miles west of a direct line, it reaches Huntsville, in Alabama; and from thence it is seen to encounter the Muscle shoals of the Tennessee. Here it must cross the river; but by what means its passage is intended to be effected, the report does not inform us; it is thence, through many difficulties, conveyed to the Mississippi, at or near Baton Rouge; from thence it follows the banks of that river to New Orleans. This is emphatically the western route, the one particularly recommended by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) yet, sir, notwithstanding the engineers report the distance of this line of road from Washington to New Orleans to be twelve hundred and eighty-two miles, and that of the middle route, through North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, only eleven hundred and six miles, the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. BLAIR) has roundly asserted that the western had the advantage in point of distance. [Mr. B. explained—he referred to that through East Tennessee.] I certainly should have understood the gentleman as he now explains himself, but he is still unsustained in his position; for the same report makes even his favorite direction longer than that of the middle survey; the difference is indeed inconsiderable; but it is decidedly in favor of my side of the mountains; but the other gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ISAACS) will, no doubt, admit me to be correct, when I state that I understand him as joining the gentleman from Virginia, in recommending the road through West Tennessee. Taking this, therefore, as the western project, I will assume it as the standard of the comparison I intend to institute between the different lines surveyed. I have already shown that distance, a very important consideration, is decidedly in favor of the middle route; and I am equally confident that the facilities for constructing a good and durable road are also on my side of the question. It is true that the report exhibits little or no difference in this respect; but the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ISAACS) has himself furnished the proof that corrects the error of the engineers in this particular. He has shown the entire unfitness of his country for the making of even a tolerable way, according to the plan proposed by the bill; and it is so for the best of reasons—the great depth and richness of the soil of that favorite and highly favored region render it unfit for the construction of a road composed of earth only. This is a partial inconvenience that we have all understood to apply to the gentleman's country; but which needs only to be stated, to convince us that its very existence implies an incalculably greater benefit in the abundant fertility of their lands.

Pay of Members.

[H. OF R.]

Then, sir, whilst the bill proposes a road constructed of earth only, it is through the comparatively poor region of my State, and a large extent of the survey still farther south, that a soil will be found most happily adapted to its construction; it would not only be more cheaply made, but when done, it would be of a much more durable character.

But, in a commercial aspect, it is contended that the western direction possesses very decided advantages; yet if I rightly understand the report upon this subject, even that authority will be found in favor of the middle route, for all purposes of internal commerce. By casting the eye over the surveys through East and West Tennessee, it will be seen that they are carried for many miles in a direction parallel to the course of the Tennessee, and other navigable streams, and often upon their very banks, or at the distance of but a few miles. Instead, then, of this improvement being called for by the absence of water communication, the road, if established as proposed by the bill, can only be regarded as an auxiliary or substitute for the navigable streams everywhere to be met with in its neighborhood, and running in the same direction. This is not only true in the State of Tennessee, but is remarkably so through a portion of the country still farther south; for not only are smaller streams to be accommodated with this road, but for at least three hundred miles it is found traversing the very banks of the Mississippi. Then, is it not evident that much of the country through which it will pass is already provided with a much better means of transportation than would be afforded by the proposed improvement? Not so, sir, in the direction of the middle route; there we do not propose the absurdity of making a national road that cannot be needed; but, on the other hand, its construction in a direction different from that of the streams flowing to the Atlantic, must afford a very extended accommodation to the inhabitants of the intermediate sections of country, by facilitating the transportation of their produce, if not to the destined market, at least to some point from which they would have the advantage of water conveyance. A preference founded on this view of the situation of the country east of the mountains, is clearly intimated in the report of the engineers; and although it may not be found to obtain with equal force throughout the entire line of survey, yet its general existence affords a sufficient reason why it should weigh much with the committee in fixing the direction of this road. But there is in my part of North Carolina a description of trade that would be peculiarly benefited by this measure. We have much intercourse with South Carolina and Georgia in one direction, and Virginia in the other. To these States the farmers of my district of country are much in the habit of wagoning their productions, either for the purpose of exchange or barter, or with the more desirable object of effecting a sale for cash. I will not say, sir, that this trade exhibits the numerous caravans of wagons that we are told are seen crowding along the western road; but I will say, it is far from being inconsiderable, and is much increasing, especially in the southern direction, and is of sufficient importance to claim our attention in the consideration of this part of the subject.

The military advantages of this western road have been heightened and embellished by frequent allusions to the city of New Orleans, as not only the scene of military operations, but as the theatre on which imperishable renown was obtained. Every idea of defence connected with this road seems irresistibly to terminate at this memorable point. My colleague (Mr. CARSON) was certainly very happy on this part of the subject; and although I could but regard some portion of his argument as underrating the importance of improvements in time of peace, tending to security in time of war, yet the reasons offered by him were quite sufficient to show the utter inutility of taking this road out of its natural course solely with a view to the defence of New Orleans; for, whatever possible necessity there may be, at some future day, to muster the sons of the West at this far-famed theatre of war, I can but believe that they will find their way thither more cheaply and expeditiously through other modes of conveyance than that which this military road would afford; and, sir, I have not heard it contended in argument, that any other point on the line of this western road was likely to present a field for military operations—no necessity is intimated of saving us from ourselves in the West; for, whatever may be thought of the South, all is peace and quiet in that quarter; there the spirit of insubordination is not thought to threaten disunion, or endanger our repose—the only possible cause of apprehension arises from their assertion of claim to the lands of the Government; and, for one, I hope, ere long, we shall remove this source of contention and apprehended danger, by making distribution of them among the several States of the Union.

TUESDAY, March 30.

Pay of Members.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. McDUFFIE, to curtail the sessions of Congress, by reducing the per diem after a certain period.

Mr. WAYNE rose, and said he was opposed to the resolution proposed by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) and also to the amendment offered by the honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. EVERETT.)

The adoption of either would be productive of more harm than good—nor was there any thing in the past legislation of our country, or which had occurred at that session of Congress, to justify the changes suggested. I am satisfied (said Mr. W.) with the present arrangement for the sessions of Congress, and believe the House will come to the same conclusion, after mature reflection upon the subject.

The original resolution proposes that the compensation of the members of Congress shall be eight dollars a day for one hundred and twenty days, and, if a session shall be extended beyond that time, that the pay shall be two dollars per diem; and the amendment provides that the commencement of the sessions of Congress shall be on the first Monday in November, with a limitation of both to the 8d March.

The first is urged upon the grounds that there is a want of industry in this House, and that something is needed to coerce us to greater effort—that our inertness is caused by the mercenary consideration of daily pay—that it will save to the nation seventy-five thousand dollars; and that if the first session of each Congress shall be continued to its ordinary length, then eight dollars per day for one hundred and twenty days will reduce the daily compensation to seven dollars, which is said to be an ample allowance.

I shall examine each of these positions in the order they have been stated; and my reason for giving this formal investigation to a subject, apparently of no great importance, is the respectable source from which the resolution and the amendment came, and the disposition to prevent the mischief which either may do. If apology, however, were necessary, my justification would be found in the example of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. COULTER,) whose acute and talented exposition of the reasons against the resolution, and of the consequences which will result from its adoption, must have commanded the approbation of the House.

The first consideration urged in favor of the resolution by its mover—a want of industry—is the assertion of a fact, and its truth must be ascertained before it can be used as an argument.

I am told by those in whose experience I have confidence, and the examination of our statute book confirms the declaration—that if the legislation of this session is compared in kind and quantity with that of any preceding Congress, it will suffer no disparagement by the comparison. Between four and five hundred resolutions have been submitted, three hundred and ninety-nine bills have been matured by the committees and laid upon your table, one hundred and twenty-three of them have been finally disposed of in this House, forty-one of which have received the concurrence of the Senate, and passed into laws; seven from the Senate have been acted upon here, and fifty-two from the same branch of the legislature remain for our consideration. Of the bills which have passed into laws, it should be remembered, there are several of national importance, and among them, what is unusual so early in the session, and which should have conciliated the kindness of the gentleman, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) is his own bill of appropriations for the ensuing political year. With this formidable array of business done, it is easier to make an accusation of indolence than to sustain it. No preceding Congress has done more so early in the session; and at the termination of this on the 15th of May, the time fixed for its adjournment by this House, in quantity at least, we may anticipate enough to entitle us to the commendation of our constituents, and from present appearances, too, without having the volume of our laws enlarged by making any extravagant and experimental expenditures for internal improvements which can never yield a revenue to our treasury, or by such laws as press upon the loins of national industry, to encourage manufactures. However, let me not be supposed to intend any injustice to the gentleman, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) as it is not owing to his want of ability or exertion that we have not been relieved from the latter; and as to the first, without thinking, with some of us in principle, between whom it must be admitted there are shades of difference, he has already manifested a strong desire to retain the operation of his own sentiments upon the power, strictly within the bounds of judicious and national appropriations; and I cannot refrain from expressing the hope that this session will pass without a difference between us as to what works or subscriptions shall be considered entitled to his cautionary opposition.

But the charge of a want of industry in this Congress has gone out to the world, under the sanction of the gentleman's name, and upon such authority it will be believed, unless it shall be repelled by a detailed examination of preceding Congresses—not very interesting, it is true, but which may command the attention of the House from its direct application to the subject. And one other reason urges me to be particular. Having come into this House under the political revolution which the people thought the condition of the country demanded, it is not to be supposed, composed as it is of a moiety of new members, three-fourths of whom were chosen to sustain the present administration, that such a charge, involving them in a moiety of its discredit, will be permitted to pass without a refutation, even when made by an old member of this House, though he be one of the firmest and ablest supporters of our common cause. Such a charge may raise the maker of it in public estimation, but it will throw his associates into disesteem if it be not denied and disproved, and might jeopard the administration itself at the ensuing election, unless it shall be shown that those who are here and its advocates are worthy of being continued. Our adversaries, sir, are sufficiently talented and numerous, without giving to them additional strength by the voluntary condemnation of ourselves.

The examination of our statute book will show that every Congress, from the beginning of the Government until the expiration of the last, excepting the fourteenth, fifteenth, and seventeenth, occupied more time than will have been consumed in this, if the pressure of our engagements shall permit us to separate on the 17th of May, which every one thinks so probable, that no one event suggests an extension of its sitting after the 24th of that month. A reference to the forty-eighth chapter of the first volume of our laws, which gives the periods of commencement and adjournment of Congress from the year 1789 to the 8d March, 1815, will confirm the declaration just made, as regards thirteen Congresses, and the journals of this House will show it to be equally exact as regards the sixteenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth. The exception of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and seventeenth—and to the fourteenth and fifteenth, the gentleman (Mr. McDUFFIE) alluded as examples of commendable industry, and of reproach to this—may be accounted for, that the country having passed from a state of war to peace, the occupation of both consisted in repealing the taxes which had been laid to meet the exigencies of the first. More than the half of their legislation was strictly private and local; that which was of a mixed character, relating to our public lands, was the resumption of what had been discontinued by the war, with which persons in and out of Congress were familiar. True it is, then was the inception of our present restrictive commercial code, by the passage of the act "to regulate duties upon imports and tonnage;" and the time was made equally memorable by the grant of the United States Bank charter. The first, however, was passed with much less discussion than has been had upon bills having the same object in view since; though the tendency of that, in the subsequent claims which have been based upon it, was foreseen and foretold by some, whose warnings were unheeded, by the honest wish of many to make our nation independent of foreign supplies, without looking into futurity for its cost; and by others, who overlooked consequences, in their eager desire to have the honor of its paternity. For the other, the bank charter, the public mind had been prepared by much previous discussion; by the existence of a former bank; by its plan having been matured in the recess of Congress; and because it was generally known that the then President's constitutional objections to the charter had been subdued by painful recollections of the necessities of his treasury, and the rapacious combinations, during the war, to depreciate Government securities, issued in our hour of hardest trial, to supply its deficiencies. In referring to the history of that time, one scandalously inclined might also say, the salary compensation law, an immediate operation having been given to it had its effect in causing an earlier spring flight than had been usual, I, sir, however, make no such charge; and in explaining the causes which enabled the fourteenth and fifteenth Congresses to adjourn the first session of both earlier than had been done before, I disclaim any intention to depreciate their industry, or assail their purity. I turn back to them with respect; for it was not until then that my mind began to pursue political investigation, or to think of public measures, either as to their consequences, or the principles by which they were to be sustained; and, from the reasoning of some of the prominent men of that day, my politics received a radical tint, which, as much decried as it was afterwards, is now the badge of many who would not then wear it, and is very fast becoming the national color, fatal as it was made to some who first raised it as a banner. There was inscribed upon it, judicious impost for revenue—proper expenditures for necessary national establishments, but nothing for patronage, and a limitation of the action of the Government to the text of the constitution—the best and only security for the perpetuity of the Union. The other exception of the seventeenth Congress is to be accounted for, from a part of the business of its first session having been done in the last session of the sixteenth, which was begun in November, three weeks earlier than the ordinary time of meeting.

Such is the fact, in regard to the time occupied in legislation, since our Government was organized, which of itself relieves this Congress from the imputation of any protraction of its sitting; and it shall be presently shown, if it is to be appreciated by the business done, it will have no cause to shrink from any contrast with the past. Nay, if the mere performance of duty could at any time justify exultation, it might be indulged by us, and those who have for some years preceded us, without any self-complacency, that the time passed in legislation has not been extended, if it is recollected how long the sessions of Congress were continued after the Government had been fully organized; when the subjects of legislation have been constantly increasing with this House, consisting of a fourth less number than it now has, for thirty years of our history, with all the rapidly progressive fluctuations of a population from three to twelve millions, living in twenty-four separate sovereignties, instead of thirteen. Sir, our predecessors were not drones in legislation; their labor is their eulogium, and ours shall be as well thought of hereafter; for I cannot be mistaken in believing that there is a spirit in this Congress, revolting at the slanders of inexperience and want of ability uttered against this administration, and determined, if they shall be permitted to do so, to make the effort to give to it as distinguished an elevation in the future annals of our country, as that which is held by the administration of its father and first President.

But it is urged, in proof of the propriety of limiting the first session of Congress to one hundred and twenty days, and as a reproach when it is extended beyond it, that the second session of three months is sufficient for all the purposes of legislation, and that as much is done in it as is accomplished in the first. The declaration was inconsiderate, for such is not the fact; and I ask the attention of gentlemen, while I resort to detail, to sustain the contradiction of both assertions. By adverting to our statute book, it will be found that the business done at the first sessions of Congress has been, with little variation, the same, and that the proportions of laws passed at the long and short sessions do not differ materially, though those of the latter are in number but two-thirds of the former.

In regard to inertness from mercenary motives, though such an imputation has been disclaimed by the honorable gentleman, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) and I do not believe in his observations he meant to make it; if it had not been disclaimed, it could have been met but in one way, and that would have been by saying, a charge so disreputable in mass, no one will venture to make particular in its application. But, sir, though it was not intended, it is implied by the terms of the resolution, for if it be not addressed to an existing corruption, it is meant to act upon our fears, which is not less disreputable. What is the resolution? The compensation shall be but one-fourth of what it is to be for one hundred and twenty days, and this reduction is the penalty for not having done in that time all that the exigencies of legislation may have required. If it be not in the nature of a penalty, one or the other of these consequences must ensue, either that the sum then to be allowed is always sufficient, or that the laborer deserves as much for his services after the time proposed by the resolution for the limitation of the session, as he received before it. It may be that there are persons here who would protract the session from sordid calculations, but we must presume they are in number too small to give decisive results to their wishes. But allow them to be numerous; how can they operate? The motive is too mean for avowal and concert, and a general indolence would be counteracted by the heads of committees, who control the business of this House, and no one of whom can be supposed to be of the number of the delinquents. Can there be among them any who, by mind, education, or character, are fitted to take an active part in our proceedings, and I trust I may say, without being suspected of spreading a general unction of flattery over ourselves, that a very large majority of such are here, to countervail the sordid selfishness of any of our associates. The insinuation includes more than is supposed by those who indulge in it, or who believe that its existence has any influence upon our proceedings. It is not that a small number are so mercenary, but either that a majority are so, or that a large portion of the majority are the auxiliaries of its influence. But, sir, neither this House nor any part of it is liable to the charge; and I invoke the feelings of human nature in its vindication. Of whom is Congress composed? Of fathers and husbands used to the quietude and sweets of domestic life. When deprived of them for a few months, our hearts burn with a fondness to partake again of their enjoyment, which even avarice cannot control. The affections trample down every impediment in the way of their gratification; nor is their restlessness appeased until we are in possession of the objects of our love. The resolution has also been recommended to us upon the ground that it will lessen the expense of each Congress seventy-five thousand dollars. I think a more certain way of doing it has been shown, and I repeat, the only difference between the gentleman and myself is as to the best way of doing it. It is certainly worth considering; but I would also remark that all saving is not economy. An investment is often made by individuals and nations, which brings a moral and political return far beyond the value of the expenditure. And unnecessarily spent as this seems to have been, has it been productive of no good? Is the information spread abroad by our debates no credit to which Congress is entitled? Or is it seriously believed, as gentlemen have impatiently declared, that our great evil and cause of delay is the prevalence of debate? Sir, much of our legislation is private, strictly so—much local; both involving a knowledge of many particulars which we should have, and can only acquire by patient listening, to enable us to vote understandingly. We have two things to do: first, to convince ourselves that we are acting right, and, by telling our reasons, to convince our constituents that we have done so. And uninteresting as the greater number of speeches may be that are spoken here, they are instructive to the people. Cut off this source of information—close your doors against your reporters, or, what will be the same, pass every thing because your committees have recommended it, or reported a bill—reduce the reasons for all your measures to plain narrative, divested of all the charm, collision, and acuteness produced by debate, and half of the dignity of your Government will have been sacrificed, and our responsibility be lost sight of, in a general indifference to our proceedings. It is this indulgence of debate which tells the constituent of the real attitude and weight, here, of his representative; and it is the expectation, upon the part of the people, that it will be indulged and exhibited, which throws into the House so many possessing the talent. They know that our nation was spoken and written, as well as fought, into existence; and that, in many perilous periods of our history, the soldier's arm was nerved, and his heart warmed, with a hero's patriotism by the animation of the orator. But, sir, I dismiss the subject, because, as yet, we are the only complainers, and our constituents have not admonished us that they think it an evil.

[H. OF R.]

There is a remaining consideration upon which the adoption of this resolution has been urged, and which is entitled to a remark. It is, that the compensation of members will be reduced, even if the session shall be extended to its ordinary length, to still an ample allowance. I do not intend to dispute the sufficiency of the sum which will be received under such circumstances; but, without intending now to compromise myself to any course when the subject shall be directly presented to us, I cannot refrain from observing, if the reason given for it be correct, that it should be applied to the compensation of every officer in the Government, at least to all whose salaries have been increased in the last ten years, and which were not before absolutely insufficient. Such a work of reduction must be carried on in the gross; and when begun, though it may be an evidence of our sincerity and disinterestedness to become the first victims ourselves, it will not be esteemed abroad a proof of our sagacity, if we do not give to others a chance for the honors of such martyrdom. What, sir! money more valuable to us now, by fifty per cent., than it was twelve years since, when the question of compensation was settled between this House and the people by the repeal of the salary law and the enactment of the present allowance. If our purchases were confined to the actual sustenance of life, as the same sum now will buy half as much of food again as it would have done then, and the consumption of men not having increased, the proposition would have the aspect of correctness. But if it be tested by the endless expenses required and forced upon us by our social condition, by the comparative prices of labor then and now, by the reduction, in our country, of every agricultural product, and the enhancement, by our tariff, of almost all that we use, it will be found we have already paid full price for this nominal appreciation of money. If invested in stock, does it give a larger interest than it did then? In the purchase of property, though it may get double the quantity by metes and bounds, will it yield a greater revenue, or is the prospective increase in the value of property, in any part of our country, at a given time to come, more than will be its present price with legal interest? Money is in value what it was, though paper is not so plentiful. It is fortunate that paper does not circulate to the same extent that it did twelve years since, by which an artificial value had been given to all kinds of produce and property; but though, by its withdrawal, we have been restored to a wholesome condition, a painful reaction was produced, from which the people of this nation are not yet relieved, far outweighing to them any additional value which the circumstances may seem to have given to money. Sir, money is the same in value that it was then, and will always, in commercial countries dealing extensively with others, be liable to be affected by causes which cannot be foreseen, and the products which it buys and itself reciprocally act upon each other. Things may be less in price, without money being more valuable to a community at large. Money is no more than an exchangeable medium for commerce, forced into use from its being a material more convenient than any other we have, as an index of value for other things; and the fluctuation in the quantity of produce which portions of it will buy at different times, is neither a certain evidence of general prosperity or declension—a proof that it is more or less valuable to the laborer, nor any criterion for altering the allowance of such as are in the public service.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAYNES in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the bill making an appropriation for the construction of the road from Buffalo, in New York, to New Orleans, in Louisiana, via Washington city.

Mr. CRAWFORD said: The bill now before the committee was one of very grave character, involving most important considerations of expediency, apart from the constitutional difficulty with which some gentlemen, avowing no disposition to do so, had, involuntarily, he presumed, invested it. The power to construct roads and canals might once perhaps have admitted of great doubt but (said Mr. C.) I defer to the decision of more experienced and wiser men, whose opinions for the last five and twenty years, expressed in legislative acts, have fixed the construction of the constitution too firmly to be now shaken—upon a basis on which this body constantly acts. Not an appropriation bill passes, that does not, in some shape or other, recognize the principle. A few days ago we acted affirmatively on a bill providing for an expenditure incurred by the removal of obstructions from the channels of several rivers, and within five minutes have approved of one of similar character. Putting aside this question as rem judicatam, as one passed upon, and so considered on almost every side and not from the alarm which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) was so kindly desirous of quieting, let us proceed.

What is the duty of a Government, or, rather, for what is any Government instituted? To promote the happiness of those who establish it, by the proper exercise of all the powers confided. To develop the resources of a country, and of every part of it, by holding out the inducements which facilities of transportation furnish to increased industry in exploring them, the experience of the world has proved to be more effectual than any other policy which can be devised. A nation may flourish in every stage of improvement from adventitious causes—by the misfortunes of others, or some special good fortune that may attend her own condition. Such was our auspicious situation, from the formation of the present constitution until eighteen hundred and sixteen or seventeen. We had just emerged from provincial inferiority—the heavy hand of an oppressive Government had been not long before removed, and we felt the buoyancy and elasticity of youth: the change of our internal and relative political position, and the adoption of our new frame of Government, placed before us an extended and delightful prospect, which was not only enlivened and enriched in all its most beautiful tints, but over which was thrown every charm that could gratify the beholder, by the situation of the Eastern world, whose food we supplied, and whose trade we carried. But, sir, except under these favorable external circumstances, no nation ever did prosper, no nation ever can prosper, nor even then to the extent of which she is capable, that is not supplied with the roads and means of transportation which a discreet and sober judgment shall assign to her condition. It is in vain that your manufacturers exercise their ingenuity and industry; that your farmers, as respectable and honored as any portion of your community, make you and themselves intrinsically richer, by drawing from the earth, annually, wealth which did not before exist, and that your merchants establish themselves as purchasers of their several commodities, if they cannot carry them to market, except at a sacrifice which blunts enterprise.

Not to open these avenues, is to bury the talent intrusted to us. For what has a most indulgent and beneficent Providence spread before us, with the most liberal hand, all the bounties of nature? Is it that we shall use them as they are furnished, or, by the exercise of the intelligence that belongs to us, bring them into the most advantageous and productive activity? To maintain the affirmative of the first branch of the proposition, might accord with the opinions of the individual who opposed the making of a canal, because God had placed a river near its contemplated route, and he thought it would be sinful to aid his works. Not so is my view. I would assist the industry and enterprise of the country, in its various branches. I would lend accommodation to its convenience, and I would, by every means in my power, place her in the best attitude for defence, if hostilities should arise between her and other powers. I would not have a splendid Government, any more than the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) but I am in great, very great error, if that which is intended for the benefit of the people—which is designed exclusively for the advancement of their interest, and which is expected, by those who advocate this bill, to contribute largely to it, can make a gorgeous Government. I had supposed there was more of utility than splendor in the scheme; that comfort, competence, and ease would be found in greater abundance in the country it traverses; but I never imagined, until the ingenious gentleman stated it, that the Government would be more imposing.

But, sir, if this be splendor I favor it. I wish to see the country, from Buffalo to New Orleans, gladdened by this channel of communication, which shall enrich the land that it passes through—diffusing pleasure and wealth, and inciting to the industrious production of that which can be advantageously disposed of. Even Virginia, in her four hundred miles that it covers, will yet rejoice, I trust, that this bill has passed—not on a magnificent scale, with triple rows of elms, in imitation of the French minister, but on the moderate plan proposed by a very respectable committee of this House, through its honorable chairman, my colleague and friend, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) on a plan destined, I hope, to be approved by the Congress of the United States.

In advocating this measure, I wish it distinctly understood that the conceded power should, in my judgment, be confided to great, leading national objects: that it should not be exerted frequently, or on ordinary occasions, but on those only which would seem to require a great common effort for a great common good. Such I regard the present project to be. Is it expedient? I think so. The seat of the General Government is the heart of the body politic. From it must flow to every part of the country, in peace or in war, the regulations, laws, orders, and instructions it was organized to furnish and give. By a speedy diffusion of intelligence and information among the people of what the Government does or does not do, of the course of policy it adopts or abandons, you can alone preserve attachment to it. That every facility should be afforded for that purpose, is of vital and engrossing interest. And here let me ask, sir, in the language of my friend and immediate colleague, (Mr. RAMSEY,) have you a single passage out of Washington provided by the General Government? By what means are you to place the citizens of this very extensive empire upon a footing of equality, so fully and effectually, as by the expeditious dissemination of information? Can those on its remote borders form so correct an opinion of the merits and demerits of their public agents, as those whose locality places them nearer, unless you transmit to them the materials of which alone opinion must be made up? I am acquainted with no arrangement by which those who administer the public affairs can be brought so immediately under the view and observation of their constituents, either for approbation or for censure, as by the rapid diffusion of useful knowledge. This Government depends essentially, both for the most beneficial results and for durability, upon the intelligence and virtue of those who have the happiness to live under it. Give them the first, and the last will be strengthened; and both will be, to the noble structure we have reared, a foundation and support that must secure its perpetuity.

To commence with the northern part of this road: What are its anticipated mail advantages? Very great. The travel from Washington to Buffalo, by way of Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, is about six hundred and seventy miles. On this route the mail can be carried between the extremes, when steamboats are in operation on a part of it, in six days; at other times, seven days are occupied. Stage lines were established, some two or three years ago, from Harrisburg to the western part of New York, by which the distance on the shortest stage route was reduced to about three hundred and ninety miles, over which the mail is conveyed in seven days. If a road were made from this city to Buffalo, by the nearest practicable route, it could be transported between them in less than four days. (Postmaster General's letter of 28th December, 1827.) What an immense saving of time! Will gentlemen tell me that it is no advantage to have the mail carried in half the time? Is not despatch the life of your post office? Here have we been, during the session, receiving petitions from a very large number of our constituents, larger, probably, by many to one, than those who have expressed their views on any other subject, requesting us to stay the mail only for one day, and that the most holy one: and by our committee we turn a deaf ear to their entreaties, insisting that great inconvenience will result from the delay—that if we grant their request, it will be felt throughout all the mail ramifications of our extended domain. For the sake of the argument admit it. How great, then, must be the advantage we would have by gaining half the time; by the transmission of intelligence in four—in less than four—instead of seven days! Will it not pervade, sir, the most remote districts of our northern and northwestern borders? To enlarge upon this topic appears to me to be unnecessary.

Our attention is next drawn to the commercial considerations which bear upon this question. The bed of the road must be carried, for the first one hundred to one hundred and twenty miles north and northwest of this city, through a country fertile and beautiful as the heart of man could desire; a region under the highest cultivation, and studded with the homes of an industrious and happy population. It will afford them a channel of direct communication with the capital. They will have a choice of markets, at which they can dispose of the products of their farms, that embrace all the varieties proper to the climate. It will cross, at various points, the several turnpikes leading to Baltimore and Philadelphia, and will enable many who choose to direct their course towards those cities, to do so with increased ease. In its more western course, it must likewise strike two, at least, of the Pennsylvania canals, and will facilitate an approach to, or departure from, them. Where the country through which it passes is not eminently fertile, it abounds in coal and iron, which will probably make the resources of Pennsylvania, unfolded and opened as they soon will be, greater than those of any of her sister States.

VOL. X.—46

For the military purposes, what are its advantages? Many and commanding. As has been wisely said by my very much respected colleague, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) the strength of a country rests not so much in the number of its population, as in the facility with which masses of its defenders can be thrown together. This road will not only afford every advantage for sending the earliest instruction to your northern and northwestern frontiers, and enable you, if need be, to transport the munitions of war and provisions, at a small cost to your army, but it will meet, at every turn, some line of communication from an Atlantic point, which shall be either endangered, or which can furnish information of any enemy that may be on the seaboard. The roads and canals which irrigate and fertilize that whole section of country, do not run parallel with the proposed road, but will be crossed by it at as many centres as this famed city contains. If we had had such a road during the late war, we should have saved more money, several times told, than the entire improvement from Buffalo to New Orleans will cost, if it shall be authorized. So much for the northern end.

Are there sufficient reasons to justify the making of the road from Washington to New Orleans? It appears to me there are. It holds out to you great facilities and increased despatch in the conveyance of the mail. It was carried in December, 1827, (Postmaster General's letter,) between the two cities in nineteen days, over twelve hundred and fifty-nine miles, along the metropolitan route—certain improvements in bridges, and the removal of obstructions, it was thought, would enable the Government to transport it in seventeen days, and it was believed a good turnpike, on the shortest line, would put it in the power of the Postmaster General to carry it through in eleven days; add, if you please, three days for difference between the contemplated road and a turnpike, and you have a saving in time of at least three, perhaps five, days. In a commercial point of view, many advantages must result from it. It traverses a country abundant to overflowing in every thing that can contribute to the comfort and enjoyment of life. The surplus products can be carried on it to those streams which it strikes at right angles, and down which they can be cheaply floated to the seaboard, or some intermediate mart. The great Cumberland valley and many parts of the Southern country will yet be busy and happy in the establishment of manufactories, to and from which this road will afford facilities for carrying the raw material and the manufactured article. For war, it will enable you to convey your troops and their provisions, not along its whole distance, but, as the honorable gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. BLAIR) remarked, on particular portions of it, and on all parts of it at different times. Perhaps troops will never be marched from Buffalo to New Orleans, or the reverse, but they will be moved from intermediate points to either, or to Washington. The proposed route is about equidistant from the seaboard and the Mississippi; they will be auxiliary to each other, or if gentlemen prefer it, I have no objection that the road be considered ancillary to the river.

Mr. STANDIFER hoped the committee would not think he was trespassing on its patience, whilst he attempted, in his own way, to give his views on the important subject before the committee. But, sir, (said Mr. S.,) you will readily account for the embarrassment under which I labor, when I inform you that I was raised to the plough, at a time, and under circumstances, which prevented my getting any but the most limited education. My embarrassment is increased also, from the unfortunate difference of opinion which prevails in the delegation from my own State, with all of whom my intercourse has been friendly. But, whatever may be the difficulties with which I have to meet, I am determined, when I see a subject under discussion which involves the best interests of my constituents, and the nation at large, to represent the views of that generous and enlightened people who sent me here, and with whom, when at home, every thing dear to me is to be found. I mean to give my full support to this bill, and wish to allow my colleagues and all others the same privilege of acting freely that I take myself. I know this is not the course of all the members of this House; but I hope I may be allowed to say that my two worthy colleagues, (BLAIR and ISAACKS,) who spoke on the same side of this question with me, and myself, live in the mountain region, where we breathe liberal air. We do not set ourselves up for little captains to lead others on; we aim at no such unenviable distinction. We are perfectly willing that they should think and act for themselves, and we will leave it to the proper tribunal to decide between us. Neither of us will hold up the constitution to shelter ourselves from responsibility, and save us from the people at the ballot boxes.

I will say for the worthy gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARROUX,) that he has, in opposing this bill, which is my favorite one, acted with his usual fairness and candor. He has argued upon the ground of expediency alone, and I give him credit for it: for who, that would be thought sincere, would oppose this bill on constitutional grounds, when it is pretty well understood here that two-thirds of this House are satisfied of the existence of the power of Congress to make internal improvements? I know that some of my colleagues will bear me out in saying, that, on my way to Congress in 1823, I expressed myself in favor of the system of internal improvements, and, after taking my seat, voted under the influence of that belief; and I tell my worthy colleague, (Mr. POLK,) that that opinion remains unchanged by any thing that I heard from him in the course of his remarks.

This road is one of the first importance to the Government in three points of view: military purposes, mail transportation, and last, though not least, commercial.

Speaking of it as a military road, I must call into my aid plain common sense, as I am not possessed of much book information. My view of the United States in its warlike preparations is, that it may be compared to the encampment of an army in an enemy's country, when commanded by a skilful general. That encampment is in a hollow square, keeping in the centre a portion of his best troops, in order, if attacked on any side, to throw this reserved force to the place of attack. Now, the United States has frontiers around all the States except Kentucky and Tennessee: they are in the centre of this great encampment, and ready to be thrown to the defence of the line attacked. Will you, then, refuse to give them a road to go upon to fight, not for their own personal safety, but that of their country? They are safe if you leave them to defend themselves, for their frontier and seaboard neighbors must be cut down to reach them: but they do not wait for danger to themselves—they volunteer, and bare their bosoms to the bayonet of the enemy for their exposed neighbors, and surely it must be important to make them good roads.

The mouth of the Mississippi is very important, and may be said to be the key of the whole Western country. Suppose that a foreign foe should take possession of it, and lock up its mouth, it would strike at the interest of nine of our States and one Territory. Mobile is still more indefensible than New Orleans, and depends upon East Tennessee for succor. Georgia will have to look to her own frontier, and will not be able to assist. It is, therefore, all-important to make this road, which runs three-hundred miles through Tennessee, and crosses the Tombigbee, in Alabama, below the mouth of the Black Warrior River, where steamboats run, and troops and provisions could be carried on this road to that point, and then sent down to Mobile. Sir, the people of the lower country do not raise provisions to support an army—hardly for themselves; for, like all others, they raise that from which they can make most, and it so happens that that is cotton and sugar. East Tennessee, through which this road is to run, is the place from whence their supply must come, as well of provisions as men; and I have tilled the lands of that valley long enough to know, experimentally, that if you give us the channel upon which to send the provisions, we can raise them.

This road, if made, passes through the country which was the scene of suffering during the late war. Perhaps, from my participation in those times, I feel more on the subject than I otherwise would. I cannot, whatever others may do, forget the difficulties and troubles of that day, and much of it arose from the want of such a road as the bill now proposes to make. I saw, on the line of this road, your sick and diseased soldiers, who were fighting for your country, wading through mud and water, whilst the measles and other diseases were fastened upon them. On our return from the Horse-shoe to Fort Williams, we had to carry our sick and wounded, some on horseback, and others on biers, by their brother soldiers. From Fort Jackson to Fort Williams it fell to my lot to be one of the officers of the rear guard; our duty was to keep the men before us, and leave none behind. From hunger, sickness, and fatigue, they kept falling back, until they far exceeded the number of the guard; some had eat nothing for four or five days, and they literally gave up to die, and sought every opportunity to dodge the guard and hide behind logs and brush, and risk the savages in preference to the fatigue of travel, under the prospect of starvation. I am confident in the opinion that no man living, save the very distinguished general who had the command, could have kept in subjection men in their condition. He was kind and tender to them, and treated them as a parent would his children; he gave his own horses to the sick soldiers, and took to the mud and water with the rest; but those who were inclined to be disobedient he forced into obedience. Who, sir, were these soldiers that endured all this suffering? They were neither enlisted nor hired men; they were the respectable freemen of Tennessee, many from my own district, who volunteered, and left their wives and children as widows and orphans, to defend the liberties of the country. But you starved them in war for the want of a road to carry them provisions; you diseased them by subjecting them to trudge through mud, and wade waters, for the want of a road; and now your country's flag is floating in peace, and you are willing, if you reject this bill, to let them again endure the like afflictions. Let me tell you, this road is more needed than many of your other preparations for defence.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

[H. OF R.]

It has been my happy lot to live among the mountains boys, as they are sometimes called. I have been with them in the field of battle in one war, and I can assure you, if the servants of the people will do their duty, and give to us roads so that we can travel to the points of danger, you never will again see the smoke of an enemy's fire upon the walls of this capitol. The people to be benefited by this road are in a situation to ask little from the Government, but they ask you to prepare the means of defence before another war may overtake you, and they, for the want of them, be again exposed to suffer sickness and famine. The utility of this road for mail purposes does not seem very clear to some of its opponents. The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. CARSON) says, that upon this road to Nashville we now have six mails a week, and on his but one, therefore there is no need for this road for mail purposes. If the gentleman means that going and returning should each be counted, then we have six mails to that place; but, counting in the same way, I could make twice a week upon his route. The growing importance of all that new and advancing country, and its increase of population, renders it probable that the time is close at hand, when the necessity for a daily mail on that route will arise. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) admitted, as I thought all would, the importance of this road in that point of view. When the cost of mail transportation is now looked at upon that route, can it be possible that there is any one who would not agree to the benefits to flow from making this road as a mere post road, and the advantages to the citizens who live upon it? But I will now pass to the benefit which can be felt, and properly weighed, by the farmers of our country. I mean that of aiding trade and intercourse. Take a view of this road and the country through which it passes: It falls into the valley of Virginia, west of the mountains, and traverses that valley until it intersects the ridges at the head of the Roanoke, thence to the head of Holston, through one of the best grazing countries in the Union, and passing through the whole extent of East Tennessee. For several hundred miles on that way the lands are rich, and present the most inviting prospects to the farmer and grazier, but unfortunately must depend upon land transportation for the means of interchange of their products with other more favored quarters. I said that I was a farmer, yes, a practical farmer, and I know how to sympathize with that class. I know what it is to labor throughout the summer in the burning sun, and have on hand throughout the fall and winter the product of your labor, if not spoiling on your hand, lying uncalled for, for the want of outlets to market. The farmer is the class for whom your legislation should mainly provide; they till the earth and feed the country; yes, we who are now the great men of the nation, legislating in this splendid hall, were sent here by them, and they are now feeding us by the sweat of their brows. They have been oppressed and borne down in the country from which I come on account of the channel in which their money has heretofore been appropriated by this body. I do not understand gentlemen when they talk about the revenue being raised in the great cities or seaports; my experience teaches me that the consumer pays this revenue, and my constituents pay their proportion; and how has it gone since the establishment of the Government? Upon tide water. Has any thing gone to the quarter through which this road is asked to be made? No, not the first dollar.

My colleague (Mr. POLK) cautions us against this system of internal improvements, because it is unequal and unjust. I tell him that which has been pursued is the unequal and unjust system; and this is the only one that our people, who live off tide water, can ever expect to be benefited from. I tell my colleague that the farmers of Tennessee will inquire more strictly into the correctness of our votes, than our fine speeches; they will rise in their majesty, and put down those politicians who will not represent their interests truly; and whilst he is giving cautions, he must pardon me for taking the liberty of giving him mine, take care that he represents the class of which I have just spoken.

I know that most of the people in the section of country from whence I come, are aware of the importance to them of connecting, by canal or railroad, the waters of the Tennessee with the Coosa, and in that manner gain an important outlet for their produce, and, in my opinion, that would be of more local benefit than this road; but, sir, the interest of the country requires that both should be done—make good roads, open your rivers; then your farmers will be stimulated to industry; all men need something to stimulate them, even the members on this floor—I do not mean, to try for places on this floor, that is already sufficiently strong; I mean to do their duty when they get here. I confess that I have sometimes thought that some of the people's servants forgot that they had masters; indeed, I very much fear that the result of this vote will tend to confirm that belief. I have this measure much at heart. Sir, it comes home in its benefits to the poor and needy; the very day-laborer is to find a place to reap the reward of his industry. I am, therefore, the more importunate. I never could see the reason why improvements could be constitutionally made on tide water; and the moment you left it, the constitution was too narrow to cover such work. This seems to be the modern doctrine, and though it suits some learned and wise men, it will neither suit me nor the people I represent; and I think some other gentlemen of this House will find, also, that those who swing the maul and axe will not be so well pleased with speeches filled with constitutional law as common sense voting, bringing home to them benefits and blessings which they can feel and realize. I trust in God that they will rise, and force their servants so to read the constitution as to include the neglected parts of this Union, for which we now ask this reasonable measure.

I have not had much experience in legislation, but I have been here long enough to know that tide water has been the spoiled child of this Government. I see on your table, and on passage, bills to open mouths of rivers, build seawalls, improve harbors, and various other things, to which I hear no man object; but when we from the other side of the ridge ask for something to be done to benefit the Union at large, and our constituents in particular, then the constitution adopted for the whole United States is too narrow to reach us, and some of our folk join in saying, if we stretch it from tide water it will tear. Indeed, it does seem to me that some gentlemen think that constitution, commerce, and every thing stops with tide water. They might as well try to convince me that a goose, swimming in tide water, turns to a terrapin when it gets above, as that commerce ceases to be commerce when it is put into a boat or wagon. Sir, this may be sound argument with hair-splitting politicians, but it would be laughed at by our common ploughboys. If the good people of Tennessee can be blinded by reasoning which tends to license the expenditure of their moneys for all the seacoast projects, and nothing for defensive means amongst them, I shall confess that my colleague (Mr. POLK) is representing their wishes, though I shall never believe it to be their interests.

I have but little knowledge of the constitutional law, but I can understand plain English, and the constitution reads thus: Congress shall have power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." This means commerce carried on between different States, just like commerce with foreign nations, and the same can be done for both, unless the modern notion shall prevail, that there is no commerce off the tide water to regulate.

On the plan which I have adopted, the neglected portions of our country would be improved, and life and spirit given to the husbandman. The farmer could find a ready market for the products of his industry, life and energy would take the place of indolence and sloth; the farmer would then whistle after his plough, and the benefits would be felt throughout society; the cheerful wife, with her prattling infants, the pride and ornament of our country, would join their husbands and fathers, and would pronounce a blessing upon the politicians who were instrumental in conferring this good.

I have heard the sufferings and sorrows of our revolutionary worthies pathetically described by gentlemen on this floor, with which I have been edified and charmed; but, sir, when I am about to get the information on that subject from the most impressive source, I will go to the actor himself. I have heard the tale of their sufferings from themselves; how they marked with their bloody feet the frozen earth, and endured all that could be imposed upon them to purchase for us this Government, which is certainly the best upon the earth. They enriched it for us with their own blood; and shall we, like drones, misimprove the means which have been put in our power to benefit ourselves and posterity? Shall we skim the surface of this delightful country, and render it barren and waste? No, we would be unworthy of being called the descendants of ancestors so brave and noble. Let us put forth our hands and improve it, and give to its high-minded inhabitants all the facilities in our power, by constructing for them roads and canals, and improving their rivers; then shall we merit the name of representatives of a free and enlightened people. Pursuing this system, you will bind together the North and the South, and prevent jealousy and distrust, which is now but too apparent. Then you would hear nothing said about States flying off from their sisters, and rebelling against the Union. All would be bound together in bonds of harmony and peace; and when our posterity came into our places, they would have the pleasing reflection that they too had cause for holding in affectionate remembrance those who had preserved, in health and vigor, their beloved country.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.

Mr. CROCKETT, of Tennessee, submitted an amendment, providing that the roads should run from the city of Washington, in a direct route, to Memphis, on the Mississippi River, in the western district of Tennessee.

In support of his amendment, Mr. C. said, he was truly sorry, under existing circumstances, to trouble the committee with any remarks upon the subject, especially as a considerable portion of time had already been consumed by the Representatives from his State, no less than four gentlemen from Tennessee having addressed the committee, (Messrs. BLAIR, ISAACS, POLK, and STANDIFER,) all of whom (said Mr. C.) are much better qualified to give light on this subject than myself.

When (he continued) I consider the few opportunities which I have had to obtain information on this important topic, I shrink at the idea of addressing so intelligent a body as this, upon matters relating to it. My lips would be sealed in silence, were I not fully convinced that there has been, in some instances, a partial and improper legislation resorted to during the present session. I was elected from the western district of Tennessee, after declaring myself a friend to this measure; and I came here quite hot for the road—yes, the fever was upon me; but I confess I am getting quite cool on the subject of expending money for the gratification of certain gentlemen who happen to have different views from those I entertain. Let us inquire where this money comes from. It will be found that even our poor citizens have to contribute towards the supply. I have not forgotten how I first found my way to this House; I pledged myself to the good people who sent me here, that I would oppose certain tariff measures, and strive to remove the duties upon salt, sugar, coffee, and other articles, which the poor, as well as the rich, are from necessity compelled to consume. The duties on these articles are felt to be oppressive by my fellow-citizens; and, as long as I can raise my voice, I will oppose the odious system which sanctions them.

Those who sustain the Government, and furnish the means, have, by the illiberality of their servants, been kept in ignorance of the true cause of some of their sufferings. These servants, after the people intrust them with their confidence, too often forget the interest of their employers, and are led away by some designing gentlemen, who, to gratify some wild notion, are almost willing to enslave the poorer class at least. I am one of those who are called self-taught men; by the kindness of my neighbors, and some exertion of my own, I have been raised from obscurity without an education. I am therefore compelled to address the committee in the language of a farmer, which, I hope, will be understood. I do not mean to oppose internal improvements—my votes on that subject will show that I am an internal improvement man, though I cannot go, as the Kentuckian says, "the whole hog." I will only go as far as the situation of the country will admit, so far as not to oppress. I will not say that I will vote against the bill under all circumstances, yet, at this moment, I consider it a wild notion to carry the road to the extent contemplated, from Buffalo to this city, and from this to New Orleans. Adopt my amendment, and you will shorten the distance five hundred miles, which will save, in the outset, upwards of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the country. Is not this worthy the consideration of the committee? Besides, it would, in a measure, be useless to open the road as contemplated by the bill. I recollect there was a road opened by the army, from the lower end of the Muscle shoals, on the Tennessee River, to Lake Pontchartrain, and thence to New Orleans, and now it is grown up, except about one hundred and twenty miles, so that it is impassable; this is according to information I have received from gentlemen who are acquainted with the road.

From East Tennessee to New Orleans it must be upwards of eight hundred miles; from that place to Memphis, I mean from where the road would pass, between two and three hundred. I am well acquainted with the local situation of East Tennessee, and do not doubt that it would be of great use to make a good road from Memphis to this city. The contemplated road is to commence at Buffalo, come to this city, and go thence to New Orleans. But suppose we should say it were best to begin at Memphis, and come to this place? Will this be opposed? Will the rule not work both ways? If not, it is a bad concern. I am astonished that certain of our eastern friends have become so kind to us. They are quite willing to aid in distributing a portion of the national funds among us of the West. This was not so once. And, if I am not deceived, their present kindness is merely a bait to cover the hook which is intended to haul in the western and southern people; and when we are hooked over the barb, we will have to yield. Their policy reminds me of a certain man in the State of Ohio, who, having caught a raccoon, placed it in a bag, and, as he was on his way home, he met a neighbor, who was anxious to know what he had in his bag. He was told to put his hand in and feel, and in doing so he was bit through the fingers; he then asked what it was, and was told that it was only a bite. I fear that our good eastern friends have a hook and a bite for us; and, if we are once fastened, it will close the concern. We may then despair of paying the national debt; we may bid farewell to all other internal improvements; and, finally, we may bid farewell to all hopes of ever reducing duties on any thing. This is honestly my opinion; and again I say, I cannot consent to "go the whole hog." But I will go as far as Memphis. There let this great road strike the Mississippi, where the steamboats are passing every hour in the day and night; where you can board a steamboat, and, in seven or eight days, go to New Orleans and back; where there is no obstruction at any time of the year. I would thank any man to show this committee the use of a road which will run parallel with the Mississippi for five or six hundred miles. Will any man say that the road would be preferred to the river either for transportation or travelling? No, sir. Then, is not your project useless, and will it not prove an improper expenditure of the public funds to attempt to carry the road beyond Memphis?

New Orleans has local advantages which nothing can take from her; it cannot injure her to have the road terminate at Memphis; and if the road should so terminate, it would be on the direct route from this city to the province of Texas, which I hope will one day belong to the United States, and that at no great distance of time.

These considerations, I think, are entitled to the notice of the committee. If we must burden the people by a great expenditure, let us endeavor to do it with a view to the general good of the country. As to the defence of the country, every man must know that the valley of the Mississippi can produce a sufficient number of troops to meet any enemy who may have the audacity or vanity to attack our western frontiers or New Orleans—that noted battle ground, where, a few years since, we made the most powerful enemy on earth tremble; where the proud troops of England, headed by their haughty Lord Packenham, so soon became tired of our present Chief Magistrate and his brave little band. We are at present much stronger than during the last war; and if we desire to transport an army to New Orleans, or any thing else, nature has furnished us with the best road in the world, the importance of which we have once experienced. Should it ever happen that your brave soldiers, who fought so gallantly at Bladensburg, should be called on to render us assistance, I should be in favor of their taking a water passage at Memphis; a ride on the water, and a pleasant nap or two, might recruit their strength and sustain their natural bravery. I do not anticipate that those heroes will ever be called on to protect us; if there is a call, it will be on the other side; and it is now to be regretted that you had not been aided here by a few Kentucky and Tennessee boys, in your brave exertions to prevent the disgraceful burning of the capitol.

In the district which I represent, there are eighteen counties, in the whole of which there is not a spot of ground twenty-five miles from a navigable stream; and, for my part, I would much rather see the public money expended in clearing out those rivers, than in opening roads. By the bill, fifteen hundred dollars per mile is to be expended. This, I fear, would be but an entering wedge. But we will suppose the road to be fifteen hundred miles in length; at this rate it would cost two millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. But I believe the distance to be farther than gentlemen have calculated, and the expense will be greater.

Mr. OHILTON gave his reasons against the measure, although friendly to the system of internal improvement.

The debate was continued by Messrs. COKE, CARSON, CRAIG, of Virginia, SPEIGHT, PETTUS, and BARRINGER; but, before a vote was taken on the final question,

The committee rose, and reported progress.

BROWN, MAJOR-GENERAL.—In the House, resolutions on the decease of, 54; a bill for the relief of the widow of, considered, 78; statement of his affairs, and cause of his death, 78; is it innovating too much on the practice of this House to grant the means of support to the family? 78; examination of the laws of Congress, 78; the House cannot consistently pass this bill, 78; the custom to pay gratuities and pensions to the widows and orphans of soldiers, 78; case of Col. Harding, 78; the claim is stronger for being unaccompanied by a memorial from the widow, 79; the passage of the bill a matter of duty, 79; the House no right to do acts of partial legislation, 79; we have no testimony that he sacrificed a dollar in the public service, 80; a precedent in the law giving five years' pension to the widows of those who fell in war, 80; when our patriotic citizens have yielded their lives are we to say we have given them a sufficient reward in the glory which they have achieved? 80; a few facts, 80; it seems to be supposed that we have no power to legislate for particular cases, although we have the power to legislate generally, 81; he left a family in want, 81; the pension law not analogous in principle, 81; if this bill pass, those who die in civil offices in a state of poverty, will be entitled to the same consideration for their families, 81; what are we called to do? 82; have we power to pass this bill? 82; it is said that glory is the soldier's pay, 82; bill passed, 83. See Index, vol. 9.

Buffalo and New Orleans Road.—In the House, a bill to establish a national road from Buffalo to New Orleans, through Washington, considered, 699; it leads from two frontiers, 699; badness of the road during the last war, 699; character of the population of the country through which it passes, 699; will open lucrative communication between interesting sections of the country, 699; advantages of a road to New Orleans, 691; the routes surveyed, 691; reasons for preferring the western route, 691; reasons for embracing the two roads in the same bill, 692; preference of the western route, 692; is this road on the western route necessary for the purposes of this country for commercial, mail, and military objects, 693; character of the country, 693; utility of the road for mail purposes, 694; use of this road for the military operations of the Government, 694; this road opens to the southern part of Alabama the most speedy, natural, and efficient means of defence, 695; your troops encountered the horrors of famine on the margin of this road, 695.
 Passage of the bill urged on four general considerations, 699; the constitutional powers of Congress have been assumed, 699; inexpediency of the measure, 699; not one of the four considerations urged requires that this road should be built, 700; what kind of road is proposed by this bill? 700; the superior improvement of railroads, 700; extracts from the report of engineers, 700; next in order are political considerations, 701; a crisis in our Government now perhaps at hand, 701; military considerations, 701; how long would it take troops to get to New Orleans by this road? 702; folly to make it for military purposes, 702; the transportation of the mail, 702; extract from the Postmaster General's report, 702; steam navigation will supersede roads, 702; the relative merits of the different routes, 702; has Congress a right to re-distribute the surplus money in the Treasury beyond what may be necessary to defray the ordinary expenses of Government? 704; the policy of a nation in regard to its funds is very different in some respects from that of an individual, 704; further debate, 703, 706, 707, 708.
 The different routes proposed, 713; comparison between the different lines surveyed, 714; it is contended that in a commercial aspect the western section contains very great advantages, 715; the military advantages of the western road, 715; this bill is one of grave character, 719; for what is Government instituted, 719; not to open these avenues is to bury the talent intrusted to us, 720; the conceded power should be confided to great leading national objects, 720; what are the anticipated mail advantages? 720; the commercial considerations which bear on this question, 721; are there sufficient reasons to justify the making of this road from here to

- New Orleans ? 731; the road is one of first importance to the Government in three points of view, 732; the mouth of the Mississippi is the key of the whole western country, 732; it passes through a country which was the scene of suffering during the last war, 732; the people to be benefited by this road are in a situation to ask but little from this Government, but to propose the means of defence, 732; view of the country through which it passes, 732; importance of connecting the waters of the Tennessee with the Coosa, 734; tidewater has been the spoiled child of this Government, 734; further remarks, 735, 736.

- Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.*—In the Senate, a bill to authorize a subscription to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, considered, 246; a motion to recommit and to amend, so as to include a subscription to the Dismal Swamp Canal stock, 246; this motion very proper, without implying a design to kill the bill, 247; amendment lost, and bill ordered to be engrossed, 247.
- Chesapeake & Ohio Canal.*—In the House, a bill to authorize a subscription to the stock of, debated, 154; objects of the bill of 1824, 154; if the friends of internal improvements do not wish to see that system utterly broken down, they must consent to have specific appropriations made for specific surveys, 155; sentiments of Jefferson, 155; necessity of making appropriations for these surveys specific, 155; dangerous to trust too much executive discretion in the expenditure of money, 155; the growing corps of engineers, 155; sixty-nine objects reported at the last session as having been examined since 1824, 156; roads surveyed, 156; is it not time for Congress to say to the war-department, finish some of the routes you have commenced surveying before you ask more money for new ones? 156; contemplated surveys, 156; the canal to Lake Erie, 157; the canal around the falls of the Ohio, 157; queries relative to the cost, time of completion, &c., of this canal, 157; replies, 158; railroads, 158; amendment postponing payment till the private subscriptions were paid up, moved, 158; it will practically destroy the bill, 158; amendment modified to a proportional payment, 159; further debate, 159; amendment carried, 160; bill ordered to be engrossed, 161.
- Question on the passage of the bill, 161; necessity of extending the Ohio & Chesapeake Canal to the lakes, 161; harbors on the lakes, 161; expediency of this government becoming a joint undertaker with the corporations of this district, 162; the policy pursued by the government of late years, 162; advantages secured by the revolution were very differently estimated by different portions of the community, 162; the proposed canal too visionary in its conception, too expensive in its execution, and too profitless in its enjoyment, to have been undertaken by the government, 163; will a reasonable profit be enjoyed by the people from what the government should lay out? 163; objections examined, 164; an improvement carrying with it more of a national character than any that can be made in these United States, 165; bill passed, 165. See Index, vols. 8, 9.

- Columbia River, Occupation of.*—In the House, a bill to authorize the occupation of, considered, 573; the best way to settle a new country is to leave it to the enterprise of private individuals, merely extending to them the arm of national protection, 373; the amount of trade there, 373; importance of such a station in case of war with Great Britain, 374; estimates of the navy department, 374; three thousand persons at the least ready to embark in this enterprise, 374; the language should be studied with great care, lest the nation should compromise its rights, 374; the bill attempts to reconcile two incompatible schemes, 374; it grants to settlers nothing more than might be reasonably asked, 374; the amendment goes to sanction foreign colonization, 375; it will allure the wild and desperate portion of the community, 375; what was to be done after these settlers had obtained possession of the land and erected forts? 375; suppose the bill passes, and thereby gives a social existence to that country, 375; insurmountable difficulties that attend the navigation of the river, 376; the very names described the place, 376; facts relative to the fertility of the country, 376; would a brotherhood of affection remain between that distant family and the States that remain united? 377; the character of the country, 377; accounts of Lewis and Clarke, 378; a peculiar kind of men necessary to fortify the mouth of Columbia river, 378; the settlement would be a foreign colony, 378; the profit to be derived from these barren regions, 378.

Existing treaties between the United States and Great Britain, 379; the twelve months' notice has not been given for annulling them, 379; can we take exclusive possession until this notice has been given? 379; bearing of the proposed measure on our relations with Great Britain, 380; the right to the country is ours, 380; a portion of this region a perfect garden, 380; does the jurisdiction belong to us? 380; main points of the bill, 380; that relating to jurisdiction a delicate one, 381; something should be done to keep peace with the British settlements and to protect our hunters and trappers, 381; ought we to forbid our citizens from going into this country while British subjects have free range? 381; the bill more conciliatory if 49° is made the northern boundary, 381; the opinion of this Congress ought to be heard, 382; our country is not oppressed by a dense population, 382; we may wonder what can induce a settler to seek this inhospitable region, 382; it is said we ought to take possession of the territory or some other power certainly will, 382; what power is there which is now attempting to hold the country north of the Columbia? 383; who has forgotten the expedition once projected to the Yellow Stone River? 383.

The substantial question is, whether any such change has occurred in the relations of this country to any other portions of the world, as to require us to assume a new attitude? 383; Columbia River is a stream of impracticable navigation, 384; the right of the United States to these possessions is perfect, 384; facts and arguments in favor of the bill, 384; is it expedient now to pass the bill? 385; the forebodings which were opposed to the acquisition of Louisiana have been happily answered by experience, 385; this assumes the territory from 43° to 54° 40', 385; would not convert into a territory a country in dispute, 385; object is to afford protection to our citizens residing there, 386; before the late war the Americans nearly monopolized the trade of Oregon, 386.

Motion to commit the bill to the Committee on Territories, with instructions, 387; by convention the country is free and open to our citizens, and to subjects of Great Britain, 388; it does not say it shall be open to the action of both Governments, 388; may you leave your citizens unprotected and ungoverned? 388; the bill should be so modified as not to conflict with the terms of our convention, 388; it is objected, that is granting certain companies monopolies, 389; the provisions of the bill will not violate our convention with Great Britain, 389; the country should be occupied before it is explored, 389; the amendment proposes to authorize a private company to purchase of the Indians forty miles square, on which to erect a fort, 390; save those inhabitants of the wilderness from annihilation, 390; amendment proposed, 390; third section examined, 391; fourth section examined, 391; objections to the bill examined, 391; amount of the trade in furs and peltry, 391; the persons who negotiated the convention with Great Britain were regardless of the best interests of the nation, 392; duty paid in England on foreign furs alone, 392; advantages of an exploration, 392; the coast is an improper location for troops, if the object is the protection of the fur trade, 393; General Clark's account of Oregon, 393; it is thought that nothing is wanting but a little aid from the Government, 393; the whale fishing is, it seems, to be made tributary to the commercial importance of the intended territory, 394; the transportation of troops at the mouth of the Columbia is spoken of as if it were an affair of daily occurrence, 394; the provisions of this bill are not adapted to the end in view, 395; a word on extending civil jurisdiction over the country, 395.

Question on the amendment authorizing an exploration of the country, 390; something should be done at once, 390; a military post best designed to secure the object in view, 390; establishment of Astoria, 391; act of surrender and acknowledgment, 391; the commercial treaty between the United States and Great Britain, 391; we have been actually dispossessed of the country west of the Rocky Mountains, 392; unfortunate if an impression should go forth from this debate, that this territory was of little consideration, 392; the harbor at the mouth of the Columbia one of the most important considerations in regard to this region, 392; nature of the harbor, 393; accessibility, 393; character of the soil of that region, 393; descriptions, 394; Indian murders, 394; the cause, 394; statements of individuals, 395; we are tenants in common, so far as present possession is concerned, 395; how a military post at the mouth of the river will protect traders, hundreds of miles in the interior, 396.

Amendment moved, 311; now decided that if any thing is done, it shall be more than sending a party to explore the territory, 311; some decisive act should be done on our part, indicating our determination not to surrender one particle of our claim, 312; more desirable to see the country remain a hunting than an agricultural region, 312; history of our western settlements, 312; objection to military posts derived from the third article of the convention, 312; the amendment would be partial, and ineffectual for the attainment of its object, 312; bill with the amendments passed, 314. See Index, vols. 7, 8.

Commerce of the United States.—See Index, vol. 1, 8.

Commerce of the West.—In the Senate, the bill allowing duties on foreign merchandises imported into Louisville, Pittsburg, &c., to be secured and paid at those places, considered, 309; the public is secured, and the convenience of the merchants promoted by this bill, 309; the citizens of Pittsburg become indifferent on the subject, 309; provisions of the bill, 309; object to give facilities to western commerce, 309; hardships under the present mode, 309; bill ordered to the third reading, 309.

Cumberland Road.—In the Senate, a bill to provide for the extension of, westerly from Zanesville, Ohio, considered, 233; every bill of this kind should be postponed until the great question of the expenditure of public money was settled, 233; a proposition now before Congress which would settle this question, 233; bill ordered to be engrossed, 234.

The bill and amendment present a subject of discussion of the deepest interest to the American people, 251; short historical sketch of the Cumberland Road, 251; the conclusion from this history is, that this road was made by the United States as a mere proprietor, to carry into effect a contract with the State of Ohio, and not as a sovereign, 252; the case of Pennsylvania, 252; what does this precedent establish? 253; the present bill proposes to change the character which the United States have hitherto sustained in relation to this road, from that of a simple proprietor to a sovereign, 253; the road was made in the manner that one independent sovereign would construct a road through the territories of another, 253; what does the power to erect toll-gates necessarily imply? 253; State courts not bound to take jurisdiction of criminal offences against the laws of the United States, 253; all the penal enactments of this bill, or of future bills which it is intended to pass, must be carried into execution by the Federal courts 253; can any man say he believes the Federal Constitution intended to bestow such powers on Congress? 253; from the very nature of incidental power, it cannot transcend the specific power which called it into existence, 254; what is the nature of the power conferred on Congress "to establish post-offices and postroads?" 254; should Congress act on the precedent which this bill would establish, it is impossible to foresee the dangers which must follow to the States and to the people of this country, 254; the clause of the constitution relating to exclusive legislation, 255; the jealousy with which our ancestors conferred jurisdiction upon this Government, 255; resolution of Pennsylvania passed at their last session, authorizing the Federal Government to erect tollgates upon this road, 255; if the States have the power to cede jurisdiction, the United States have no power to accept such cessions, 255; if Congress has not the power to pass this bill, the States cannot confer it, 255; this question has already been settled, so far as a legislative precedent can settle it, 256; early feebleness of the Government, 256; a giant now, 256; a party friendly to the rights of the States and people should oppose this bill, 257; the constitutional question not involved, as the construction of the road rests on a contract prior to the constitution, 257.

In the House.—A resolution to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to construct the same in Indiana, 258; objects of the resolution, 259; amendment offered, 259; resolution carried, 259.

The bill proposes to erect tollgates on the Cumberland Road, 260; a mere question of property, and of the right in Congress to protect, by its laws, that property, 260; it is said the bill would impose great hardships upon the offender, 260; this road is a mail road, and the post-office laws, among other things, impose fines for obstructing the transportation of the mail, 260; why not also for passing a tollgate and refusing to pay? 260; this property belongs to the United States, 261; the United States now hold real estate in the limits of the old States, over which they have not exclusive jurisdiction, 261; having the property in this road, have they a right to erect tollgates for its preservation? 261; the sort of jurisdiction which the United States have over this road, 261; they have now the title to many parcels of land, over which they have no exclusive jurisdiction, 262; act of 1803, 263; amount of the two per cent fund, 263; the power to regulate highways is certainly not among the enumerated powers of the General Government, 263; if we have not the power to execute an end, we cannot use the means which conduce to it, 263; the attempt to derive the power from the military power, and that to establish post-offices and post-roads, 263; history of our progress on this subject, 264; it is said the constitution gives us power of erecting tollgates, if not, we are authorized to do it by compact, 264; these points examined, 264; all the powers which the constitution gives to Congress relate to persons and things, except two, which are to exercise exclusive legislation, &c., and the power to dispose of and make all needful rules, &c., 264; the rule by which to decide in what cases the sovereignty of the States has been alienated, 265; all the powers of the Government may be considered as emanates from its sovereignty, 265; with the exception of the cases cited, it is not competent for the General Government to exercise, or acquire by purchase, jurisdiction, 266.

Three questions present themselves for discussion

under this bill, 370; principal errors lying at the root of the subject, 370; is this Government a confederation of independent sovereign governments? 370; history of the formation of this Government, 370; the constitution was ratified, and subsequently enacted by the people of the several States, and not by the State Governments, 371; are the powers of the Government derived from the State Governments? 371; does this Government exist only in this ten miles square? 372; do the States enjoy a paramount and exclusive jurisdiction over the soil they cover? 372; this is a government of the people, and its powers are all sovereign and paramount, 373; a successful opposition to this bill requires that the force of legislative precedent should be destroyed, 373; unnecessary to speak of compacts on the subject of this road, 373; if the General Government cannot erect tollgates, can she authorize the erection of them by the States? 374; your contract to connect the Western world with the Atlantic border, 374; four-fifths of the lighthouses are erected within the limits of the States, 374; importance of the decision as to its effect on other contemplated improvements, 374.

No scruples of the existence of such a power in the constitution, 377; it is contended that this power, called the making power, does not involve the preserving power, 377; the efficiency of the one would be, in a great measure, destroyed without the other, 377; if repeated decisions, and the uniform practice of the Government could settle any thing, this question ought to be regarded as settled, 377; this road is now in a state of rapid decay, 378; the power of creation carries with it, as an inseparable incident, the power of preservation, 378; it is said the politicians of this country are hereafter to be divided into two great parties, 378; without internal improvements, what is the West ever to expect from the Government? 378; does the bill provide for such repairs and preservation of the road as is necessary? 379; Congress is vested with plenary powers by the constitution to construct roads and canals of a national character, 379; so far as principle is involved, the amendment presents quite as strong a question of constitutional power as the original bill, 379; a cursory view of the formation of the Government, and its powers prior to the adoption of the constitution, 380; objections to the Articles of Confederation, 380; the words of the constitution, 380; if the amendment prevails, it cannot fail to be considered as the abandonment by the Federal Government of the whole system of internal improvements, 381; why should we confide to certain States a duty we can as conveniently attend to as they? 381; difficult to define the powers of the General Government on all occasions, to avoid apparent conflicts, 381; the nature of our governments, 381; are the States then sovereign? 382; what do gentlemen mean by saying jurisdiction always attaches to soil? 382; no State can, without the consent of Congress, enter into any compact or agreement with another State, 383; views of the subject have been presented, calculated to engender serious doubts, 385; if the Government has the power, a strong necessity for its exercise exists, 385; conditions of the compact made relative to the Northwest, 386; rights and duties of the respective parties to this compact, 386; the fact of the expenditures cannot affect the power of the argument, 387; how Congress may derive the power of making an appropriation for that part of the road through Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia, 387.

Two grounds of objection to the exercise of this power, 388; have Congress the right to erect tollgates? 388; principle upon which the State constitutions are predicated, 388; the only kind of road the United States can make is postroads, 389; you must employ the same means to repair postroads as may be employed to establish them, and no other, 389; no system of policy of great and general interest can be either introduced here or successfully opposed, until public sentiment shall have been in some degree prepared for its adoption or abandonment, 389; anomaly in the pretensions of the leading advocates of this system of internal improvements, 390; grounds upon which it is attempted to sustain the authority of Congress to enact the main provisions of the bill, 391; if you grant the power to make the road, there is no constitutional impediment to the erection of tollgates, 391; the power in Congress to construct roads and canals has never been sanctioned by long and general acquiescence, 392; power of the Federal Government to apply to public use so much of the property of the citizens as may be required in the execution of this system of internal improvement, 392; it is said that Congress, being invested with the war-making power, and charged with the common defence, you would strip the country of one of the most efficient means of defence if you deny this power to make roads and canals, 393; further remarks, 393; what does this amendment propose? 395; a road leading from the Atlantic to the Mississippi was considered of great national importance, 395; political opinions of Mr. Jefferson, 395; to go as far as he did to appropriate money to make the road, was a fundamental error, 396; it has given rise to a new theory, 396; further debate, 396; bill ordered to third reading, 397; in the Senate, tollgates struck out, 400; House concur, 401. See Index, vols. 3, 4, 5, 9, and Index, vols. 7, 8, Appropriations.

DUBOIS, MADAME, the case of.—In the House, the case of, relative to bringing back slaves from Cuba, considered, 144; facts of the case, 144; right of every citizen of the United States to travel and take his servants, and bring them back, 144; case of ambassadors, 144; the law prohibiting the security of slaves was to be construed in the most strict and rigid manner, 145; further remarks, 145.

Duties on Imports.—In the House, the bill considered, 54; where are we to stop in this system of progressive protection? 54; the tariff of 1824, if rightly executed, would give all the protection which the people of this country ought at this time to expect, 54; full faith and credit should not be given to all the statements in petitions and memorials, 54; not a man would have thought of increasing the duty on certain articles, but for the clamor raised by the wool manufacturers, 55; hemp is abundantly protected, 55; the manufacturers of cordage seem to have escaped the notice of the committee, 55; look at the necessity for increasing the duty on duck, 56; system of fraud practised to avoid existing duty, 56.

Public interest directed for many years towards the establishment and progress of domestic manufactures, 57; no need of protection to the manufacturers of molasses, 57; increase of the business, 57; history of the legislation on this subject, 57; imports of molasses, 58; the poorer part of the population pay the greater portion of this tax, 58; the lumber business, by the imposition of double duties, would be annihilated, 58; the fisheries would wither at the loss of any important branch of our trade with the West Indies, 58; the interest of distilling molasses would necessarily be ruined by doubling the duties, 59; quantity annually distilled, 59; importance of the tobacco interest, 59; the restrictions of the constitution, 59; are these additional duties necessary to support the government and defend the country? 60; if there be a chosen race of men, it is the farmers, planters, &c., 60; the incessant augmentation of duties on imported articles to favor manufactures, is a dangerous procedure, 60; history of the tariff of this country, 61; it cannot be the policy of this Government to turn the manufacturing capital of this country to the manufacture of the raw material of foreign countries, when we can produce the same, 62; the proposed duty on wool, 62; the United States now produce a sufficient quantity of coarse wool for every demand of the present manufacturers, 62; calculation of the wool grown in the United States, 63; consumption of woollen goods in the country, 64; importation of foreign wool, 64; its conflict with the home article, 64; where is the evidence of the want of foreign coarse wool? 65; many of these importations are made in evasion of the spirit of existing laws, 65; it is alleged that most of the wool is of a finer quality than the native wool of the country, 65; it has been said that the demand for these coarse wools cannot be supplied by the native wools of the country, 66; what remedy is proposed against the importation of these coarse wools? 66; the subject of woollen cloths, 66; the cost of the raw wool in this country is about one half the cost of the cloth it makes, 67; the cost of the wool in this country is greater than the cost of the same wool in England, by from 50 to 80 per cent. upon the English cost, 67; what are the present and the proposed duties on these goods? 67; are the duties proposed sufficient to give to the manufacturer of woollen cloths that protection which he actually requires? 69; the frauds alleged to be committed, 70.

Motion to strike out the minimums, 74; this system is an entire departure from the settled policy of the Government, 75; what would be the effect of the minimums recommended by the Harrisburg Convention? 75; no combination of wool growers and wool manufacturers should ever attempt to dictate a tariff to the people of this country, 75; the Legislature of Pennsylvania has not sanctioned the proposition of the Harrisburg Convention, 76; the amendment will be an absolute and immediate prohibition of nearly all the foreign woollens worn by the poorer classes of the people, 76; the minimums will be premiums for the perpetration of fraud and perjury, 76; it is said they are sanctioned by the example of the cotton minimums, 76; the proposed measure of the Harrisburg Convention would give birth to a system of smuggling, 77; if you wish to adopt a prohibitory system, you have not selected a proper course, 77; amendment lost, 77.

The only foreign trade of North Carolina, 84; if this vent for our products is closed, great distress must ensue, 84; extent of the sales of lumber at the French Islands, 84; results of a voyage, 84; state of commerce at the ports on Ocracoke Inlet, 85; extract from a memorial, 85; amount of exports to the West Indies, 85; why shall this trade be so grievously oppressed? 86; it is said the bill is a compromise between two great contending parties, the manufacturers and the growers of wool and grain in the Northern and Middle States, 86; is the lumber and agricultural interest to be sacrificed, to try the experiment of making the American people consume whiskey? 87; history of the Madeira trade, 87; operation of the bill on North Carolina, 88; of more importance to the grain grower of North Carolina that the item relative to molasses should be retained in the bill than any other, 88; amendment rejected, 90; various amendments moved, 90.

Moved to strike out "ten" and insert "seven and a half" as the duty on molasses, 90; operation of the present law, 90; increase of duty on foreign spirits, 91; bounty to the manufacturer of rum from molasses, 91; how will this duty reach the western farmers but through the western distillers? 91; keeping the duty in the bill will get votes against its passage, 91; further remarks on the duty on molasses, 91, 92; amendment carried, 93; bill ordered to be engrossed, 93; the bill, 93.

Question on the passage of the bill, 95; motion indefinitely to postpone, 95; the bill is opposed at the outset by the manufacturers and wool growers, 95; all amendments are precluded, 96; the immaturity of the bill, 96; reckless precipitation with which the subject has been pressed to a conclusion, 97; the minimum principle, 97; absolutely impossible that any of the manufactures embraced in this bill can be made as cheap in this country as in those from which we import them, 98; what is the comparative price of labor in Great Britain and the United States? 98; statement of wages in Great Britain, 98; an American laborer receives nearly as much in a day as the English laborer in a week, 99; the same course of reasoning applicable to capital, 99; the cost of the raw material for woollen manufactures, 99; the idea that domestic competition will reduce the price till it becomes as low as the foreign production, is founded on an utter misconception, 100; address of the Harrisburg Convention, 100; its literary character, 100; it is conceded that free trade would be most conducive to a nation's prosperity, if all nations would pursue the policy of tolerating it, 101; fearful responsibility for the passage of this bill, 101; the burdens of this system have now reached a point beyond which you cannot carry them with impunity, 101; distressing to witness the kind of aristocratic influence by which measures of this sort are obviously controlled, 102; we hear grave talk about promoting the interest of a "whole State," when in the very act of imposing a tax upon the great body of the people of that very State, 102; the injustice, impolicy and anti-republican tendency of this system, 103; it is alleged that the farmers are interested in the establishment of manufactures as a means of obtaining a market for their wool, 103; to attempt any interference with distribution of domestic capital and domestic labor by taxing one portion for the benefit of another under pretence of regulating commerce is a gross and fraudulent abuse of a constitutional power, 104; neither this government nor any free government can exist a quarter of a century under such a system of legislation, 104; what is the nature and tendency of the system we are discussing? 105; infatuation which a combination of capitalists and politicians have been able to diffuse over half the country, 105; subversive of the constitution, 106; observation of Chief Justice Marshall, 106; it was not the three penny tax on tea which led the colonists to resistance and independence, but the principle asserted, 106; the supremacy of Congress, 107; go back to fundamental principles, and not abide the decisions of legislative enactments merely, 107; source of the power to protect domestic manufactures, 107; speech of Mr. Randolph, 108; extract from the speech of P. P. Barbour in 1824, 108; a wide difference in a moral point of view between the direct and the consequential operation of a power, 108; if the encouragement of domestic industry is deemed of such consequence, let it be done by the States, consistently with the provisions of the constitution, 110; if Congress can constitutionally pass this bill, it can assume complete legislation over the subject, incorporate the companies, and do any thing else calculated to promote their interests, 110; if any bill is to pass, this one should, because out of the extreme evil the remedy is to come, 110; my object to enter a firm and unflinching protest against this whole system of restrictive or prohibitory imposts, 111; to this system, called American, there seems neither limit nor suspension, 111; state of feeling among the people, 112; you are coercing us in South Carolina to inquire whether we can afford to belong to a confederacy in which such severe restrictions is its established policy, 112; excitement under which some are acting, 112; it is said that we are not prohibited from manufacturing, 114; do not the numerous memorials upon our tables speak a language that should be listened to by this House? 115; the government was formed on the principle that the people should be able to control their rulers, 115; we too, like England, must have our schemes, 116; the flame of this manufacturing mania has been fanned in some States for political purposes, 116; compare the situation of the North at this time with the South, 116; owing to the system of legislation pursued by Congress, we are to attribute, in a great measure, the unprecedented depreciation of our property, 117; bill passed, 118; debate on the title, 118; note, 118.

Drawback.—In the Senate, a bill to extend the time within which merchandise may be exported with the benefit of drawback, considered, 209; course pursued in Great Britain on this subject, 209; time extended to two years, 210.

Drawback on refined sugar.—Four cents now allowed, and the object of the bill is to allow five cents, 210; it will enable the American to compete with the foreign manufacturer in foreign markets, 210; this system should be diminished or repealed altogether, 210; no reason why New Orleans sugar might not be made as dry and as fit for refining as the Havana, 210; shall we give encouragement to the refiners in this country, or to foreigners? 210; the question is whether we shall allow the drawback to the whole amount of the duties or not, 211; original policy of the drawback system, 211; the refining of this article will aid the manufacturer, 211; state of things in 1794, 211; the principle of allowing a drawback was a plain and essential one to the navigation and commerce of the country, 211; in five years the production will equal the consumption, 212; amendment proposed and lost, 212; a nice calculation to know how much the refiner paid for his sugar, 212; five cents too great to be allowed, 212; the government will be the loser, 212; a bounty should not be paid to enable the manufacturer to send the proceeds of his industry abroad, 213; what is the object of refining? 213; number of manufacturers in the country, 214; the object of the bill is really to give one cent more on refined sugar than formerly, 214; amendment offered that the drawback should cease as soon as the exports equal the imports, 214; the drawback has never been allowed on the cost of the brown sugar, but solely on account of excise, 214; a drawback afterwards allowed, 214; the drawback did not originate with the excise, 214; advantages of the drawback system, 214; amendment passed and bill ordered to be engrossed, 215.

Drawback, extension of time for.—In the House, the question on the passage of the bill, 260; it proposes to abolish the per cent. charged on debentures, 260; it will take off $150,000 from the revenue, 260; object of this per cent. charge, 260; this object now provided for, 260; object is to place the foreign trade on the wise and liberal footing of other nations, 261; erroneous impressions, 261; bill passed, 262.

Drawback on refined sugar.—The bill increasing the drawback on refined sugar taken up, 262; the bill proposes to give a bounty on domestic refined sugars, when exported, of five cents per pound under the pretext that this brown sugar pays three cents on importation, 262; object of the bill to correct an error in previous legislation, 263; what ought to be the actual amount of debenture? 262; effect of the bill to grant an additional drawback on refined sugar, 263; if sugar could be raised at home as cheaply as it can be imported, we should not go abroad for the article, 263; the bill ought not to pass, 263; this bill does not legitimately pertain to the system of drawbacks, 263; interfere with our domestic sugar, 264; not so, our domestic sugar is not suitable for refining, 264; we do not produce sufficient sugar for home consumption, 264; this bill will produce a benefit to the commerce and navigation of the country, 264; origin of our allowance of a drawback on refined sugar, 265; a mistake that the policy now contended for had been adopted during the first administration of the government, 266; amount of exports, 266; the advocates of this bill desire so to model our revenue laws as to direct thereby the application of a portion of our capital and labor to the manufacture of an article for exportation out of foreign materials, 266; it will not affect injuriously the production of domestic sugar, 266; sugar forms an essential article of our commerce, 267; in all other countries the drawback equalled the duty paid, 267; duty of Congress to encourage the carrying trade, 267; the only question respects the rate at which the drawback ought to be fixed, 268; more raw sugar brought into the country than is consumed, 268; what reason why such a manufacture should languish? 268; amendment to limit the drawback to foreign sugar when refined, 268; modification recommended, 269; no fears of injury to the sugar interest from this bill, 269; alleged that the drawback should equal the duty as the ground for the passage of the bill, 269; this bill will give a preference to the foreign sugar over the domestic sugar, 270; statement of facts, 270; to the extent that the foreign sugar is refined, the bill will repeal the duty of three cents on that article, 271; a violation of public faith to do now any act to injure the Louisiana manufacturer, 271; the principle embraced in this bill, 271; expenses in Louisiana, 271; decline in the business of refining shown by facts, 272; the last law on the subject, 272; this decline not chargeable to the decreased proportion of drawback, 272; the bounty allowed to the foreign article is the reason why the domestic article is not refined, 272; answer to objections, 273; bill passed, 273.

In the Senate, a bill to reduce the duties on coffee, tea, cocoa, &c., 561.

Salt.—Motion to reduce the duty to ten cents on fifty-six pounds rejected, 561; salt tax overthrown in England, 561; enormous amount of the tax, 561; weight of a bushel, 562; distribution of the tax on different sections of the country, 562; the west the true seat of its most oppressive operation, 562; the provision carriers and exporters entitled to the same bounties and allowances with the exporters of fish, 562; the provision trade of the west, 562; reasons for keeping up this tax, 564; the salt tax brought to the test of the principles of the American system, 564; another ground of claim for the continuance of the duties examined, 565; it is said these duties should be kept up, as in time of war we must depend on the home supply, 565; all these arguments used in vain in England, 566; like result must come here, 566; bill ordered to be engrossed, 566.

In the House, a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill allowing a drawback of ten cents on distilled rum, 675; this resolution proposes to restore the manufacturer, in part, to the situation in which the tariff of 1828 found him, 675; statement of their position, 676; the repeal of this drawback has failed of the object intended, 676; it is not merely for the distiller we should pass this resolution, but for other extensive branches of industry, 676; whom relief to the West India trade will aid, 677; the material used by the distiller is as much the produce of our soil as the whiskey which the farmer gets in exchange for his grain, 677.

Moved to amend by allowing four and a half cents on cotton bagging, 677; explanation of the reasons which induced this motion, 677; the present excited and agitated state of the country on this general subject, 678; general remarks on the tariff, 679; of all the duties imposed by the tariff, that on bagging is most iniquitous and untenable, 679; it is charged against the South that we are too easily excited, 679; what claim has the manufacturer of bagging to the protection of government? 680; it is said, that it is important for the interests of the nation that her supplies should be drawn from her own resources, 680; it is said, the interest of one particular section must yield to that particular policy which promotes the interest of the whole, 680; trifling as this duty may appear, it is one of the highest among our imposts, 681; comparative merits of the claims to drawback of the two articles, 681; further remarks, 682.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9.

Duties, Taxes, &c., Abolition of.—In the Senate, leave to bring in a bill for, asked, 463; title of the bill, 463; abolition of unnecessary duties, 463; explanation, 463; first section, 464; abolishing duties by the joint act of the legislative and executive departments, 464; equivalents, 464; extract from Jefferson's report on commerce and navigation, 464; treaties abroad to be founded on legislative action at home, 465; recommendations of Washington and Jackson, 465; do not the agriculture and manufactures of the country require better markets abroad than they possess at this time? 465; a fair and practicable plan, combining the advantages of legislation and negotiation, 466; the peculiar recommendation of the plan, 466; other sections of the bill, 467, 468; it presents the tariff question under a new point of view, 468; that question has heretofore rested on two great principles—protection and retaliation, 468; how presented to the people under the proposed plan, 468; the principle of discrimination, 469; increased importation of gold and silver, 469; in promoting the internal trade of Mexico, 469; cause a speedy death and burial of the tariff question, 470; laws relative to the salt tax and the fisheries, 470; reasons for proposing to abolish the salt tax, 471, 472; leave granted and the bill read, 472; further considered, 490.

Georgia Claims.—In the House, a motion to reverse the report of the Indian Committee, &c., 330; the question of these claims has never been examined by the House, 330; the merits of the claims, 330; details, 331; ground of action in the decision on these claims, 333; objects for which the claimants contend, 333; the Indians in defiance of the treaty kept the slaves, 333; are the Indians in consequence of their bad faith to be placed in a better situation and the owner of the property in a worse one? 333; the claimants were entitled to receive a just indemnification for the property not restored, 333; what is a just indemnification for a wrong? 333; the property has been lost for eleven years, and is the meagre return of the value of the slaves at the time they were taken an indemnification? 333; justice requires not only a return of the specific property, but compensation for the subsequent detention, 333; are the Indians entitled to the residue of the money after paying the claim of the citizens of Georgia? 334; determined by the treaty at the Indian Springs and the agreement between the Indians and the commissioners of Georgia, 334; stipulation of the treaty, 334; article of agreement, 334; commissioner appointed to decide on the claims, 334; his report to the President, 334; it is said, the Indians are not an independent people, 334; contents of the schedule of claims exhibited to the commissioner, 335; if injustice has been done to the claimants, it is proper for Congress to interpose, 335; the nature of the debt determined only by reference to antecedent treaties, 336; these treaties examined, 336.

The question is whether further legislation on this subject be now necessary or not? 336; what were the considerations that led to the formation of the treaty of 1831? 337; the question presents a covenant, to the perfecting of which the assent of three parties was necessary, 337; in carrying the intention into effect, indemnity for property destroyed is not admitted, 337; it is assumed that the Indians are entitled to the surplus after the satisfaction of Georgia, 337; the powers and rights pertaining by the principles of our Government to the Indian tribes in our confederacy, 337; how our forefathers treated the savages on first landing among them, 338; we scrupled not then to take lands on which we founded our homes that now cover the whole of our limits, 339; individuals possessed the right and power to make such purchases as they might think proper, 339; reason assigned for causing the change in the mode of acquiring Indian lands, 339; King George's proclamation in 1763, 339; further remarks on the policy pursued to the Indians, 340; article of the confederation, 341; what is deduced? 341; another clause, 341; examination of the different surrenders of the waste lands by the different States to the General Government, 343; conditions of those grants, 343; that of the State of New York, 343; that of the State of Virginia, 343; the States admitted from these territories must have the same rights as the original States, 343; that of South Carolina, 343; that of Georgia, 344; stipulation made as late as 1808, that the General Government should extinguish the Indian title, 344; anterior to these surrenders, so far as the Articles of Confederation went, the power of controlling this subject belonged exclusively to the States, 344; examination of the Constitution of the United States, 344; can Congress, if any State thought proper to interpose, take Indians from such State? 345; when the Indian title is extinguished, it is said, the land becomes public land, 345; 4th article of the ordinance for the government of the territory north of the Ohio, 345; may not the soil be in the General Government, and the people subject to the municipal regulations of the State? 346; general inference, 346.

The first question is, to whom the unexpended balance belonged, after satisfying the Georgia claimants? 347; circumstances under which the contract was entered into, 347; the United States have not done justice to the citizens of Georgia in its adjudication of their demands against the Creek Indians, 347; during the Revolutionary war the inhabitants of Georgia were almost entirely driven from its limits by the Creek Indians and their allies, 348; the exuberance of the natural vegetation of the country, instead of proving an advantage to the settlers, had been the occasion of their greatest losses by exposing their stock, 348; different classes of claims improperly rejected, 348; ought the citizens of Georgia to lose their right to have their injuries redressed because compensation was not provided in the treaty? 348; claims upon which the principal has been allowed and the interest refused, 349; claims rejected for the increase of female slaves taken by the Creek Indians, 349.

Hornet, the sloop of war.—In the House, a bill to provide for the widows and orphans of those lost in the Hornet sloop of war, 657; not justifiable to extend the principle to parents, brothers and sisters, 657; sustained by precedents, 657; bill ordered to be engrossed, 657.

Question on the passage of the bill, 659; a dangerous precedent to extend its benefits to brothers and sisters, 659; we have no right to be generous and charitable with the money of other people, 660; commitment moved, 660; the practice of the government in these cases, 660; feeling of distrust towards the navy in former times, 661; shall we admit that the course of our predecessors was dangerous and unwise? 661; the name of the Hornet will be as imperishable as the history of the last war, 661; history of Captain Norris, 661, 662; the principle of the bill has none of the objections offered to the pension system, 662; the bill is like others in relation to brothers and sisters, 663; the relations in which they stand, 663; this provision should meet with the sanction of the House, as it would most assuredly receive the approbation of the country, 663; case of the son of the late Colonel Forsyth, 663; cannot answer to our constituents or consciences, the propriety of thus appropriating the funds, 663; some disposed to "go the whole hog," 664; what is the object of making such an appropriation to those engaged in our land or naval service, 664; the bill is wrong in principle, 664; case of the mother of Commodore Perry, 664; a rule long established and recognized in the proceedings of this House, 664; the bill rests more on a principle of duty than of favor, 664; the objection assumes that the officers, seamen and marines belonged to that class of the community in which they were likely to have wealthy brothers and sisters, 665; those opposed must go against the principle of the bill, 665; occasion of the loss of the Hornet, 665; bill passed, 665.

Indiana, Cherokee.—In the House, an appropriation to extinguish the title to certain lands, considered, 136; are the Cherokees in Georgia willing to sell? 136; statement of the facts, 136; Senate amendment proposes also to extinguish the Cherokee title to all lands in North Carolina, 136; this committee refuse to concur, 136; duty to vindicate the rights and interests of Georgia, 137; the case of North Carolina has not been investigated, 137; the Indians can never prosper while they remain in any of the States or Territories, 137; the amendment of the Senate is injurious to the interests of Georgia, 137; it merely extends the power of the Commissioners, 137; the treaty would cost no more if the lands lay within twenty States, 138; the United States are under no obligation to extinguish the Indian titles within any State except Georgia, 138; strong reasons why North Carolina should share in the benefit proposed to Georgia, 138; Senate amendments approved in committee, 139.

House refuse to concur, 140; a discrimination between the case of North Carolina and that of New York challenged, 140; the General Government estopped to say that North Carolina could not call upon her to extinguish the Indian title, 140; nature of the Indian title, 140; what was Georgia at the close of the Revolution? 141; conflicting claims set up to this territory by several of the States, 141; further debate, 143.

Senate insist on their amendment, 146; motion that the House recede, 146; it is said, if we pass this claim it will be a precedent for other States, 146; no State has such strong claims as North Carolina, with the exception of Georgia, 146; treaty between that State and the Indiana, 146; treaty of Hopewell, 146; effect of this treaty, 147; when did New York, by treaty, extinguish all the Indian title to lands within her limits? 147; no State in the Union has been treated in the same unjust manner by the Government, 147; comparative merits of the respective claims of New York and North Carolina, 147; object of North Carolina in parting with her western lands, 148; obligation on this Government, 148; did the Government faithfully dispose of the lands? 148; it is said North Carolina solicited the Government to make the treaty, 149; further debate, 149; House recede, 150.

Indiana, Chickasaw and Choctaw.—See Index, vol. 9.

Indiana, Emigration of.—In the House, an amendment to the appropriation bill offered, 14; appropriation perfectly proper, 14; amendment to embrace the Chickasaws moved, 14; other bills in relation to them, 14; to bring in the subject at present would defeat other objects, 15; a propriety in including all the Southern Indians, 15; duty of the Government to take the earliest opportunity to extinguish the Indian title in Georgia, 15; the provision relative to the Cherokees introduced in conformity to a compact between the United States and Georgia, 15; claims of the Chickasaws further urged, 15; objections to the amendment, 16; the item came from the Committee of Ways and Means, 16; if the Chickasaws are introduced, all the other Indians will have to follow, 16; importance of the removal of the Florida Indians, 17; not the time for a general discussion of Indian affairs, 17; distinction between the cases of the Creeks and Cherokees and that of the Chickasaws and other Indians, 17; without the appropriation, the Government cannot fulfil its compact with Georgia, 17; forbearance of Georgia, 18; amendment lost, 18.

Moved to strike out "for aiding the Cherokees, &c., to remove," 18; if a general course of policy is introduced by an item in an appropriation bill, the whole course of the Government might thus be changed, 18; there should be no treaty with the Indians without a previous appropriation, 18; now is the proper time to discuss the policy of the removal of the Indians, 18; now settled policy of the Government, 18; of little importance to the Committee at what time the question is met and discussed, 19; the question is one of momentous importance, 19; a just and humane course should be pursued towards the Indians, 19; is the situation of the Indians such as to require the interposition of the strong arm of the Government? 19; what are they now? 20; how have the treaties been made in former years, and how have their lands been acquired? 20; your annuities form the most destructive policy ever pursued towards them, 20; a part of your present policy is to send missionaries among them, 20; are the shades of this picture too highly colored? 21; they should be induced to remove of their own voluntary free will, 21; it is said we have no lands on which to locate them, 21; it is said the Indians cannot be qualified for self-government, 21; some appear to dread the effects of the policy of concentrating the Indians in one section of the country, 22; the fate of the Delawares, 22; will not the Committee rather adopt the policy recommended by two Administrations, by the missionaries, &c.? 22.

Reasons for the proposed amendment, 23; the ordinary appropriation bills should not be embarrassed by any new measures, 23; what was the proposition recommended by our late Chief Magistrate? 23; where are the Indians to be removed to? 24; situation of the country which the Indians now possess within the limits of the several States, 24; the advantages enjoyed by the four largest nations, 25; the present situation of the several tribes or nations, 25; their situation not worse than thousands of our independent yeomanry, 26; the policy of the late Secretary of War, Mr. Calhoun, 26; it is said the Indians are oppressed by the encroachments of the white population which surrounds them, 26; it is said the Indians, while in our vicinity, learn only our vices, and cannot be civilized here, 27; the expense which will attend this measure, 27; estimate for the Chickasaws, 27; look at the situation of the Indians across the Mississippi before we take more over, 27.

Great complaint made as to the manner in which this subject is presented for discussion, 28; the appropriation to aid the Creeks is but the fulfilment of a solemn obligation, 28; expediency and necessity of the appropriation, 29; the colonization of the Indians west of the Mississippi, 29; give that country to them in exchange for theirs, 30; to the pecuniary interest of the Government to remove them, notwithstanding the vast expense, 30; no other salvation for the Indians, 30.

The amendment that no Indians north of 36° 30' be aided in removing south of that degree, or those south in removing north, considered, 31; state of things in the Western and Southwestern States, 31; dangers of angry collision by the removal, 31; the extension of our laws over the Aborigines recommended by Mr. Crawford in 1816, 32; the prosperity of our settlements created a strong desire in them to remove the Indians from their vicinity, 33; the report of the Secretary of War in 1835—the disposition of the Indians endangers the whole Western frontier, and renders the condition of Missouri peculiarly perilous, 34; the appropriation which is now proposed, 34; object of the removal as stated by Mr. Monroe, 35; no digest of fundamental principles has been adopted by Congress as the basis for arrangements with them, 35; result of removing them without such previous arrangement, 35; case of the Florida Indians, 35; can gentlemen go forward another step in this work of desolation? 36; what are the processes to be performed in the execution of this plan? 37; how are you to make them relinquish the chase in a country possessing the strongest inducements to it? 37; you cannot shut out the intercourse of the whites, 38; how are this great number to be reduced to order and regularity, and obedience to law, 38; cost of supporting them in the wilderness, 38; condition of this oppressed people in their present abode, 38; many of the tribes have made great and flattering advances in improvement, 38; they will not voluntarily assist in a work of reformation that must end in an extinction of their own consequence, 39; the Indian's sense of dignity, 39.

The views of all the Indian agents coincide with the friends of the emigration plan, 40; it is denied by some, that the policy of this Government is settled in relation to the question of Indian emigration, 40; the report of the Committee is altogether favorable to the objects embraced in the resolution, 40; the time has arrived when this Government must change its policy in relation to the Indians, 40; the state of things existing between the State of Georgia and the Cherokees, 41; three distinct sovereign legislatures enacting laws upon the same identical subject, 41; this state of things cannot exist, 42.

Singular course of this debate, 43; object of the amendment to destroy the effect of the appropriation, 43; the present policy must result in their utter annihilation, 43; the true question, 43; they are and ought to be considered as minors, and governed as such, 43; statements of the agents, 43; the title of the Florida Indians, 44; their colonization is alike due to ourselves and to the Indians, 44; Committee rise and report the bill to the House, 45.

Indians, Removal of the.—In the Senate, a bill to exchange lands with the Indians residing in States and Territories, considered, 519; amendments moved, 519; they hold a title superior to the British Crown and her colonies, and to all adverse pretensions of our own, 519; in the light of natural law, can a reason for a distinction exist in the mode of enjoying that which is my own? 519; on the increase of population a duty devolves upon the proprietors of large uncultivated regions of devoting them to useful purposes, 520; the case, as it lies beyond the treaties made with them, 520; how would the white man act in the position of the Indian, 521; we have always distinctly recognized their title, 521; we regarded them as nations, 521; our public history in these connections, 521; the dispute of the colonies with Great Britain, 523; under the Confederation, 523; who can doubt the unquestioned political sovereignty of these tribes? 522; a subject of wonder, that after these repeated and solemn recognitions, it should be gravely asserted that they are mere occupants at will, 523; report of the Committee, 523; our relations with them under the absolute superintendence of the General Government, 523; consideration given to the treaty power, 523; treaties with the Indians, 524; whenever we approached them in the language of friendship and kindness, we touched the chord that won their confidence, 525; later treaty with Cherokees, 525; the legislation of Georgia, 525; it is not surprising that our agents advertised the War Department, that if the General Government refused to interfere, and the Indians were left to the law of the States, they would soon exchange their lands and remove, 526; the end, however, is to justify the means, 526.

Georgia has taken her course, and will pursue it, 523; the alternation of coercion must be the result, 523; Georgia stands perfectly justified in the steps she has chosen to take with regard to the Cherokees, 523; the treaty of Galphinton, 523.

The treaty of De Wet's Corner settles the question with the Cherokees, 523; the treaty of Hopewell, 524; it may be asked, what has this treaty to do with the question between Georgia and the Cherokees? 524; the compact of 1809 answers the query, 524; upon the principles assumed by the adversaries of the bill, Georgia stands justified, 524; what has been attempted? 525.

Will Congress authorize the President to exchange territory belonging to the United States, &c.? 528; the authority is to make the exchange with Indians who are willing, 528; is there any thing alarming in this proposition? 528; nothing in the bill unbecoming a great and magnanimous nation, 528; the Message of the President, 529; the first attempt by an act of Congress to operate directly on the States, 529; what will be the practical operation of this Indian protective system? 529; a conflict of laws, 540; proceedings in this case, 540; we are called upon to decide the subject according to the principles of abstract justice, 540; our title has always heretofore been considered as sufficient, 540; question on the amendment, 544; other amendments adopted, 545; bill ordered to be engrossed, 545; further proceedings, 574.

Report of the Committee, 606; moved to print ten thousand additional copies, 606; not true that it was not the intention of this Government and of Georgia to remove the Indians by force, 606; this denied, 606; Georgia has treated the Indians within her limits with humanity, 606; no such excitement in Georgia as has been imagined, 607; her relations with the United States are peculiar, 607; motion to postpone, 607; great misapprehension exists in the country in regard to this Indian question, 607; was it not proper first to know what opinions the report contradicts, and what it affirms? 607; erroneous impressions, 608; better to know what the report contains, 608; mere presumption that the report is partial and one-sided, 608; should not be pressed to vote blindly on this resolution, 608; motions carried, 608, 609.

Indians, Southern.—In the House, a memorial relative to, 607; reference moved, 608; propriety of entertaining every petition, 608; useless waste of the time of the House, 608; character of the petitions, 608; question of our Indian policy destined to create much discussion and feeling, 608; a few words by way of comment on the memorial, 608; it appears to have two objects, 608; whence the necessity of the petitioner's interference, 608; this discussion premature, and will result in no good, 609; a subject of great delicacy and importance, 609; commitment opposed on the ground of the language in which it is couched, 609; real intent of the subscribers, 609; details of the memorial, 610; regret that the memorial was not permitted to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs, 610; an impertinent intermeddling with other people's affairs, 610; it is time to have a definite policy on this subject, 611; what are our affairs, and what the affairs of the nation? 611; implicit confidence in the integrity and intelligence of the Committee on Indian Affairs, 611; the subject matter of the memorial

- pertains to the business of the House, 613; this right of petition has been deemed so sacred, that its security has been provided for in the Constitution, 613; if they speak respectfully to this House, it is all we have a right to require, 613; impossible to retreat from the discussion of the question, 613; the paper is sent here not only as a petition, but as an argument in opposition to the views of the President, 613; the many delicate terms made use of, in relation to Georgia and her policy, indicate the motives which prompted the petition, 613; will produce a feeling injurious to the public interest, 613; referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, 618.

- Judiciary System, the.*—In the Senate, a report on the resolution to equalizing the distribution of justice, considered, 368; a subject of great importance, 323; all admit the inequality, but impossible to report any specific plan, 326; bill laid on the table, 326.

In the House, a bill relative to, considered, 635; this bill proposes no new theory—no untried experiment, 635; prominent points of the judicial history of the United States, 635, 636; the great outlines of the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts, 637; views of the Committee in relation to the question, 637; in regard to the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, 637; too great press of judicial business in each of these States composing the circuit, 637; causes that have contributed to swell the business, 638; situation of the six new States, Louisiana, &c., 638; inequality and injustice of the present system in another point of view, 639; does the present bill present the best plan for accomplishing the object under all the circumstances? 639; most powerful reasons for believing public opinion on this subject is correct, 639; suppose the withdrawal of the justices of the Supreme Court from their circuit, its effect upon public opinion, 639; would they continue to enjoy this extensive confidence, should they no longer be seen by the people of the States? 631; other reasons against the withdrawal of the judges from the circuits, 631; the judgment, like every other faculty of the mind, requires exercise to preserve its vigor, 631; the great objection to the passage of this bill, 639; extend the number of the judges, 639; upon the subject of judicial appointments, public opinion has always been correct, 639; have we no examples of Appellate Courts consisting of more than nine or ten judges, which have been approved by experience? 639; origin of the prejudice against this number, 639; details of the bill, 634.

Amendment to transfer the powers and duties of the Circuit to the District Courts, 635; does this bill carry the benefits of the judiciary to all the States? 635; decisions of the District Courts, in some cases, final and conclusive, 635; duties of the justices of the Supreme Court of two kinds, 635; ought not to resort to independent Circuit Courts and judges, if a better plan can be devised, 636; existing prejudices on this subject cannot be the fruit of experience, 636; how is it that they are to learn the laws and practices of the States? 633; it is said that the justices, if withdrawn from the circuits, would come to the city of Washington, 637; it would not be a thing of course, 637; the justices of the Supreme Court ought to be withdrawn from the circuits, 633.

Whatever be the judicial system, it should be uniform, 636; inequality of the present system as regards the Western States, 636; only ten States when the act was passed, 633; the seventh circuit, 633; present condition of the nine Western and Southwestern States in reference to the operation of the Federal Judiciary, 639; will this bill afford the remedy which the existing evils require? 640; plan to answer the just demands of the West, 641; what is the amendment proposed but a re-enactment of the system of 1801? 641; many and irresistible objections to it, 641; further remarks, 642.

Are the evils attending the practical operation of this system such as require any remedy? 639; the evils complained of, 639; does this bill furnish both an adequate remedy for existing evils, and the best which, under all circumstances, can be adopted? 638; no worse remedy can be adopted than that which increases the judges, 638; it tends to divide the responsibility, and thus diminish the weight of it, 638; an increase in the number tends to produce less concentration of action, &c., 634 also to impair public confidence in the court, 634; in two ways, 634; by increasing on the principle of this bill, may it not become impossible to despatch the business of this court? 635; amendment proposed to be offered, 635.

The system of 1819 preferable, 635; uniformity and permanence are to be aimed at in establishing a Judiciary system, 656; two plans brought before the committee by the bill and amendments, 656; the proposed system is not adapted to the country, and must be finally abandoned, 656; no belief that the court can be made better by increasing the number of judges, 656.

The subject one of extreme difficulty and delicacy, 657; take no step to relax the present hold of the Supreme Court upon public esteem, 658; an increase of judges will have a tendency to destroy the confederate character of the Court, 658; the consideration of economy, 658; the proposed change not necessary, 658.

History of the judicial system of the United States, 673; the doctrine which repudiates the idea of representation in the judicial department is anti-republican, 674; this idea repudiated, 674; meaning of the term judicial representation, 675; are the judges responsible to the people? 675; further explanation, 675. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 9.

Paintings, Historical.—See Index, vol. 9.
Paintings, National, resolution relative to, 198.
Panama Ministers, instructions to.—In the Senate, a resolution calling for the instructions to ministers to Panama offered, 249; interesting to know the results of the mission, 249; these instructions may contain matter which was improper to go before the public, 249; the object is that the Executive may have an opportunity to publish these instructions in vindication of his conduct, 249; it properly belongs to Executive business, 250; who can tell what may be its character as disclosed by the communications which may be made in answer? 250; alarm of the country in relation to the Panama Congress, and desirable to know what grounds for this alarm, 250; the object is to ease the President by the interposition of this body, 251; an act of courtesy, perhaps of justice, to a retiring administration, 252; resolution laid on the table, 252.
 Message communicating the documents sent to the Senate, 253; the resolution having been rejected, the President unasked has obtruded the documents upon the Senate, 253; the opposition to printing surprising, 253; the Executive has the right to make public his official acts, 253; is there any thing unusual in resisting the motion to print? 253; have we the power to arrest here a communication to the House? 254; public opinion is not to be forestalled, 254; the usual mode of proceeding is to refer the message and documents to the Committee on Foreign Relations, 254; the Senator assumes the contents of the papers to be such as to render their publication improper, 255; these documents do not belong to you alone, 255; how does this course compare with that of the Senate, when the Panama mission was advised, 255; motion to print lost, 255.

Motion to transfer the Message and documents to the Executive Journal, 256; motion to refer to the Committee, do., withdrawn, and substitute offered, 256; amendments, 257; transferred to Legislative Journal, 257; printing refused, 257.

Panama Mission.—See Index, vols. 8, 9.

Patent Office, the.—In the Senate, a bill providing for the further regulation of, considered, 541; amendment proposing to admit foreigners to the privilege, do., 541; the fees proposed are too much, 541; better to raise the price to restrict them from issuing in such numbers, 541; two additional clerks unnecessary, 541; the great difficulty has been to so frame the laws as to prevent the issuing of patents to useless inventions, 543; no necessity of increasing the fees, 543; the provision respecting foreigners a very fair one, 543; regulations here nearly similar to those in Europe, 543; further debate, 544; bill laid on the table, 544.

PAULING, JOHN, the widow of.—In the House, a resolution to recommend the report on the memorial relative to, 374; facts of the case, 375; what is it the petitioners ask? 376; what has been done for the other actors of the drama? 376; resolution adopted, 377.

Pay of Members.—In the House, a bill relative to, considered, 538.

Mileage.—Bill provides for a computation of mileage, and a deduction for absence in cases of two post routes, how shall the mileage be determined? 538; one object of the bill is to throw from members the responsibility of fixing the amount of their mileage, 539; the responsibility should be thrown on him, and on him alone, 539; not see the utility of the bill, 539; neither the Postmaster-General nor the Sergeant-at-arms should estimate the mileage of members, 539; members from the same State and the same neighborhood had been in the habit of computing their mileage differently, 539; proposed to take from a member the privilege of fixing at his own will and pleasure the extent of his compensation, 539; if the facts stated in the report were true, it was important that some remedy should be provided, 539; you cannot place a barrier to human ingenuity or error, 539; bill reported, 539.

Various amendments agreed to, 539; an evil exists in the variant computation of mileage, 539; on principles of justice, this bill ought to pass in some shape, 539; why not pass it to-day? 539; no officer out of the House should regulate its peculiar and exclusive concerns, 539; incorrect estimate which the Post-office books give of distances, 539; the doctrine that members are too honorable to need accountability reprobated, 539; further amendments moved, 539; form of the bill, 539.

In the House, a resolution for a bill to reduce the pay of members after a certain number of days, 536; it would save a month's time, 536; other reasons, 536; only objection its unpopularity, 536; suggested to organize a corps to sustain the call for ayes and nays on the motion to adjourn, 536; details of the business of the House, 536; modifications suggested, 537; the great evil of the Government is the immense mass of legislation with which the people are afflicted, 537; two principles connected with this subject which must always enter into the character of every legislative body, 536; moderate salaries are consistent with the spirit and principles of our institutions, 538.

No voice of complaint raised by the people, 719; the

- reproach which the resolution conveys may be correct or not, 710; it is founded upon an assumed fact, the contrary of which is proved by experience, 711; it is not true that this House or any considerable portion of its members desire to remain here without performing any public service, 712; the principle implied is that the members of this body prolong its sessions from mercenary motives, 713; the adoption would be productive of more harm than good, 716; the original resolution, 716; the amendment, 716; grounds upon which they are urged examined, 716; a charge of a want of industry, 716; this Congress relieved from the imputation of any protraction of its sitting, 717; the charge of inertness from mercenary motives, 718; the compensation of members will be reduced, even if the session shall be extended to its ordinary length, to still an ample allowance, 719. See Index, vols. 5, 6.

- Public Documents, suppression of.*—See Index, vol. 7.
- Public Documents, reprinting of.*—In the House, a resolution relative to, offered, 397; a useless and wasteful expenditure of public money contemplated, 398; estimated expenses, 398; cost of printing by Congress for the years embraced in the resolution, 398; contingent expenses of the House for the last seven years, 399; it is a mere question of expediency, involving no principle, 399; the question of expense incidental, 399; the cost of printing in past years affords no data, 400.
- Public Lands: Mr. Poole's resolution.*—In the Senate, a resolution offered to inquire into the expediency of suspending the sales of public lands, 418; note, 418; the policy which ought to be pursued in relation to the public lands, 419; two parties in the country who entertain very opposite opinions in relation to the character of the policy which the Government has heretofore pursued in relation to the public lands, as well as to that which ought hereafter to be pursued, 419; views of these parties on the past action of Congress, 419; one or two particulars, in relation to which the West has some occasion for complaint, 419; difference between our policy and that of other nations, 419; reason that other nations adopted their policy, 420; the best means of building up prosperous communities in the wilderness, 420.

What ought to be the future policy of the Government in relation to the public lands? 430; views of the two parties, 430; as a source of permanent revenue, 430; an immense national treasury will be a fund of corruption, 431; another scheme, that of distribution of the lands among the States, 431; what is our true policy on this subject? 431.

The whole course and policy of the Government on the public lands is spoken of as wrong, 431; nothing harsh or severe in the policy of the Government towards the new States of the West, 432; the analogy between other countries and ours is neither just, nor are the cases similar, 432; it is said we want no permanent sources of income, 433; when gentlemen speak of a common fund belonging to all the States as having a tendency to consolidation, what do they mean? 433; General Washington's consolidation, 433; the tendency of all these ideas and sentiments is obviously to bring the Union into discussion, as a mere question of present and temporary expediency, 433.

The Senator from Massachusetts tells us that the tariff is not an Eastern measure, and treats it as if the East had no interest in it, 434; he intimates that there is a party in the country who are looking to disunion, 434; the uniform, zealous, ardent and uncalculating devotion of South Carolina to the Union, 434; what was the conduct of the South during the Revolution? 434; the attempt to throw ridicule upon the idea that a State has any constitutional remedy by the exercise of its sovereign authority, against a deliberate violation of the constitution, 435; the good old Republican doctrine of '98, 435; Virginia resolutions, 435; Madison's report, extract, 435; action of Kentucky, 436; expression of Mr. Jefferson, 436; his letter to Mr. Giles, 436; these authorities in support of the Carolina doctrine, 437; the whole country once divided on this question, 437; remarks of Hillhouse on the embargo, 437; remarks of Webster on the embargo, 437; the Carolina doctrine is the Republican doctrine of '98, 437.

I am considered as having assailed South Carolina, 438; the reference to Massachusetts for a precedent, 438; the Hartford Convention, 438; he finds no fault with the recently promulgated opinions of South Carolina, 439; ancient harmony between South Carolina and Massachusetts, 439; no encomiums on Massachusetts, 439; the true principle of the constitution under which we are assembled, 439; the right of a State Legislature to interfere, &c., 439; the sum of the South Carolina doctrine, 439; what is the fair interpretation of the resolution to which Mr. Madison is understood to have given his sanction? 439; inquiry into the origin of this Government, and the source of its power, 431; what is the length and breadth of that doctrine denominated the Carolina doctrine? 431; it is held that every tariff designed to promote one branch of industry at the expense of another, is a dangerous, palpable, and deliberate usurpation of power, such as calls for State interference, 432; in Carolina the tariff is a palpable, deliberate usurpation, she may therefore nullify it, 433; at no time has New England or anybody in New England, put forth such a doctrine as this Carolina doctrine, 433; no case to be found in New England, 433; if this doctrine had been acted on in New England in the time of the embargo, we should not now probably have been here, 433; a remark on the Virginia resolutions of 1798, 434; whence is this supposed right of the States derived? 434; the people erected this Government, 434; the constitution and laws the supreme law of the land, 435; this power of State Legislature denied, 435; neither South Carolina nor any other State prescribe my constitutional duty, 435; the doctrine run into practical application, 434; direct collision is the result of that remedy for the revision of unconstitutional laws, 436; it is said, if this Government is the sole judge of the extent of its own powers, it subverts State sovereignty, 437; if any thing be found in the national constitution which ought not to be in it, the people know how to get rid of it, 437; although there are fears, there are hopes, 437; reasons for dissent to the doctrines advanced, 437.

Complaint that the argument in relation to consolidation has been misunderstood, 438; the proposition laid down is taken from the Virginia resolutions of '98, 438; the very idea of a division of power by compact is destroyed by a right claimed and exercised by either to be the exclusive interpreter, 439; in every part of the constitution the people are always spoken of as citizens of the several States, 440; extract from Madison's report, 440; the constitution being a compact between sovereign and independent States, there can be no tribunal above their authority to decide in the last resort, 440; questions of sovereignty are not the proper object of judicial investigation, 440; if the Supreme Court assumes jurisdiction over questions between the individual States and the United States, it is acting entirely out of its sphere, 441; does Congress possess the right of deciding exclusively upon the extent of its own powers? 442; it is vain to tell us all the States are represented here, 443; right of the States before entering into the compact, 443; why not compel a State to appeal to her sister States, when objecting to the constitutionality of a law, by a proposition to amend the constitution? 443; it is said this will make the Union a rope of sand, 444; this doctrine recognized in the Virginia resolutions, 444; by Mr. Jefferson, 444; in the Kentucky resolutions, 444; it is said this right will be dangerous, 445; a State will be restrained by a sincere love of the Union, 445; if the alien and sedition laws had not been yielded, Virginia would have interposed to protect her citizens, 445; views of Mr. Madison, 446; called to carry out our scheme practically, 446; is the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance contended for? 447; an eloquent appeal in favor of the Union, 447.

The argument consists of two propositions and one inference, 447; if the main proposition is conceded, the inference is not warranted, 447; if conceded, the question would be, what provision is made to settle this disputed sovereignty? 448; if the constitution is a creature of the State Governments, it may be modified at their pleasure, 448; even if it was a contract, the gentleman's doctrine is not maintainable, 448; to say the constitution is a compact, is using language applicable to the old confederation, 448; the Government is one of checks and balances, 449; note, 449; a violation of the rule of propriety, 449; change of policy on the tariff and internal improvement disclaimed, 450; despotic power claimed for the Supreme Court, 450; a charge of Judge Story, 451; extract, 451; try the doctrine of judicial supremacy on the case of slavery, 451.

It was not the intention of the States in the formation of the constitution to invest that tribunal with the power of doing any political act, 452; authority of the judges, 453; all the purposes for which civil society was instituted would be defeated in the control of the States by the judiciary, 454; the unrestrained exercise of the sovereign power of the Union is necessary to all the purposes of the Union, 454; unfitness of the judges for the exercise of this controlling power over the sovereignty of the States, 454; is there more safety in that court than in the people? 455; would not the enlightened citizens be as much interested as those judges? 455; who ever before thought that one of the parties to a contract was a competent judge of the matter in dispute? 455; this power asserted for the court is unreasonable in other views, 455; it may be asked, to what tribunal should be referred a question involving the sovereign power of a State? 456; if Congress refused to interfere, the State should appeal to its own sovereign power to protect her own citizens from lawless incarceration by the court, 456; it is in the power of Congress to refer the question to an infinitely more exalted tribunal than the Supreme Court, 457; the case stated, 457; Congress should appeal to the tribunal of the States, 457; an appeal by a State would be as unavailing as unwise, 458; throughout this debate the States have been treated as restless, querulous, impatient, disorganizing beings, 458; the greatest good, when perverted, becomes the greatest evil, 459; on this doctrine of the power of the court, what is to prevent a perfect consolidation of the Government and monarchy or despotism? 459; the argument has gone upon the prediction that the States are to be kept in order by coercion only, 459; every policy which has a tendency to humiliate the States should be deprecated, 460; every institution of man is purer at commencement than at any after period of its history, 460.

The constitution has vested the power here contended for in express terms, in the Supreme Court, 461; understanding of the word sovereignty, 461; if internal improvement is a res judicata, why not yield in this case also? 462.

One of the Virginia resolutions, 473; views of Mr. Jefferson, 478; who does not see cause of new and fearful apprehension to the States? 478; has it come to this, that one of the parties under the government cannot interpose and correct its ruinous tendencies? 478; those views were the views of the fathers of the democratic party, 474; from the fact of two parties in the Federal Government the agents of each must be allowed to decide on the extent of its provisions, 474; remarks of Mr. Jefferson, 475; the people will apply a most sovereign remedy, 475; no institution in this country is above just criticism and fair discussion in regard to its political views, 476; resolutions of New Hampshire on decisions of the court in 1821, 476; how the powers of the General Government have been gradually brought through one of its departments to bear on the States, 477.

Two great questions involved in this discussion, 477; the first a mere speculative political question, 478; the question of South Carolina is with her people, 478; in case of unjust oppression the last alternative remains, 479; writings of Dr. Cooper, 479; lectures of Mr. Dew, 479; men of business cannot remain devoted to a system that must produce their certain destruction, 479.

An examination of the powers of the Federal and State Governments, 480; who is to decide in cases of disagreement between them? 480; in every contest of power there would exist in the judiciary the same motives to lead it astray as exist in the other departments, &c., 481; if the opposition are right, the only security of the States is the integrity of the majority of seven men, 481; power of the court over the sovereign rights of States, 481; a State Legislature cannot nullify and make void an act of Congress, so far as to prevent its operation within its limits, 482, 483.

Any and every question growing out of any circumstances in which a State may conceive her sovereignty impugned is translated to her own tribunals by the same train of argument which induces the conclusion that she may nullify an act of the Federal Legislature, 486; extent of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, 487; some of the rights of independent sovereignty were ceded to provide for the general welfare, 487; no attempt will ever be made by a majority of the large States to destroy the Independence and legitimate powers of the smaller, 488; is there any other forum than this court, established with co-extensive or appellate powers? 488; we have no other direct recourse in the cases we have been considering to save us from the horrors of anarchy than this court, 489.

The union and the happiness of the country depend on a true understanding of this subject, 491; none of the opinions, however much they differ, justify a violent opposition to an unconstitutional law, until an extreme case of suffering has occurred, 491; both of the positions on this subject, seemingly so contradictory, are true, and both false—true as respects one feature of the constitution, erroneous if applied to the whole, 493; distinction between a consolidated and federative government, 493; traces of both these features in the incipient state of our political existence, 493; two characteristics of government apparent in the Federal Constitution, 493; marks of another kind of union than a compact, 498; it is neither such a federative government, founded on compact, as leaves to all the parties their full sovereignty, nor such a consolidated popular government as deprives them of the whole of that sovereign power, 498; the States have given certain powers to the General Government and the right also of enforcing them, 498; the right contended for, a positive veto on the operations of the whole government, 494; when a law is once passed, it is made the duty of the President to execute it, 494; must the President yield to a small majority in the Legislature of a single State? 495; show the written authority, 495; it is asked, will you deny to the States every portion of their former sovereignty? 495; deductions from the Virginia resolutions, 495; views in the Federalist, 496; the court not created as an umpire between the Federal and State Governments, 497; the discontent in an important section of the Union, 497.

The right of a State to annul an act of Congress is one of deep import, 504; it is not derived from the constitution, 504; its effect, 504; checks and balances of the constitution, 504; we are told no such consequences as a dissolution of the Union will ensue, 505; it is extremely difficult to get any more than a bare majority for any measure, 505; the judiciary power under the provisions of the constitution, 506; a power granted to try all imaginable cases that can be described, 506; the question reduced to a narrow compass, 507; the great question solved by the convention, 507; jurisdiction of the court, 508; objections answered, 508; precedents, 508; debate on the Virginia resolutions in the Virginia Legislature, 509; nothing in them that looks to the right of a State to annul an act of Congress, 509; opinion of Jefferson, 510; letter of George Nicholas, 510; resolutions of Pennsylvania in 1809, 511.

Public Lands Distribution.—In the House, a resolution relative to distribution of the proceeds, 588; moved to strike out "for purposes of education," 588; protest against the number of propositions relative to the public lands, 588; what proportion has been given to the Atlantic States? 588; the West has had no donation of public land, 584; this subject agitated in every part of the Union, 584; the donations of land beneficially bestowed, 584; further debate on the proposition for inquiry, 584; resolution laid on the table, 585.

Motion to inquire into the amount and value of the public lands which have been given by Congress to any State, or to any public institution in said State, 592; the present an improper time to make the inquiry proposed, 592; excitement in the House on this subject, 593; object to inquire into the mode of disposing for the future of the proceeds of the public land sales, 598; a policy that would be wise for an individual would be wise for the Government, 594; the United States are bound by every principle to contribute something to the improvements in the new States, as they had a direct tendency to increase the value of the public lands, 594; this discession is premature, and not likely to arrive at any profitable end, 594; the only question for discussion is, whether the subject of the resolution is of sufficient importance to demand inquiry? 595; the report at the last session furnishes all the statistical information desired, 595; the constitutional power of Congress to make the proposed distribution among the States, 595; the present, the peculiar and the appropriate time for inquiry, 596; a substitute to the resolution, 596; the amendment looks forward to the general operation of the resolution, 596; an equitable division among the States proposed, 596; motive or consideration which induced Virginia to cede, 596; is the amendment calculated to promote this great and magnanimous object? 597; would the new States stand and look on and see you carrying away the fruits of their hard labor? 597.

The operation under the provisions of the amendment, 601; precipitancy, 601; never denied that Congress had a right to dispose of these lands according to the tenor of the compacts with the various States, 601; the resolution is merely for the purpose of inquiry, 602; any retrospect of donations to new States unjust, 602; the amendment proposed is a Pandora's box, 602; the surrender of the States never ought to be viewed as a donation, 602; a strong and inveterate disposition manifested to scramble for the public funds, 608; the amendment involves the rights and interests of the new States, 608; the measure is entirely premature, 608; the amendment much more objectionable, 604; grants for different purposes, 604; considerations on which made, 604; the claim of the old States to this distribution, 605; the resolution proposes nothing definite, nothing conclusive, 605; no disposition to demand a strict reckoning on this score from the people of the new States, 606; our duty in North Carolina to take back from the federal treasury every dollar we can lay our hand on, 606; a subject of great interest to the new States, 606; as a question of inquiry, it is of a character so decisive of the destiny of the new States, that it should be met on the threshold, 606; a requisition of sheer justice before any distribution, 606; previous to any sales, it was known that there were to be certain reservations for the purposes of education and internal improvement, 606; what has been the effect of the concession on the part of Alabama? 607; the proposition unjust and unequal to the new States, 607; whence does the proposition come? 607.

No cessions made by Rhode Island, 614; she stood in the first rank in the revolutionary contest, 614; these lands have been acquired by disbursements from the common funds of the nation, 614; neither the patriotism nor the efforts of the States is called in question, 614; proposal of the resolution, 614; amendments calculated to subvert and destroy this resolution, 614; the whole subject of the resolution, with the reasons for adopting it, are so many arguments for consideration in discussing the amendment, 615; the ceding States claimed that they relinquished claims, but never claimed or relinquished to the United States fee simple, 615; history of this subject, 615; sovereigns of Europe never claimed soil and freehold by right of discovery, 615; the London Company, 615; English and French colonies, 616; proclamation of king George in 1763, 616; the rights thus claimed and rules promulgated have never been questioned, 616; the Atlantic States freed the enemy in the struggle for existence, 617; the claim of France during that war, 617; exact political condition of the Western country, in relation not only to the colonies but to European powers, &c., 618; rights of the United States, 618; the purchase from Spain, 618; how purchased, 619; acquisition from France made also by common funds, 619; will the people of the old States quit claim to the people of the new? 620; the resolution, if adopted, will mightily strengthen the Union, 620; further remarks, 620.

Opponents of the resolution not influenced by selfish motives, 621; gentlemen of all sorts of political opinions support this resolution, 621; how will you distinguish this money from other money, when paid into the national treasury? 622; conflicting opinions of the advocates of this resolution, 622; principles upon which this Government is founded, 622; the people of the States have a just ground of complaint that this Government is more rigid than any other in the world in regard to the disposition of these lands, 622; report of a committee in 1780, 622; action of Congress in 1780, 623; opinion of the old Congress on this question, 624; the cession of North Carolina, 624; is it equitable that this division should be made according to representation in this House? 624; if this plan is carried into execution, the people of the new States may forever bid adieu to the prospect of having the title of the United States extinguished, 624; if the desire is to ease the treasury, let the just claims upon the Government be paid, 625; this is an anti-emigration system, 625; resolution modified, 626.

Public Lands, purchasers of.—In the Senate, a bill for the relief of, considered, 500; amendment, 500; its difference from the law as it now stands, 500; in opposition to the whole policy of the bill, 500; the relinquished lands are placed on a better footing than those that have reverted, 501; desire to keep the actual cultivators of the soil from the grasp of speculators, 501; second section of the bill, 502; amendments of the House concurred in, 502; amendments considered, 623; other amendments, 623; bill passed, 622.

Public Lands.—See Index, vols. 1, 2, 3, 4, 7.

Purses in the Navy, pay of.—In the Senate, the bill regulating the duties and providing the compensation for, considered, 512; the present practice, 512; propositions of the bill, 512; the compensation proposed, 514; amendments proposed, 515; question on the third reading, 516; it proposes an entire change of compensation, 516; it will reduce the compensation one half, 516; the compensation allowed, 516; salary contemplated higher than is justified, 517; not the best way to effect reform by increasing salaries, 517; all admit the evils existing, 518; further debate, 518; bill passed, 518.

Reed, 414; on the decease of General Smyth, 535; on the impeachment of Judge Peck, 547, 556; on a western armory, 579; on refuse lands in Tennessee, 579; on the decease of Gabriel Holmes, 583; on distribution of the public lands, 583; on postage on periodicals, 585; on refuse lands in Tennessee, 587; relative to West Point Academy, 643; on cultivation of the sugar cane, 644; on West Point Academy, 669; on ardent spirits in the navy, 670; on retrenchment, 683; on the pay of members, 694.

Retrenchment.—In the House, a resolution relative to, reported, 89; the propriety of the power to send for persons and papers, 89; some reasons should be urged to show the importance of vesting it in a committee, 89; duties charged upon the committee, 89; resolution passed, 89; joint resolution reported, 134.

Committee had not time to prepare and report the bills and resolutions necessary to carry their recommendations into effect, 196; extract from the report of the minority, 196; further remarks, 197.

Resolution directing an examination of the accounts of Gales & Seston, considered, 198; only part of the account to be examined, 198.

In the House, a resolution relative to stationery offered, 268; intended to prevent the unwarrantable use or abuse of the privilege of members, 266; what evidence of the existence and extent of this abuse? 266; facts, 266; the subject matter is one we cannot regulate by public enactment, 267; motion to lay the resolution on the table lost, 267; object of supplying members with stationery, 268; is not a waste of public stationery to the amount of two or three thousand dollars worthy of attention? 268; intended to prohibit its application to matters not connected with the business of legislation, 268; would not its adoption make an appeal to the moral feelings of a succeeding Congress? 268; a great noise had been made on the subject of retrenchment, but after waiting so long what had the House received? 269; other bills are in progress and preparation, 269; better meet the question now, 269; the information has gone abroad for the benefit of the people, 270. See Index, vol. 2.

Revenue Cutters.—See Index, vol. 4.

Revenue, collection of.—See Index, vol. 5.

Resolution, soldiers of the.—In the House, a bill for the relief of, considered, 150; amendment moved relative to the ownership of property by the applicant, 150; the officers have no legal claim to any grant, or gratuity, 150; the officers have a valid claim, 150; case of Captain Dehart, 151; solemn engagements of the old confederation, 150; how were they executed? 151; this money withheld from claimants in violation of every principle of justice, 152; amount due captains of the army now, 152; can you escape paying this balance? 153; as it respects the Revolutionary officers, justice has slumbered a long time, 153; the decision of this House will settle the question, 153; amendment lost, 153; further debate, 154; bills reported, 154.

Amendments moved, 171; question on third reading, 171; carried, 171; bill passed, 172.

Bill important, and requires mature consideration, 248; bill for the relief of officers and soldiers explained, 248; names of some who did not belong to the regular army, 248; this an innovation, 248; their claim such as cannot in equity be resisted, 248; one of the most extraordinary bills ever before Congress, 248; one section gives a pension to a child of a soldier of the last war, 249.

The Virginia Line.—In the Senate, a bill for the relief of the Virginia State Line considered, 558; Virginia asks nothing of the liberality or bounty of the Government, 558; grounds upon which the bill rests, 558, 559; was a reservation made for these troops in the deed of cession? 560; obligation of the United States to yield land for the satisfaction of the warrants, whether in one place or another, 560; bill ordered to be engrossed, 561.

In the House, the report of the committee considered, 633; the bill, 633; amendments moved, 633; the present laws are of a most invidious character, 634; the amendments are calculated to extend the benefits of the pension system, 634; it is said, it will greatly increase the amount of the appropriations, 634; amendments offered and discussed, 635; bill ordered to be engrossed, 636; question on the passage of the bill, 636; a proper time to try the question of providing for the militia of the war as well as the regular soldiers, 636; motion to recommit, 636; merits of the militia, and their claims, 636; other amendments proposed, 637; the provisions of the bill as amended a partial one, 637; it provides for none but the continental line, 637; all or none, 638; some wish to get the funds of this Government distributed, and they care not for what, 638; amount of appropriations, 638. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 5, Soldiers.

Rules of Order.—In the House, a discussion on a motion for reconsideration, 143; practice of the House, 144; the rules, 144; amendments moved, 144.

A resolution declaring that all elections by the House shall be etwa voca, offered, 338; reasons for desiring a change of practice, 339; what are the objections to the proposed change? 339; it would lead to great inconvenience, and to great and useless sacrifice of time, 339; objection to altering the standing rules on every slight occasion, 339.

A Representative ought always to vote etwa voca, 350; occasion no delay, 350; practice of Pennsylvania, 350; let the vote be etwa voca, and put on record, that the constituent may know, 350; is there any reason why the present mode of election is not a good one, and why the mode proposed would be better? 350; we are makers of the laws by which our constituents are bound, and it is proper they should know how each man votes on every law, but this principle does not apply to our acts when merely appointing an instrument to facilitate the discharge of our duty, 351.

Resolution of thanks to the Speaker offered, 401; do the ordinary rules of order apply to the last day of the session? 401; resolution not in order, 401; universal practice has decided that such a resolution may be received on the last day, 401; appeal to the House, 401; further debate, 402; decision of the Chair sustained, 402. See Index, vol. 9.

Tennessee, vote for President in 1833, 394. See Index, vols. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8.
Tennessee, land claims in.—In the House, a bill considered relative to authorizing the State of Tennessee to issue grants for certain lands, &c., 121; the grant is to supply a deficiency which exists in the school lands of the State, 121; a review of the prominent acts of legislation which have taken place on this subject, 123; details of the present state of the lands, 123.
 Quantity of land greater than many suppose, 123; principle and policy of the bill objectionable, 126; the State has a legal claim upon the General Government for 490,000 acres of land, 129; agreement with Tennessee, 129; the country east of Tennessee River, 129; purpose for which this relinquishment is sought, 130; statement of facts, 130; the Act of Congress, 130; the United States are not under any obligation to cede a foot of school land to the State of Tennessee, 131; North Carolina has never released the United States from liability to satisfy her warrants, 131; evidence of the obligation of the General Government to make provision for the support of common schools in Tennessee, 131; the bounties promised by North Carolina, 133; further debate, 133, 134; bill laid on the table, 135.
 Reasons for not obeying instructions of the Legislature, 295; grants of fractions of land could never operate as a precedent, 296; reasons for the amendment, 296; a preference of entry provided for the occupants on the relinquishment, 297; gentlemen from Tennessee disagree as to this grant, 297; the quantity of land proposed to be given, 298; lands in the State have never been surveyed, 299; further debate, 298; adjournment, 299.
 The two propositions compared, 315; objections to the substitute, 316; is Congress ready not only to refuse the application of a State, but to go farther and employ the officers of that State to do something directly at war with her application? 316; the amendment makes no disposition of the remainder of the lands, 316; the passage of that amendment would do direct injury to the persons it was intended to benefit, 317; a very important condition attached to the act of cession, 318; further debate, 319; the bill is advocated as a measure of justice, 320; assertion on which the whole measure rests, 320; a mistake that Tennessee had received less of the public land than Ohio, 320; amount received, 320; statements and opinions of those who favor the amendment, 323; the right of Tennessee to the surplus lands within its limits, 323; grounds upon which the State founds her claim, 323; the burdens imposed on Tennessee, and her inducements to encounter them, 323; cost the United States five thousand per annum to appropriate these lands, 324; if the land is so indifferent, why do you show such solicitude to get it? 325; to what purpose will you convert it? 325; this amendment is at war with the principles of equality, which ought always to be observed in legislation, 326; further debate, 326, 327.
